NOTE:

This story is AU/OoC and, as the standard disclaimer goes, the MaiHime (and other) characters belong to their creators but everything else is this author's. Furthermore, I have chosen to create a world that is based upon several ancient civilizations. The most prominent similarity you will see is that of the Hime (here, a state/nation) to Ancient Rome. The Himean political structure is based almost entirely on the Roman one, specifically that which was in place prior to the empire, or Republican Rome. If you are a historical purist who dislikes seeing people grossly distort the Roman sociopolitical institutions for the sake of Yuri, please look away. Obviously, one had to change an essential thing about Roman society to make the story work: the patriarchy. This makes it possible for me to have women in significant offices/roles. Either that or I turn them into men-and risk having the readers flay me alive.

*Most of the Latin terms are kept intact. The following notes may be referred to before, during, or after the story, to help comprehend the details of the era . You are not obliged to read them now: the reader should simply refer to them as or if the need arises. Use Ctrl+F to find a term whose definition you require.

Vocabulaire:

1. A note on the Himean military - The military structure for the Himean troops follows the Roman one. The largest tactical unit would be the legion . For quick reference: 1 legion = 10 cohorts ; 1 cohort = 600 men (noncombatants included); 1 cohort = 6 centuries ; 1 century = 100 men (noncombatants included).

2. Cursus honorum - "The Way of Honour", the classical Roman/Himean political ladder of governmental offices. It begins at the office of quaestor and peaks at consul. The consul is the highest position, with 2 for every year .

3. Decury - The Roman Senate was organised into groups of ten senators. Each group was called a decury, and as the old laws had it, each decury had to be led by a patrician (s.v).

4. Legates ( in Latin, Legatus ) - The most senior members of a general's military staff. Typically members of Senate.

5. Patricians vs. Plebeians - An important but simple distinction: Patricians come from the original aristocratic families; Plebeian means everyone who is not patrician, and does not necessarily mean "commoner" in the way we use it today. Wealth does not enter the picture in this particular classification: there were a good number of impoverished patricians in Ancient Rome and so it is here.

6. Primipilus - The centurion with the highest rank in a legion, also called the primus pilus . There are many grades of centurion, from first spear centurions to second spear centurions, etc..

7. Stibium - A substance based on antimony (the element). It was used as a cosmetic, as well as for writing, in ancient times. It is similar to the modern eyeliner.

"Surely we'll reach Otomeia today," Chie Harada said, struggling with the ends of her cloak to wrap it more securely around her. She shivered, even with the cloth enclosing her. "This country's climate is intolerable."

"Piss'll freeze before it's even hit the ground in this place," came the sneering comment from her side. The speaker, Nao Yuuki, ground her teeth and scowled, bright green eyes narrowing with irritation. She brought a hand up to rub at a conspicuously red ear, visible even against her conspicuously red hair.

"My ears are about to fall off," she complained.

"I think one of mine already did, a few hours ago," Chie replied.
"Either that or I'm just so numb I can't feel it anymore."

The woman on the horse ahead of them laughed and slowed her steed to fall in between theirs.

"Perhaps the two of you should get in a carriage," she offered. "It is unnecessary for you both to be out here at the moment."

Nao bared her teeth in a grimacing smile.

"That's easy enough to say, Fujino-san," she said. "But when even the commander stays out with the soldiers on the march, it'd be poor of a simple centurion not to ride next to her just because the weather's colder than a Conservative's heart."

"Well now," the other replied, unable to help smiling. "I actually doubt they have ones to speak of, on occasion. And there is truly no need for you to brave the cold for my sake-after all, Nao-han is not just a 'simple centurion' but a primipilus, and one who has been marching on her feet since we arrived in this land," she added, to soften the admonition. "Surely a little comfort is only deserved by such a soldier."

The primipilus snorted.

"You don't have to flatter me, General. It won't work, I'm staying right here." Nao gave her another sharp grin and continued: "Besides, I'll be damned if the soldiers tell of the day I couldn't stand a little ice up my ass, when a patrician senator and a letter writer could."

The other two laughed, the sound hollow in the dead winter air. The "letter writer" grabbed a handful of snow from a low branch on a tree they were passing and threw it at the centurion, who dodged it with a hoarse cackle.

"Scribe, Yuuki. Personal scribe, the general's fellow senator and your legate," Chie said, not really offended. "That's the title, not 'letter writer'. Get them straight, you heathen."

"Sure, sure."

"And this scribe's been in almost as many campaigns as you have, so shut your mouth."

"Well, I don't see the other senator complaining."

"Shizuru-san's too well-bred for that."

"Which means you're not."

Chie cursed the centurion again. This set them off on another round of friendly bickering as they plodded along, the soldiers marching beside them grinning from ear to ear as they listened. It was pleasant to the rankers to hear their officers being warm and cheerful with each other: it made for a nice camaraderie in the army, which was why the commander encouraged it strongly. She herself said nothing more afterwards, content to just laugh and listen to her two officers as they continued bantering.

The jokes were stopped by a galloping rider coming from the front. He drew his horse up before them and saluted.

"General," he said, "we've entered the outskirts of the Otomeian plateau. The city walls are up ahead."

"Good," was all the general said. "Thank you for informing us, Soldier."

Another armour-slapping salute: "General!"

"How far, Scout?" the centurion asked before the man could go, squinting against the rising wind.

"Just past this valley, hidden by the bend, Centurion," he answered. "The other scouts we sent up to clear the tops said there were some archers on the promontories, but they were Otomeians, and they signalled to us."

"That's expected. Tell them to look alive. You can't be too sure with these barbarian places if you've missed something or not, and I don't fancy fighting off a damn ambush here."

"Understood, Centurion! Permission to return to scouting?"

All eyes turned to the commander.

"Granted," she said simply.

He saluted again and rode off. Nao spurred her steed on as well and said that she would get word out to the other centuries' officers that they were near their destination. The other two waved her off and kept their pace, staying at the head of the century with which they marched.

"Finally," Chie said. "Let's hope these ones are a little more civilised than the last 'allies' we had."

"Indeed."

"Shizuru-san."

"Yes?"

"Do you think the Mentulaeans know yet?" She turned her head towards her friend as they rode side by side. "That we're here to stop their expansion?"

"I think they may suspect it by now."

"How come they haven't even tried to get in touch with us? No attacks, even, and we're not carrying as many troops as I'd like. There are hordes of them, so I've heard."

They were speaking in low voices, their beasts close as they leaned towards each other.

"Certainly it is a curious thing," the general replied, sounding meditative. "I would have expected an envoy from them, at the very least, to probe for information as to exactly what our purposes are, here. But at least we shall not have to engage in combat prematurely."

"And that's good because of how outnumbered we are right now?"

"Not really," was the reply, given with a small smile. "Simply, it would be an annoyance at this stage. Numbers are not the end-all and be-all of the world. Even when we do reach our allies at Otomeia, we shall very likely remain heavily outnumbered even with the Otomeian military filling our ranks. No, it is that I would prefer to minimise any possible losses, frankly speaking. Whatever the case, I am entirely sure we would win."

"I see."

Chie smiled to herself as they rode on, reflecting on the calm but unselfconsciously confident manner in which the answer had been given. That's the good thing about being with Shizuru Fujino, she thought to herself. If her friend said they would win, they would. In all their years together, the general—even when she had not yet been a general, and even when she had not yet entered the military arena—had never been anything less than successful. Shizuru Fujino's brilliance came allied with a powerful lucky star, one that seemed certain to lead her to even more triumphs than she had already achieved. Which was probably why she had managed to become a senator at such a young age. And head of a decury too, something Chie had never been, for all that she was the elder of the two of them. Not that it pricked her pride in any way, for she had grown too used to her friend's star for that. After a while of standing beside it, you simply resigned yourself into accepting that it would outshine any other star flanking it into insignificance.

In fact, she should be outshining everyone in the political arena back home right now, Chie ruminated, a small frown building on her forehead. She had been expected to run for the office of praetor this year, then go on to the next rung up the ladder that was known as the cursus honorum, which was the consulship. By all rights that was what should have happened this year in Hime. Had it not been for this campaign, that is.

But that would change after this, Chie was sure of it.

We'll finish this thing wreathed in glory, she nodded to herself, the confident thought bringing a momentary flush of warmth to her chest. Shizuru-san will do it again and we'll beat back those dogs, the Mentulae, all the way to their borders.

Yes, they would do that. Never mind that they were outnumbered. Never mind the dratted chill nipping at her ears. They would finish this campaign and show up those jealous curs in the Senate that all their schemes to send Shizuru Fujino and her army to a situation she could not fix were for nothing! And perhaps, she would even manage to show up that snobbish old father of Aoi's who kept apostrophising her as unfit for his daughter, calling her blood too weak and new, her achievements too thin...

I hope I'm not being too optimistic, she told herself. Yet being optimistic at the outset of a journey was surely the better way to begin it. There was no harm in being sanguine even in light of such conditions, as it could not hurt. Besides which, she had one of the best talismans of good luck at her side, did she not?

She smiled, watching as the talisman herself edged close to the walking soldiers and chatted casually with them, their tired expressions falling away as they laughed at her jests. She knew her friend did this every time they went on campaign, mingling with the army on the march to keep their spirits up. Still she found herself amazed by it each time.

This was something no other general did, because it was considered unnecessary as well as uncomfortable, when it was possible to merely wait out the journey in a carriage or riding serenely at the head of the column. Shizuru Fujino, in contrast, not only spent her time with the soldiers for the full march but usually walked with them too. She was only horsed this time because the army, through the centurions, had managed to convince her to use her horse during the last stretch of their trail. They were concerned that the general would be overtired in the brutal climate, especially as she insisted on moving back and forth the column even more than usual, probably to keep up the rankers' spirits against the frigidity of the weather. She capitulated only when the soldiers themselves made direct pleas to her, saying that it would set their minds more at ease.

She's the only general I'd ever follow happily, thought Chie, sighing in contentment at her lot. True, there were some other good commanders back in Hime, but as far as she was concerned, none of them could even begin to hold a candle to her red-eyed friend. She was brilliant, kind, generous, and-most importantly of all-had never lost a single venture. All of the soldiers, Chie knew, would follow such a general to the death. Who would not?

"Chie-han."

She turned her head to her general, who had cantered back to her side.

"We are almost there. How are you holding up?"

She smiled: "Fair enough, Shizuru-san."

"Ah," was the only response, and a smile.

A while later, they heard the ripples of speech coming from the leading soldiers that told them the ones at the head of the column were in sight of the city walls. It was not long before they themselves could see it as well, silhouetted against the sinking sun. The sky, formerly a grayish blue, had now melted into a soft orange towards the centre of the dying light. The snow covering the trees and the land reflected the colours and bathed everything in warm shades, softening the earlier harshness of the landscape's cool monotone.

"For all its chill, this land is very beautiful," the general remarked.

Chie made a sound of agreement, busy trying to imprint the sight into her memory. She intended to make an illustration of it when she had the time. As they approached, however, she furrowed her brows and squinted at the outline of the city.

"Shizuru-san," she said. "Don't they seem seem a little... crooked to you? The walls?"

It was a while before the general replied.

"Ara..." she said. "You're right. The line does seem highly irregular at the top."

"Does this mean they can't even build even walls?" the other said in dismay.

"Perhaps there is more to it than that," said the commander, her tone holding a touch of excitement. "Come, Chie-han, let us go to the front. I wish to see it."

They galloped forward, their horses complying eagerly with the release from the monotonous pace. When they were close enough to make out the sentries on the tops of the walls, they realised why the walls looked so odd.

"By the gods!" Chie exclaimed. "This is amazing."

Shizuru laughed, equally delighted by the discovery: "Extraordinary. You should make a note of it in the record you send to the Senate."

"Oh, you can be sure I will."

"Hey, General!" said a voice, one that had joined theirs sometime earlier. "Crazy, isn't it?"

"What do you think of it, Nao-han?" asked Shizuru.

Nao brought her horse in line with the others. She looked up at the walls they were approaching.

"Well, it's unusual, all right," she said. "But it's perfect for defence. Those sections look like they'd be impossible to breach with normal artillery. A catapult or ram wouldn't even make a dent in that part."

"I've never seen such a thing," Chie said. "What are they?"

"I do not know," Shizuru said, eyeing the entire structure.

Imposing, she thought. And the primipilus was correct: the whole would be difficult to breach, if not for the sections of the wall that were actually man-made-although she could not be too sure that those other cliff-like sections were not man-made, even if they do not seem like it. What were they?

They seemed to be sheer slabs of rock that rose from the ground at a close-to-vertical angle, jutting out and ending in sharp peaks ranging from twenty to forty metres from the earth. The rock appeared smooth, and there were hardly any regular crags or projections that a climber could use for purchase. The narrowest wedge appeared to be at least a hundred metres wide, and there were around ten of them that she could see from the side they were approaching. There were a few others that were not part of the city's walls, but which stood alone on the white field of the mountain plateau.

Like solitary towers, was Shizuru's thought as she stared at them: like monoliths thrown up by the gods.

The walls of Otomeia were made up partly of these monolithic slabs, with the more standard brick and stone sections built into the spaces between them. These were of an even height, about thirty meters tall. The irregularities of the city's silhouette were caused by the stone wedges rising from the regular height of the brick and stone sections.

Soon the Himean command was entering these walls, having sent envoys ahead to tell the Otomeians to open the gates. The gates too were formidable as they appeared to be made almost entirely of metal. Due to the weight, they also took a little longer to open and shut than others-or so Shizuru thought, as she studied the shape of the doors and entertained herself with imagining what kind of huge winching mechanism was on the other side, with how many oxen it must take to move them each time. She alone was quiet among the officers as the doors creaked and groaned, her famous red eyes gleaming and taking in everything.

When the portals were finally open, she rode forward with her legates and several officers at either side, some other officers leading the other cohorts into orderly arrangement on the flat plane outside the gates. Accompanying the general's party were two of their interpreters who were familiar with the Otomeian dialect. The Himean command gazed around.

Seen from within, the stone slabs were also flat on this side. Shizuru and the centurions, who had been taking note of the thickness of the walls as they passed through them, knew that each had to be at least seventeen metres thick.

Truly impressive, the general thought, drinking in the sights with a calm eye that masked her excitement. I really must ask about them, these walls. And the charming buildings! Undoubtedly foreign in design, yet wonderfully aesthetic to her eyes. Even the Otomeian clothes appeared far more cultured than she had expected, and her expectations had not even been poor. She supposed it was her fault, permitting the usual archetypes to influence her expectations: a mountain people, known for being military, at that, was not usually expected to present such an elegant, almost Grecian atmosphere. White was everywhere-they obviously favoured it for their clothing-blond hair predominated, and gold and lapis lazuli adornments seemed sprinkled liberally throughout the crowd, even the people on the fringes. Oh, and they were so tall! A very tall people, very athletic, somehow appealing in their Attic-looking wraps and robes. Yes, they were a handsome race.

Well, now, she berated herself. Don't just stand here staring, go forward and get the initial diplomacies over with. The sooner you do, the sooner your people can rest and get warm.

She dismounted and walked forward, her attendants and officers doing the same. Several persons from the Otomeian line in front of them came up to meet her. They met in the centre of the square, bowing to each other.

"I believe I have the honour of addressing the General Shizuru Fujino?" inquired the man who was standing foremost, facing Shizuru. His eyes widened as he met hers, and she smiled, used to the reaction. She took the opportunity to study him in turn, filing away as many notes as possible within those two seconds of silence his pause afforded.

He was extremely pale, as all the Otomeians appeared to be, and had very long, lank grey hair that went past his shoulders. There were several thin braids in the hanging mane, adorned with minute golden clasps and beads. His eyes were heavily outlined in black-stibium, Shizuru presumed-and his garb was entirely white, with trimmings of gold and brown. Like most of the other Otomeian elders, he was wearing a long robe-like garment that reached his feet, with a cloak of fur over it.

"I hear most of you speak our tongue?" she said, appreciating his use of Himean from the beginning.

"Most of us, General," he said. "But the elder ones are more comfortable with it-there was more congress with Hime in our time-and the nobles. Most of us speak Greek as well."

"Excellent." She swept the people behind him with a look. "The king is not in present company?"

"I am afraid not," he replied, courteously putting on an abject expression. "We apologise for this, but His Majesty has been feeling poor of late, Fujino-san. He regrets that he cannot come to greet you outside, as the present weather is contrary to his health. If you would be so kind as to follow us, we shall escort you to him. As for your army, we shall be glad to take care of their needs. We have already prepared lodging and food for them-and all our interpreters are at the ready, although I doubt you shall have need of them very often."

"I am grateful for such thoughtfulness," she replied. "Please lead the way."

"Of course, Fujino-san. I am Hyodo, by the way, one of His Majesty's counsellors."

Accompanied by her senior legate, the interpreters, and a century of soldiers, they followed the Otomeian representatives through the city, leaving the other officers with the wagons and the soldiers. As they passed through the streets, Otomeians thronged the road to watch the foreigners being taken to their king. Some of them even cheered at the sight of the Himeans, awed by their appearances. This prompted a low chuckle from the senior legate, who leaned over to her friend the primipilus-it was Nao's century Shizuru had chosen to bring with her on security detail.

"Nice to be welcomed, all right," Chie said, grinning. "I do get tired of dour looks for welcome, after all. What do you think?"

"Hm. They don't look as uncivilised as the Scurrae," Nao muttered quietly, referring to the allies they had worked with during their last campaign. "But I'll be damned if they don't look decadent."

"I know," Chie replied. "Look at all the gold. Dear me!"

"Filthy rich bastards. I bet the king's a greedy old fart."

The general interrupted silently by sending a humorous warning look at her chief primipilus, earning a grin.

"Right," said Nao, sighing. "I know. Be diplomatic."

"Indeed."

"Maybe we should've brought two centuries," Nao muttered. "I'd feel better with two hundred for a bodyguard instead of one."

A smile: "Do you suspect something, Yuuki-han?"

"If you're asking me if I feel they're going to try anything funny, no," the redhead replied. "But I always suspect something."

Shizuru chuckled and told her to relax.

"I am quite sure they shall not try anything," she said, looking at the buildings they were passing. "Enjoy the tour. Look at Chie."

The person in question laughed.

"Guilty," she said to them. "Look at their dress, the structures. Fascinating!"

"Is it just me or is it warmer inside their walls?" Nao asked.

"It is warmer. Amazing, isn't it? Probably since there's a denser concentration of people, and the walls pretty much stifle the wind."

"Well, I don't care why, so long as it keeps my ears stuck to my head."

They entered a compound and came up to the palace, a striking edifice that appeared to be made almost entirely out of painted stone from the outside. They entered and found that the inside was even more noteworthy, done with elaborate murals and smartly tiled floors.

Making their way through the rooms, they noticed the heat and made comments to that effect. One of Otomeian representatives explained that the palace was kept heated by continuous fires burning on every floor.

"Hypocausts?" Shizuru offered.

"Yes, General," an Otomeian responded. She motioned vaguely to the ceiling. "And we have fireplaces for each part of the structure, each positioned to maximise heating capabilities for every storey."

"Marvellous architecture."

The Otomeian nodded, smiling with pleasure: "It is the king's pride and joy, General."

"Nice and toasty," Nao commented as they entered the great hall, which was lit by several fires and lamps inside, giving a warm glow to the area. There were already a lot of people-judging from their clothes, mostly more counsellors and elders-waiting for them there. All were seated on cushions and fur rugs on the floor, at low tables that prompted many an odd look among the Himeans. The bizarre tables were laden with a veritable feast, however, ostensibly for the newcomers.

In the middle of the rows of tables and cushions was a clear path leading towards a longer table, this one set on a raised platform. The Himeans were led through this path as the seated people stood up in respect and made bows to them. At the end of the path by the platform was another group of Otomeians, who bowed slightly as Shizuru and her party came near. A tall man with white hair and a long beard braided with small gold twine stepped forward, his manner and the white ribbon of the diadem tied around his brow indicating his identity.

"General Shizuru Fujino," he said, addressing her in faultless Himean. "I am Kruger the Third of Otomeia. We are honoured by your presence."

Shizuru bowed as he did, although rather less deeply: "We are honoured by your having us as well, Your Majesty."

"Please, address me by my name, Fujino-san. It is hardly meet for one such as you to have to refer to me by such distant formal titles. Even we, far as we are from Hime, hear tell of your greatness. I would be ashamed to put on airs before the Red-eyed Conqueror," he intoned, pronouncing one of Shizuru's titles with almost comical gravity.

"Please do not say such things-I would be ashamed to demand such titles for myself," Shizuru said with her customary diplomacy. "As you insist, however, I shall address you as either Kruger-han or King Kruger. Is that satisfactory, Your Majesty?"

"It is satisfactory, Fujino-san." He clapped his hands and the people at the other tables seated themselves. Some of the Himeans looked around curiously, obviously wondering if they were supposed to do the same.

"It is customary among us to indulge in a feast for any important gathering," the king explained. "Will you do us the honour of gracing our banquet with your presence, Fujino-san? Your entourage is included, of course, and we can provide for the soldiers accompanying you too."

Shizuru inclined her head: "As you wish, King. It would be good to have a rest before more pressing matters are discussed."

"Then, please join me at the table." He made a motion to Hyodo, who stepped forward. "Direct Fujino-san's escort to a table."

After they were seated-a slightly amusing affair on the part of Shizuru's group, since they were unused to sitting on the floor with rugs and cushions-the feast began and conversation resumed in the huge hall. All of the Otomeian representatives seated with the Himean officers spoke the Himean language, although with varying degrees of proficiency, and if that language failed, they all spoke superb Greek, which meant the Himeans could still interact comfortably with them even then. As for the king, Shizuru found that he spoke both languages flawlessly, with no trace of a foreign accent. She commented on it.

"The Greek is expected, but my pedagogue was a Himean philosopher," he explained. "So naturally, he taught me the language as he spoke it in his hometown. Which was Hime itself."

"Yes, you speak it as someone from the upper class or schooled parts of the city would."

"Quite so. And your accent is one of the older ones, I think? From which area did it hail it again?"

She told him.

"Yes, I recall. Most distinguished. I have met people who speak as you do before. It is most pleasant to the ear."

He paused to quaff some wine, urging her to taste it as he had had it opened from his cellars for her sake. She did so and complimented the vintage, privately noting that the rest of his people were drinking a foamy beverage instead. She had done her research and knew what it was, of course: it was the beer of which these mountain peoples were so fond.

"It is expected that I would learn your language," he continued. "No one denies the influence of Hime today, and any ruler of Otomeia must be aware of it, our distance from your city notwithstanding. Besides, our dynastic line has long held client-patron relationships with Hime and its senators."

"Indeed, we have a long history of alliance," Shizuru agreed.

"Although relations between our countries have been sparse of late, unfortunately. How came so many to speak our language here, aside from you, Kruger-han? I understand that it is indeed a well-known language, but I had no idea it was so common in these parts, so far up north."

"It is considered the language of civilised peoples, especially in several of the areas we walk and trade with, so it well befits us to learn it. We interact with your two Northern Provinces, Argus and Sosia, regularly, for example. It is one of the prime languages in Argentum too, and even in the Mentulaean Empire, as you know. It is taught to the upper-class families, and it is a requirement for gaining a position in our government," he explained, after a swig of wine from his goblet. "The lower classes speak very little of it, although most of them understand it quite well."

"I see." Her eyes went around the hall again. "I must say that I expected more people to be wearing trousers."

"Ah!" He grinned, his blue eyes lighting up with amusement. "Due to the cold, no doubt? Well, all the soldiers' uniforms are trousers. And as to the formal dress you see us wearing at this moment, there are in fact trousers underneath the long tunic. Some of the women wear leg wraps instead."

"Now I see."

"Now then, let us have some entertainment," he said all of a sudden, signalling to one of the attendants behind him. Several musicians took up positions near the platform their table was on, and some people clad in colourful costumes began to dance in the empty space before the platform. Some of the diners clapped and cheered as one of the dancers, in a particularly smooth movement, flipped and twirled in the air.

"I hope it pleases you," the king said, seemingly very pleased himself with the performers putting on their elegant show of athleticism. He tapped his fingers on the table to the rhythm: the king, all of his subjects knew, adored music.

"Interesting, isn't it?" Chie said after a while from Shizuru's side.

"Yes."

As everyone was watching the performers and falling to the repast with renewed vigour-dinner entertainments sharpened the appetite-Shizuru let her eyes wander throughout the hall once more, enjoying the looks of these foreigners. They were all so pale and fair, and because nearly all of them wore white, with the rest wearing shades of fawn and cream, she found them all the fairer for it. They rimmed their eyes too with stibium, she noticed, and with their pale skin, it made them look even more exotic.

She was about to put a piece of bread in her mouth when something caught the corner of her eye, and she turned, looking past the king. There, leaning against the far wall, was a female figure that did not appear to be Himean yet was not wearing white. She seemed to be in dark clothes of some kind-black, to all appearances-which Shizuru could not see perfectly because of the flickering light of the torches and the depth of the shadows in which the figure was standing. What she could see perfectly was the figure's face, illuminated in such a way that made her appear to be glowing.

Shizuru paused with her hand halfway to her mouth.

"Fujino-san?" inquired the king, who had noticed her odd pose.

Shizuru looked at him and smiled apologetically.

"Forgive me," she said. "I was just thinking of something."

"Perhaps you are anxious to begin our talks already?"

"It would be appreciated if we could do so."

"Then, if you have finished with your repast, would you like to join me in the council room? Or would you prefer to wait until the feast is over?"

Shizuru glanced at the wall and found that the person was gone.

"Indeed," she said. "It would be best if we could cover some of the ground now and adjourn to another room, King Kruger."

"Of course, Fujino-san. Your attendants?"

A while later, Shizuru and a few of her officers were with the king and several of his head counsellors in another room, this one much quieter. There were two interpreters from the Himean side as a precaution, although the speech being used was Himean. Guards were posted outside the room as they held the conference.

"So he has not yet stepped into your territories?" Shizuru was asking the Otomeians. "Or tried?"

"He has not," a female Otomeian said. "But he is getting closer and closer. Even now, he is making movements that tell us he plans to besiege Argentum, and that is already a Himean client-state, as well as an ally of ours."

"We shall have to engage him soon," Shizuru said. She looked up. "Your forces?"

"Good," said the other counsellor, a man. "Although we are nowhere near his numbers, ours are better-trained, I think. We have at the ready three thousand horse, fifteen thousand foot, and about a thousand archers. About seven hundred of the cavalry are archers-although the Lupine Division's units are crack shots with arrows as well as spears."

"The Lupine Division?"

"Our elite unit, the first cavalry division. They comprise about seven hundred warriors, all of whom can use nearly any weapon with remarkable skill. Sending them out often decides the course of our battles, so fearsome are they."

"How interesting," Shizuru said, lifting her brows. She was a rarity among Hime's generals in that she loved to use cavalry in her battle tactics. "An elite cavalry squadron? I daresay that would be useful."

"I'd like to see this Lupine Division," her chief primipilus muttered quietly to the senior legate behind her, eyes lighting up with curiosity.

"Why, one of them is just outside the door," the king exclaimed, clapping his hands. The door opened and he called for someone. "Here she is now. Come here, My Dear. I think you should meet our guests."

As the person entered, Shizuru felt herself freeze again, the odd crystallisation going through her body as though it had been touched by some winter wind. The person the king had called in was the figure she had been looking at in the great hall.

The king beckoned to the young woman and said something in the Otomeian tongue to her with remarkable gentleness for a king addressing a subject: Shizuru noted it. The new arrival then stepped forward, bowing to the Himeans. As her hair fell forward, Shizuru realised why her face-and what a face!-had seemed so much paler than the rest of the Otomeians' faces, even at a distance: her hair was dark as night, black with no hint of brown or red in the strands. The little gold-ornamented braids in it, relatively fewer compared to the others, looked like stars.

"This is Natsuki," the king explained. "She is head captain of the Lupine division, as well as one of my personal attendants. She is one of my most trustworthy subjects and one of the most valued."

The Himeans took in the young woman, appraising her with great interest. Just a little behind her, Shizuru was conscious of her senior legate responding quietly to someone-probably the primipilus-digging her in the ribs.

"I see," Shizuru said to what she now realised was still a girl, speaking a little more softly than she had intended. "We are pleased to be working with you in the coming months."

The Otomeian merely bowed and retreated to one corner of the room with the king's permission, receding into the shadows. The rest continued their conversation, speaking for a good while. Every now and then, however, Shizuru would flick her eyes surreptitiously to the figure standing in the dark, wondering what in the world would drive someone with a face like that to hide it in darkness.

"Now, I believe we have covered everything," the king said, at length. "The rest needs to be planned in detail, and perhaps it would be best to get some rest before that. I am sure you are very tired, Fujino-san."

"The idea is appealing," Shizuru responded with a wry smile. "How nice it would be to actually sleep in a warm room, after having spent so many nights in the chill of marching camp. Why, I am almost afraid I would fail to fall asleep if I do not see my breath misting above me."

"We shall paint it on the ceiling of your rooms if need be," the king laughed, the braids of his white beard waving. "I shall have someone take you to your rooms, honoured guests. We have rooms enough for each one of you to sleep in peace, as well as comfort."

The primipilus approached the commander when they stood up, which made the others turn towards her. Shizuru understood and looked as though she would shake her head.

"Pardon me, General," Nao said, setting her face into its most pugnacious lines. "But I think I'd better set some of my rankers outside your room, just in case."

Shizuru chuckled: "Unnecessary, I should say. We are clearly among friends here."

Chie added her opinion to the matter: "But it's par for the course even when in camp, Shizuru-san. Maybe Nao's right."

"In camp, yes. As a guest in the home of another, palace though it may be, it is shabby conduct."

Looking from one woman to the other, the Otomeian king took in what was being said and what was being suggested. And then, with the lightning-fast intelligence that was required to be ruler of his nation, he made a decision that he calculated would benefit him in the future, one way or another.

He gently interrupted the three women and offered the resolution he had invented.

"Fujino-san," he said. "Perhaps I can help set your worthy officers' mind at ease. Would you be willing to accept Natsuki as your personal bodyguard while you are our guest? It would set my mind at ease as well, for she is the best warrior we have, as well as the most reliable one. I myself would vouch for her, for I too feel exceeding calm when she is near."

It was clear that Nao found this intelligence even more cause to be suspicious, and she was about to protest when Shizuru cut her off with an unexpected response-at least, as far as her officers were concerned.

"I would be happy to have her as my guard," she said firmly, eliciting a curious look from the senior legate and every other Himean in the room. "Would she be willing, Kruger-han?"

"She will do as I tell her."

"I would prefer to hear it from her, I am afraid, to be sure it is no imposition."

The king called the young woman over from the shadows. She stepped close to them, her face shining in the yellow light.

"I want you to be Fujino-san's personal attendant, Natsuki." Again he spoke more kindly to his supposed attendant than he had with several of his counsellors, and again Shizuru wondered at it. "For as long as she is a guest of our country, guard her with your life."

The girl's eyes, which she had kept lowered all the while, flicked up and met her king's. They were a startling shade of green and the general, seeing the woman's eyes properly for the first time, had the impression of a glittering forest after rain.

Truly, Shizuru thought once more, what a face!

Natsuki nodded.

"There," the king said, pleased. "You have a bodyguard, Fujino-san."

Nao and Chie turned to look at Shizuru, still wearing bemused expressions on their faces. There was good reason for their confusion. Their commander had never accepted foreign offers of personal bodyguards before, and they wondered why she would do so now. Certainly both thought the young woman, this "Natsuki", cut an enigmatic figure-but why should that make a difference to the general?

The general, for her part, was locked in a staring battle with her new bodyguard. Her eyes twinkled mischievously as she realised that the young woman was not about to cave in to her stare, something fairly unusual. This was the first time anyone had even dared to take her on at first meeting, she thought with amusement, tickled by this interesting situation into which she had willingly walked.

A smile formed on her lips, and she was even more amused to see that spots of colour had appeared on the young woman's cheeks.

"Does this please you, Fujino-san?" the king of Otomeia asked her.

"Oh, yes," Shizuru said, still keeping her eyes on the young Otomeian. "I have a bodyguard."

Chapter 2

My thanks to all the reviewers. Before we start, I wish to answer a question first.

The question comes from SychoBabbleX, who really flatters me too much-not that I mind. "Inter Nos" is Latin for "Between Ourselves". Incidentally, I have been playing with the names a little. Take the main civilisation our protagonists shall be fighting against-namely, the Kingdom of the "Mentulae". It means a certain unsavoury thing in Latin.

Vocabulaire:

1. Caligae - Roman soldiers' boots; lace-up sandals made of leather with hobnails on the soles for absorbing the shock of walking.

2. Chief/senior legate - The general's topmost military officers are called legates. Of these legates, there is at least one tasked to be superior in rank to the others. In Shizuru's case, it is Chie Harada.

3. Client-state - A term for a state allied to Rome/Hime in such a way that it seeks the latter's protection in exchange for its allegiance or tribute.

4. Consuls - Chief magistrates of Rome. They preside over the Senate's discussions too. There is one chief or senior consul (here, Haruka Armitage) and one junior consul. The consular term lasts for one year, at the end of which they will step down and new consuls will be voted in from among the other senators.

5. Military Man (or Woman) - Military man in Latin is "vir militaris"; it refers to a person whose fame is primarily for his achievements in the military and who tends to move forward in his career using those achievements.

6. Princeps - A shorthand term for Princeps Senatus or Leader of the House. In the Roman Senate, once someone is chosen to be Princeps, he retains that title for life, and thus has a very important (and sometimes, deciding) say in discussions. To be Princeps often means one is a very remarkable speaker. Here, it is Reito Kanzaki.

7. Pteryges - The skirt you often see worn by Roman soldiers; a sort of apron made up of leather/metal strips that protect the groin, worn with an actual cloth skirt and often breeches or trousers beneath.

8. The Cursus Honorum - The Himean political track, from lowest to highest : quaestor - praetor - consul. One does not go straight from one office to the other in consecutive years, however. Future chapters shall show why.

9. Tribunate of the Plebs - The tribunate of the plebs has ten members per year, all called tribunes of the plebs. As there are many other "tribunes" in Roman government, we shall henceforth refer to this office almost always in full. Plebs here is shorthand for plebeian, as only plebeians could be members of this council or could elect members of this council. It was originally created to protect the rights of the plebeians against the patrician aristocracy. Their office's greatest power is the veto. They may veto any motion from any magistrate, presumably (though not always) with good reasons for doing so, which makes them significant forces in politics.

10. NOTE on Oratory : The tale follows the Ancient Roman style of speaking in the Senate, which is a very rhetorical, stylised way of presenting arguments. Speeches were expected to be more dramatic than reasonable-which means that logic was often less important than presentation. The best orators combined both aspects in equal parts. There are also several sub-styles of rhetoric, naturally, from the Attic or Athenian to the Asiatic.

"I am sure I will be comfortable here, King Kruger," Shizuru was saying to reassure the king of her satisfaction. He had personally seen her to her quarters, along with the horde of servants who had lit the lamps and the fireplace with silent efficiency before quietly backing away. Shizuru's own servants were mostly still with the baggage train, in the middle of unpacking and fetching her effects. The last member of the party at present was the Himean general's new bodyguard: true to form, she had sought the darkest corner of the room.

"I am very glad that our humble lodgings are enough," the king said. "I have had a bath drawn for you as well, Fujino-san. There is a bathing room beyond this one, through that passageway. I hope you find it to your liking, as it is one of the most finely-designed private washrooms in my palace."

"I would appreciate any washroom at this moment, I should say," Shizuru said honestly, rather liking the king's easy manners and subtle way of drawing attention to his palace's richness: he had given her one of the grandest rooms in the entire edifice, it was obvious. "It is one of the greatest disadvantages of going on a campaign that if one is able to take one's time bathing once in a fortnight, that is already terribly lucky. I imagine I am quite foul already."

"On the contrary," the elderly man replied smoothly. "Your beauty is such that it shows purely whatever the situation, General Fujino."

"You would make a fine senator, Your Majesty," she said to the flattery.

Two more women entered the room, these ones younger and noticeably better-looking than the other slaves. The king introduced them as her attendants for the bath and then excused himself, pausing to give final instructions to the young woman skulking in the corner. Shizuru smiled as she heard the words: "Do not let her out of your sight or let even a thorn prick her, Natsuki-she is important to us!"

That makes me sound like a stray child, no matter how important, she thought with amusement.

And then the king was gone, the doors to her enormous chambers shut by her Otomeian bodyguard, who strode over to the archway leading to the washroom and went through it. While this was going on, Shizuru dismissed the rest of the Otomeian slaves, saying she would be happy with only the two bathing attendants to assist her. The one Himean servant present-one of hers-she sent to ensure her other slaves knew where to find her.

The Otomeians left laid out fresh clothes on her behalf. They bowed to Shizuru afterwards and stood, waiting as she inspected the Otomeian-style robes they had laid out on the bed. The cloth was the finest linen, and-unsurprisingly-white.

"Do you understand Himean speech?" she asked her attendants. One nodded and the other replied in the language, with a slight accent:

"Yes, General. We speak it as well."

"Good," Shizuru replied. "Then shall we go on to the washing room? I am anxious for a bath."

They bowed again and followed her to the other room, where steam had misted drops of condensation on the walls. Lamps had been lit there as well, showing her a steaming pool of water that could have easily fit five bathers. It was tessellated in an elaborate pattern and had been built into the floor, the clear water showing the whorls of colour at the bottom. Shizuru sighed as she gazed at the inviting sight, then looked up to meet her bodyguard's eyes. The young woman was standing on the other side of the pool, and appeared to have been inspecting the room as well as-Shizuru guessed-the water.

"Well... Natsuki," Shizuru said, testing the name and finding it pleasant on her tongue. "I trust everything is safe?"

The woman nodded, then moved into a corner where an oaken bench was set. She perched herself on it, folding her arms and shutting her eyes.

Shizuru felt intrigue quirk her lips. So her shy, dark little bodyguard was going to stay in the room? She had honestly not expected that, but she should see potential for entertainment in it.

She divested herself of her armour and clothes, setting each piece aside with the reverence due to objects that protected her life. Once she had come to slipping off the padded undershirt beneath her cuirass, her attendants took over the task. It had been a while since she had let someone do that for her-even back home, in Hime, she usually declined the help of her slaves when she bathed, because she had become so used to the self-service expected of a soldier. But the Otomeian slaves were tender and unobtrusive, and she felt herself relaxing under their attentions. Soon, they had stripped her to her skin. She lowered herself into the water with a drawn-out sigh just as several of her own servants entered the bedroom. She called to them.

"Did you find your way easily?" she asked, telling them to set aside the clothes they had brought. "Good, then please put my gear in the other room. The Otomeians were just about to bathe me, but perhaps two of you can take over instead."

"As you wish, Domina," said the head servant, who conferred quickly with the Otomeians and dismissed them. Shizuru herself merely leaned back in the pool and let the slaves do their jobs. Eventually there were only two left in the washroom, and they bathed her where she sat, their fingers rubbing her taut muscles into the beginnings of comfort.

She was silent at first, her eyes watching only the play of light on the water. After a while, however, she brought them to the figure seated in the corner. She thought the name before she said it, and it sounded sweet if strange even in her thoughts.

"Natsuki," she said.

The young woman opened her eyes and promptly averted them at the sight of Shizuru's naked form. Shizuru fancied that if the Otomeian would step into the circles of light created by the lamps, her face would have those spots of colour once again.

"Why do you always lurk in the dark, Natsuki?" she asked, letting her voice seep in a slow drawl from her throat. "You do not need to, you know."

She waited a few seconds for the other to answer, but waited in vain. The only response was a slow shake of the head, eyes still averted.

"Really now," she said, deciding to try to bait the woman. "I thought that Kruger-han told you not to let me out of your sight? I am not in your sight if you keep your eyes looking away like that, am I?"

There was no response save for a sharp exhalation from her bodyguard. Shizuru resigned herself to the silence, tempted to roll her eyes. It was not that she disliked the quiet, but she was a naturally companionable creature-and one who, after finding someone as interesting as her new bodyguard, would prefer to talk to this new discovery instead of just regarding her like a goggling mute. Which she had to admit was very tempting: the foreigner had such a face!

Still, she supposed she could get her new attendant to talk to her later. So she closed her own eyes now and leaned her head back, inhaling deeply the fragrance of the oils they were using to clean her dirty hair. She enjoyed the gentle rubbing and scraping away of old skin and dust from her arms, luxuriating in one of the best feelings in the world as far as she was concerned, which was that of being clean.

After the bath was over, her slaves helped her dry and dressed her in the native clothes that had been provided for her use. She found herself in a long, robe-like garment similar to the night-robos some wore back in Hime and found it surprisingly comfortable.

She thanked her slaves and sent them away, with instructions to return in the morning with fresh clothing. This left her new bodyguard as her only companion, as it was obvious the young woman would not leave absent her dismissal. Shizuru had no intention of giving that to the Otomeian, or not just yet, when she could have fun with her first. She looked the girl over with a slight smile that would have signalled danger to those who knew her well.

This is going to be interesting.

Shizuru settled herself on the bed, which was a large mattress spread on an enormous fur rug on the floor. The fur was soft, obviously not made of mere wolf's pelt. As for the bed, it was filled with cushions covered in various textures and fabrics that brought Nao's comment on the Otomeian 'decadence' to her mind. The linens were all superb-they could even be imported from as far away as Egypt, she guessed-and gold thread had been used to work borders and geometric patterns into the pillows as well as the heaviest blanket. She thought of the king's words earlier and grinned.

Humble lodgings, nothing!

She sat back against the pillows but did not lie down. At the moment, she preferred to look at her stoic companion-who resolutely avoided the curious gaze by fixing her own eyes on the floor.

"Natsuki, would you come closer?" she said, after a while.

Somehow managing to radiate apprehension as she did, the other came forward.

"Into the light."

A few more steps. This time she was close enough for Shizuru to see every line of her visage. It did not disappoint, and even caused the older woman to inhale reflexively.

She had been right earlier, she realised: the girl had a face. The countenance Shizuru was looking at was remarkably good-looking, sculpted atop fine bones that determined a beauty that would persist even beyond the sag of either age or death. It was a lovely shape, elegant and possessed of a small, pointed nose and sensuous lips, the lower one slightly fuller than the upper. The eyes too were beautiful enough to be unearthly.

The demure way in which they are downcast right now, however, hardly makes her look a fearsome warrior-not to mention head of an elite division, Shizuru thought, still inspecting the young woman. More like a pretty girl at what those back in Hime call "the lethal stage" of unknowing coquetry.

Shizuru suddenly wondered how young she was. The Otomeian's bearing was noticeably regal; that could throw off an observer as it imitated the poise of a mature woman, and yet the girl's looks argued that she was far younger than her comportment and position might indicate.

"How old are you?" she asked, barely able to restrain her curiosity. Somehow, this girl brought out the most feline interest in her. "You look so young."

When no answer came, she mentally slapped herself.

Perhaps she is one of those the king was talking about, she thought. One of those who could understand their language but not speak it. If so, she had been acting very rude towards the Otomeian. Here she had been asking questions all night, without even knowing if there was actually a way for the other woman to answer. Indeed, for all she knew, the girl might be mute!

She decided to reframe the question.

"I myself am twenty-four. Which they say is quite young. Or my detractors in the Senate say, is very green," she added with a smirk. "I suppose you are close to my age. Are you the same age, Natsuki?"

When there was no reply, she tried again, consumed by her odd interest.

"Younger, then. Twenty-three?"

Again no reply.

"Twenty-two? Twenty-one? Twenty? Nineteen?"

At "nineteen", the other made a small gesture of her head.

"Nineteen?" repeated Shizuru, provoking a small nod. The general's eyes widened in both surprise and delight.

"Heavens! Young indeed," she mused aloud, turning over the information in her head. "Why, you are still a girl! How long have you been a warrior? Perhaps you have been doing so as early as I? And to be captain at this age..." She paused and smiled cheerfully at the young woman. "We are both early starters, I suppose."

As usual, only a sullen silence met her friendly speech. She sighed, having been hoping to hear the girl speak-or even just make a sound-at least once. What mattered it if the girl spoke not a whit of Himean? She just wanted her to respond!

"I wish you would speak to me, even if only in your native tongue," she said with disappointment. "Even if I cannot understand it. Or Greek?" She switched to the language of the Hellenes. "If you speak Greek we may speak in that language."

There was no response and she shrugged, close to giving up, but more than a little vexed by her failure. It might be an odd fancy, but she had wanted to see if the girl's voice matched her face. What kind of voice would be produced by that mouth?

Her own mouth twisted as she returned to Himean with a wry observation: "I suppose it is all very well for a bodyguard to keep her counsel, but it is surely another thing when my own bodyguard will not even meet my eyes."

At that, the younger woman's gaze lifted. She looked straight at Shizuru, who was surprised by the sudden and searchlight glare but looked back. The general marvelled again at the Otomeian's ability to stare straight at her without flinching in the way many others did. The young woman had nerve, even if she did not appear to have a tongue. But she did seem to lack a bit of humour too, which Shizuru thought a great pity: one of the things Shizuru loved best was to laugh.

A notion came to her then, a notion born of the rogue inside her heart. Why not tease this damnably surly girl a little? She was so serious! Surely she needed to loosen up a little, be taken down just a peg from her standoffish and silent high horse.

Shizuru moved her gaze to the young woman's lips, intensifying her stare. The other unconsciously mirrored the gesture, acting on instinct. At this, Shizuru smiled to bring the younger woman's eyes back to her own, which she knew were shining with mischief.

Just as I thought.

Realizing what she had just done, the Otomeian woman pinked with mortification and looked away. Shizuru smiled at her again, entertained by the reaction.

"You really are quite attractive for a cavalry captain," she said to provoke her further, her eyes still on the green ones. "And you have such beautiful lips."

The colour on Natsuki's face had now deepened to a furious red, even as she snapped her gaze back at her tormentor defiantly.

"One wonders... what you think of my lips," Shizuru continued, unable to resist-the Otomeian was simply too amusing. She nearly burst into laughter as she saw the girl's eyebrow begin to twitch.

The poor child, she thought after managing to swallow the hilarity. I really am hopeless, baiting her this way when she is supposed to be looking after me. Instead of letting the girl do her task in peace, here she was, teasing her relentlessly. True, she had a bit of a reputation for teasing, but she herself knew that she hardly teased people as much as this back in Hime. Perhaps it was a little cruel for her to be doing so now, especially to someone seeing to her safety.

She lifted her eyebrows when the younger woman suddenly broke her glare to turn away, heading for the corner she had been occupying a while ago. Shizuru watched as her bodyguard stooped and retrieved something from a pack she had apparently left on the floor, returning to stand before the Himean woman. The girl held it out in one hand.

"What?" said the older woman, wondering what the object being extended to her was. "What is this, Natsuki?"

Natsuki, whose head had been turned away, merely looked at her.

Wordlessly, she pulled back her hand to handle the object. Shizuru watched as she pulled at a clasp to reveal that the thing in her hands was a small container made of wood. The Otomeian opened it and dipped a finger inside. When she pulled back her digit, it was glistening. She brought the finger to her mouth and started rubbing it there, slicking her lips with whatever the gleaming substance from the container was.

The Himean watched this exercise with quiet fascination. When Natsuki began rubbing her lips, Shizuru had felt herself go into a sort of stupor, her eyes fixed on her companion's mouth. She was jolted out of this trance only when Natsuki thrust the container towards her again, still looking away.

"I see," Shizuru said, aware that her voice was uncomfortably thicker than usual. "So this is how you deal with the cold. A kind of balm, I take it?"

At a nod from the younger woman, she took the container and proceeded to do as the other had done. It stung a little upon initial contact, as her lips had cracked and chapped on the march, but she felt a soothing sensation gradually spread over the area.

"Oh, that does feel better." She marvelled at the relief. "This balm is superb. Thank you."

She smiled and handed back the container to her bodyguard. As she did, their fingers slipped over each other in the exchange.

Rough, she thought. But very warm.

"I am glad that your concern for me is so great that it extends even to protecting my lips," she said suggestively, still unable to rein in the rogue inside her that seemed obsessed with teasing Natsuki. Why did it feel like that? "How nice to have such a devoted protector."

She grinned unrepentantly at the Otomeian's discomfiture, watching the fine twitch of the fine dark brows: they seemed to want to slant downwards even more than they already were. Suddenly, the younger woman turned again and retreated to her corner. She did this soundlessly, her movement much like the shadows of which she seemed so fond.

Should I let her stay here? pondered Shizuru, watching the young woman stoop to return the container to the pack. I should make her stay outside, really, if she is supposed to be my watch for the night. That would be usual, but...

But what? she asked herself. But the girl might be uncomfortable standing guard all evening outside? Still, she supposed that was par for the course with a bodyguard. Yet it seemed churlish to situate the girl uncomfortably somehow. And besides, it was not even certain if she was supposed to be staying outside. Was that how Otomeians treated their bodyguards? Shizuru could only guess, could only recall the oriental and southern potentates she had heard brought their bodyguards into every room. It did not matter if they were only sleeping or even about less innocent business in the bedroom: royals seemed to believe it safer to have their guards present at every second, without even a door between them.

She supposed that might be what Otomeians did as well. And some part of her whispered that it was understandable, with a bodyguard like hers: would one not want that face nearby and visible at all times?

That was another of her strange whims talking, she supposed: they seemed to be turning up more and more. How eccentric she really was becoming! Well, and did not her fellow senators constantly remark on it?

She looked at the girl in her room once again, narrowing her eyes in the dim light. Again she found her eyes gravitating to the Otomeian's countenance, that splendid young face.

She shrugged her shoulders privately and threw caution to the wind. Oh, why not let the girl stay in? Eccentricity should be indulged once in a while, she decided. She was a light sleeper anyway, and she doubted the girl posed any danger. The Otomeians would gain nothing at all by harming her person, and she had detected no malice earlier from the king. Why else had she refused her centurion's earlier proposition to put a guard at the doors of her chambers? Her only hesitations had been in the fact that she was unused to sleeping in a room with someone else in it, for she made even her slaves stay out of her bedroom back in Hime. Sociable she might be, but she was also very private about certain things and certain places.

Still, she doubted someone as unobtrusive and quiet as her new bodyguard would trouble her privacy greatly in sleeping.

"Shall you stay here?" she asked.

She perceived a nod. So it was how the Otomeians' bodyguards worked!

"Where shall you sleep?"

She lifted her eyebrows as the figure in the corner sat down and put her back against the wall.

"I could not countenance that: it is so uncomfortable," she said. A grin: "Do you not want to join me in bed?"

She felt the glare even before the flickering light let her see it.

"I suppose that is a no," she said with a low chuckle. "Pity."

She got up, taking two very heavy blankets from the covers piled on the mattress and three cushions among what had to be a dozen. When she reached Natsuki, she saw the confusion patent on the girl's face-for it was still very much a girl's face, she decided.

"It would be a waste to have so many of these without you using them," she announced while handing the pile to the Otomeian. The younger woman took them abashedly, then ducked her head to contemplate them where they lay on her lap.

"Is that all right? I am not at all unwilling to share more of the pillows or covers with you if you need them."

A nod to show they were enough. Shizuru smiled and returned to the bed. Moving some of the pillows aside, she stretched out upon the sheets and looked up at the ceiling.

"Put out the lamps when you are done, please," she said, closing her eyes. "Have a good sleep, Natsuki."

The only answer was a shuffling sound that indicated the other was arranging the items Shizuru had given her.

I've never slept with anyone else in the room, before, now that I think about it, she thought idly. It was strange to know that there was another person, not even just a mere slave, inside the room. She wondered if she could make her peace with it enough to actually fall into slumber, or if she would end up regretting this little game she had taken on for amusement.

Her concerns turned out to be in vain. She fell asleep so quickly that she did not even hear the Otomeian girl crouching beside her, studying her face with silent interest before blowing out the last of the lamps.

"It's a crock, is what it is!"

The general and the other officers turned to look at the senior legate, who had made the exclamation.

"Well, we all know it, don't we?" Chie growled, directing her gaze to her commander. "Those asses in the Senate would give anything to see you come back crushed and bawling for someone else to do it."

"I fancy they would rather I did not come back at all," Shizuru said dryly. "If only to be able to say that I cannot even handle this 'small affair'," she finished, quoting the words of the senior consul in describing the Mentulæan situation.

"'Small affair' my eye," returned her chief legate. "Armitage is crazy if she thinks of this as small in any way. Here we are, posted in some foreign country with barely five legions-maybe four, if we actually redistributed the soldiers so the legions weren't understrength-and all to cover the entire North against what could be an army of a hundred thousand imperials, if you believe the reports!"

"Well, this was a bit of a suicide mission-or my enemies meant it to be one, as Reito-han put it," Shizuru said, referring to one of her allies in the Senate, the famous orator and current Princeps. "It merely shows how determined they are to see me fail an enterprise, even at the expense of Hime, when even the Princeps is unable to sway a vote as he wishes."

Chie shook her head as she recalled that ill-omened senatorial meeting. The junior consul had been the one to convene it, subsequent to receiving a report from the governor administering one of the Himean provinces in the North. The report, written a little over two months earlier, was read to the House by the junior consul, Utada Asou.

"In sum," Utada had said, after finishing it, "the Mentulaeans are moving in force upon the Northern Territories, it seems. We already have multiple reports that one of their armies crossed their empire's border far north of one of our provinces and sacked several local villages. They have not yet set foot on any of our client-states' territories, to be sure, nor indeed any of ours. But they are very close and they come as an army."

"Is the Mentulaeen king expanding his territory, Junior Consul?" someone asked.

"It appears so to me, and our sources concur with that impression. We would do well to be wary of this, Members of the House. Such an expansion might threaten even our own provinces there, from Sosia to Argus, both of which are significant-Sosia, for its mines, and Argus for its function as the prime port in those lands. Senators, we must take action."

There was a brief moment of buzzing along the rows, until one senator stood and belched out a proposition.

"I propose that we send an investigative party to determine what action is proper! Until then we cannot engage in any hostile action, for we have treaties with the Mentulae. Armies are not what this calls for. We should avoid leaping into military action before we are certain it is needed. Send only an investigative party!"

"An investigative party?" burst out a voice, from the centre rows. The speaker, bright hair seeming to bespeak her indignation, rose to her feet.

"Members of the House, let me speak," she cried, patently exasperated. "To send a purely investigative party is to send a lamb to the wolves! I know how much you hate the idea of paying out more legions, but wouldn't it cost more to lose our provinces in the North? To lose our many people there?"

"But we don't know yet that that's even a possibility, Tokiha-san!" came the retort.

"Of course it's a possibility! It's not a certainty even now, but it's a possibility. We all know how these particular northern barbarians act-haven't we had several treaties with them, all of which they broke, sooner or later? No, this is no longer a matter of investigation but of military caution. To that end, an investigative party would be a huge underreaction!"

The junior consul followed this with a question, addressing the one who had spoken.

"What do you suggest, then, Tokiha-san? You seem to have an alternative in mind."

The red-haired senator nodded.

"Send a party to investigate, by all means," she declared. "I agree with that much, Asou-san. But do not make it a mere investigative party! Send an actual army to garrison our territories as well as the client-states in the North, for-investigation or not-I don't see any party surviving an encounter with the Mentulaeen king without an army behind it! Why else would he march at the head of a column of several thousand soldiers into the Northern Territories? Do we really think he would content himself with just having a late autumn walk to sample the riches of our provinces? Send him senators, yes. But also send an army!"

A furore exploded at this suggestion as senators and consuls alike tried to get a word in, shouting and gesticulating to draw attention to themselves. The senior consul, by dint of having by far the strongest voice in the House, managed to scream them all to silence.

"Esteemed consuls Armitage-san, Asou-san, may I speak?" asked a clear voice, easily distinguishable as that of Princeps Senatus Reito Kanzaki. Given an affirmative, he got up and strode forward, stopping at the centre of the floor. He took a moment there to arrange his toga: the long and draped garment that was standard attire for Himean senators during formal functions. His friends watched him fuss over his dress with amusement, for they knew it was one of his tactics to get attention-by primping his attractive, broad-shouldered figure in a sort of flirtation with the audience.

"Honoured Members of the House," he began. "I agree with the words of Tokiha-san, that we cannot simply allow the Mentulaean king, Obsidian, to run amuck as he pleases. It is a significant threat to us if he is somehow able to consolidate the Mentulaean Empire into such a force as would pose danger to the lands bordering Our Sea. We cannot condone such a peril, nor can we condone letting it pass unmitigated while we waste valuable time sending out an investigative party under care of some meek diplomat. Yet neither can we act hastily, too, for there is still a possibility-a very small possibility-that the Mentulaean advances can be stopped before they reach our own northern lands."

He held up his hand to stay the murmurs and proceeded with what he had to say.

"Yes, it's possible," he said to them. "How can anyone doubt it? Reflect, Members of the House, upon the fear that our armies are able to instil in savage hearts, no matter how barbarian these hearts may be. The prudent option, therefore, is to send an army to garrison, as Tokiha-san said, but with an initial view to intimidation that may forestall any actual warfare. It may be unnecessary to incur casualties or losses at this point... although I do feel that we shall have to, later on, against this particular king. So yes, send an army. Our armies are the backbone of our strength and pride as a nation, and all other nations cower at the sight of them. So let the Mentulaeans have sight of them! Let King Obsidian see what he may face if he does not heed good sense and turn tail! It is for this reason that we absolutely have to send an army and not just a soldierless investigative party. And, if all else fails, at least we shall have forces immediately at hand for any possible engagements."

"Prudent words, Princeps," said the junior consul. "And fair to the mind. I for one support the proposal. Members of the House, is anyone opposed or does anyone else have a better plan? I address the question first of all to my fellow consul, Armitage-san."

The senior consul shook her blonde head and thundered: "A good plan, Kanzaki-san, My Good Felon!"

Rustling titters and chuckles filled the floor as another senator on dais leaned towards the consuls and whispered a correction behind the hapless Haruka Armitage, who had a horrid knack for malapropisms. Meanwhile, the Princeps returned to his seat and turned his head to smile at the person to his left.

"Well now," this person was saying to him. "As far as your exploits with women go, she got the word right, did she not?"

He laughed and leaned towards her, actually angling his chin slightly upwards because she was extremely tall.

"I'm a better fellow than I am a felon, I assure you," he whispered. "You will most likely be given the commission, Shizuru-san, to lead this expedition. You do know that, right?"

Red eyes danced: "Why should it not go to another of the military men and women we have in the House?"

"Because none of them is as famous as you are right now. Furthermore, none of them has a ready army the way you do at the moment. Your veterans from Africa have not been discharged from last year's campaign and are still parked in the Campus Martius, just outside the city. Fortuitous that the Senate was considering sending them back to Africa Province to stiffen up the garrison there temporarily, no? Now you have them ready to go at a moment's notice... Only it looks like they shall be heading northwards, instead of southwards to Africa as we had thought before this."

"The House might well choose another senator to lead them there."

"That would be silly indeed, when their old general is already here."

Come now, and tell me. Shall you take it if they offer the commission?"

"You make it sound as though I have a choice, Reito-han," Shizuru finally sighed. "As the commission of the Senate is the command of Hime, I cannot but do as they see fit."

"True, but there are ways of getting out of commissions, such as a good group of senatorial allies-or I daresay even a Princeps Senatus-might put into speech."

She flashed him a demure smile.

"If you are asking whether I would like the commission or not so that you could put your persuasive powers to work for which one I want, then allow me to say this: I would like it, insofar as I have always wanted to see the North, and I would not like it, insofar as I had hoped to stand for praetor this year, or possibly even the next."

He nodded in understanding.

"A difficult choice indeed," he said. "Personally, I would prefer that you take it, as I am in doubt that anyone else could manage such a potentially dangerous campaign as effectively. Furthermore, I believe it would be to your advantage to postpone your candidacy for one more term."

"Oh?"

"The conservatives are still strong in the Senate, and to top it all off, they've managed to overrun this year's Tribune of the Plebs as well." He made a shrugging gesture. "No, Shizuru-san, it would be no loss at all to delay running for praetor. Besides, I hear that the northern provinces are very rich-and that the allied state of Otomeia, though remote and extremely difficult to reach, is also very wealthy. It might be to your advantage to visit that region for the moment."

At this moment, the senior consul's voice boomed out once more.

"As the House has no objections, we adopt the measure," she proclaimed. "Who will be commander? I offer myself, for one. This needs the touch of the senior consul," she declared, drawing herself up pompously.

"I would protest," said one of the more aged senators, rising. "The senior consul must stay in Hime to oversee things, particularly as we are not yet assured that several other threats we have in the south are finished. I would propose that the commission be given to one of the other senators."

"I second the motion," announced Tate Yuichi. "Let it be handed over to someone else. To send both the senior consul and our forces to handle the Mentulaean situation-just plain silly, especially if it drags out into the elections!"

The Princeps chuckled at this.

"Tate never did get the finer points of rhetoric," he mumbled to his seatmate.

"Indeed," Shizuru said, trying to suppress a laugh. "But he is a decent officer, as well as a good man to trust things to, I have heard."

"I know," Reito replied. "And that's the reason I endorsed him when he said he wanted to enter the Senate."

"But."

"But he'll never make it to the consulship. Too weak in the tongue and not enough of a politician."

"Armitage-han never really understood the finer points of oration either," Shizuru whispered back, smiling. "And she is the senior consul."

"Yes, but she definitely does not have a weak tongue!" he hissed to her.

"Members of the House," intoned another senator. "I move that the commission be given to one who can handle such a task and has veterans of her own already at hand-let it be Shizuru Fujino."

Fresh mumbling broke out at this, and Shizuru and Reito halted their dialogue with each other, as most of the senators were looking their way. It was no surprise, of course, and Shizuru did not even bother making it look as though it was.

"I protest," said someone, just as the senior consul appeared to be on the verge of another explosive outburst. "Fujino-san has just finished one campaign, and now we are to send her out again? To such a taxing situation, no less? We are grateful for what she has done in Africa, of course, but that does not give her priority in our selection of generals for the legions. No, fellow senators, it is time to send someone else into the fray. Let others have their chance! I suggest Yukino Kikukawa, who deserves the commission better, especially as she is currently a praetor."

"I endorse that suggestion!" cried the senior consul, eager to get her friend and subordinate to head the enterprise. Indeed, it was exactly what their faction needed to consolidate their influence: the promise of a successful campaign, both in terms of victory as well as spoils. As if on cue, her senatorial allies began to rally their voices in agreement. However, there was an opposing wave that clamoured for the other choice. Loud words began to turn into shouts and madness threatened to overtake the meeting.

"Silence!" cried the junior consul, addressing both the senators on the floor as well as his screaming consular colleague. "Silence, I say, for the Princeps wishes to speak! Members of the House, you are acting like rabble-control yourselves, if you please!"

Eventually, they calmed enough to allow Reito to begin his speech. He put on his most formidable air as he addressed them, making sure to stare each one in the eye to press his point.

"Honourable Members of the House," he started, sparing no time for priming and sporting a disapproving scowl from the beginning. "I said before that the situation has the potential for extreme gravity. Yet what I've heard just now seems to be ignoring this. Have you not heard my warnings? We may be facing a Vesuvius on the verge of eruption! Have we any desire to be eradicated that way-melted off the face of the Earth after taking all warning signs lightly? Do we wish to be so blind, so stopper up our ears to all rumblings?"

He paused, took a deep breath, and drew himself up to his full height.

"Fellow Senators, this is a force of nature we face!" he boomed out. "And if we take it lightly, if we do not heed the rumblings in the distance, that force will overflow and reach even our shores! Yes, even across Our Sea! I adjure you, be prudent in your decisions, for this is not merely a question of the Northern Territories. Recall the doings of these Mentulæan kings, even the ones before this Obsidian. Do you not see their arrogance? Do you not see how savage, how primal these people can be? They are as unchecked in their ambitions as a volcano is unchecked when it explodes-they have no sense of where to stop! And if we take them lightly, they will not stop!"

He turned and faced the consular platform, bowing slightly.

"I have no intent," he continued. "Of deprecating the esteemed senator Kikukawa-san, fellow Members of the House. Truly she promises great things in the future, that much may be seen from her past achievements and conduct. Yet I am wary of sending one who has not yet headed a military campaign, even if only as a legate, to the situation we are speaking of. For that, Fellow Senators, is to taunt Fate. It is to taunt Nature, by saying that we take it-in the guise of these primal barbarians we face-so lightly that we make it a mere training ground for our unblooded. And one does not taunt Nature. Such an act only leads to the worst catastrophes, and you know it. So I say we must give Nature and this threat its due! Present it with our best, our most blooded."

He wheeled to face the rest of the senators instead of the consuls on the dais.

"There," he said, turning to hold out his hand to the direction where Shizuru sat, "is our best this very moment. Shizuru Fujino has just wrapped up the Numidian Campaign in Africa to Hime's benefit... and has made every battle she has thus far generalled an unqualified victory! She has won battles that are already legendary and on which many of our current military experts have written treatises of analysis and praise! She has seized fortresses so apparently impregnable that my heart stills in my breast to think of the feats! And she has won something no other in this present House has, which is the greatest of all our military decorations! Can anyone possibly have a record here that can compare to that list? Can anyone else show me a corona obsidionalis ?"

No one could, of course, so he rushed on with the rest before they started protesting again.

"Now, you may not all like her, Fellow Senators," he continued. "But by god, you do not need to! You can even hate her if you wish! But you need to acknowledge that we have a threat spilling over the northern boundaries and that she is the person with the best chance of pushing that threat right back into the pits from where it originates! All the other generals with a comparable level of experience are away and cannot be recalled from their own posts for this. Those who are here are either too aged already-esteemed though they may be-or tied down by posts of their own. They also do not have veteran soldiers readily available, ones who have fought for and would willingly fight for them again even in the wastes of the North. Do you really think soldiers would be happy to sign up for such a campaign if just any commander were heading it? Even levying recruits would become a challenge! But it would not be if we had someone of Shizuru Fujino's repute heading the commission."

"So it's Shizuru Fujino we have to send," he concluded, "if we are to take this threat seriously and repel it effectively. And before you begin to think this possible threat is a small thing, reflect on how close the Mentulaeen Empire is to Upper Fuuka, with only our neighbour Caledonia and the Alps to separate them. Therefore, we must send someone who can do the job as well as possible, and not take any chances with this matter! Again, who cares if you hate the person we send? What is important is that the Mentulaeans shall fear her! Senators, see sense: it is Fujino-san who must be sent!"

After such a speech, there was little for the House and the consuls to do but give the commission to the woman many of them did not want leading another military expedition-not least because she had a knack of being so successful (and thus, enviable) on them. Shizuru accepted the campaign with a short and gracious speech. The other faction had another ace up their sleeves that even the Princeps failed to foresee, however. It was enunciated by none other

Given, he said, that this was indeed a potential disaster, the House must indeed send its best, and its very bravest. But as it was a potential disaster and still not an actual one yet, then surely it would be unwise to expend unnecessary resources for the sake of what could well be averted. There were other threats to Hime to consider. Hence, he concluded, the Senate should send Fujino-san with her best legions-but not too many of them. The clincher came with the prescribed limit: five legions, at most.

"Five? Heavens above, that is suicide," the stunned Princeps had pronounced to Shizuru, upon hearing of the recommendation. He along with several other senators had argued strongly against it, but the other senators, ever mindful of costs, had adopted the "moderate" option and passed it, to the satisfaction of the senior consul and her allies. It had been disheartening to Shizuru's supporters, yet she herself had shown no visible discomfort at the time. Only later did she speak of it scathingly to her friend and long-time senatorial ally, Chie Harada.

And now we're facing a situation that isn't just a potential disaster but a probable one, Chie thought. The minimum number of legions was usually two for an army, and the standard number was six. Anything above six means that the campaign's going to be an awful one, and this promises to be an awful one. And here we are, with an impressively understrength five!

"The bastards," she hissed, finishing her reminiscences. "Sergay! How I wanted to shove my toga down his throat and stop that evil tongue!"

Shizuru laughed, again the portrait of inhuman calm.

"Come now," she said. "There is nothing to be done-at least, not until we actually are provoked somewhere into a battle with them, Chie-han. Then we can send off a request to the Senate for a few more legions up here and tell them the potential has turned into the actual. Otherwise, I fear all we can do is prepare and use what we do have wisely."

"My cousin told me that he overheard Armitage's people talking about what would've happened if Senator Kikukawa had been the one sent here," another legate noted, entering the conversation. "They say the senior consul would have requested your legions from the Numidian Campaign anyway, Fujino-san."

Everyone at the table burst into laughter.

"Of course-it would have been a friendly request, certainly," Shizuru said, with light sarcasm. "Just as I am sure my veterans would have gone along willingly with that."

"Can you imagine Nao's reaction?" Chie stuttered out, still shaking with mirth at the idea of the fanatically loyal Fujino legions being commanded by someone who was notorious for being a Fujino opponent. "She'd terrorise Yukino-san so much that the senator would be begging to go back home only a day into the bargain."

"True, Fujino-san," said another legate. "You're the only commander who can manage that one."

The general tilted her head thoughtfully.

"Nao-han can be a little complex to deal with," she allowed. "But she is a brilliant soldier and the best primipilus one can have."

"I'll second that," said Chie. "She's a terror-especially that tongue of hers!-but there's no one else you'd want to be behind you in a tight spot."

"Except for the general herself, naturally," supplied a voice from the doorway.

They looked up to find the centurion in question walking towards them. She saluted Shizuru first, then was told to sit at the table and break her fast with them.

"I'll say this much about this place," she said. "They've got that nice sense of comfort down-nothing beats sprawling around like this."

"But this just seems like such a savage way of reclining," one of the legates remarked. "Resting on a couch for meals is normal. But on cushions and rugs on the floor ? Barbarian!"

"I would think," Shizuru said suddenly. "That it is improper for us to call them barbarians. We Himeans tend to think of ourselves too much as the only civilised people in the world, with little appreciation for how others must think us the opposite. Indeed, were we to ask the Otomeians or any other people, for that matter, they would say that we seem barbaric to them."

The others looked at their general, unsure of what to make of her statement. She had such radical ideas sometimes that they were never really certain of how to react to her remarks.

"Anyway," said the centurion. "I like this place. Good food. Too much meat, though."

"Here's some bread," said the senior legate, handing her a hunk of it from one of the plates. Nao tore it apart with her hands.

"Scouts came back, General," she said, referring to Shizuru's order that she send the scouts out in the morning to double back on their tracks up and around the Otomeian mountain and see if anyone had been following them. "All's clear."

"Good. Thank you for your work."

Nao nodded, chewing through some bread. She smiled at the commander after she had swallowed it and said, "Say, General, where's that ghost of yours, by the way? Or should it be your sphinx? Has she said anything yet?"

The others laughed. "The General's Sphinx" had become a familiar sight as well as joke to them, as she simply seemed to follow Shizuru everywhere, obviously taking the king's injunction to 'never let her out of sight' to heart. It had been several days, and still the young woman had said nary a word to any of the Himeans, which led some to conclude that she was mute-something Shizuru was beginning to think herself, although for some reason she doubted it. She had been meaning to ask the king, but kept forgetting due to the sheer number of things that needed doing.

"She is right there," Shizuru said to her primipilus, flicking her eyes to the "ghost" standing in a distant corner of the dining room. "You really should not call her that. She has a name. Natsuki."

"What exotic names they have!" said another legate. "And they do not even have last names-how do they tell them apart if two people have the same name?"

"Their names have meanings," said another officer, who was also an interpreter. "So each one is made to be unique. Otherwise, they add 'the second' or 'the third', such as in the king's case. Usually, names are only repeated in families."

"What does 'Natsuki' mean?" Chie asked, before Shizuru could ask the question.

"I think it means 'summer child' or 'summer girl'. Something like that."

There was a pause followed by uproarious laughter. Even the general had to struggle to mask her giggles.

"Summer child?" Nao guffawed. "That's the coldest 'summer' I've ever seen!"

"It doesn't really... suit her, does it?" Chie managed, in between laughs. "The 'summer', particularly."

"Ah, now," Shizuru said, reprimanding them even as her face showed her own amusement. "You should not say such things. Natsuki has superb hearing, from what I have noticed, and she can understand us."

Indeed, when they turned to look, the general's bodyguard was glaring at them so horribly that their laughter dried out. Only the primipilus was unfazed, and she hooted and snorted away, aggravating the intensity of the offended girl's glare.

"Oh, perfect-just perfect!" she said, as she laughed.

"Yuuki-han, really," said Shizuru in a reprimanding tone.

"Sorry, General," the redhead grinned, shoulders still shaking. She flicked a glance to the figure in the corner who was still glaring at her, and narrowed her eyes.

She dropped her voice.

"I don't trust her one bit," she muttered. "You shouldn't keep her in your room, General. Who knows if she's an assassin."

"Then she would have killed me long before," Shizuru replied smoothly. "Or tried to, at least. But she has not once ever threatened me or given me cause to distrust her. Besides which, she is quite expressive of face in some ways: I daresay I would know if this girl were planning something nasty from a single look at her. No, trust me, I have no suspicions towards Natsuki."

"Still. I don't like the look of these Otomeians." Nao scowled. "And what's with their eyes? All that black stuff like them Egyptian ponces-creepy!"

"I like it," said one of the legates, making his way through another cup of watered wine. "It sort of makes their eyes pop out, you know, the colour. It looks especially good on Natsuki-san, actually, because of the colour of her eyes. Quite a ravishing green! Like a cat. Or broken glass."

"I think," Chie put in, grinning, "that everything looks ' especially good ' on Natsuki-san. Wouldn't you say so, Shizuru-san? She's actually... oh, terrifically good-looking!"

Shizuru smiled, nodding in quiet agreement. One of the legates laughed and they turned to look at him.

"You see," he said, speaking in a low voice. "Half of the soldiers are already eyeing her like animals in heat. Just eyeing, mind you. She's too intimidating to be approached. But that sort of adds to it, that she doesn't say anything at all, and they all think she's the-how did Tenjou put it, Nao-san? I know you were there when we were talking about it."

Nao rolled her eyes.

"The sexy, silent type," she said. "Anyway, they can't miss her since she's always trailing after you, General. But you're right-she's drawing a lot of attention. Some of my boys and girls have their eyes on her too."

"Well," Shizuru said, eyebrows shaking a little at the ends as though they wanted to draw together. "Well, now."

Chie noted the displeasure in her friend's eyes and wondered what it meant. Did Shizuru perhaps disapprove strongly of the soldiers getting together with auxiliaries? Well, that was understandable, certainly. She decided to change the subject.

"So, what's on the schedule for today, Shizuru-san?" she asked.

Shizuru, broken from her thoughts, looked up at her.

"Inventory, I think," she said. "It is time for preparations."

She signalled to one of the Otomeian slaves serving them that she wanted to wash her hands, and was provided with a basin of water. After drying her hands on the supplied cloth, she reached for and began to pull on her caligae, lacing the cords tightly.

"Please prepare the legions for inspection," she instructed, walking towards the doorway with her red cloak flapping behind her. "I shall meet you all at the square. I need to see Hyodo-han, first."

They went their separate ways and Shizuru found herself striding through the hallways of the Otomeian palace with her bodyguard. She slowed her steps and asked the other woman to walk by her side, telling herself that she was doing it as a precaution.

How silly I am, she thought as Natsuki complied wordlessly. I certainly do not suspect her of being a spy, much less an assassin who would stab me in the back. So why do I keep asking her to walk in step with me? She is supposed to be simply my bodyguard, after all, or at least my Otomeian attendant. Now it looks more as though she is either a high officer in my army or a friend-which would be fine if not for the fact that having her by my side this way only makes her refusal to speak with me even more noticeable. I really should ask them if she is mute.

She looked at the woman from the corner of her eye, seeing the proud rise of the nose in profile. Letting her gaze fall lower, she noted the dark uniform that no doubt added to the "eyeing in heat" that her legate had spoken of. It was an extremely form-fitting affair, unlike those of the regular Otomeian robes or even the Himean issue for soldiers-which was composed of pteryges with loose trousers underneath, and the standard cuirass covered by cloaks and tunics in winter.

In contrast, her bodyguard's uniform seemed to be made up of a dark, fitted shirt that shut by means of tucks in a front flap, and similarly-coloured trousers that appeared much slimmer compared to the Himean ones, as they were overlaid by wide leaves of leather that wrapped around the thigh. These leather pieces were strapped together to prevent them from slipping down the leg, and Shizuru guessed they were to prevent chafing when the troopers were on their horses. The shirt, too, was fitted even closer to the outline of the body due to a complex sort of torso-protection made of leather strips or belts, each belt about three fingers wide. There were sheaths and pockets worked into the belts for an array of darts that Shizuru guessed to be thrown weapons. There was no cuirass as far as she had seen.

All in all, a complex outfit, Shizuru thought. It was made for lightness and manoeuvrability, which explained the lack of metal and chainmail on it. She initially thought that it was the standard uniform for the Otomeian military-but attendance of a demonstration from the Otomeian ranks disproved that. Upon asking about it, she had been informed that it was the uniform exclusive to the Lupine cavalry unit. Afterwards, being presented with some of the other members of that unit, she had made a mental note that none of them looked as good in the uniform as Natsuki did. Her senior legate had been right earlier in saying things tended to look especially good on the girl: she really did have remarkable looks. Even Shizuru, who was possessed of spectacular ones herself, had to admit to the power of the girl's exotic appeal.

Turning a corner, they met some servants carrying packages. The Otomeians stopped and bowed to them. Shizuru smiled and inclined her head, not pausing her steps. Natsuki for her part ignored them and made no motion to show acknowledgement of their presence.

After a moment, Shizuru spoke.

"So aloof and so silent," she said nonchalantly, still walking. "It is no wonder they call you a Sphinx, on occasion."

She sensed an almost tangible drop of temperature from the younger woman.

"Did I forget to mention so cold?" she quipped. "Ah, Natsuki. It means 'summer child', eh?"

This time, the glare was impossible to miss, even if only from the corner of her eye. She turned her head to face the dark-haired girl, meeting the glare without fear.

"Do not mind them. For my part, I honestly think it is a beautiful name, Natsuki."

She fancied that she felt the heat coming from her bodyguard's reddening cheeks even before she saw it. The glare melted away, replaced by a completely bewildered look.

Shizuru had to smile.

Vocabulaire/Notes:

1. NOTE on centurions and primipilii - The chief primipilus of the Ninth Legion is Nao, but there are other primipilii [plural] in the army because there are other legions. The primipilus is essentially the senior centurion for a legion.

2. Cursus honorum - Lit. "Way of Honour", the Roman political track.

3. Praefectus fabrum - This particular prefect was a civilian (as opposed to a military officer or soldier) appointed by the general to be responsible for equipping and supplying the needs of an army. He/she is generally someone with a good mind for logistics and accounting.

4. Rhomphaia; falx; naginata - All three are actual, existent weapons. They also happen to all be of the polearm (lance or spear) type.

Nao Yuuki watched the troops being marshalled into formation, inspecting their ranks with an eye long used to it. She looked around after a while and noted the Otomeians milling at the edges of the square, obviously there to catch a glimpse of the Himean forces in their exercises. Most of the bystanders appeared to be civilians, although there were a good number of local soldiers in their uniforms. That was good—at least they would have an idea of how the Himean legions worked, even before joint exercises. She turned to the centurion next to her, instructing him to see to her century. He accepted the order with a salute.

They're all big boys and girls, she thought as she walked away. It's not like they need me to hold up their tunics for them to piss.

The primipilus took the main street, sneering at the Otomeian citizens whom she passed. Not really out of dislike: she simply had a habit of doing it when she was in a hurry to get somewhere. They scurried away before the flame-haired woman, some bowing and some too intimidated to do more than walk off swiftly. She went along this way until she reached her destination, a courtyard teeming with bustle. It was a veritable hive of activity, giving an initial impression of chaos amidst the crates and weapons and other things scattered or being transported around-but once you looked more carefully, it became clear that it was a methodical kind of madness. Underneath the veneer of disorder was a system, and the one directing that system was the one she had come to see.

She approached the tent that had been set up to the side and entered. Several people were within, busily fiddling with scrolls and whatnot, and talking to the never-ending stream of visitors. The centurion's presence made them stop long enough to greet her, however, and she grinned at the young man at the centre of the commotion. He got up and excused himself from the others.

"Centurion," he said, moving the two of them out of and away from the tent. "What a pleasant surprise!"

"I'll bet. How's everything?"

"It's going along nicely."

"Frozen your arse off yet?"

He laughed. "It isn't getting any warmer."

She eyed his spare, rather unmartial frame and grinned at him with irreverent offhandedness. She was not at all normal in the way she tended to ignore class distinctions by treating him and others of his ilk as she would someone with birth as common as hers, but he liked that-it was natural when you grew up being coddled by most people around you, as had been the case for most of his life. What mattered it if she did not stand on ceremony? She was, as her friend the senior legate, put it, strange but good people.

"I'd have thought you'd be blue by now, Praefectus," she told him. "You getting toughened up by being around us?"

"I hope so-if only to stop my sister from worrying so much about my health."

"Clucking like a mother hen, you mean," she snickered, knowing the ongoing story of his sister babying him: she was a follower of politics, and the topic was much bandied about in political gossip. "Senator Tokiha can be tough as nails in Senate, but she sure gets thin-skinned when it's about you. Remember the hell she raised when she found out you volunteered for this campaign and Fujino-san accepted?"

He chuckled, knowing most people had heard of his sister's attempts to get the Senate to recommend a different person for his current position: "Do I ever! She nearly barricaded my room."

"Those are the breaks. Even almighty senators can't get everything they want."

"I don't really think of her as almighty-odd, huh?"

She stopped walking and he did the same, sensing she was coming to the reason for her visit.

"Stock," she said flatly. "Are we running low on anything? Chie told me there could be some problems with food. I don't want the legions starving on top of this goddamned weather. They'll need more food than we counted on, I think, at least if we drill them as hard as our general wants. Cold keeps a soldier's belly feeling like its empty. It also means we'll need to make sure we get as much surplus cold weather gear as possible. If a legionary loses a sock, we've got to have a replacement ready."

"That's true," he replied with a pleasant smile. "We're fine, Nao-san. It's a funny thing, actually. I was worried about the wheat in particular, but it turns out that Otomeia trades that with the merchants bringing in their stock through our own port province, Argus. They sent out for a larger amount than usual this month, factoring us in. It may be a concern later, when the supply we've brought along with us runs out. Then we have to make do with what's here and what we can get from Argus. They've also sent out traders to meet the ones from Rheia, although that's a little further off and will take a while," he admitted. "Particularly since we're working in stores, since winter's just about here."

"Damn ice everywhere," she muttered. "Couldn't grow a blasted stalk in this place. The soil here's frozen."

"There are some nice valleys nearby, though. Very green and lush."

"They're grassland, not farmland. What about meat?"

"That's what they have a surfeit of," he grinned. "They keep quite a lot of flocks nearby-goat, horse, ox, you name it. We have meat."

"That won't keep the soldiers running," she grumbled. "They're used to more bread than meat."

"I know. I'll see what I can do."

She grunted and ground the heel of her boot on what appeared to be a broken arrow on the ground.

"A little fidgety today, Nao-san?" he observed gently.

She shrugged: "I don't like this. We're practically cooling our butts just waiting for those bastards to make the first move, just because those half-baked aristocrats in the Senate-half of who don't know one end of a spear from another!-don't want to pay more legionaries than they think they have to."

"But it is the more prudent thing to do, instead of jumping directly into a war," he offered hesitatingly. "Or so my sister told me."

The primipilus narrowed her eyes before heaving out a breath, deciding she would be wasting her time in arguing otherwise to a coddled young cub like this. No doubt he still believed most of what his sister said was the right way to go, even if he did claim to want to strike out for himself. Well, that was the way it was. The blood ruled, especially among the upper classes.

"Maybe I'm just getting restless," she said irritably, trying to withhold the sharp words she was clenching behind her teeth. "Or maybe it's the risk we're putting perfectly good legions through, getting to me. These soldiers have fought for Hime more times than you can count on both hands, and then they're sent to this kind of place with an enemy that outnumbers them, what, ten to one? Then we can't even have the advantage of making the first move... and you should know what a bitch that spells out, if you've been listening to that sister of yours." She gave him a nasty look, superbly executed because she found her second metier in such expressions. "We're sitting on thin ice here, Praefectus. You'd better know that."

He nodded gravely, seeming to actually agree with the evaluation.

"Yes, I do see what you mean, Centurion," he replied with a sombre look. Then he smiled. "Do you know, I think everyone knows that: you, I, Akira-kun, and everyone else. And yet we're all here."

She bared her canines at the remark, grinning in that somewhat dangerous way she had.

"Well, for me and the army, it's because of the commander," she admitted. "But why did you apply for this stint, Takumi-san? There are easier posts to be praefectus fabrum at-I'm sure your sister would've gotten them for you, easy. Or is it one of them political things you'd rather not say?"

"Oh, my reasons don't require me to be as cagey as all that, Nao-san! I hope I never have to be."

He smiled at her as they began to walk again. People made way for them amidst the chaos.

"To be honest, the first reason was that it would help me get a little away from being under my sister's thumb, so to speak," he said, smiling at the centurion's laughter. "Oh, don't get me wrong, Nao-san-I love my sister dearly! But I know that most people in Hime consider me a lightweight, someone unable to act without her approval, much less climb the cursus honorum or any ladder of our society apart from her. Succeeding in this post would go a long way to disproving that, I think."

He watched as she considered it, knowing she was a very smart woman rather in a different mould from the other centurions. He also knew that her former occupation had required her to understand quite a number of complexities in politics that were often beyond the ken of people of her class, which meant he could actually expect informed reactions from her here.

"Yes," she said, at length. "You're right. This was a dangerous campaign, to start with. Just volunteering for it would've helped your image. Plus you're actually here. It's a good idea-provided we get out of this and back to Hime in one piece."

"You have doubts on that score, Centurion?"

She half-smirked, half-sneered: "Don't bait me, Praefectus. I'm talking about us, individually. As far as the war's concerned, we'll get these bastards. With the general in the lead, of course."

He smiled and said, "It's wonderful how much faith everyone has in Fujino-san."

"You've never been on a campaign before, so consider yourself lucky the first one you go on is hers, even if it's to a place like this. You'll understand why we believe in her, soon enough."

"Ah, but the truth is," he answered, "I already do. I'm not that different from the army in that sense, Nao-san, unblooded civilian though I am. I would never have volunteered for this if it were not under Fujino-san's command. I know enough to see that she's the one who makes a difference."

As the troops were preparing for the inspection and preliminary exercises, their general was speaking to the Otomeian king's chief counsellor-ambassador to the Himean Northern Commission. The king was apparently abed, still suffering from mild traces of his ailment. Thus it was that Shizuru found herself discussing the local situation with Counsellor Hyodo instead.

"We have not had news yet," he was telling her as they reclined upon thick, shaggy rugs in a reception room. There were draughts of warm wine as well as beer before them, and some platters of various delicacies that could be picked up and sampled in one bite. "Although we did send messengers down to Argentum."

"When did you send out?" she asked.

"Nearly two weeks ago," he said. "The day you arrived, Fujino-san. They should be on their way back by now. I do not think it is time to be concerned yet."

She closed her eyes in response. After a while, she opened them and met the Otomeian counsellor's, startling him a little.

Zalmoxis preserve us, he thought with a shudder. It was little wonder her people made as much of her as he had noticed: sometimes the woman felt like something more than a woman, something more than a mortal. Witness the colour of her eyes, which seemed truly arterial, brilliant spots of crimson spilled on perfect white.

"We have sent to our present governor in Sosia too," she was saying. "And inquired as to the situation in that province. Although I must admit that what concerns me more at this moment is Argentum. If what you say about the Mentulaean movements is true, we may have to fight them there."

He agreed.

"The problem," he said. "Is that the Argentians don't have a standing army as we do. They're not a very military people, I'm afraid, and it's a small city. We can only hope the Mentulae have not attempted anything yet, that place being so close to the borders."

She sighed quietly: "If only we knew what was going on there we would be able to make preparations earlier."

"Yes, Fujino-san." He paused, musing. "If the couriers do not return in, hmm... three days' time?"

"Make it two."

"Two, then."

"Then we send out more," she replied calmly, but in a tone that indicated she had made up her mind about it. "If those still do not return promptly, I shall march. I would prefer that to simply waiting and wondering about the state of our allies in Argentum. In any case, if it turns out that our fears are unfounded, I will at least be able to garrison their city to prevent Obsidian from thinking of trying anything."

"And yes, I must visit Sosia as well, sooner or later," she added. She turned her head and was surprised to see that her familiar shadow was not nearby. After a quick sweep of her eyes, she found her bodyguard a ways off, at the other end of the room and by the entrance. The girl was with a group of other young women, oblivious to her attention on them.

Shizuru's eyebrows went up. Although they were too far for her to hear anything, she could see that her bodyguard was nodding occasionally at her companions. And from the way she was moving her mouth...

"She is talking," Shizuru said, perhaps a little more loudly than she had intended, for Hyodo turned to her with a concerned expression on his thin face.

"Fujino-san," he said. "What is it?"

She looked quickly at him, then at the cause of her surprise. Natsuki still appeared to be talking.

"Natsuki," she said with tones of wonderment and enquiry. "She is speaking."

She returned her eyes to Hyodo when she heard his chuckles.

"I thought you would have asked someone about that by now, Fujino-san," he said with apparent enjoyment. "It turns out I was wrong."

"I confess I do not understand."

He smiled and tipped his head gracefully, one of his beaded braids swinging forward.

"Forgive me for laughing at your expense, General," he said. "I mean no disrespect. It is just that you are not alone. Many-outsiders and newcomers in particular-tend to think she is mute, especially if they do not see her often enough to catch the times when she does speak."

"You make it seem so rare a phenomenon, her speech."

"Oh, relatively speaking, it is," he explained offhandedly, reminding her of her bodyguard's position. "It is graver when she is in the company of those she does not know well, of course. In any case, she has deceived many with that tendency to silence. It is simply that she is-how does one say it?-reticent."

Shizuru smiled at his words.

"Reticent," she repeated, with a wry twist of her lips. "That is surely the gravest reticence I have yet to meet, Hyodo-han."

He acknowledged her point with an inclination of his head.

"She was never inclined much to conversation," he said. "Not even in her younger years."

"What was she like, then?" she asked, genuinely curious.

"Silent, withdrawn... a little independent, perhaps, but that is to be expected."

"Why so? And how long have you known her?" she asked, trying to keep the swelling curiosity out of her voice but intent on indulging it.

"Since she was brought here along with the other survivors," he replied. Seeing the question on her face, he added, "She is not actually Otomeian, Fujino-san. Not in blood, at least. In fact, it may be of interest to you to learn that she is the last of a line-that of the Chalinitis."

At this, the general lifted a hand to her face, thinking of where she had heard that name before. It came to her in the time it took her companion to blink. She looked to the Otomeian's face and saw the answer confirmed there.

"Why, can it be..." She lifted her brows, impressed. "She is of Ortygia?"

He nodded, somewhat gratified that she knew the relevant history already.

"Yes," he said. "She is Ortygian-one of the few who survived that infamous massacre of their people. There are others, perhaps six or seven aside from the captain, whom our people came upon and rescued after it happened, but we found no more. It's possible to say they are the only ones who lived."

"Indeed," she said in a hushed tone. "I thought none did."

"A common misconception," he replied complacently. "The survivors were all children, except for an old crone who has since passed away."

"Where were they found? How were they able to escape?"

He wet his lips with wine before answering.

"Some were found wandering about in the forest," he said. "And some were hiding. Natsuki herself was found hidden under several bodies-corpses." He grimaced. "A gruesome case, Fujino-san. The corpses were those of her kinsmen."

Shizuru blinked her eyes at this intelligence, expression impassive. He looked inquisitively at her, wondering what she was thinking.

When she spoke, her voice was level.

"How old was she?" she asked him.

"I am not sure now. I would say seven or eight."

"The Massacre of Ortygia," she murmured, after a pause. "If Natsuki is of the House of Chalinitis, that makes her a noble, does it not? I may be a little rusty on my northern dynasties here, so feel free to correct me, please."

He shifted a little and tipped his head to acknowledge her question. And immediately after seeing the gestures, Shizuru knew he would tell her the truth but not all of it. Why was that?

"Yes. That is partly why the king took her, in particular, to be under his care." He lifted a hand to push back his grey hair. "And there is also the point that the nobility of the Ortygians is related to our own. A long way back to be sure, but of the same stock. We have always thought that this was the reason their tongue is- was -very much the same as ours."

"Related to your king, then?"

"Remotely." Again he shifted, as if wondering how much he could keep saying. "But yes."

"Is that why she became captain of the Lupine Division?"

"That may be part of it, yes," he said reluctantly. "But there is no doubt that she also outstrips everyone in her division in both battle and leadership, so it would be insulting her prowess if I were to say that her lineage is solely what determined her status. One would have to see the pr-the captain's skills as both an officer and trooper to understand how her age did not stand in the way of her promotion."

"I see." She turned her head to look at the figures by the doorway, privately wondering why he had checked himself. "She grows more and more interesting."

"The girl to her right," offered Hyodo. "Is her cousin."

Shizuru eyed the girl.

"They do look somewhat alike," she admitted, while mentally adding the note that the other girl was yet not as impressive as her taller, much more elegant-looking cousin. "Particularly the colour of their hair. Was she another of the survivors?"

"Yes. But she was found at a different place from where Natsuki was retrieved."

"Is she in the military? A part of Natsuki's division?"

"No, she is in the light cavalry unit, I think. She's actually quite young, you know-a year or two younger than Natsuki. Still, the last members of their line seem to display remarkable military prowess, so that is no surprise."

"They have other relatives who lived?"

"I'm afraid not. They are the only ones left of or related to the Chalinitian house. Natsuki is, to be exact. Her cousin comes from a much lesser branch of the extended noble family."

At this point, Natsuki had apparently finished conversing with the other two and was heading back to take her customary post near her charge. Shizuru, seeing this, got to her feet. Hyodo did the same.

"I must see to the troops now, Hyodo-han," she told him. "Shall I expect you to come?"

"Of course, General." He bowed to her, his long, braided hair swinging forward again and hiding his face. "Please expect the other counsellors as well."

"Then I shall see you there."

She inclined her head, then turned on her heel and walked off with her bodyguard trailing behind her. She sighed after a few strides and stopped dead on her tracks. The young woman behind her did the same, giving a small start when Shizuru cast a mock-dour glare over one shoulder.

"Natsuki, I have told you to walk beside me thrice now. Must I stipulate it every time or would it suffice to ask that you do it always from now on?"

The other seemed put out by the remark. She moved forward to comply, however, and they started off again. They went at a slower pace, at Shizuru's behest.

"I am surprised, though," the Himean said, almost as if to herself. "How obedient Natsuki is getting!"

A puff from the Otomeian's nostrils, very clear and sharp.

"It tempts me to see if you shall actually obey if I ask you to talk to me, you know," Shizuru went on.

Another puff was her answer. Shizuru smiled and flicked her eye to the side, looking out of a window they were passing. The breeze from outdoors blew against her face, leaving the slight and smarting sting chill breezes did.

"I saw you talking to those people earlier, Natsuki," she said easily to her bodyguard. "One of them was your cousin, yes?"

She knew an answer was unlikely, so she simply talked on as though the other had replied.

"I was almost beginning to think you were mute," she said. "Now that I have seen that, I know it is merely that you are reticent. Not that this is a bad trait, really. Simply that you take it to such levels that I must marvel. You cause only more curiosity, you know, by refraining from releasing information so much. It is something to keep in mind if your goal is to evade other's attentions, My Dear Girl."

She paused in her speech as they passed several Otomeian guards, who saluted them.

"I am beginning to wonder, however, if it is that you reserve your words for those you actually like," she said afterwards, turning her head to smile sweetly at the girl. "I am also beginning to fancy your speech so rare it must be an honour to receive it. An intriguing challenge to achieve that honour, yes. I love challenges."

The crimson eyes sparkled.

"I promise you this: you shall talk to me soon, Natsuki."

Natsuki looked mildly astonished by the statement and lifted a swanlike eyebrow at the older woman. She quickly returned her glance to the front. Despite that and the fact that the girl said nothing, Shizuru was pleased to note that she had the ghost of a smile on her lips, as well as the faintest of pinks dancing on her cheeks. The girl was so fair that it must have been difficult to ever hide any moment of elevated feeling, the Himean thought, watching that heightened colour with more pleasure than she had ever known possible to acquire from such a simple phenomenon.

Then they were already outside the palace, heading for the square. People fell silent as they passed, smiling shyly and bowing in salute. Shizuru returned their smiles with ease and her usual grace. Natsuki returned the greetings in her own fashion.

Some of the greetings, the Himean commander eventually noted, were directed more towards Natsuki than to her. That strange young woman acknowledged them in the barest of ways, simply nodding her head in such a way that it could just as easily be taken for a casual movement instead of a deliberate one. It was exceedingly subtle and the patrician watching it from the corner of an eye was struck by its restrained yet deep hauteur.

What a little aristocrat, Shizuru thought with amusement. For a moment, she wondered if it was the girl's knowledge of her own aristocratic origins that made her act so standoffish. She cast that thought aside quickly, judging somehow that Natsuki was not of such a character as to make such distinctions. After all, she acted almost the same way around the king too, albeit with a little more deference. Her actions towards Shizuru—who was noble and of illustrious enough origins herself to rouse the envy of many in the Himean Senate as well as no mean hand at showing hauteur herself—were further proof of that.

It is simply the way she is, Shizuru decided. It was probably intensified by the standoffish, blighted part of her that Shizuru had identified earlier as being without humour and turned in on itself somehow. Not that Shizuru could arraign her for that tragedy of character: what little she had heard of the girl's past certainly made all the excuses for it. To be hidden under corpses and survive a bloodbath that way, to experience such things as a child? Ye gods, what a tale! Too grotesque to be made up yet too horrid to be real. She would have to find out more about it. If only because there now lived in her mind a Natsuki who was a child, green-eyed and stick-limbed and drenched with blood, weeping in that way some little girls did: with a complete absence of wailing but with quiet hiccups that tore at the heart. How could she let that urchin in her mind stay that way, even if only in her imaginings?

They were at the square now, and people made way for them to pass through the crowd until they were facing the ordered ranks of Himean legions. Shizuru smiled at her soldiers, gratified to see their stoic faces take on adoring expressions when they saw her making her way to the front. She stopped in front of Nao, who grinned. She reciprocated the greeting, as well as those of the other centurions gathered at the front with the rest of her officers.

"They look trim," she commented, looking at the rows with a laid-back eye that her subordinates knew missed nothing. "Any reports?"

"All's fit and fair," Chie replied. "We've been keeping them busy doing work since we got here, so they haven't fallen out of shape or anything like that."

"What are the exercises for today? Not joint ones yet, correct?"

"That's tomorrow." It was another legate who answered. "And we're thinking standard exercises today. I know they're all vets, General, and it's unlikely they'll be forgetting the formations, but we'd like to keep them in the mood anyway. Soldiers can get a bad habit of cooling their heels when they're given a few days of doing nothing."

Shizuru nodded. "Fair enough."

She looked at the soldiers again and gave them an extravagant grin.

"Well then," she said. "Carry on."

The officers dispersed to their respective units and the square was filled with the sound of stamping boots and clanking armour. Shizuru was about to begin her rounds among the centuries when her senior legate approached.

"Shizuru-san," she said. "There's something I'd like to show you because I think you have to see it to believe it."

Mildly curious, she followed as Chie led her-and Natsuki, naturally-to a warehouse near the square. Entering it, Shizuru quickly caught the flash of metal in the spare light and smiled to herself. Chie ordered the Otomeians guarding the place to open the barred windows. Once this was achieved and the light from outside was streaming in, the general's suspicions were proven correct.

"Their armoury," she stated, as her legate nodded. She turned her eyes to the articles. "What curious weapons they use."

"That's why I wanted to give you a preview, before joint exercises start tomorrow," Chie returned, smiling. "Fascinating, aren't they?"

"They seem to have a lot of those," Shizuru said, indicating a long, spear-like device. "Mm... interesting objects."

"What do you call those?" Chie asked, addressing one of the guards. After making him repeat the name a couple of times, she felt secure enough to pronounce it. " Rhomphaia ."

"It looks like the falx," Shizuru was saying. "Do you not think so?"

"Yes. Although I have to admit this reminds me of your naginata, too."

"Certainly there are similarities," the other answered, still considering the rhomphaias. "Although I would imagine that my naginata is considerably more manoeuvrable. You see how the blade is thicker."

Chie nodded at the observation. "Interesting, isn't it? I suppose they use them just like we've seen people use the falx, then-slashing. Although... now that I think about it, this one could be used for thrusting too. The falx was a bit hard for that because of the curve of the blade. These rhomphaia seem a little straighter. Might be a good thing, you think?"

"The distinct advantage of the straighter blade," said Shizuru, "is that these can be used for fighting defensively, even in crowded situations. The disadvantage would perhaps be that it loses some of its cutting power, but that is only in comparison to the curved falx."

She turned her head and masked the resultant surprise upon seeing her bodyguard looking at her intently, green eyes glittering with naked interest. Realizing she had been caught, the girl promptly turned a shade of pink again and looked away. Shizuru smiled and suppressed the urge to chuckle, feeling childishly pleased by all the blushes she was eliciting.

"But this isn't what I wanted to show you," Chie said, drawing her attention once again. "The strangest one I saw was over there."

They walked over to the area indicated, and Shizuru herself felt her eyebrows lift at the sight.

"Ara," she said, staring at the same things causing her friend to goggle. "What are they?"

Thanks to the reviewers and to the edifying Fade9Wayz, in particular, for bringing my attention to Zalmoxis-had she not suggested it, I might have forgotten that possibility altogether for choices of religion here. EphemeralOne was most helpful as well.

Vocabulaire/Notes:

1. A n ote on a commander's largesse - A general who can afford it sometimes adds to the pay of the soldiers, especially if he/she wins a war with rich spoils, whereupon he/she distributes part of the spoils to the army. This is done to prevent any thoughts of sedition in the ranks or to consolidate or strengthen the troops' loyalty to her/him.
2. Cataphract [s.], c ataphracti [pl.] - A military unit made up of a heavily armoured man on a heavily armoured horse.
3. Consular - A senator who has been consul at least once in the past. The consul is the top magistrate of Rome: two were elected every year.
4. War chest - Technically the funds allotted by the Senate to a campaign. This includes the wages of the army, expenses for food and weapons , and so on. It is not unusual for a commander to find that the war chest is insufficient for his/her campaign, so obtaining money is often a concern for generals and their staff. This is also why some generals have personal war chests, with which to augment the funds from Senate when they run short.
5. Corona obsidionalis - Also 'corona graminea'; the highest military medal/decoration for Romans (and Himeans), it was very rarely awarded. It was so rare that it is possible to count the recipients of it throughout recorded Roman history. Even two of the greatest military men of Ancient Rome did not have it-Gaius Marius and Gaius Julius Caesar Dictator. It was the only crown given by the soldiers to the general, as other crowns were usually the other way around. To receive it, a person has to save at least an entire legion (about 5000 soldiers) by his/her individual efforts in the battlefield. The legion has to confirm that the person deserves the corona obsidionalis for him/her to receive it, and no one can beg or argue that he or she deserves the reward: it must be given of the army's own volition, absent attempts to persuade them to do so on the part of the recipient.

The day the Himean officials were to satisfy their curiosity about the alien weapons of their host state-the day of the first joint exercises-was also when the first letters arrived from home. The general found several scrolls waiting for her with her senior legate, who flourished her own thick missive.

"I got one from Aoi," she said cheerfully, waving it at the blonde woman. "I'm glad to see that mail from Hime is still delivered quickly in these places."

Shizuru quickly broke the seal on her first scroll, which was from her banker, Sosius. He explained succinctly that he had withheld the bulk of her letters as per her directions, specifically those that had been sent by her admirers-that amusing but oh-so-irrepressible lot! He had chosen to send only those he deemed worthy of her attention: a letter from the Princesps; another from Senator Tokiha; and one from her cousin, Senator Tomoe Marguerite.

She frowned at the third name. It was with nothing less than apprehension that she eyed that particular scroll, wondering why Sosius had deemed it prudent to send it to her considering she rarely got anything of merit from the woman's letters. Then again, Tomoe was her cousin, and the banker might have thought that the blood tie merited Shizuru's attention. Oh, Tomoe definitely merited attention! But not in the ways the woman fancied herself worth attending.

If ever there were a potential thorn, Shizuru thought wryly. A wily politician and a promising strategist in the senatorial arena, that cousin of hers was nonetheless far more poisonous than most people saw. She hid it well, but Shizuru saw it sometimes, especially when she rebuffed Tomoe's sly little advances towards her, and then- such malice in her eyes!

Perhaps I should be grateful that she is fond of me, Shizuru sighed to herself. Otherwise I would be on the receiving end of her viciousness, as some people have been. But that is so selfish a view of it: simply because I am not party to her poison-or not yet!-does not mean I should ignore those who are, and are unjustly. But what am I to do, when she is technically family? Oh, family is a wretched nuisance!

Her senior legate's voice cut into her thoughts.

"I've already read mine," she was saying. "And there are a lot of gossipy bits. Very entertaining. Do you want to hear them, Shizuru-san, or would you rather read your letters first?"

Shizuru smiled.

"I would rather hear from your letter, Chie-han," she replied. "Much-vaunted as some of my correspondents are in the realm of rhetoric, they rather lack the art of delivery your sender has when it comes to the social happenings at home. Yes, read it to me, if you please."

"Well then," Chie began, clearing her throat. "I'll skip over to the parts where she starts telling the news."

"Oh, please do not feel obliged to do so."

The laughter pushed up her nose in a snort: "I daresay I would be reading the rest to you in a red face if I didn't!"

Shizuru laughed as well. "As was the idea."

"You're terrible, Shizuru-san."

She stopped and looked up as they heard the sound of marching feet from outside the tent.

"Looks like most of them are here," she said nonchalantly. Returning to the task at hand, she scanned the letter for a moment or two, then began reading.

Such events, Chie! You'd have a field day recording it in your "Archives," as you call them. It's barely been a month since you left, and here everything's in turmoil. But first things first.

You remember when you left that the elections were coming, and people were announcing candidacy right and left-with many lamenting the absence of the Fujino name from the praetor's roster. You also remember that the year before last was when the law that no senator could be consul for two consecutive terms was passed. Anyway, it turns out that our senior consul, Armitage-san, remembers it too. Result: she tried, belatedly, to pass a resolution invalidating that law.

I myself don't think much of that restriction-I think it should be made to allow for two successive terms, at most-but I'm straying from the point: which is that she could have attempted to undo that legislation early in her term instead of waiting so long. Now she can't avoid the accusations by saying she's doing it for reasons other than wanting a second, consecutive consulship. So the accusations flew, and how they flew!

First was the outrage from the two consulars who drafted the original law. Crusty old men, both of them, but still spry enough to jump up and howl at Armitage's proposal. The Princeps was so worried they'd suffer from heart attacks that he actually sent for the most prestigious doctor in Hime these days-you know, that Athenian called Youko-san. So the good doctor stayed beside the doors of the Senate's Hall, waiting for either old man to drop. The patient she got was unexpected, though. But more about that later.

After the old men started jumping up and howling, guess who set up a roar and at them? Yes, none other than our senior consul! Up she got from her seat, and started screaming back at the two consulars, at which they promptly screamed even louder. Oh, the sound! I was told it reached even the other end of the Forum.

But there came a lull here, thanks to the good efforts of the Princeps and the junior consul to calm the howlers down. After which several senators proceeded to give speeches opposed to Armitage-san's proposal-you know how distrustful they are of anyone who wants to be consul twice in a row. And goodness! Even that famous member of Armitage's camp, Sergay Wang, came up and delivered what must have been the most scathing speech of all! How the Princeps smirked and chuckled and clapped at his nemesis!

This was unexpected. Our senior consul's face was beyond description, I tell you. Even her own supporter had turned against her, and suddenly-to use the metaphor that the Princeps has made popular ever since his speech advocating Fujino-san's leadership of your campaign-Vesuvius erupted! It was awesome, actually. Armitage simply up and burst.

I don't think I've ever seen her in such a state. She simply roared everyone down, especially anyone who tried to roar back. Even the Princeps. Yes, even her fellow consul, Utada Asou-san. I wish you could have heard her, although I'm not sure you didn't, since her voice must've been loud enough to reach you people up in the Northern Territories.

Anyway, the House was in an uproar. It took a long time before everyone calmed enough for the junior consul and the Princeps to threaten everyone-the senior consul included-with disgraceful ejection from the hall. Amidst the mumbling, Nakajima-san suddenly got up and asked Utada-san if she could speak. When he waved her on, she delivered what I'm sure was the best speech of her life.

I wish I had your talent for remembering things, Chie-as it is, I can't remember exactly what she said. But, in gist, she denounced the senior consul's actions in a way that had everyone who was still mumbling shut up and listen.

"Never in my life," she said, practically shaking with indignation. "Have I ever seen such a disgraceful display from the consul's chair. And I hope never again to see it! What we have seen today not only brings dishonour upon the present consuls and senators but on the office of the consul and the Senate forever."

And so on. She ended by asking Armitage-san how she dared to even call herself a consul while acting in such a way. If this was the way their consul behaved, she said, then she would leave the Senate immediately and call her other colleagues to do the same. Anyway, she ended to the applause of the House, and poor Armitage-san had to sit stiff, sore, and shamed before the rest. Oh, she was red with rage, Chie, but she kept her mouth shut, at least.

So the meeting went on, and it was more orderly than before, thanks to Nakajima-san. No more talk of consecutive terms from the senior consul. But when the candidates for next year's consulship were being announced or announcing themselves for an early start on the electioneering, up came Haruka-san. I felt a cold sweat then, because I thought she was going to try and press the matter. But I was wrong. Instead of announcing her own (illegal) candidacy, she announced that of her protégé, Yukino Kikukawa-san's!

That was unexpected. So unexpected, in fact, that the nominated candidate didn't even see it coming and stood up to stare at her mentor in shock, only to turn pale and faint on the spot. So the good doctor Youko got a patient after all.

"Oh, I wish I had been there!" cried Chie, howling. "Didn't I tell you it was entertaining?"

The general herself was shaking with laughter, and she nodded her head.

"Dear me," she said. "Poor Kikukawa-han."

"She'll get in, you know."

Shizuru stopped laughing, looked pensive and smiled.

"Yes," she said. "Who else is running?"

Chie gave her some names that she identified as some of the less inspiring members of the House.

"Yes, she shall get in," Shizuru reiterated.

"I guess she's not so bad," Chie allowed. "I like her better than Armitage, to be honest. It's just that she's liable to do whatever Armitage tells her."

"Hmm, I don't know," Shizuru answered. "Because I have a feeling that Kikukawa-han is actually quite capable of holding her own against Haruka-han, on occasion. In her own subtle way, perhaps."

"Maybe," Chie said. "By the way, I see you have a letter from Sosius-if I remember that seal correctly. Worried about the funds?"

"At first, yes. But it turns out I shall not have to dip into my own accounts to supplement the war chest this early. You recall that Kruger-han and I had a private meeting yesterday?"

"Yes."

"He was kind enough to present a gift to us-a few hefty bags of gold, to be precise. I should think that will go a long way to helping our campaign."

"That's wonderful!" Chie exclaimed, clapping her hands together happily. "I was worried about it, actually, because those cheapskates in the House gave us so little to start with, and we always end up having to make up for it from our own coffers... Oh, don't get me wrong, Fujino-san, I don't begrudge it to the soldiers! Otherwise, I wouldn't even bother adding to their pay, nor would you. It's just that it's bad policy and those from Senate can't see it!"

Shizuru nodded: "Indeed. I never understood how they could see fit to allocate so little to the legionaries' salaries and supplies when they obviously were not having fiscal issues. Why, there is more than enough in the Treasury to fund three or so full wars and carry out management of Hime at the same time. Hoarding state moneys is a crime!"

"They'd rather use it for those grand banquets they're so fond of," Chie frowned. "I wouldn't mind a good banquet myself... but pretending it's a state affair and making the state pay for it when they could very well afford to do that themselves! And there's nothing of value discussed-they only spend the time to gossip and flirt and pretend to be very busy people!"

"I seem to recall seeing you at several of those 'grand banquets', Chie-han."

"Guilty!" Chie cried, laughing at the tease. "Well, it's a wonderful place to get all the dirt on everyone, and you know how I can't resist that. Although... there's also that other thing."

"Senou-han," Shizuru noted. "Or, to be precise, Senou-han's father."

Her legate sighed and lifted a hand to push the dark hair out of her eyes.

"You got that right, General," she said. "I'm still trying to get around to his good side, you know, and those parties are the best places for that sort of thing. He can't exactly ignore me like he does when I visit their place, because he has to act civil in front of everyone else."

"I wonder why he is so insistent on Aoi-san being married to a man instead of a woman."

"Continuing the family line."

"Progeny? But surely it is possible to adopt, as is often the custom in such cases."

Chie bared her teeth in a wry smile.

"He'd rather they were of his blood, I think," she said. "It's not just that I'm a woman, you know: it's a secondary excuse to him. It's the blood. You know what pride that old bastard has in their lineage-he keeps touting his illustrious ancestor, you know the one-and he has the old patrician snobbery to boot. Huh. Not that all patricians are like that," she added quickly, seeing the smile on her general's lips.

"I would hope not," Shizuru said. "As it is, I consider that way of thinking a very outmoded concept."

"Which doesn't stop a lot of people from still being 'outmoded,'" Chie sighed. "Why more people can't be like you is beyond me... but, no, that's a silly thing to say. You're rather beyond comparison, Shizuru-

san. No-one else's standards can be applied to you."

"Oh, really, Chie-han!"

They were interrupted when a head poked into their tent. They turned towards it to see the chief primipilus of the Ninth, her red hair waving over her eyes. She stepped in, snapped off a crisp salute, and smiled at them.

"All in, Nao-han?" Shizuru asked.

"Their people are here, General," the other replied, before turning her head to the side and facing the general's bodyguard. Their faces were not exactly level, for the Otomeian had her people's height and the centurion was the same. Even so they glared at each other, two dissimilar pairs of green eyes shining.

"Shouldn't you be out there leading your whatever-you-call-it division, pup?" she snarled at the Otomeian, who said nothing and merely gave her the full benefit of a frigid stare. Used to cowing people she provoked, the primipilus faltered in her glare momentarily, then narrowed her eyes at the intractable figure.

"I can't wait to see what you can do on the battleground, Girly," she sneered. "If you can do anything, that is."

She nodded to the other two in the tent, then vanished. The flaps of the entrance waved slightly after the disturbance.

"Well, Nao's being herself," Chie said wryly. She rolled up her scroll and put it in the trunk next to them, after which she stood up and left, only stopping momentarily by the dark-haired girl next to the exit to tell her-rather awkwardly-not to mind the centurion too much. Then she was gone and the only people in the tent were the general and her bodyguard, who eyed her with the usual quiet wariness Shizuru had grown used to by now.

"Chie-han is right, you should not mind what Nao-han says," the Himean said, after a while. "She is not saying it out of spite, Natsuki."

Natsuki said nothing, merely looking away.

"But she did bring up a good point. Shall you not be leading your division today?"

The Otomeian nodded vaguely.

"So you shall?" Shizuru smiled and feigned a sad expression. "So I shall not have a bodyguard to protect me today? How will I ever fend for myself without Natsuki to look over me?"

Natsuki rolled her eyes-it fascinated Shizuru, being such a normal gesture-and shook her head at the older woman with a pointed expression, making the latter's eyebrows go up.

"So you will be staying with me after all?"

A nod.

"Then how will you lead your division? You do not mean to do both at the same time?"

Another nod. Shizuru laughed and stood up.

"How the people back home would laugh at how we communicate," she said, coming around her desk to stand in front of the girl. "This gives new meaning to the phrase 'a one-sided conversation', I tell you."

She reached out to touch the silky hair, making the other freeze with a look of alarm on her face. Shizuru ignored it and simply went on. When she withdrew her hand, she showed Natsuki the object she had removed from her locks: a small leaf.

"Really, now," Shizuru said soothingly. "My own bodyguard should not be scared of me."

Natsuki, having recovered from her surprise, frowned and coloured angrily. It was the jibe at her being afraid, of course: Otomeians had a very proud culture of courage.

"I cannot wait to see what you can do, too," the older woman said kindly, apologising for the previous joke with a smile.

Having said this, she exited the tent. Natsuki slipped out after her and followed. Soon the two found themselves looking at row upon row of Otomeian and Himean soldiers standing to attention before their respective officers. Weapons and mail shirts flashed in the sunlight as more troops moved up into position before the dais where Shizuru was supposed to oversee the manoeuvres.

When the Himean and Otomeian officials planned today's exercises, they had hit upon the fact that the square within the city's walls was most definitely not spacious enough for their purposes. Hence it had been decided that the armies would have their training outside of the citadel: on the vast, snow-covered plain directly before the western entrance of the city.

Now, as Shizuru made her way to the dais put up for her sake, she found herself thinking how picturesque the scene was. Before her were the colours of the soldiers against a backdrop of pure white, the snow having been packed to ice by their feet as well as the cold. Behind the armies was the deep green of the forest, sprinkled with glittering snow on the very tops of the firs and pines. And the smell! The cool, crisp scent only winter could bring, cut with the underlying sap and scent of pine. Why did it seem so familiar to her, a woman from a warm, grassy country? It was so clean, so comforting.

She greeted the other officials on the dais and stepped to the front. As she did, she saw the criers ascend their individual, smaller platforms throughout the ranks, ready to begin repeating her words so that they would reach even those farthest from the dais. Unsurprisingly, the Otomeians also had criers, and no doubt translators as well.

She closed her eyes for a moment, glad that there was hardly any wind today. It would make it easier for her to project her voice without becoming too high-pitched or nasal—a technique she had learned from a friend who was a famous actor of the stage. She took a deep breath.

"Fellow Himeans and Otomeians," she said, her clear-carrying voice sounding through the cold, still air. "Today we begin our first joint exercises. Today the Otomeians shall see how the Himean legions move, and today we Himeans will see how our Otomeian friends manoeuvre. We will see how you use your weapons and you will see how we use ours. This we shall do in the proper spirit of respect and regard for each other."

She paused to allow the criers to call out her words. The one closest to her would cry out her words down the line, only to have them taken up and repeated a second time by the next crier, and so on. When the last faint yell ended in the distance, Shizuru resumed.

"Yet this is only in the beginning. By the end of today, I expect that we should no longer see each other as strictly Otomeians or Himeans. At the end of today, I expect that we should have lost that distinction between and among us when we enter the field. For what we are doing is merely for the purpose of being able to acquit ourselves well in the coming battle. And in battle, being Himean or Otomeian does not count. What counts is being victorious. What counts is being able to survive."

She paused again and shifted her stance, red eyes blazing.

"I say this because I do not want distinctions of nation or class to be made when we finally come to war. I will not have it! I tell you clearly now that anyone who dares to think in such ways has no place in my army. And you are-every one of you-my army, for so long as this campaign lasts. Those from Hime have been assigned to me by the Senate and the Himean People. Those from Otomeia have been assigned to me by the kindness of His Majesty Kruger the Third. So let us be clear about it: you are now, all of you, one unit. My army."

"In my army," she went on. "Everyone is on equal footing with everyone else, in a certain sense. Yes, even I, commander though I may be. What I mean by this is that there should be no divisions made within an army on the basis of who belongs to what group. The army is the group. The army's survival is what matters, because it is the survival of everyone in it."

"I say this now because I have seen some officers and even generals encourage such elitist thinking in their ranks, with the result that the whole suffers. I have seen people abandon or ignore an allied soldier's plea for assistance simply because he was merely an ally, and 'not one of their own'. I have even seen whole units sent to a massacre as bait, because they were not the commander's people and their loss could thus be condoned. I have seen a soldier hesitate to go through the risk of saving another's life simply because the other was a mere ally, and he wondered whether it would be worth it to go through the risk 'just for an ally's life'."

She lifted her chin, sweeping the rows with a severe gaze.

"I will punish anyone who does something along those lines," she said. "For as long as you are under my command, you will move together as one, think together as one, and act together as one. You will aid a fellow who needs it not because he is Otomeian or Himean but because he is your fellow. You will think of the whole before you think of the factions. You will not discern who is Otomeian and Himean because it is irrelevant. You will be my soldiers first and Himeans second. And those of you who hail from this nation will be my soldiers first and Otomeians second. If this is taken as treasonous thought by those in our respective nations, I beg to differ. As my soldiers, you are my army and I am your commander. I... I am not Fujino Shizuru when we come to the fighting. I am, by the power vested in me by two governments, Hime and Otomeia both. I represent the two, united in interest."

"I spoke earlier of survival. Many of us have begun to think ill of that word—that to be concerned about one's survival is the surest way to being a coward. That one cannot be a good soldier without disregarding one's survival, for if one dies bravely, it is the surest way to immortality. I speak not only to those Otomeians who adhere to the faith of Zalmoxis, but to the Himeans as well, who seek to become immortalised as heroes."

"I agree that to die bravely is an honour," she declared. "Yet I also agree that to live bravely is just as great an honour, and in many ways may even surpass an honourable death. For what can be more immortal than to enter the battlefield and emerge from it wreathed in the laurels of victory? What can be more honourable than to be able to say that you won the war and lived to enjoy your triumph? I would rather have living soldiers than dead ones. I would rather win this war with living heroes rather than men and women in the grave."

"I say this because I wish to make this clear: I have every intention of winning this war, whatever happens. But I also want to do it without making martyrs of my army . This is only possible if we are unified. Others have said this time and time again: strength is in unity. I repeat it now."

She stopped to fix them all with her look, putting all her power into her gaze. As though on cue, the sun peeked out of the cloud it had been hidden behind and caught her face: her eyes were on fire.

"You are my army, and you will be unified," she enunciated, seeing that she had them hanging on every word. "You will be strong. My army is always strong. You will survive. My army always survives. Do you know why? That is because my army always wins."

She ended her speech with a smile. As the last echoes of her words reached those at the very back and she was returning to the officials standing behind her, a roar came from the first ranks of the Himean line.

"General!" came the cry. "We are your army!"

As though that had been the only catalyst needed, a wave of yells and cries swelled up through the soldiers on the field, reaching even the Otomeian ranks. The applause for the general exploded the silence of the previously calm landscape as soldiers beat their swords and spears on their arm greaves or shields.

As for the object of all this adulation, she merely turned to face them and inclined her head, mouth set in a warm smile. The Otomeian officials watched, as fascinated by her as they were by the spectacle of seeing their normally stoic soldiers moved to this wild display. The Himean officers, more accustomed to their general, smiled knowingly and gazed at her with admiration.

Shizuru waved the ranks into calm again, bowing gracefully to acknowledge their applause. As this was happening, one of her officers sidled up to her senior legate.

"She's got them," he said. "She's really got them."

"Oh, yes."

"If the Otomeian troops weren't falling for her before, they're all in love with her now, Chie-san." He shook his head humorously. "And as for our legions-that's always been a love affair there."

Chie grinned.

"The thing of it, Taro-san," she told her fellow legate. "Is that I've heard her give similar speeches several times now. But it gives me the shivers every time, and this... awful giddy feeling. I don't think I'll ever be immune."

"No one is." He lifted his eyes to the sky, squinting against the light. "It's just her. And it's hard not to love a general who's actually just as concerned for your life as for the victory. I mean, seriously concerned."

Chie chuckled.

"You know," she told him. "People used to think she was crazy when they first found out about her hate for losing soldiers. Crazy, they said. Or too idealistic. Either way, they thought she'd never get through a war as a soldier, much less as a general." She laughed. "And the first battle she jumps into, she goes and wins the corona obsidionalis."

"And later commands her first official campaign constantly outnumbered!" Taro laughed back. "She's unbelievable, isn't she? I'm starting to believe the rumours about her being the child of Jupiter-what?" he asked, seeing his fellow senator's shoulders shaking.

"Jupiter is right! I didn't know you were that superstitious."

"You shouldn't take the gods so lightly, Harada-san."

"And you shouldn't be so light in the head. Even Shizuru-san calls those rumours preposterous."

They stopped their conversation when Shizuru approached them. The other officers, Otomeian and Himean, gathered with them as they clarified the day's training schedule, which had been decided on earlier. Afterwards, they dispersed to their tasks.

Shizuru remained where she was after the others had left, speaking to one of the royal princes. He was acting as the king's representative today, so the rest of the Otomeian counsellors deferred to him. He complimented her on her "stirring speech" before moving on to the real matters at hand.

"I expect that you wish to be more acquainted with our military's ways," he said. "So I arranged for the Baron Seki here to accompany you, General. He is one of our best commanders on the field, and he will explain whatever you need to know about."

The man beside him was a hulking giant who stood a hand's span above Shizuru, herself an exceedingly tall woman. She gazed up at him and returned the salute with an admiring smile, appraising his form.

"I can see what an imposing figure you must be in the fray, Seki-han," she said. "It would take a brave soldier not to cringe at the sight of you advancing."

He smiled, his angular features crinkling with open pleasure.

"I'm nothing compared to the great Fujino-san," he said in Himean. His low voice held traces of a slight accent, the one she had recognised by now as the Otomeian one. "We're honoured to be in your army, General."

"As I am honoured to be working with all of you," she returned, waving away his compliment. "Well then, we shall leave you now, Prince."

With a nod to the prince, Shizuru turned her head and found what she was looking for: the forest-green eyes of her bodyguard. Natsuki herself was facing the prince, who was smiling at her and said a few words to her in their language before leaving himself.

More and more curious, Shizuru thought, having noticed by now how well-situated her bodyguard seemed to be in the ranks of the nobility. First it was the king and the way he always spoke to her in those warm and personal tones, then it was the fact that most of the high officials being sent to see to Himean needs were always giving acknowledgments beyond the usual nod to the young woman whenever they saw her. Clearly, her bodyguard was an important person in her own right, and certainly a well-connected one. Was it simply because of her pedigree? Her captainship of her division?

"Natsuki," she said simply when the young woman's eyes had returned to her, giving a slight tip of her head towards one side. Understanding, Natsuki came up and nodded to Seki, who grinned at the young woman. They started walking.

"I'm in legendary military company here," the gigantic man suddenly rumbled good-naturedly. "The famous general of Hime and the leader of the Lupine Division. Makes me feel smaller," he joked.

He and Shizuru laughed. Sneaking a quick peek at Natsuki, Shizuru found her with her lips trembling, trying to suppress a smile. She thought the sight strangely appealing and resolved to get it to break into fullness one day.

"By the way-if you don't mind me asking Natsuki a question, General. No? Thank you. Natsuki, I heard you're going to make Kyo take charge of your unit for most of today?" Seki said.

The younger Otomeian nodded.

"So you'll be overseeing them from a distance?" Seki went on.

She nodded again.

"Right." He looked at Shizuru. "That's all right, then."

They were walking past several cavalry units in training. Shizuru slowed her steps to be able to survey them properly, not bothering to hide her interest.

"Cataphracti," she observed. "True cataphracti! It is my first time to see them in the flesh." She chuckled at her words. "Although strictly speaking, I am not seeing the flesh."

Seki's voice held a note of pride to it when he replied to this.

"Yes, ours are what they call the real ones," he said. "We've seen and heard of those imitations they did in those other places... sad little things. They couldn't stand to a real one. It's the armour and the horse that makes the cataphract. And we have the best armour and horses for it."

"I imagine the gear must be heavy, though."

"Very much," the big man admitted. "And that's why we put the strongest, bulkiest riders in the third cavalry division. That's the cataphracti."

"Heavy cavalry."

"That's it. Though heavier than most, I'd think. Same with the horses. The bulkiest horses go there, to make sure they can take the weight. Of course, that doesn't mean they're the best horses all-around-those still go to the Lupine Division-but it does mean they're the strongest if you want to put it in terms of brute force."

"I see. How many cataphracti here?"

"I'd say seven hundred right now. What you'd call an ala and a half, I think?"

"Indeed." Looking ahead, she narrowed her eyes slightly. "Then the second cavalry division is that one I see in the distance, near our Fourth Legion. Judging by their armour and spears, would I be correct in saying that they are the light cavalry-what you call skirmishers?"

The giant nodded.

"So you're familiar with cavalry tactics, General?" he asked.

"Yes," she said. "Although the only ones I have worked with have been the auxiliary and allied units we had from Africa and Thrace. No cataphracti, although they did have heavy cavalry."

She stopped to look at the soldiers they were now passing.

"Mounted archers," she said with obvious enthusiasm. "Excellent!"

"They can shoot just as well off the horse, General," he said, sounding happy at her approval of the auxiliary troops. "But we're a horse people. Most of our troops prefer to operate on horseback."

"I see. But what is that they are using? It looks like a composite bow. I thought they were not used in such countries as this."

He nodded to acknowledge her point.

"The usual ones aren't, I think," he said. "Because the moisture gets to them and the glue starts getting weak. But we use a different kind for ours-it's only made in Otomeia."

"How superb!" Shizuru said, truly excited by the discovery. "It's a great advantage over the enemy's archers, unless they use composite bows too."

"No, the Mentulaeans use simple bows," Seki said, baring his teeth in a grin. "We've seen them before. Only Otomeia uses composite bows in these parts. We don't sell them or tell how to make them either."

"A wise decision, militarily." They resumed walking. "Out of curiosity, Seki-han, have the Mentulaeans and Otomeians ever fought each other?"

Seki shook his head.

"No," he said. "Because our lands have always been far from each other. More so back then, when they hadn't started to expand yet. Now, though, they're much closer. Too much for comfort."

"Would you say they are familiar with your methods of engagement?"

He spent a moment thinking, letting out a rolling hum as he did.

"They know we have real cataphracts," he said. "Because we're known for that here. They know we have an elite cavalry-I mean the Lupines, of course-but that's more like knowing a legend more than anything. Lots of people outside Otomeia talk about the Lupines, but they don't know what they are. They don't even believe it exists, I think. We haven't sent the Lupine unit out in years-except for that one time out east, right, Natsuki? But that's too far from these parts for anyone from around here to have seen it."

"I think it's safe to say they've never seen us fight," he continued. "They don't really send out scouts as far up as here for that, or they haven't. And most of our own battles have been to the east, in the opposite direction. Our kingdom stretches there-to other provinces, to lowland mining towns, valleys, other hilly regions-and the bastards around there keep trying to invade our territory. Just small fry now, really, so not really threats as big as the Mentulaeans. We've pretty much beaten down most of the enemies in those areas."

"So most of your activities have thus far been confined there. There are other armies there, yes?"

"Yes."

She smiled at the sight of Chie ahead of them. Her senior legate was overseeing the joint exercises of one cohort of Himean infantry and an equivalent unit of Otomeian foot soldiers, the latter carrying their long pole-arms.

"The rhomphaias, " Shizuru noted to Seki, referring to the lance the Otomeian infantry was using. "Are quite a good spin on the falx. You are familiar with the falx?"

Seki's broad face arranged itself into a grin: "Yes. The Mentulae have switched to pole-arms based off of them in the last, hmm, three or four decades, I think? I'm not sure. We call them falx too."

"Indeed."

"I'm not that worried. They're not as good with them as we are with our rhomphaias," he said proudly. "All they do is slash. Which isn't a bad thing, because it's easy and the falx is better for that than rhomphaias, actually... but huddle them together and they've no idea what to do."

"Actually, we do have some experience with that," she told him.

"And with the nation from which the falx originated, so I am not worried about the Mentulaean prowess with it either. What I actually wished to learn more about was that strange instrument I saw yesterday-I do not know what you call it. The one that looks like a threshing sickle with a long chain attached to it."

He turned to her with a puzzled expression on his face.

"The daos ?" he asked, brow furrowed as he looked at her bodyguard. "But surely Natsuki..."

He trailed off and grinned, lifting a large hand to scratch at his blonde head.

"No, you wouldn't say anything, would you?" he said humorously to Natsuki, who did not respond, although Shizuru noticed her eyes were sparkling with what seemed to be amusement.

"What are you talking about, Seki-han?"

He faced her.

"You're talking about the Lupine Division's primary weapon, General," he said. "We call it daos . In your language... let me see... ah. Wolf."

" Wolf, " Shizuru repeated. She lifted an eyebrow at Natsuki and smiled. "So all this time Chie-han and I were going about wondering what it was, you could have simply told us, Natsuki? Really, you can be so unkind."

She shook her head with a hint of exasperation as Natsuki stared back at her with mischief in her eyes, lips pressed into a tight line as though trying not to laugh.

"What do you call it again, Seki-han?" she asked, turning back to him.

"Daos, general."

"And it means 'wolf'?"

"Yes." He chuckled, suddenly. "It's strange to be the one explaining this to you, you know, when the best person who can do so is standing right next to us. But knowing her-well, I guess it's to be expected."

She laughed softly but stopped when she saw Natsuki smiling and shaking her head at the Otomeian giant. Her bodyguard's splendid face was transformed by the expression, and the transformation stripped Shizuru's breath from her throat so hard that she had to clear it to avoid the impending cough.

Good god, she thought, irritated by her own unexpected reaction. Again-what a face!

The deep voice of their companion interrupted her thoughts and she turned to him as he returned to talking about the daos. He proceeded to take the lead as they walked, telling them that he would take them to where the Lupine Division was training today.

"It's called that because of the parts," he explained to Shizuru. "As you say, it's made up of a sickle blade with a handle attached by a long chain to a metal weight or lump. We call it a ball. The ball end of the chain is called the paw, and the sickle end is called the fang. There are other variations of the paw-one's even called a claw-but the ball is the standard for battle."

She nodded. "It's certainly curious. I've never seen anything like it."

"I'm sure of that," he told her. "Only we use them. And only a few people can actually use them. Almost all of them are in the Lupine Division. They're handpicked and trained very carefully."

"I am very interested."

He tipped his head at their silent companion.

"Natsuki here is best at the daos," he said. "If you really want to see how effective it can be, you should ask her to give a demonstration when we get to where the others are. It's beautiful when Natsuki does it, General-I've yet to see anyone work with that thing as she does. I could watch her all day."

Shizuru looked at Natsuki from the corner of her eye. She was surprised to see that the blush she would have expected from Seki's compliment was not there. It took only the barest compliment from her to make Natsuki flush, yet here her bodyguard was with nary a spot of colour on her cheeks at Seki's extravagant compliment.

Dare I think that blush is something for my eyes alone?

She shook her head at herself, letting a smile come to her face.

Oh, your ego, Shizuru ! she thought, sneaking another look at her bodyguard's ever-stoic face. Watch yourself and your fancies, for god's sake. The girl does not even speak to you!

"Ah! Here we are," Seki rumbled, bringing them to a group of warriors wearing uniforms similar to Natsuki's. There were a good number of Himean uniforms mixed in, and Shizuru distinguished her chief primipilus there. The redhead saw them approaching and ran up to meet her.

"General, you need to see this," she said, sounding more excited than Shizuru had ever heard her outside of the actual battlefield. She led Shizuru and her two companions to the edge of the crowd of dark uniforms, stopping next to several Himean and Otomeian officers. They saluted the new arrivals.

"It's damn amazing, how they use it," Nao told Shizuru. "Even I think it'd take me a while to learn how to use it the way they do without slicing off my arm. Or giving myself a nice little cosh on the head."

She turned to one of the black-uniformed warriors next to them.

"Kyo," she said. "Can you do that again? I want the general to see it for herself." Turning to the Shizuru, she said: "He's the best at it here, they tell me, so I think you should see his way of using it."

"Excuse me, Nao-san," came a voice.

It was the lanky one named Kyo and they looked at him.

"It's not true that I'm the best. Not now that the captain is here," he said, speaking carefully in powerfully accented Himean. "The captain is much better than I am. Maybe she should give the demonstration this time?"

Nao turned to face Natsuki, who was standing a little behind Shizuru, off to her side.

"That's a good idea," she said, giving her a halfway-nasty smirk. "So how about it, Kid? Let's see it."

"Yes, please do humour us, Natsuki," Shizuru said, adding to the chorus.

Natsuki stepped forward and made a motion to Kyo expressionlessly. He came up to her and handed over his daos, which she held by gripping the handle of the sickle in one hand. She looped the long chain until she could hold the lump of metal at its end with her other hand without having the chain touch the ground as it sagged in between. She then let the metal lump slip through her fingers, giving it enough length to let it dangle like a pendulum.

She looked around, seemingly searching for a target.

"Use those pegs," Nao said, pointing to a series of thick wooden dowels that had been driven vertically into the icy ground, nearly three metres from where Natsuki was standing.

Nao nodded to her commander. "You'll see, General. They sort of throw that end with the lump-the weight-and lasso something with it, then finish it off with the blade. When they're on horse, they don't bother to pull it to them and just follow through with a charge. But since we're standing still, we might as well have her pull it here. With the pull, they catch the peg with the blade when it flies back after the pull on the chain."

"Centurion, General," interrupted Kyo. "That is still a simple manoeuvre I showed you. The captain is capable of far more difficult things than that. Some of them, in fact, no one else of us can do."

Nao squinted at Natsuki, who simply listened to them while continuing to finger the chain of the weapon in her grip. She looked as though she was asking them to give her the signal to begin.

"Tricks, hm?" the Himean primipilus said, licking her lips. "Okay. Let's see it then, Captain. Impress us with your skill."

"Yes," said Shizuru, smiling at Natsuki. "Do show us, Natsuki."

Natsuki held Shizuru's eyes for a moment, then nodded. Turning her head so that she was no longer looking at them but at the pegs, she changed her stance so that her body was half-turned to the targets and half to the observers. The weight swung slightly from where her left hand held part of the chain. She slowly began to pull up the chain with her fingers, and soon, that hand was holding the weight itself.

The rest watched her, curious as to what she intended to do.

Suddenly the hand from which the ball hung tensed and flicked out the weight in a snapping motion, sending it on a direct trajectory towards the target. There was the whistling sound of something rushing through air, then a crash as one of the pegs shattered in its middle, splinters flying along with the severed half.

"Damn!" came the awed oath from one of the Himeans. "D'you see that?"

Shizuru's eyes, trained to spot the swiftest movements, still had to strain to catch the quick progress of the metal ball from Natsuki's hand to the peg and back again as the girl pulled back with the hand holding the sickle end of the weapon. She blinked after Natsuki once again had the weight in her fingers, having caught it as it returned with the retracting pull. She seemed to be absorbing the returning blow of the weight by catching it with a retreating drag of her palm, whose wrapping of linen strips Shizuru now understood.

Shizuru's eyebrows went up after the demonstration, her mind recalling the blurred image of the chain extending from Natsuki's hand in an impossibly straight line.

"Natsuki..."

There was another flick of the chain and the weight shot out again. This time, it seemed to miss its target as it went past another peg, missing it by a good hand's width. Suddenly, there was a jerk that shivered up the still extending chain like a wave, rushing across the line in the air and ending with a rippling curl at the end. The weight seemed to pause, then snaked back and inwards rapidly as the wave forced the chain to alter the direction into which it was forcing the metal lump. This caused the weight to hit the peg from behind and smashed it just as the other one. Another jerk and the weight was back in Natsuki's left hand.

Shizuru was vaguely aware of Nao letting out a sharp curse, even as she followed the ball in its third projection from Natsuki's hand. This time, it smashed one of the remaining pegs close to where it was dug into the ground. The severed part flew up in the air and the next thing the spectators knew, the chain had waved again and curled around the airborne object, wrapping around it but not smashing it with the weight. There was a tug and the chain retracted, the severed peg coming with it. Then came the flash of metal as the sickle met it, slicing through the wood as though it were made of wax.

All of this was done in a matter of moments. As quickly as it had begun, it was over. All that they saw afterwards was Natsuki standing before them with the sickle and the weight end of the chain gripped by her other hand. The split pieces of the third peg lay on the ground near her. The spectators, particularly the Himeans, stared at her mutely, jaws slack. It was the chief primipilus who broke their silence.

"How in the bloody hell did you do that?" she asked, green eyes dancing.

Vocabulaire/Notes :

1. Shades - One doubts anyone is unfamiliar with these, but to be sure: Dis/Hades is the Underworld as well as the name of the god of the underworld in Roman/Greek myth. The Romans/Greeks believed that upon death, a part of the person that retained his/her form went to the Underworld. This was called the shade, and it is unlike the modern notion of soul in that it does not exactly have a mind or personality (at least, not in the sense of having agency that a soul is supposed to have), although the noblest shades could be brought 'to their senses' (to put it crudely) upon a draught of blood. For purposes of expediency, I have the Himeans use 'shade' interchangeably with the word 'soul'. Please be careful not to confuse the modern understanding with the ancient here, however. To a Himean, the Underworld is not an Afterlife. This point is significant.

2. NOTE for the sceptics - Yes, the manoeuvre at the end of this chapter is possible and has been done. (Most of those thinking otherwise may be imagining the distances between forces unbelievably short!) It is worth noting that a baggage train would make it much harder. Recall that Shizuru marches light, however.

Two days after the beginning of joint exercises, the Otomeian scouts sent to bring back news of the enemy finally returned. They bore the intelligence that would precipitate the Himeans' march down from Otomeia and to the western lands that bordered the Mentulaean Empire. It was not until evening that they arrived in Otomeia to bring this catalyst with them, however. The people of that city still breathed an air of near-idyll for most of that day, and even those in the army were able to enjoy the morning as well as the afternoon with pleasurable indolence.

The Himean general herself was taking a quiet moment of relaxation at the time the scouts were riding their way back to the Otomeian citadel. She had taken to hiding in the royal gardens with her bodyguard when seeking a moment for herself. Since the morning, she had talked to over a dozen Otomeian influentials, had partaken of her midday meals with the king upon invitation, and had overseen the military manoeuvres for joint training. One would say it was only natural, therefore, that she felt the slightest bit of weariness creep into her bones. Yet she herself felt it foreign and attributed it to the cold as well as the lack of actual engagement with the enemy, as she explained to her attentive bodyguard.

"Do you know," she told the young woman. "It is the most curious thing. I hardly ever feel tired when I am actually on the battlefield, and there have been times where I had to fight almost without cease for days. Yet when I am simply preparing for battle or for war, I am quick to feel fatigued. Almost as though the waiting itself is more draining than the activity. Do you know the feeling?"

The dark-haired woman predictably nodded instead of answering her verbally. Shizuru had become so used to it these past days that she simply went on, continuing their 'conversation'. She leaned back against the trunk of the tree she was sitting under, looking at her silent bodyguard.

Herself no great talker-or at least not one known for disclosing her true thoughts as candidly as she now did with her Otomeian companion-Shizuru had acquired the habit of talking to her watcher as a way of passing the time. It was partly due to her promise that she would get the younger woman to talk to her one day, and partly due to the fact that it felt immensely, oddly comfortable to speak to the quiet girl. Occasionally, she would marvel at the way the other's silence managed to draw out words from her that she would ordinarily not speak freely, but then it would slip her mind and she would go on with ease. Natsuki of the Otomeians, she thought, was bizarrely soothing as a listener.

She paused to look at their surroundings again, the secluded spot she had found. The ground on which she sat was frozen, and snow covered most of the area as well as the greenery, but she had spread her cloak out as a rug. It was getting dark-not to mention cold-but she did not mind. She chose to savour this moment of respite for as long as she could, chill be damned.

"I suppose it is simply my body storing up the energy it needs for the coming battle," she said, squinting as she looked up at the other woman, discerning the outline of the girl's features by the light of the torches nearby. "Diverting as much as it can of what I have now into reserve, or something to that effect."

A nod from her companion.

"Natsuki," she said, "you have been standing there for a while now. Did I not tell you to sit down? Come here, there is still room."

To prove the point, she shifted her seat on the cloak and pointed to the space next to her. Natsuki gave her a dour look that she answered with a smile.

"Could it be that you feel that to sit next to me-on a humble cloak on the earth-is too far beneath your dignity?" she said, eyebrows lifted as she feigned hurt. "I wonder what I have done wrong to deserve such low regard in your eyes."

Natsuki sighed, accustomed to the Himean's levity by now. Shizuru wiggled her eyebrows.

"Come. I do not recall anything in the king's instructions saying that you should stand all day. Sit here. I do not bite. Come now, please?" she added, seeing that the girl was wavering. "It is far more comfortable for you and for me as well. I do not have to strain my neck looking up at you."

Giving another resigned sigh, Natsuki stepped forward and took a seat, managing to do it with a fluidity of movement that the older woman found appealing. The girl was so catlike in some ways, Shizuru thought.

"Thank you." She gave the Otomeian a bright smile. "Now then, where were we? Ah, yes, waiting for battle."

Natsuki tipped her head slightly, eyes surveying the area.

"I am looking forward to it," Shizuru said, leaning against the tree once more. "And yet I am not. I feel two things very strongly about war, and they seem to be contradictory. I do not deny that fighting is in my blood, and that a great part of me enjoys it. Yet I loathe it, too, on principle."

Natsuki swept her eyes back to meet Shizuru's, emeralds asking a question. Shizuru gave her a wry smile.

"Yes, I loathe it," she went on. "Because it always means death. And I loathe death, on principle, as I said. You remember what I told the army in my preliminary address?"

Natsuki nodded.

"Well, it is true. I do hate the thought of losing soldiers. More than that, I hate the thought of losing people. An odd thing for a heavily blooded general to say, perhaps, and yet it is the truth. Human life is so precious, Natsuki, and so frail. It struggles so! And nothing is more wonderful than the way it triumphs in its efforts to overcome the difficulties of our paltry existence," she said, frowning thoughtfully. "Lives are meant to be lived, as they say, and yet I am in an enterprise that would prefer them to be offered up to the god of war. And for what purposes? Do these other lives under my command understand the purposes we officers and commanders bandy about, even? Oh, the others talk of glory being the goal of the rankers, but that is not true. My soldiers are not Achilles, and they are not Greek. They are Himeans, practical and beautifully sensible and far more likely to disdain the futility of a Leonidas and his three hundred than admire it. Glory? It is not a commodity they can purchase or seek. They do not search for it. It is more likely for me to do that, instead of them."

Natsuki was staring at her intently, seemingly engrossed in her words. Shizuru did not notice because she was shaking her head at the injustices of the world.

"It is true I am their better, and so I am privileged with the ability to consider glory," she muttered. "A consideration they shall never feel, or if they do, in only the smallest of ways. Each time they send a shade to the Underworld, they do it not so much for the elevation of their own stature but for their commander's. For mine. No doubt some of the philosophers would ask of me if one person's pursuit of glory can be justifiable cause for the extinction of a thousand others."

She paused to tuck her hair behind her ears, smiling at the young woman frowning at the problem she had posed.

"Oh, but that selfish pursuit is only the core of the thing for me," she said, in answer to the girl's drawn brows. "I suppose even those hypothetical philosophers must remember that there are other cores for others involved in this. For the peoples of our Northern Provinces, the core of the thing is their safety. And I am aware of it. I kill so that others shall not. The Mentulae, for instance, must be stopped from their expansion not merely since it is in Hime's territorial interests for them to do so, but also because they would be likely to kill more lives throughout their unfettered conquest than could ever be lost in this war. They are not known for being gentle masters: they practise genocide and eradication of races in territories they claim. They even practise human sacrifice in their faith. Horrific. What bloody gods and faith would countenance the regular sacrifice of a mortal life, one that has not even been conquered fairly on the field of battle?"

She stopped, then let out a sardonic laugh.

"Although," she admitted. "Even Himeans can have few scruples on fairness in dealing out death. My cousin, I am sure, subscribes to no rules when it comes to killing and getting her way."

She smiled dryly as she thought of the letter she had received two days ago from that cousin, Tomoe Marguerite. It had been full of pleas for her to return, to simply let someone else take charge of that campaign, to join her at her sumptuous villa outside the city. All of which Shizuru read through with sighs, having expected it. What stopped her sighs was the portion of the letter that informed her that her cousin had finally managed to acquire the vineyards she had been after for a while now, and had managed that acquisition in suspicious circumstances.

The vineyards were situated in the southern parts of the country and belonged to a certain well-to-do merchant who had absolutely refused to sell them, no matter how much Tomoe had heckled him. Now, it turned out that the merchant had died, allowing her to buy the land from his widow at a pittance: the poor addled woman had had little idea what those rich properties were truly worth. Small news, seemingly. What caught Shizuru's eye was Tomoe's description of how the merchant died-by a sudden seizure during a dinner party.

Could you have laced his drink with those poisons you are so fond of keeping for research? she wondered in disgust, knowing there would be little to no proof of it but conscious too of a powerful conviction that this had been the case . After all, Tomoe was famous for her very un-Himean knowledge of poisons and their effects. She kept countless specimens of various noxious mixtures, powders, mushrooms and the like, with what she called her interest in studying them. Poisons, of all things! The Himean world was much like the classical Greek one in this respect: poison was not considered a proper tool for anything, its study a subject regarded with wariness. Shizuru, for this reason, disliked having meals with the relative studying them... and secretly dissuaded most of her friends from doing so.

The moment I am gone, Shizuru thought, she would do something like this . She wondered if her cousin had been waiting for her to take a short absence to do such a reprehensible thing and only after plead with her to return immediately, once the job was done. That was certainly something Tomoe would do. For if there was something that occupied Tomoe more than her study of poisonous substances, it was her unrequited passion for Shizuru. Shizuru herself knew it, and suspected that the woman refrained from most of her nefarious activities whenever she was around, afraid of being seen through by the person she admired the most.

Shizuru wondered why her absence from Hime always seemed to come with events in that city that made her feel as though she should have been there to stop them. Another example would be the news she had received from both the letters of the Princeps and the Senator Tokiha: the two told of a certain group of foreign noblemen in Hime who seemed to be courting the less scrupulous politicians around the city, feasting them and making much of them in general.

What I do not like is that they are said to be-and I believe it!- Mentulaean, Fujino-san, had been the impassioned words of the Senator Tokiha's letter. Both Mai Tokiha and the Princeps, Reito Kanzaki, had expressed their concern and suspicions for what the Mentulaean visitors were doing in Hime. It was possible, they thought, that if Shizuru found it necessary to write to the Senate requesting more troops, she would find it very difficult to get it granted, as a result of these foreigners' efforts with some of the less upright members of the House. And there were a great deal of those! No doubt they were filling their pockets with foreign gold, promising to oppose any resolution that would send more resources to the North.

Let them keep their gold and their unblooded legions, Shizuru thought, unable to suppress a flash of anger at the idea. She could win this war without additional help from the Senate if it came down to it. She would show them. Even if they did persist in saying it was not a war to which they had sent her.

She thought of the words of the Princeps telling her of the currents in the House. They still refused to call it an actual war, regardless of the overwhelming portents showing that it was going to be one. They preferred to call it-in Sergay Wang's twist on Reito's words-a "mere potentiality" and "no great one, at that". A mere potentiality, where a small Himean force had been thrust into foreign country with an overwhelmingly large enemy around it: an atom cast into a hurricane...

She sighed heavily, letting the sound seep out of her like water, a catharsis. Yes, she did feel tired.

She started at the feeling of something touching her knee. It was her bodyguard, who was looking at her with eyes that showed so much concern that she inhaled sharply at the sight. After a few seconds of staring at her, the dark-haired woman broke the spell that held them both frozen by turning the most furious red Shizuru had ever managed to see yet, making a move to withdraw her hand from the Himean's knee.

Shizuru clutched at the hand and kept it where it was. Natsuki's eyes returned, doubly alarmed now.

She was met with a soft smile.

"Thank you, Natsuki." Shizuru held the hand in hers tighter, to prevent the girl from withdrawing it. "You are so kind."

The Himean commander then pressed the hand on her knee, feeling the bones twitch through the bandages that her bodyguard wore wrapped around the palms-ostensibly to protect them from her own weapon when she was obliged to enter battle. Eventually, Shizuru felt the young woman's hand go limp, the ridged protrusions of bone retreating underneath the linen bindings. She relaxed her own fingers in response. Lifting her hand, she picked up the younger woman's and it turned it so that the palm faced up, ignoring the other's puff of surprise.

Her eyebrows lifted.

"So many scars," she observed, noting the marks on the fingers that were not covered by the wraps. "From the daos, Natsuki?"

The other nodded shyly.

"I see."

She felt one scar with her fingers, feeling the other girl tense up as if by instinct. She gave Natsuki her most calming smile, feeling again that prickling sense of curiosity about this enigmatic creature consuming her, the desire to break open all those secrets Natsuki seemed to be holding behind locked lips.

"These must have hurt," she said, noting the depth and shape of several of the scars. "And they look very old. When did you start training in the daos, Natsuki? Were you very young?"

She was given an affirmative gesture.

The price for being skilled in such a weapon, she decided. She recalled her first images of the girl wielding the deadly instrument, managing to shock even the generally acerbic Nao into grudging respect. Yes, the price for such skill would be high. A natural talent for fighting lived only inside the person, after all: it was up to the outside, the body, to suffer the injuries it often took for that talent to be given form properly.

"I see."

She continued to feel the exposed skin of the other's fingers, running her own gently over them. Softly now, softly: she had the feeling of running her hand over the flank of a new horse, still very much a filly and still very willing to buck and flee. There was the tremble underneath the skin, the willingness to run at any moment.

"And even now, you are so young."

Natsuki tried to clench her fist. Shizuru stopped her by spreading her palm with her own.

Looking at the girl's pink cheeks, she realized what was bothering Natsuki.

"Oh, come now, Child," she said in surprise. "It is nothing to be ashamed of. I do not find it unsightly at all."

She removed her fingers from the other's and turned it up.

"Here, look," she said, exposing her hand too. "I have them too."

Natsuki looked at the palm next to hers, fascinated by the many crosses and patches of scar tissue on it. She looked up at the older woman.

"Touch them," Shizuru told her.

A small, reluctant shake of the head.

"It is nothing to be ashamed of," she said again. "Go on, Natsuki. Touch them and see. Mine may be deeper than yours, even."

A short interval of stillness, then a hesitant touch on her hand from the one next to it, which now hovered above her own. She smiled at the shyness of the fingers brushing over her palm, pleased that she had managed to get her reserved companion to touch her so familiarly.

"You see? Everyone's hand has scars."

Shizuru sighed, finding herself enjoying the delicate touches. Natsuki was surprisingly-or was it really surprising?-gentle with her hand.

"Sometimes, you cannot see them. But all hands are scarred."

The lucent green eyes flicked up to meet hers, shining.

"Sometimes," she added, "the most beautiful scars are the ones you can see."

A silence fell between them as the girl went on with her examination of the other woman's hand. Shizuru let her, feeling the warmth spreading through her palm. Neither of them spoke, simply looking at their hands where they were touching, and soon, the explorations of Natsuki's shy fingers seemed more like caresses to their recipient.

They were interrupted when Natsuki suddenly jerked her hand away and stood up, startling the Himean. Thinking that she had offended the younger woman somehow, Shizuru stood up as well with the intent of apologising to her. However, she soon realized what had prompted Natsuki's actions as she heard the sound of people approaching, their footsteps dulled by the snow. Soon, she could see the shadows, approaching them from the left.

"General!"

She recognized one of her legates along with two Otomeian officers. Picking up her cloak from the ground, she and Natsuki went to meet the group.

"Toshi-han," she said, as the party reached them. "What is it?"

"Their scouts are back," he answered, puffing misty little breaths.

She waited for him to regain his wind.

"What happened?" she asked.

"Siege. The Mentulae." He paused to inhale sharply. "Chie-san has already called the rest of the legates to council. Their people are in it too," he said, indicating the two Otomeians with him. "I was sent to inform you."

"Then we must be going."

They set off quickly. They made their way to the room where the council was being held and were let in by the guards, and found a dozen or so people already seated. They were at a large, round table that was not as low as the rest of the Otomeian tables but set at a height that permitted chairs. Everyone stood as they entered, including the king of Otomeia. He came to meet Shizuru and led her to the seat next to him. Natsuki took a stance nearby.

"Fujino-san," the king said. "We have news."

"So they tell me. Where are the scouts?"

They sat back down as he indicated two rather scruffy men seated with them. They bowed their heads in deference.

"Do they speak Himean?"

"One of them does. Both speak Greek."

"As do all my officers. Greek, then."

"Of course."

"May I hear of the news from them? I would like to hear their own accounts."

"Of course, Fujino-san. Report," he said to the men.

"I would like to hear first about why you took so long to return," Shizuru prompted. "Or so Hyodo-han tells me-that it was not usual for scouts sent to those parts to take this long to come back."

"Yes, Fujino-san," one of the men said, speaking fluid Greek. "It's the Mentulaeans who stopped us from getting back earlier. They're up on Stych Gorge."

"Stych Gorge," interrupted Hyodo, who was sitting on the other side of the king. "Is where we usually pass to get to the lands in the west, Argentum included."

"We nearly ran into them," the other scout said. "When we realised they were there, we though it was better to scout them a little-they're pretty well-camped there. It's not a small force either. I'd say they know you're here, General Fujino, and don't want any interference with their doings further west."

"How many?" Shizuru asked. "In the gorge."

"About ten thousand or more, I think."

"All foot?"

"Yes, infantry. Didn't see too many archers, but mostly spearmen."

"Very good. Please go on."

"We took a separate route when we were headed to Argentum, so I guess that's why we didn't run into them then. A good thing. Our orders were to pass by Sosia first, so we spent about a week going around. The closer we got to Argentum, the more rumours we got about a siege going on. It was when we got close enough to Argentum that we saw it for ourselves. The siege. It was the Prince Artaxi's army, we found out. We tried to get back as soon as possible and that's when we found the garrison at the gorge."

"Artaxi," the king said. "Is one of Obsidian's sons. It would be a large army, Fujino-san."

"I see," Shizuru replied. She looked at the scouts. "Argentum. It is heavily invested?"

"Very, General," said one of the men. "Not a lot of siege machines. Some chariots, but not for fighting. Looked more like a royal guard for the Prince. But they brought people, all right. We reckon there were about fifty thousand foot in there."

Chie, sitting a seat away from Shizuru, hissed.

"Argentum has no garrison," the senior legate muttered. "They won't last long. Not with an army that big."

"True," Shizuru said reflectively. "No horse, you say?"

"None, General."

"I can't think why they'd bring such a large force," one of the Otomeian counsellors at the table murmured.

"They were planning on going on after Argentum is why," someone else spat decisively. "Those bastards were set on getting the thing done in one swoop."

Shizuru tapped a finger on the table to draw their attention.

"Well then," she said coolly. "We must relieve Argentum."

"But can we?" asked an Otomeian. "We have only conducted three days of joint manoeuvres, General. I doubt we can all get there in time too."

"Not all," Shizuru responded. "The bigger the army I take, the slower it shall march. No, I am not taking all the legions or auxiliary. The troops are well-drilled enough for work, Chie-han?"

"They'll do, General," Chie said. "The Otomeians are just as well-trained as our legions. They'll follow command."

"Mm." She turned to the king. "It is certainly a great credit to your nation, Your Majesty, that your military is so efficient."

Kruger inclined his head at her compliment, the lines on his face showing that he was itching to smile at it.

"If you want to go, Fujino-san, then of course we shall give you what you need," he said gravely. "And you are right. We cannot simply leave Argentum without succour when it is our ally too. It would be shameful to wait."

He paused for a heavy moment, his deeply-lined, age-spotted brow furrowing.

"Yes," he decided quietly. "We must relieve Argentum."

The rest took this in silence. Hyodo was the one who expressed what everyone was thinking.

"So," he said, taking a deep breath. "It is war."

"Yes," Shizuru answered calmly. "It is war. Perhaps a little earlier than we expected, but it is here, nevertheless. It has been coming here all this time."

"Well," said the king, shifting suddenly in his seat so that his braided beard waved in front of him. "Better now than later, when we do not expect it at all! Shall you go through the dispositions, General Fujino? I suppose you are eager to make them as soon as possible."

"Yes, of course. Have you a map?" she asked the Otomeians, who produced a large one made of calfskin and recording the geography of the area to which they were headed as well as where they currently were. One of them pointed out the locations of the cities and the routes that were possible for them to take.

"This is Stych Gorge," he said, pointing to the illustration with his finger. "And this is the route we usually take to Argentum. Since that's blocked off, we probably have to take this other pass and skirt the Eutychine Hills, then go through here. There's another route, but it's even longer and would take close to a month for an army from here to get to Argentum. The other route will take only three weeks, at most."

"And if we were to take Stych Gorge?" Shizuru asked.

"About a week. But since we cannot use that-

"We shall go through Stych Gorge."

Every face in the room turned to her.

"But General Fujino," the king said, recovering from his surprise the quickest. His dour grandfather's face regarded her with confusion. "You would be ambushed. The gorge is garrisoned, as they said. Unless you plan to take it from them?"

She shook that idea away: "No, not at this moment, much as I would like to. The simple fact is that we do not have spare legions to garrison and hold on to the gorge, even if we do happen to take it from the legions they already have there. I am simply aiming for speed. From what I have heard, it seems as though Argentum is in dire condition. We cannot waste time. The matter of the gorge will have to be settled later."

"But General," said one of the Otomeians. "A route through Argentum would mean an ambush-a fight. We could take even longer than if we took the other routes."

"No, we shall not," Shizuru replied, already working out numerous possibilities and routes in her head for the march. "One way or another, we shall get through the gorge. I am taking all the cavalry and archery units with me, along with two of the legions we have brought from Hime. I shall leave the rest here, along with your infantry, to ensure that Otomeia is still garrisoned. In case they try something, you know, because I do not like our foes being as close as Stych Gorge. Although I may well send for the rest of the forces later too. Well, we shall see. Simply be prepared to move all forces at a moment's notice. I have a bad habit of demanding that troops be moved out in an instant, as my officers shall tell you."

"But General, that is all?" spluttered out another of the Otomeians in the room. "Pardon me, but the cavalry you named makes up no more than three thousand altogether! You shall be facing so many!"

"Indeed."

"You need not worry about Otomeia-our walls are not easy to break," another chimed in. "Please, Fujino-san, take more soldiers with you! And consider passing through the other route instead."

Shizuru only continued to smile, bereft of any discernible distress or tension. Her legates recognised this as the expression their general wore when she was readying herself for battle, and began to relax. They knew there was little to be done save follow orders when the force of nature that was their commander got into this mood. The Otomeians were hardly privy to this wise advice on resignation, however, and so merely looked more and more frazzled by the moment.

"Now then," Shizuru said, standing up. "I would like someone to explain the lay of the land to me as I see to the preparations. We shall march tomorrow at dawn, so get everything ready tonight, even if it means several of us shall not be able to sleep due to that. You can get your sleep on the march at camp, anyway. I would like these good men-" She indicated the scouts. "-to come with me for now. I have several questions they might answer. Now please excuse me, King Kruger and the rest of you. I have a lot of things to see to tonight."

The rest stood up automatically as she left, her bodyguard, legates, and both Otomeian scouts trailing after her. The Otomeians left in the room stared at the last figure going through the door until it disappeared into the darkness. They were silent, still wondering what had happened. It was a good while before anyone spoke.

"By the gods," one of the king's ageing counsellors finally got out. "Is she mad?"

---

Much though the Otomeians thought it, the Himean commander was not mad. She set out at a brisk march for the gorge the very day after the war council with her half of the army: two legions of Himean infantry with three thousand horsemen, including archers. There was no baggage train: with only two legions, Shizuru pointed out to her legates, there was no pressing need for one anyway.

The rest she left in Otomeia, true to her word, under the command of her chief primipilus and the only legate she left in the Otomeian citadel, Taro. Nao understood the meaning behind her general's decision and continued to drill the remaining legions while the others sped for Argentum. And 'speed' was the word for it. This was the first time the Otomeians witnessed for themselves how quickly the Himean infantry could move, marching at a pace that kept them level with their mounted allies very comfortably. Thus they covered the distance to their destination with great efficiency.

It was a mere four days before they came within sight of the gorge, only having stopped very briefly to make camp whenever nighttime fell. As they neared the defile, Chie squinted, trying to estimate what time they would reach it.

"What do you think?" she asked Shizuru, marching next to her.
"Looks suspicious, all right."

Shizuru flashed a brilliant smile: "Chie-han. Nervous?"

Chie laughed: "Don't tease, Shizuru-san."

"All right," her general replied. "We are right on schedule, so do not worry. We shall be there just before sunset." She paused to survey the area. "And everything is as I expected it to be. Yes, we shall follow through the plan."

"This is going to work, isn't it?"

"You doubt me?" she asked, the teasing tone there again.

"I'd eat my helmet first-if you don't make me eat it yourself!" the legate replied, making the legionaries marching next to them laugh as well. They knew their general, and if she said this was going to work, it was going to work. The Otomeians, who had initially harboured doubts, had begun to be infected by the Himean soldiers' confidence, and had taken to looking forward to reaching the gorge as well.

By sundown, the army was at the gorge, and directly under the scrutiny of the Mentulaean officer sent to garrison that canyon: a certain Ramis. He watched curiously with his legions as the Himean and Otomeian troops began to throw up earth and rocks, working frantically to-it seemed-build fortifications. Only half of the troops worked, while the other half stood watch. The cavalry separated itself to move ahead to the gorge's mouth in order to graze their animals.

Ramis laughed at the sight after a while.

"The idiots!" he said, blowing through his nose derisively. "I thought they were going to try to get through, but here it looks like they want to take this pass from us instead."

"Don't you think they can? Himeans are supposed to be good soldiers," said one of his junior officers. The man happened to be a close friend, and now joined in looking down at the activity. "They outnumber us too, here."

"It doesn't matter," Ramis told him. "We're too well-entrenched here for them to defeat us. They can wear themselves out trying, but they'll never take the gorge. By the time they've even made any headway in doing that, Prince Artaxi's army will have come closer too. All we have to do is hold for a while."

"They're really making that camp sturdy," observed another Mentulaean officer. "They must be serious about taking the gorge off our hands."

Ramis snorted with derision again and resumed watching. It was dark by now and the army below them had lit torches to be able to continue their work. The Mentulaeans watched, fascinated by the progress of the foreign, bizarre fortifications. It was well into the evening when the torches were finally extinguished, the camp having been completed.

"Idiots," Ramis said once more as he and his officers retired for some wine and to discuss the folly of the enemy army. "I intended to ambush them when they marched through the middle of the gorge, where they would have been completely swallowed-up by it. Looks like I won't get to do that. Pity. Would've been easier."

"At least we still have the upper hand," replied an officer. "They can throw themselves on the rocks trying to eject us. Prince Artaxi will be finished with Argentum by then."

"Get a good sleep, boys," said Ramis, getting up and heading for his tent. "We'll show these idiots how the Mentulae defend a position."

Ramis never got to show them his defensive skills, however. The moment the sun came up and shone its light on the fortifications in the ravine, it also showed no people behind them. There in the distance was the dust that showed where the Himean general's army had slunk off to during the night, headed for Argentum.

Dismayed and feeling very much like the idiot he had called their foes the day before, Ramis sent off a messenger to Argentum at full speed, to warn Prince Artaxi of the enemy's approach. He could not pursue the army in the distance as to do so would mean losing his advantage of the high ground, spelling out sure defeat. Furthermore, his orders were to garrison the gorge, and he predicted that his superior would flay him if he abandoned it without any orders to do so.

"The deceptive little pricks!" he ranted to his officers, watching helplessly as the dust and the column faded farther into the distance. "A trick like that-even I didn't see it coming!"

The Mentulaeans listened to their superior rant, wondering who could have thought of the manoeuvre that had just outwitted them so soundly. While they were all burning with humiliation at having been made fools of, every one of them also felt awe for whoever had orchestrated the plan, as well as for the sheer nerve it must have taken to try to get a whole army out of a ravine absent detection. Of all the monumental bluffs -why, it beggared description!

Thus it was that while the defenders of the gorge lamented their oversight, the relief force for Argentum continued along its path, unhindered by obstacles and buoyed by general merriment for the trick they and their commander had just done.

Chapter 6

Vocabulaire :

1. Imperium – Complex idea, possible to express as the degree of authority owned by a magistrate of Rome. There are varying degrees of it, and subcategories such as the "pro[office] imperium", which is basically a kind of authority that is comparable to that vested in the holder of the stipulated office in the title but which is held by a person not actually holding said office. Hence, with a proconsular imperium, the one holding it acts with the authority of a consul but is not in office as consul.

2. Pedarii - The senators at the back rows of the seating arrangement in Senate. One might think of them as the 'backbenchers' in that sense. They are not permitted to speak/make speeches but they may vote on decisions. From this, you gather that it is a reflection of a senator's prestige if he or she has the privilege of speaking in the Senate.

3. Siege and engineers - Engineers had an important role in sieges as they were the ones who drew up the plans for and supervised the actual carrying out of water diversion systems and the like.

4. Verpa - Latin obscenity; actually refers to the erect male organ with the foreskin drawn back.

When Ramis sent a messenger to Artaxi about the army heading for Argentum, he calculated correctly that it would reach his commander before the said army would. The news electrified the leader of the Mentulaean force, prompting him to send officers scurrying to alert the men. His troops began to take up positions around the city, further terrifying the citizens quartered within the walls with the noise of their armour and orders. Every eye was on the lookout, every ear waiting for the sound of rattling metal and marching footsteps.

Argentum sat on a wide plain bounded by patches of wooded area on every side. The city walls had three entrances: the main gates at the south; the north-western gate; and the eastern gates. The assaulting army before it now dispersed troops to form concentrations before each entrance, the bulk of the forces remaining in front of the southern one. The rest of the army massed in lines before the other two gates to prevent entry and exit through those portals.

The Himean general seeking to succour the city watched all this with a thoughtful eye, standing on her lookout point on a woody hill. With her were two of her legates and her bodyguard, who often left her own division in the hands of a subordinate so that she could watch over the general-as she did now, looking impassively at the older woman as the latter turned to the rest of the company with a grin.

"Rather disorderly, are they not?" the Himean commander remarked, drawing grins from her officers. "Do look at those lines. Really!"

"What do you expect from uncivilised barbarians?" asked one legate.

The general shook her head playfully at him.

"Uncivilised?" she echoed with a lift of the brows. "We often say that war is the expression of humanity's most uncivilised side. If one excels at the organisation of war as we Himeans are supposed to, does that not mean one is-or we are the most 'uncivilised barbarians' of all, Toshi-han?"

The legate named Toshi frowned, a little confused as to whether she was serious or poking fun at him. The senior legate laughed and clapped him on the back.

"The general's teasing you, Toshi-san," she told him. "Don't kill yourself thinking about what she said."

She turned to the tall woman looking out at the Argentinian plain.

"What do you want to do, Shizuru-san?" she asked her.

"I want to enter the city, I think."

"Enter the city?"

"Yes."

All of them turned their eyes to the army in the distance, once again.

"How many enemy scouts have been found thus far?" Shizuru asked.

"Five," returned her senior legate, grinning. "Oh, I love the Otomeian scouts-so stealthy! I doubt any of the Mentulaean ones have seen us yet or escaped to tell the tale, if they have. They're either dead or in our hands. They're quite lax for scouts, so the Otomeians tell us."

"Do you hear that, Natsuki?" said Shizuru, giving her bodyguard a wide smile. "Otomeia has impressed all of us, truly, with the calibre of her men and women... especially that of my own Natsuki, of course."

The girl responded with a half-choke when she heard the words 'my own Natsuki', turning a brilliant shade of red that fast approached purple. The other members of the party quickly brought their hands up to their mouths, stifling their laughter.

"Are you all right, Natsuki?" said Shizuru, still holding up her hand to her mouth as she smirked. "Is my dearest bodyguard going to protest and tell me I cannot call her that?"

The Otomeian gave her another fierce-and very purple-glare, shaking with indignation as she pressed her lips tightly together.

"Tsk," clucked the senior legate, when she had recovered enough to speak. "You lose this one, Shizuru-san. It looks like Natsuki-san's still not talking to you."

There was muffled laughter again. Ever since the senior legate had found out about the general's vow to make her bodyguard finally say a word to her, the information had spread to the other members of the general's staff-not least because it was impossible to ignore the way the general attempted to tease or bait the uncommunicative girl into finally saying something. As a result of this little eccentricity on the part of their commander, the legates had taken to making bets among themselves on when the girl would finally crack. The pot on that bet was now large, since officer after officer had been coming in to place his or her own wager. Secretly, of course.

"I seem to have lost again, Chie-han," the general sighed dramatically, ruffling her hair where she had tucked it into her cloak. "Well, as she is my bodyguard in truth, I do not see any reason why I cannot say she is my Natsuki as well. It sounds so much better, do you not think so?"

The subject of this comment drew her brows further together as Chie chuckled.

"Easy, Shizuru-san," said the senior legate, casting a teasing look towards the indignant girl frowning at them. "Or you'll give her a stroke."

Shizuru returned her friend's smile, then turned back to the scene before them.

"The Argentians speak Himean, I recall?" she asked.

"Yes," answered Chie. "It's their chief language, actually. And most of the Mentulae speak it too."

"Of course."

"I'm glad we don't have to get more interpreters," said Toshi.

"Hmm," was all the general said. She paused in her contemplation of the city and looked down to the earth at her feet, a small crease on her forehead as she started playing with a large, sharply-faceted rock by rolling it under her boot. The others waited, saying nothing.

"The first sally should be from the northwest," the commander said a moment later.

Toshi stepped forward to squint at the area she indicated.

"Thinner troops," he remarked. "Hm. Why don't they form a perimeter that's closer to the city? Surely that would make it easier for them to create a barrier against any relief from outside. All they have to do is form the line closer to the city itself."

"And get themselves killed by arrows from the city walls?" Shizuru asked, amusement quirking her lips.

"Oh."

Chie slapped him again, this time on the shoulder.

"You are really quite green, aren't you, Toshi-san?" she said good-naturedly, only pointing it out because he himself said it so often. "Whatever made you sign up for this?"

He rubbed the stubble of his jaw in a way that managed to convey self-deprecation.

"You know why, Harada-san," he said gruffly, amused as well. "I've spent long enough in the House, just doing paperwork and listening to the rest who aren't pedarii yammer on. Never a proper campaign to my record! Rather embarrassing at my age, I say, so I felt obliged to do some time in the legate's post."

"Come to think of it," Chie mumbled, doing some quick calculations in her mind with slight agony-numbers had never been her strong suit-before squinting at him. "You've been in the House since, oh..."

"Longer than the two of you," he continued for her, seeing that she had trailed off out of politeness. He grinned at the two women, who sent him apologetic smiles. He flapped a hand at their expressions.

"Oh, don't worry! It's no shame on me if it's the two of you we're talking about," he told them. "Your status is deserved, as far as I'm concerned. But sometimes I can't stand the other senators-the ones who don't have a grain of sense in them, because if they had that much, at least, they'd know they could serve the House better by sitting down and shutting up!"

He stopped to let them laugh, shaking his head with mock dismay even as he smiled at the sound of their giggles. It brought to his mind an image of his soon-to-be-of-age daughter, whom he had left at home with his wife.

It's times like these that I remember how young they are, he thought to himself, his eyes settling on the erect, slender figure of the general in particular. Or maybe it's the other way around and I'm simply old.

"Anyway, if I get through this in one piece I won't have to settle for just listening in the House like a speechless idiot. And the general was nice enough to grant my request to serve with her, so here I am, greenness with military strategies and all," he said with a grateful look at Shizuru, who beamed that stunning smile of hers his way.

"Come now, Toshi-han, the 'niceness' is all on your part for lending me your strength on this endeavour. I am sure you will prove yourself worthy of at least a consul's position before this ends," she replied generously. She chuckled at his renewed embarrassment before looking away and returning to their earlier topic. "In any case, I must say that your earlier idea, while it had merit, cannot apply here. No matter that their forces outnumber us. They still cannot spread themselves out enough to cover so large an area without thinning some places. Besides, the only important places to cover are those before the gates. Hence they are drawing into blocks there."

"Are we doing a straight charge, then?" Chie asked.

Shizuru shook her head.

"No," she said, folding her arms around her waist. "At least, not in the sense of one deployment. What a pity Argentum doesn't have a garrison! Otherwise we could have driven the bulk of their army straight against the walls and had the Argentians finish them by attacking from the rear."

"That's a fine idea," said Toshi, making a mental note of it in his mind. "Yes, that's brilliant, Shizuru-san."

"I am glad you think so, Toshi-han," she replied, amused by the realization that he was cataloguing her ideas for later reference. "But it does not apply here. Besides, it would be rather risky, with them spread out and outnumbering us. No, I have another plan."

"I can't wait to hear it, Fujino-san."

"Then shall we return to the others?" she said, drawing her long scarlet cloak about her tall form. "I would rather everyone hears it instead of having to repeat myself."

She stepped off the boulder she had been standing on, and began making her way back to the army. The others followed, as ever.

Thus it was that around noon of that day, the Mentulaean troops at the north-western gate found themselves subject to an attack from an Otomeian cavalry that hit them in a rush. It began with a devastating volley of arrows that was followed by another, equally devastating volley of spears. These were succeeded by another wave of arrows that preceded a head-on charge, breaking the Mentulaean frontline on that side, which had been attenuated by the first ranged attacks.

It took only a short while for the Mentulae to gather their bearings. Rallying to fight off the intruders, the call to arms was sounded to warn the other troops that the enemy had attacked at the northwest. The commander of the army, the Prince Artaxi, bared his teeth in a wicked grimace at the sound.

One of the king's sons from his favourite wife, Artaxi had made a fairly good name for himself even amidst the rest of his father's brood when it came to war. He had a predilection for deceptive tactics that often drew the enemy to an apparently weak flank, only to unleash a sudden onrush of reserves that would overwhelm the enemy force with a merciless assault of mass and numbers. What really got him notoriety was his regular procedure following the fight:

after the battle, he would request prisoners from his men to torture for amusement. His soldiers and officers had learned to set aside more than a few living members of the enemy force to appease their commander's taste for hearing a person scream. They learned what sorts of captives were ideal as well: the prince liked them young, preferably with unmarred skin, and virginal-looking. The sex did not matter. That they could scream to a soprano did.

Ever since receiving the message from his subordinate at Stych Gorge, Prince Artaxi had readied himself for his usual trick, wanting to draw out the enemy forces from wherever they were undoubtedly hiding. Hence he had ordered that the northwest entrance be garrisoned most lightly, with most of the troops from the southern and eastern blocks already prepared to rush to that area once it drew out the enemy. This was why neither the Mentulaean army nor its commander was surprised that the offensives had occurred in the northwest: they had intended it.

"As expected, they hit the thinnest spot," Artaxi said to the officer with him, running to his chariot and ascending it. His charioteer whipped the reins as they drew closer to the front of the troops at the southern entrance. The prince shouted for the bugle to be sounded, and the blare of the horn soon filled the field, sending a thrill to every soldier in the fray.

As arranged, the troops at the other sides of the walls thinned as their bulk rushed to the northwest, ready to catch the foe in the trap. To their surprise, however, only about two thousand units' worth of Otomeian horse were rushing in and out of the lines on that side, wreaking havoc and roaring to make enough noise for a full army as they danced around the Mentulaean infantry in the northwest. Artaxi frowned and ordered his chariot to stop.

"What is this?" he yelled to one officer. "This is what Ramis calls a relief force? This paltry army? Just this?"

Unable to tear his eyes from the mêlée, he furrowed his brow in confusion as he realised that the enemy cavalry seemed to be drawing out his own forces farther and farther from the city walls.

Well, let them try! he sneered. Do they think we'll bite all the way?

Two legions of cavalry! Are these fools belittling me?

The Otomeian cavalry was in almost full retreat now, and Artaxi smiled smugly as he watched them withdrawing from the battle, apparently heading for the forest beyond the plain where Argentum lay. His men, on the other hand, began to reform their line before the northwest entrance, refusing to be drawn into the forest but preparing for another assault by forming a defensive block.

Truly idiotic, to attempt to draw my forces off into the forests with such small bait.

He started as the halt of the horns from the northwest suddenly let another sound, thus far drowned, split through the air: another shrill horn trumpeting the Mentulaeen call to arms. Artaxi's eyes widened, his mind racing.

Another attack so quickly? he thought, bewildered. A whisper of alarm rose from some corner of his mind. But it's coming from...

"The eastern gates! They're coming in through the eastern gates, you fools!" he screamed at his men, spurring his chariot towards the eastern part of the plain. "Re-form! To the east! Leave the northwest to the troops assigned there!"

Indeed, Artaxi had been correct in recognising the cavalry attack as bait. However, he had made a mistake in thinking it was bait to draw them into the forest-a ruse to enable the outnumbered enemy forces to play on guerrilla tactics, thus lowering their disadvantages.

No, the true purpose of the bait had been to draw the bulk of his troops to the northwest, leaving the eastern entrance lightly guarded. The Himean fox had fallen into his trap only to slip out and reveal that it had set a trap of its own. Just as most of the soldiers from the east had gone off and been reinforcing the north-western lines, the remaining Mentulaeen troops at the eastern entrance had found themselves on the receiving end of a barrage of arrows, followed by an infantry charge so swift, so strong, that it smashed a hole right into them and caused a panic that folded the thinned eastern line into itself.

Near the very head of this charge was the Himean commander herself, who slashed open three men before any of the soldiers by her side could even draw blood. Flicking her naginata in perilous circles, she opened space for her soldiers to follow into the charge, all the while crying out to the men on the ramparts of the city before them.

"Open the gates!"

She stopped shouting to lift her weapon to the air as a Mentulaean soldier leapt from a chariot towards her, brandishing his sword. The end of the naginata's blade caught him in the gut as she swung it to the left in a vicious arc, splitting the man. Two of the rankers flanking her and intent on ensuring that nothing would harm the commander went in for overkill, their teeth bared as they slashed viciously at the savaged body even before it fell to the earth. The man was decimated, his entrails flinging out and leaving blood splattered all over those in the area, including the general herself. The general continued pressing forward with the rest of the leaders of the charge, resuming her cry and joined in it by the other Himeans in the fight.

" Open the gates , Argentians !"

The defenders of Argentum who stood on the walls called to open the eastern gates, giving entry to the four charging columns of Himean infantry and Otomeian cavalry archers-for the Himean commander had split the cavalry archers between her half and the half with the cavalry that acted as bait in the northwest. The gates opened just in time: Artaxi's officers had begun to return their men to the eastern entrance, ready to pursue the intruders straight into the city. As they approached, however, they were met with a thick volley of arrows from both the defenders on the walls as well as the Otomeian archers-who had wheeled around and reformed at the flanks of the columns even before the last infantry troops made their way into the gates.

Due to the rain of arrows, the disordered Mentulae were unable to follow Shizuru's army into the city, and the gates were shut before they could attempt to do so. Finding themselves subject to another hail of projectiles before the entrance, they rushed off to a safer distance, panting from the exertion of having been made to run back and forth from the east to the northwest. Their commanders, however, were unsympathetic. They cursed the hapless Mentulaeen footsoldiers for what had happened, now seeing the trick for what it was. The 'bait cavalry' in the northwest had disappeared into the forest while the attack by the eastern walls had taken place. The enemy had slipped out of their hands: one group into the walls of the city, another into the walls of the wood.

Inside the city, just within the eastern gates, the Argentians were busily crowding around their rescuers, who were busy themselves with wiping off the gore from their faces, taking off sweat-soaked helmets and dismounting from horses. The magistrates of the city were soon at the fore of the crowd, praising the gods loudly for the new arrivals.

Some of the Argentinian officials stepped forward.

"I am the head magistrate of the city," said one of them: a stocky, grizzled man with piercing blue eyes. "I am called Livius Silo. Who is the leader of this force?"

The answer came from his right.

"Greetings to you, Livius Silo," said the clear voice. It was coming from a statuesque figure whose once-polished armour was now covered with blood. "The one you seek is I."

The rest of the Argentians turned to face the person, watching as the helmet was removed. There was no disappointment once it was done: the removal of the helmet revealed a face somehow unmarred by the spatters of blood on the fair cheeks and unforgiving nose. Most of the onlookers started, partly due to the woman's unexpected beauty, but more due to her eyes, whose colour matched the blood on her skin.

"I am Shizuru Fujino, Senator and Envoy of Hime to the Northern Territories, commander of this army," she said, breezing through the formal introduction. "We have been quartered in Otomeia for the past weeks, and that is from where part of the army I carry with me comes. We are here to relieve you of those who besiege your walls, in honour of the allied status you hold with both the nations of Hime and Otomeia."

Livius Silo stared with lips slightly parted at the woman before him, resisting the unexplainable urge to kneel. Something flashed in his memory and he started out of his trance.

"Shizuru Fujino... Ah! Yes, I have heard of you! They call you the Red-eyed Con-"

"None of that, please, Livius Silo-han," Shizuru said, waving her hand in a gesture that seemed to say she was embarrassed. "I actually find the nicknames people give me quite ridiculous, not to mention trite. I am Shizuru Fujino. That is all."

Livius Silo nodded uncertainly, still awestruck-as were the rest of the Argentians observing his conversation with this splendid young woman. Who knew Hime had senators who looked like this? Oh, how wonderful to have a saviour who actually looked the part! Irrational though the thought was, many of the people were already convinced of their salvation from the besiegers, simply because it seemed impossible that the gods would send someone who looked so, well, heroic without actually granting that person a triumph of heroism.

"What concerns me is that over half of my cavalry is still out there," Shizuru told him, pleasant smile an odd contrast to the blood all over her. "I made arrangements to that effect, but I still need to see the state of your defences before I go on with my plans."

She looked around for her legates, and found the one she was looking for nearby.

The two women nodded to each other, unspoken words clear to them.

"Let us go to the battlements and survey the field," Shizuru said to the Argentinian magistrate.

"Of course, Shizuru Fujino-san," Livius Silo responded. "Please follow me as the rest take care of your people."

He snapped his hands at someone who appeared to be a servant.

"Give me that towel," he told the man.

He then offered the towel to Shizuru, who took it as gracefully as though she were accepting a gift from someone in a formal reception.

"Oh, that feels better," she said, wiping her face carefully with it as they walked, several other magistrates and citizens following them like an entourage. "Thank you, Silo-han."

"Whatever we can do for you, Fujino-san," he said, heading for the stairs that would take them to the tops of the walls. "We've been strung out for a good while, so your arrival's a godsend. We were getting worried about starving to death without even offering a fight to those verpa out there."

"Indeed, I am sorry we could not come sooner."

He shook his head.

"Nothing to be sorry for, General," he assured her. "We're just thankful the gods have sent you to aid us. We tried sending out messengers for help, but they caught them each time."

"How unfortunate. You have no standing army, correct?"

"Yes. To keep one costs far too much... besides which, we are not a military people by tradition, so it would be a waste of resources unless we hired mercenaries from outside." A frown. "Too costly."

"I take it you have been beating the Mentulae back with just those arrows?" she asked, tilting her head to the archers on the walls.

"Yes. We have that, at least."

"How many archers?"

"It depends on the day. Just about anyone who can use a bow can be an archer here. We're all defending the city that way."

"I see. How many bows, then?"

"Around three, four hundred. We've been making more to help repel them when they try to come too close."

"And arrows?"

"We make them every day, so there are a lot of those. We still have enough wood in the city to spend on that, thank the gods."

"In any case, may I ask how the people have been holding out?"

"Fairly. Argentum has large vaults, although we've also been rationing heavily, to be safe. We're not in the starvation stage yet."

"That is good. You are well-victualled, I hope? And no shortage of water? I do not see anything to indicate they have blocked your water supply."

"They can't," he said, letting a broad grin split his face. The seams on his face ate deeper into his skin as he smiled. "Or they haven't yet. Our water is led off beneath the bed of the river at hundreds of points. It would take a very long time, and Prince Artaxi is not known for his patience with such undertakings. Or his engineers, for that matter." He emitted a relieved sound. "That's part of why we've held out so well until now. He's been having problems with his siege machines. He fixed them two days ago, though, I think, so he's been using them on us since then. It caused some problems."

"Yet your walls and gates still stand for the most part."

"I think his machines aren't perfectly fixed, Fujino-san. Either that or he must be afraid of having issues with them again. He probably has no decent engineers to rely on in that army of his."

"More fool him, then," Shizuru, a natural engineer, said.

She stopped as they reached the top of the walls, looking out upon the field. The Mentulae had apparently reformed once again, now choosing to mass all their units so that they faced the southern walls of the city. She narrowed her eyes as she peered farther into the distance, into the forest beyond the plain.

They should be there now, waiting, she thought. The rest of my army and my Natsuki.

She caught herself and shook her head. Why tease the girl with the possessive when she was not there to hear it?

Really, that is becoming something of a bad habit, she scolded herself privately.

"It appears that he has thought it better to consolidate his troops into one block," she remarked, brushing her damp hair out of her face.

"Well, now, what are you thinking over there, Prince Artaxi?"

Suddenly she paused and gave Livius Silo an odd smile.

"Those are the tracks of the enemy artillery, are they not?" she said, pointing to marks and ruts of the earth in the distance.

"Yes, Fujino-san."

She hummed for a bit, the smile playing on the edges of her mouth.

"You use simple bows, yes?" she asked him.

"Yes."

"You are familiar with composite bows?"

"I have... heard of them. In my travels. They are used in the drier climates... But why do you ask, Fujino-san? We do not have them here."

"Ah, I simply chanced to notice something."

The clanking of armour and voices from behind them made her turn around.

"Chie-han."

The legate smiled, stepping forward to stand next to her as Livius Silo stepped back to speak with another of the Argentinian magistrates.

"I've told the legionaries to take a breather. They're all resting and enjoying the attention, anyway. The Argentians are treating them like heroes."

"Indeed."

She continued to look out into the direction of the woods.

"You told them not to use the daos yet, right?" Chie asked, not needing to specify that she was talking about the unit that had led the cavalry charge at the northwest earlier.

"Yes," Shizuru affirmed. "Risky, I suppose, but it was for the best."

"Well, they handled it well enough, even if they weren't using their favourite weapons. They're not elite for nothing, I guess. May I ask why you made them do that?"

Shizuru had a pensive expression on her face.

"From my talks with the Otomeians, it appears that the Mentulae have scarcely encountered them in battle, particularly the Lupine Division. I have a feeling they have never seen the Lupine Division, in fact. Or the daos."

Her senior legate lifted her head, then nodded.

"I see," she said, looking thoughtful too. "Saving the shock for later?"

"Yes."

Chie looked out at the army before them, admiring the sparkling of the Mentulaean armour worn by thousands and thousands of persons. She sighed and lowered her voice.

"Here comes the hard part."

"Quite." There was a pause. "We shall bring in the Argentinian archers to man the walls. Silo-han estimates about four hundred or so."

"That's a help, I'm sure." She turned to Shizuru, her eyes searching the brilliant red ones. "That was pretty good fighting back there,

General."

"Perhaps we will see even better fighting later, Chie-han," Shizuru said.

"If your plan is going to work, Shizuru-san, we better." She paused, then added with a grin: "From our troops, that is."

"Oh, I have every faith in them," the general said, her smile wider than before.

The commander of the Mentulaean army, however, was far from expressing a similar faith in his men. Seething with anger at what had happened, Prince Artaxi had called together all of his officers, ranting and raving as he proceeded to explain why the debacle had been their fault, why their carelessness had allowed the Himeans to get into the city. Finally running down after nearly an hour of this, he took to his uncomfortably jewel-encrusted seat and glowered at them.

The most experienced of the officers, a man who had seen his fair share of battles over the years and whose face bore an ugly scar that bisected his left cheek, stepped forward with a deferential bow to the commander.

"At the very least, Oh Great One," he began. "We know that they are truly a smaller force than ours. And that they are now walled up in Argentum, subject to the siege as well. Never mind the cavalry force we ran up against earlier, they are far too small to worry about. What we must do now is return to the siege."

Artaxi looked at him, chewing his bottom lip in thought.

"What if they sally out to try to destroy our artillery?" he asked. "Those cavalry troops in the forest could do that, you know. Simply ride out and try to get the siege weapons. Oh, I should've brought cavalry!"

"We can handle them, My Lord."

"Like you did earlier? Or even the legions that got into the walls!" He sneered with true royal contempt. "Himean legions, eh? I don't see why so many people are afraid of them, even among us. If there are a lot, I suppose-but this army we're facing is a paltry little thing!"

"They may try to sally out," answered another of his barons, returning to the original question. "But to no avail, Great One. For we only have to send a strong escort with our artillery when we set up to resume the siege. They would hardly dare a direct engagement with us now, since it would involve a head-on charge. They are too outnumbered. Even if they do try it, they would be eradicated."

Artaxi nodded slowly, continuing to chew his lip. He stopped, worked his mind furiously again, then grinned.

"I wonder what they were thinking," he said with great malice. "Shutting themselves into the city like that. Very bad tactics, especially if you're trying to relieve an invested city. Did they think Argentum had a garrison they could assimilate into their ranks?"

He laughed a thin, piercing sound.

"Yes, resume the siege," he said, waving his hand. "And send a third of the army as guard with the artillery, just to make sure those bastards inside the walls don't think of coming out and trying anything. Kill them if they do."

Afternoon of the same day Shizuru Fujino's troops entered Argentum, the city's besiegers resumed their attacks. The defenders on the walls watched as a large part of the Mentulaean force detached itself from the bulk sitting to the south of the citadel and drove forward, pushing and pulling their artillery with them.

The array of siege machines Prince Artaxi had brought with him was largely a fresh one, even if it had been giving him some trouble in this investment. The pieces were newly-made, precious engines still bearing-if one was close enough to smell it-the scent of freshly cut and oiled wood. These were not great machines, truth be told: had the Himean engineers inspected them from up close, they might have scoffed at the practical limitations of their designs. They would see the shorter range, the weaker shot, the shabby sinews. But the Mentulae were not a people of great engineering abilities, and all things considered, these were still the best they had. Besides, weaker than their Himean counterparts though these were, artillery was still artillery, and it always made a difference.

With the Mentulae at Argentum were catapults of various makes, some meant to cast incendiary missiles, as well as the more common ones used to hurl large boulders and bricks at the gates and towers. These were drawn up before the city in an ordered line with the rest of the Mentulaean footmen sent out under the prince's instructions. There might not have been many machines to speak of, but there were certainly sufficient soldiers with them to make up for that. The line as it drew up was an impressive sight, and certainly one that could have easily worried anyone on the opposing side.

Yet, had any of the Mentulaeans coming forward been able to see the faces of the defenders, the men and women on the city's ramparts showed more eagerness than apprehension. Soon, the Mentulae had formed a line before the city and the artillery was drawn into place for the bombardment to begin. When the last siege unit was in place before the line, however, the defenders did what seemed to the Mentulaeans an odd and very futile thing: they began to lift the bows in their hands and got into position.

One of the Mentulaean field commanders, a man named Ordo, squinted at the distant figures. He could barely make out their images against the light of the sky, for Ordo's sight was rather weak. When not in battle, he served as one of the head wardens of the king's dungeons, where the only light to be found was from torches-and the occasional fireplace-or the scalding iron. A lifetime of working under such conditions had reduced the keenness of his eyes to their present state. He cursed their weakness now, just as one of his subordinates wondered aloud what the Argentians thought they were doing. Ordo turned to the man, one of the handlers for the catapult beside him.

"They're aiming their arrows at us?" Ordo asked curtly. "I can't see too well anymore. Is that what they're doing?"

"Yes, Sir, looks like."

Ordo scoffed.

"Desperate," he sniffed. "What makes them think they can even shoot this far? They tried that before, and it didn't work."

The soldier nodded, then frowned suddenly as a thought occurred to him.

"Maybe the soldiers who got in there earlier can shoot better?"

One of the soldiers near them snorted.

"It doesn't make a difference if those Himeans can shoot better," said the soldier, joining in the conversation. "There's no way they can shoot far enough to reach us at this range. That's the point of our taking position here and not any nearer."

Ordo made a brusque sound of agreement, nodding his head. He took off his helmet and wiped at his brow.

"We're going to start," he said, motioning for them to get into position and load the catapult. A flash of light caught his eye and he returned his attention to the tops of the walls, open-mouthed in confusion.

"They're... lighting their arrows," said one of the soldiers, his face showing his own mystification at the Argentinian's actions. "Sir, they're-"

"I can see that much!" Ordo barked. "What in the name of Lugh do those fools think they'll be able to hit?" He shook his head at the enemies' desperation. "We're too far away for that! What a bluff!"

They continued watching until all the arrows aimed at them had been lit, some even laughing at the ludicrousness of it all. They kept laughing until the first volley was shot, and the array of meteors sped forward and up.

But when the meteors began the descending part of their arc, all laughter stopped.

"No, that's not right," Ordo mumbled to himself, realising what every other man on the Mentulaean line was coming to see belatedly.

"They're going to-!"

A fiery shaft buried itself into his cheek and ended the sentence prematurely. The soldier beside him screamed.

The defenders did not let up. Another volley of arrows came, then another, and yet another, all of them lit with fire. By the time the Mentulae had gathered their wits and begun to reform at a safer distance, dragging the precious catapults with them, most of the artillery had been touched by the sparks from the relentless arrows, for the defenders had focused on the machines for their targets. Further panic ensued as the stunned soldiers clamoured about the burning engines, trying to pull them out of range of the shots. And the question on all minds was this: How in god's name were they able to shoot that far?

It was a fair question. By rights, the basic bows the Argentians had been using before should never have been able to execute a volley at that range-but the bows of the new arrivals, the Otomeians, could. This was what had prompted Shizuru Fujino to pause during her survey from the top of the walls, noting the marks in the earth below that showed where the Mentulae had often set up their artillery for the siege, having found the range there. A quick assessment of the distance of the tracks from the base of the walls and a few rapid calculations in her mind had ensued. The Himean general had concluded that, while the distance could not be covered by an arrow from a simple bow, one from a composite bow would do the job.

"A wonderful opportunity," she had said to her senior legate, who looked about as delighted as she did. "They are not expecting composite bows, so they do not allow for the greater range those have. If we are lucky-and I think we are-they shall not have realised it from our skirmish earlier and will again move their artillery to that distance marked by the tracks, thinking it safe."

Chie had nodded, as excited by the opening as her general.

"So we're making the Otomeian archers man the ramparts?"

"No," Shizuru had replied, to her surprise. "They are far too precious not to have on the field, where they can do the most damage to the enemy. We shall need them there. I intend to have them change bows with the Argentians, instead. Using a composite bow is not all that different from using a simple one, in any case, so there should be no problem. They shall probably have sore arms from all the smacking later if they are unused to it, but as long as we get as many experienced archers and strong-backed and strong-armed people up on the walls as we can, I foresee no difficulty. As for the Otomeian archers, the difference in range will not matter so much since they are mounted and mobile. It will work, I am sure."

Indeed it had. The Argentians were so dedicated to the task Shizuru set to them that they ignored even the pains in their arms and backs, loosing volley after volley and effectively setting most targets aflame before the enemy could pull them completely away. By the time most of the Mentulae managed to move out of range, nearly all the artillery was burning beyond redemption.

To Prince Artaxi, watching from a distance, it was a ghastly sight. He was almost pulling his hair out from consternation as he lamented the loss of his siege machines. What made him stop was a roar issuing from the direction of the city. Eyes widening in horror, he watched as two legions of Himean infantry barrelled out of Argentum's southern gates and into the still-disordered Mentulaean line like demons on the field.

Unknown to him, some among his own foes had shared the same thought earlier, while listening to their commander speak to them before the battle. This had been during the time that the Mentulae were still moving their artillery into place. The Himean commander had been standing on a small, makeshift platform then, addressing her troops before they opened the gates.

"I have told you what to do," she had declared loudly, eyes burning so bright that more than one soldier had felt as though he were staring into either the fires of Vulcan or the eyes of Dis. "I have told you what to do and now all that is left is for you to do it. You know that out there, beyond those walls, lies an army that far outnumbers us. You know it and so do I. But I know as well that they can never outstrip us! They may be more-but they are also less! They are sitting out there, smug and contented, thinking themselves the ones with the upper hand in this battle. They are wrong! We have the upper hand! We are the ones who shall win!"

At this time, the Argentians on the walls had begun to draw their bows.

"Were any of you to ask me how I could say this, whether I feel no fear at all at the thought of meeting that host outside, I would tell you plainly: I do not! I have no fear at all! How could I feel fear with such men and women at my side as you, fighting with me? What fool would feel fear, even were he to face a hundred thousand more than that army waiting for us, if he knew that such legions would be with him? Shizuru Fujino is no such fool."

The arrows were being lit.

"Shizuru Fujino cannot wait to go outside and show the Mentulae how little their numbers mean," the Himean general had proclaimed. "Shizuru Fujino cannot wait to show them what fear is, what a fool is. For we are fear, we shall bring it to them, and the fool is the one who would stand his ground before us!"

The first volley had soared through the air.

"Out there are our comrades, waiting in the forest," Shizuru had announced, gesturing with her hand. "Waiting for us. Waiting for the slaughter of the Mentulae. Waiting for the lesson we are going to teach these arrogant fools sitting before Argentum. Well, I would have them wait no longer! I will run out of those gates and end that wait, along with the life of every Mentulaean fool enough to come near me! For that fool has not learnt the lesson, and the price of that failure is his life! I shall collect that price from every fool standing out there! Now shall I do it alone, Boys and Girls, or are you with me?"

The army had answered with a deafening yell, just as the last shower of arrows was shot by the archers and the gates fully open. Shizuru had not even paused to take a breath after her speech and simply leapt from the platform, leading the first four columns of legionaries at a run towards the Mentulae.

In demonstration of her tactical foresight, she made her army halt halfway through the dash. This let the soldiers recover their breaths right before continuing the plunge through the Mentulaean front ranks. It was a complete rout. The Mentulae, still in disarray and recovering from the shock of the arrows, were hardly able to draw themselves into formation before another round of arrows hit them- this time from the Otomeian cavalry archers charging forward from the gates- right before the first column of the Himean infantry slammed into the broken line with a vengeance.

This was the horrifying sight that Artaxi now watched with the rest of his army, all of them stunned by how swiftly the deployment of the Himeans had followed the archery attacks. He saw his men cut down right and left, and his sight grew dim with rage. It was with satisfaction when he noted, a little while later, that the Mentulae in the fray had managed to regain formation. Yet this satisfaction vanished when he noticed the formation waver, then start to collapse. He called to his officers, shaking with fury.

"Send the second group," he barked to them. "Flank them with our chariots and tear them apart!"

Meanwhile, the opposing army's commander was cutting a wide swath through Artaxi's troops, slaughtering men left and right with an economy of movement that those she killed had only seconds to admire before they died. She went on this way, leading the others on her side.

"Kill her! Kill that one!"

Flicking her weapon to slit an enemy soldier's throat, she searched for the source of the cry, brows drawing together when she saw that it was coming from a Mentulaean in unusual armour- an officer? - charging towards her.

She stepped forward to meet his advance. The blade of her pole-arm glanced off the thick metal of his shield as they lunged, and he took advantage of that by bringing his sword down upon her as they passed each other. To his chagrin, all he caught was her cloak, tearing a scrap of red fabric from it. It floated in his eyes, the last thing he saw before he found himself skewered through the chest, the spike capping the other end of the naginata lancing into his back.

Bringing a foot behind her and onto his bowed back to use as leverage, Shizuru pulled her pole-arm out of the dead man at her rear. She ducked as a blade came slicing towards her temple. She was about to lift her weapon to kill the one attacking her when a recklessly flung sword caught him in the neck, tearing through skin and flesh and exposing even the white bones beneath. The one who had flung it followed in with a hack that stove in the skull at the temple, and soon there were several more soldiers yelling to reinforce the ranks surrounding their general.

"Fujino-san!" It was her senior legate, who had moved up closer during the fighting. "There you are!"

Shizuru smiled briefly while barking another encouragement to the legionaries around her, knowing the other woman had likely made her way over out of worry. Later she called out her legate with a grin, "Yes, here I am!"

This went on for a while. Minutes coalesced into an hour, formations were held and rearranged, and still Shizuru and her officers stayed in the fighting, knowing this was the sort of battle that needed such dangerous and inspiring heroics. Oh, but were her boys and girls ever heroic! She felt pride swelling in her chest even while fighting, lauding the efforts of the men and women fighting valiantly for her even as the carnage went on. It was with contentment that she was able to note, not long after the fight had started, that the soldiers had fought so bravely that they had reduced the Mentulae on the field to a mere fraction of the number earlier, overcoming the odds despite all statistical predictions to the contrary.

Suddenly, she discerned a rumbling sound that made her look into the distance, where the rest of Artaxi's army stood waiting. Her mind identified the sound before her eyes did: half of the army that had remained with Artaxi was rushing towards them, the second group to engage. Nerves humming with anticipation, she cried to her soldiers to prepare for the impact, seeing that the sheer disorderliness of the charge as well as the mass of the people in it would provide a lethal momentum that might well dislodge them from the ground they now held. It was a tidal wave coming towards them, one filled with spikes and steel.

Standing near the front as well, Chie Harada saw the coming wave at the same time as her commander and rushed closer to the younger Himean, cursing her general's ridiculous and unnecessary courage. Oh, certainly she saw the justice of Shizuru's decision to fight with the men, saw that being outnumbered as they were might intimidate some of the soldiers into flight if they did not have some inspiration as monumental as what Shizuru offered-but by Jupiter, what if Shizuru fell? Shizuru her commander, Shizuru her friend, Shizuru the patrician Fujino: it would be a catastrophe if that happened! Yes, yes, the fabled Fujino Fortune was all well and good when you were talking about it in a calm setting, but it hardly gave sufficient reassurance now!

She should have done more to prevent her from leading the charge and fighting so near the front, she thought, although it was decidedly too late for that. So she just marshalled more of the centurions to reinforce the space around their commander, shouting for the Himeans to hold and screaming to the soldiers all around her that their general was among them, that they had to hold as they never had before if they cared at all for the commander they loved so well.

She shot a fleeting glance at the woman herself, who was tearing a shield from an enemy corpse. Chie turned her attention back to the front and saw why: the legionaries' ranks were closing in, tightening and forming the wall with their shields in preparation for the enemy. Closer and closer the wave came, the rumbling morphing into a rolling thunder, and then, with a shrieking cacophony of metal and men, it hit.

The moment after impact found Chie in the middle of a tempest that had temporarily knocked her off her feet, kept upright only by the legionaries next to and behind her. The new wave of Mentulae fell upon the Himeans eager for blood, pushing even the Mentulae at the front as row after row of soldiers crashed into each other from the rear. The force piled up, angry cries echoing as more were rolled under the gears of the military machine. Stunned by the brute strength of the onslaught, the Himean line shook, faltering.

No, no, push, damn it, Chie found herself screaming in her mind, even as a meaningless cry came from her throat. Her muscles strained as she dug her heels in the earth, her shoulder against her shield as she struggled to add her force to the total. All around her, the Himeans were baring their teeth and grimacing as they did the same. Fresh sweat was on everyone's face, rolling so fast and so continuously that it washed their countenances clean.

Still the Mentulaean wave threatened to engulf them, building up more and more force from the rear. Muffled screams came from those who had been unlucky enough to be trampled underfoot—mostly by their own comrades. There were also people breaking loose of the crush now by climbing atop their fellows, sometimes trying to leap on the heads of the Himeans at the front lines and sometimes unlucky enough to run into a falx sticking up from the mass, killed by their own comrades and carelessness.

Then Chie saw something that nearly took her mind off the Mentulaeans pressing against them from the front. She growled, feeling her muscles trembling from the exertion, and started praying to the gods again, with the sort of religiosity she hardly ever evinced in normal times. The small group of Mentulaean chariots had come in and was now attacking a flank. The Himeans at the side swiftly turned to execute a defence by forming another wall there, but it was clear that they were becoming overwhelmed. Meanwhile, the Mentulae at the front were beginning to push back the Himean line, whose ranks had thinned due to the departure of those who broke off to defend the flanks from the enemy cavalry. Only their rear was still safe, as Shizuru herself had predicted it would be with the Argentians on the walls covering it. Even so, the Himeans were now almost completely surrounded, and still the enemy kept pushing, gaining more ground inch by inch.

" Hold !"

The voice, devoid of any tremor or panic, rang through Chie's ears. She recognised it immediately, as did every other soldier in their area.

"Hold them off, they are coming!"

Chie managed to turn her head enough to look at their commander, whose eyes were blazing as she glared over the enemy shield she had thrown up before the Mentulae hit them. Shizuru was pushing into it, jaw clenched tightly. Chie winced as a rivulet of blood trickled down into the general's left eye-an enemy falx had split her eyebrow sometime after the wave hit them. Elsewhere the sound of continued clashes could be heard, but here in front were merely the screams of the two armies ramming into each other, locked in a many-armed embrace as the Mentulae pushed the Himeans back through the force of numbers.

"Hold your ground, Legionaries!" came another cry from the Himean commander as her cut bled more profusely, painting one eye's white a glossy pink. Chie groaned at the sight of their general blinking and trying to clear her sight, scowling terribly at the annoyance of having her vision partly impaired.

"Push!" Shizuru yelled again, one side of her face now dripping with blood. "Push and hold the line! Our comrades are coming!"

The soldiers with her were her veterans, men and women of legions she had blooded and brought to several victories in other wars. All of them loved her deeply, and to see her bleeding with them, fighting beside them this way and asking them not to give in was all it took to stiffen their aching sinews and take away the pain. They replaced it with only a blazing, burning desire to kill the enemy.

Hence, the weary Himeans renewed their efforts even as the Mentulae surged forward once more, ignoring the screaming in their own joints and backs and holding as their commander had asked. Groans and sounds came from everywhere as cuts were opened and joints strained almost to breaking point, a horrible stalemate developing between the participants. For what seemed an eternity, they stood there and were locked, one side too large to be moved back, another too determined to collapse.

The break came when a roar rang from the Mentulaean rear. The Himeans looked up, felt the strange shudder go through the mass pushing against them, and several thought themselves finished. The roar had to be the rest of the Mentulaeen army, coming in to finish the deed. More roars, uncoordinated, followed by strange screams. Another shudder followed, then even more screams.

And then there was the slight and surprising give, the opportunity.

"Now!" came the yell, screamed by a hundred, then a thousand voices. "Now, do it!"

It was fast and chaotic and even they were surprised by it: the Mentulaeen line broke.

"Forward!" came the new screams. "Push forward!"

It took a while before they could see well enough into the fray to find out what had happened to the Mentulaeen side to give them the breathing space they needed, but eventually they saw it: the roar had not come from the rest of Artaxi's army coming into battle. It had come from the Otomeian cavalry, who had issued from wherever they had been hiding and had cut down nearly all the Mentulae at the back as arranged. These had caused a panic that spread from the Mentulaeen rear all the way to the front. Meanwhile, the Otomeian cavalry archers had taken to picking off the Mentulaeen charioteers, dispatching them and going off too quickly for the less adept enemy horsemen to retaliate. The chariots were slower, less able to manoeuvre on the field. The Otomeians simply ran their horses in and took the shot, then ran off while taking a shot again.

It turned the tide completely. The Himeans began to push back and regain their formation. Sparks flew left and right as more than one enemy falx or sword found its blade meeting a determined Himean one. And still the yelling continued, the officers from both sides screaming their throats raw.

"Follow the general!" the Himeans' senior legate yelled, urging the soldiers on with the rest. "Himeans! The general is fighting at the front! Fight with her, by god!"

Gritting her teeth as the legionaries complied, Chie was about to resume her yells when she saw something that took her breath away even as the Himean side began to overcome the panicked enemy.

Oh, by Jupiter!

She was looking at Shizuru. The Himean commander was now well into the enemy ranks, leaving a bloody trail of bodies behind as her own maddened charge left increasingly more space between her and the Himeans who had been flanking her. One of the Mentulae, however, whether out of luck or military skill, had positioned himself in the exact place on her left that was her blind spot due to the blood from the wound swelling above an eye. Poising his spear, the man lifted it and aimed. Shizuru fought on, unable to see him.

The man tensed, ready to release. Before the shaft could leave his hands, however, a scream left his throat. Even Shizuru was startled by the utter anguish in the sound and turned to see the source, noticing the danger to her life as well as her saviour belatedly.

"Natsuki!"

Her bodyguard had somehow managed to find her amidst the chaos. Seeing the man about to send his spear through the Himean commander, Natsuki had spurred her horse into a frenzied gallop, killing at least two foot soldiers by trampling them into the ground on the way. Once within range, she cast the chain of her daos around her target's throwing arm, pulling it back with the spear still in hand.

She took the spear as she passed him. She had then leaned down one side of her mount in a way that appeared to those around them as though she were falling off the saddle, keeping on the horse only by hooking a leg recklessly around the reins. This was when the man's scream came, for she had slipped herself so far down one side of her steed only to place the scythe of her weapon between her enemy's thighs, dragging the blade up while the horse continued galloping. All the males on the field close enough to see this vicious attack felt a spark of horror, regardless of their allegiances, as Natsuki cut the man cleanly from the groin, then lifted him momentarily in the air as the blade met resistance from the pelvic bone. Well-sharpened metal won out, however, as the girl concentrated her strength upon continuing the scythe's upward slash. The man was rent in two, blade, blood and bone erupting from his hip.

Righting herself on her steed with stunning dexterity, the Otomeian warrior retracted her chain and wrapped it around one leather-sheathed arm, brandishing the spear she had stolen. She threw it as the horse continued on its charge. The missile impaled one of the Mentulaeans around Shizuru, who took the opportunity the distraction caused to dispatch the other enemies around her. Just as she finished off another man and found the rest slain by the legionaries rushing forward to protect her, Natsuki reined in to stand by her side, glaring terribly at the fresh enemies approaching.

"Natsuki!" Shizuru called again to her, immensely glad and grateful. "Oh, well done, Natsuki!"

Eyeing the Mentulaeen leading the charge towards her, Shizuru scanned his armour for gaps-only to feel her eyebrow lift as his head exploded with grisly fanfare. This happened again and again as more Mentulaeans came within range: it was Natsuki's daos.

The girl simply continued to work around Shizuru like a destructive satellite orbiting the Himean, flicking out the weight end of her weapon as soon as an enemy soldier came close enough to threaten her charge and always aiming for the head or the gaps of armour at the neck. Out would come the paw of the daos, a lick in the air, and another neck or head would shatter as the tiny lump of metal gained explosive force at its peak velocity. Hence, soldier after soldier continued to drop before they were even close enough to scratch either the Otomeian captain or the Himean general, although Natsuki herself ended up covered with streaks of blood due to the gore her weapon was flinging around and at her. The linens on her hands had turned crimson in the entire.

Shizuru watched her with amazement, only able to kill the very few who managed to escape Natsuki's slaughter and forced to suffer this odd cessation of activity as the girl resolutely stayed close, apparently unwilling to leave her by herself again. The general shook her head wryly, unable to help an amused smile from coming through: the Mentulaeans themselves were to be blamed for the ease with which the Fury guarding her was dispatching them.

More of them might have gotten through had they come in one solid line, she thought. But coming in uneven formation such as this-they might as well have queued up for her to kill one by one as they approach.

More soldiers were coming in now and pouring around the Otomeian girl, spoiling to get some Mentulaean blood and protect the commander as well. Shizuru took a deep breath and looked away from the fighting for a moment, towards the Otomeian who had been protecting her, and practically laughed upon seeing the girl's face.

If ever there were a look of boredom, she thought, clapping to herself. Oh, bravo, Natsuki!

The girl lingered a while longer around her, leaving only when the rankers had pushed in so far into the Mentulaean line that Shizuru herself was no longer at the very front. Then she left, heading for her troopers still working the collapsing back and centre of the Mentulaean force. Once she was gone, Shizuru surveyed the field again. Yes, no doubt about it: the Mentulae were now in full rout. Shizuru felt new strength course through her limbs as she saw that most of the enemy had taken to flight, some even shedding their armour and weaponry as they tried to get light enough to flee quicker.

"Shizuru-san!"

She looked around for the voice calling her.

"Shizuru-san!"

"Here!" she said as she saw who it was. She moved towards her friend. "Chie-han!"

Pushing away the soldiers who got in her way, Chie continued to work towards the general, clasp the other woman by the shoulders as soon as they were close enough. Around them, the Himeans continued the slaughter. They shouted at the officers first, yelling to the men to keep the formation, then yelled at other to be heard above the din.

"Thank the gods you're safe!" Chie was saying. "When I saw that-" She stopped to duck a wildly thrown spear that appeared out of nowhere. "-bastard set to throw that spear at you- formation, Men, hold the bloody formation!"

"Natsuki was there!" Shizuru called out in reply, nodding in thanks at the two officers bringing her horse to her: they had been trying to do it earlier, but she had been so far into the thick of battle that it had been a battle in itself just to reach her. She swung onto the animal. "Did you see?"

"Yes," the other replied in a shout, turning away to face some legionaries at the back of the mass. "Hey! You two! Get me a horse too, damn it, and be quick!"

She turned to Shizuru again.

"Oh, that was a nice thing she did! I love her for it, Shizuru-san!"

Soon both were horsed and scanning the field. They could see that several other legates were horsed already, waving to them from where they were. There was time enough to wave now, for the conclusion was undeniable: they had won. The Mentulae had gone into complete disarray, shocked by both the pincer attack they found themselves subject to, as well as the unleashing of the Otomeian cavalry-which had only pranced before them earlier in the day to veil the true threat they presented. Added to this was the terror of seeing the Otomeian Lupine Division for the first time, a black-uniformed mass with gigantic horses and weapons so alien that one could not anticipate their attacks. Why were they all wearing black? Where in the world did they get horses that large? What sort of people went around waving scythes and chains that way? The Otomeian elite cavalry absolutely confounded their foes, who literally ran away before them, only to be cut down from behind.

Satisfied with what she saw, Shizuru went on and led her troops as they decimated the formerly massive number of Mentulae pressing against them. Meanwhile, she saw Natsuki directing the Otomeian cavalry into blocks and leading them into dashes through the foes, further preventing the Mentulae from getting their bearings and reforming. They fought ceaselessly, unmindful of the hours, and by the time the sky showed it was nearing sunset, Shizuru and her army had thinned out the Mentulae so much that they could actually see Artaxi's camp and remaining troops where they still sat in the south, apparently too aghast at the destruction of over half their forces to do more than gawp.

Calling to her legionaries to re-form, Shizuru proceeded to sweep the field with her soldiers in a tight line, killing any Mentulae still standing. The Otomeian cavalry flanked them on either side, dispatching the enemy at the edges of the line. They could see Artaxi's remaining army milling about on the southern front. At first it seemed they would have more fighting before them, but then they saw it: even the Himean general paused as she realised what was happening and why the movements of the remaining Mentulae in the south were so disordered.

"A rout!" one of her centurions said for her, roaring with glee. "Look, the pricks are running!"

A great shout came from the general's army as they charged, thirsty for blood. Shizuru and her officers were hard-pressed to keep them in formation, as the soldiers were absolutely spoiling for carnage. They managed to tighten them enough to present a solid wall during the charge.

The fleeing Mentulae in the south looked up to see it, and the sight of all those orderly ranks practically running for them was enough to turn the fear into blind panic. They started throwing off their gear, choosing to cast it off rather than be burdened by its weight, and forgot all about their personal effects as they fled. Some of them still chose to make a stand, coming to meet the army as it rushed upon them in a clean and unbroken formation. Brave though it was, the Mentulae who chose the path of honour found it futile as well. It took only another hour before the battle was practically finished, the enemy camp torn apart by the furious Himeans. Thrown into rout with almost a third of them choosing desertion, the Mentulae lost the battle.

In the aftermath, the Himean general stood surrounded by dead bodies, her hand coming up to swipe at her eye. She brought her fingers to the cut on her brow and found that it had dried, encrusted with blood. She smiled and looked out at the field.

Her legions were now occupied with running down and ferreting out the remaining enemy in the camp and the field, an easy task as there were only a bare few left. Most of the centurions had drawn their soldiers into cohorts to make the undertaking more orderly-they knew their commander preferred it that way. Shizuru could now clearly see the officers of her army, pride growing in her chest as she found each one more or less strong enough to still carry out his duties, bellowing out orders to finish off the foe.

Seeing Chie busy at the head of one cohort sweeping the turf, she suddenly wondered where her bodyguard had gone off to with her own troopers. The Otomeian cavalry was running through the field, and she started searching it for the girl she wanted to see, the one who had saved her life so valiantly during the battle. She thanked the gods that the Lupine Division had a different uniform, as it made her search easier. Yet after some time had passed, she had not yet found the young woman anywhere on the plain. She swung her head around, feeling a slight, unreasonable fear creep into her skin.

"Where is she?" she muttered, frowning.

She scanned the field once more, searching among the dark-uniformed figures dotting it. There were still a good number of Mentulae straggling across the battleground, some still fighting, some still attempting to escape, and more simply lying half-dead and groaning from their injuries. The Lupine Division's members as well as the other cavalry were finishing off these stragglers, swinging their scythes or weapons to kill them as they rode past, or sometimes just using their horses to open their brains or chests with a heavy hoof. Shizuru looked among all these busy figures, wondering why she could not see her Otomeian among them. It was so strange: she always found Natsuki so easily. She was conscious of a strange dread rising, a fearful fatigue setting in all of a sudden.

Where is that child?

Her eyes roamed the field, flicking away as soon as she realised the person they alighted upon was not the Otomeian captain. After a good while of doing this, she grew impatient and made her way through the soldiers that had begun to crowd around her. She nodded and gave each one close enough to hear a compliment for how he or she had fought. Thus she strode through the plain, dispatching any remaining Mentulae she ran across. She did not even care that some of her officers were following her, all speaking fervent praises for the victory. A nod to one, a smile to another: it was rote, a mask of routine. Her mind sought only one thing at the moment, and that was Natsuki.

I should have looked out for her more, she thought angrily, coming to an enemy soldier who lay groaning on his face. He was in the throes of agony due to a severed leg, and Shizuru ended his pain by swiftly flicking her naginata's blade over the cluster of nerves in his neck that she knew would bring immediate death. It was another act of rote. She was thinking of the unbearable possibility of Natsuki having been lost, that wonderful girl who had not only saved her but possibly the army with her heroics with the cavalry, that ever-present-if-silent companion she had come to grow comfortable with in the past weeks. She heard her own words to the army return to the fore: living heroes, not dead ones.

A sharp breath, a self-castigation. I really should have looked out for her, damn it!

There was hardly any fighting now, and her army had begun to congregate around their commander, who only barely masked her frenzied search among the ranks as they began to give her the grand accolade-the title given by Himean armies to their commanders only if they had won a great battle.

"Imperator!" they cried, filling her ears with it. "Imperator!"

The imperator was breathing hard, still trying to find the pale face, looking among the soldiers for the striking green eyes she had grown so used to having for company in the evenings. Oh, her Natsuki! Her heart began to sink further, a strange weight in her belly even as her army continued to give her their applause. She registered their exultant expressions, the beating of swords and spears against shields, the face of her senior legate-profusely bleeding on one cheek-grinning at her and joining in the cries. And through all this exultation, her heart was heavy.

I cannot have lost her!

Unexpectedly, another sound pierced through the clamour, growing louder and louder. Eventually, it was loud enough to rend the air around the gathered army, giving pause to the cheers for the Himean general. It was a buzzing at the back of the ranks, then the sound of hoof-beats and laughter and someone screaming imprecations and threats.

Shizuru turned to the direction of the noise, just as a cheer roared from the Otomeians, along with more bursts of laughter and taunting. The Himean legionaries too began to cheer and laugh, clapping their hands and slapping aching thighs with hilarity.

Is that you, Shizuru thought, feeling hope rise again. Let it be you.

As if hearing her thought, the soldiers parted to make way for a gigantic and black, blood-covered horse with an equally blood-covered rider. The rider's face was a grisly mask of crimson, nearly all features obscured by the gore. The horse came up to the general, and the rider turned to face her, revealing green eyes shining through the shocking mask. The green eyes she had been searching for-and they bore exultation.

The general was still, her own red eyes settling upon the young woman.

So great was her relief at having found Natsuki safe that Shizuru did not notice immediately what the girl had brought that was causing laughter-or rather, whom she had brought with her. The Otomeian was dragging by her horse, the chain of her daos looped about his neck, a filthy man with armour that must have been quite impressive before the mud and battle reduced it to its present state. He was the source of the screams and insults that had interrupted the army's hailing their "imperator", as well as the object of the soldiers' hilarity due to his comical attempts to get free of the noose around his neck.

"Dogs!" he was crying, actually attempting to spit at the faces around him as he clawed at the chain again. "Bastards! You will pay for this, by Dagda! You will rue the day you touched Artaxi! My father will tear you limb from limb! Ah, let me go, you filthy bitch!"

At the last insult, Natsuki turned her head from Shizuru and peered at her prisoner, startling him with her glare. She yanked violently on the chain, making him choke as he attempted to catch his breath.

A hush followed by murmurs had descended upon the rest of the army, the officers signalling to the rankers behind them to be quiet. They were dumbfounded at the prisoner's declaration of his identity and watched, amused and amazed, as the royal captive began to rant once more.

"Oh, filthy louts! I swear I will have your heads for this! Artaxi swears it! Bastards! Cunni !"

His captor, however, seemed to have tired of the game. She yanked on the chain again to draw him up abruptly and choke him into silence, then kicked him squarely on the temple with her heel. Artaxi lost consciousness at the blow, dropping like a dead weight to the ground. The others stared at his limp figure while buzzing quietly to each other, still finding it difficult to believe the capture of their royal prisoner.

The general moved and the buzzing quieted. She stepped forward, coming closer to Natsuki's pawing horse. She could feel its heat steaming off the skin as she stood next to it, laying a hand on the huge beast's sweat-drenched mane. Looking up at its rider, she conveyed her admiration for this achievement through her smile.

The girl on the horse surprised her by returning the smile, her white teeth stark against the blood on her face. Then something happened that stunned many of the people around them even more than Artaxi's identity.

"His chariot."

Shizuru froze, eyes growing large.

"It was stuck," came the husky words, spoken in perfectly accented Himean. "Trying to escape."

Shizuru stared on as a dead silence fell, brought about by Natsuki's first words to her. For her part, the girl on the horse was unfazed by the shock she had caused among the Himean command-including the woman she was talking to-and simply continued to look down at the general, her smile developing into a smirk.

As if this shift had been all that was necessary to bring her to her senses, the Himean commander's eyes softened. The smile returned to her lips, wider than any she had ever given before without calculating its purpose or effect.

"Well done," she said, so softly that perhaps only the two of them heard it. "Well done, my Natsuki."

Vocabulaire:

1. A note on scribes and senatorial correspondents - There were many types of scribes in a campaign, most of them employed by the officers to write their words for them . Chie Harada takes on some duties akin to those of a scribe, in that she is asked by Shizuru to keep an account of events during campaign and send these accounts to Senate as dispatches (to keep that body informed). Sometimes, it was considered preferable to have someone else telling the tale of one's doings-especially since praise for the general would be better received coming from someone other than herself/himself.

2. Capite censi - (L.) the proletariat or masses, so to speak. They were the poorest in Rome/Hime and were also the most numerous. Another way of referring to them in the story is "Head Count".

3. "Ecastor!" - An exclamation considered proper for Ancient Roman women to utter, even in formal company. Men tended to use "Edepol!" instead.

4. Fortuna - The Roman/Himean goddess of Fortune, a very important figure in their pantheon.

Shizuru lowered herself to the steaming water, sighing as it welcomed her taut and exhausted body. She seated herself on the shallow pool's bottom, leaned back on the edge, and closed her eyes. Soon a hand came up to rub her temple, the movement stirring small waves that lapped at her collarbone.

"How I needed this," she mumbled. "After these past couple of days, I was ready to drop."

Two days had passed since the Battle of Argentum, and those two days had been consumed by work. Always meticulous, she had insisted upon overseeing the many things to be done afterwards, which were almost as tiring as the battle itself. There were wounded soldiers to attend to, damaged walls to be repaired and, of course, dead to be given funerals. Long hours had been spent gathering all the corpses strewn on the field and divesting them of their armour-which could be put to good use later-so that the deceased could be burnt after the necessary obsequies.

Shizuru ordered, to the mystification of the Argentians, that even the corpses of the Mentulae be treated with the same respect as the bodies of her dead soldiers. Her army said nothing: they knew that it was necessary to burn all the bodies, whether in a proper funeral pyre or not, for to leave them lying about would invite disease to the area. The only difference lay in their ways of viewing it: most of them saw it as standard procedure for clearing a battlefield; the general saw it as that too, but also as the honour due to the dead.

Of casualties to the Himean general's army, there were unbelievably few: less than a century had died. This paltry number was taken by many to be further proof of her genius-and for others still, her supposed ancestral divinity-but the general herself said nothing about the matter, save for a quiet comment to her senior legate about her only regret being that she could not have spared those soldiers' lives.

As for the Argentians, they were overjoyed by the deliverance. They did their utmost to assist the army and made much of them, offering the best that they had. The siege had not so depleted them of their resources that they had been reduced to utter destitution. Thus it was that, after two days of duties and feasts that she would have preferred not to attend but was obliged to suffer, the Himean commander found herself enjoying a relaxing bath in her private quarters, half-asleep with weariness and alone at last.

Well, she amended, cracking open one eye to look at her companion. Not quite alone .

Her bodyguard was still following her about doggedly. The younger woman was seated on the floor of the room, leaning against a wall and looking resolutely away from where Shizuru bathed-also as usual. The Himean general opened both eyes and looked at her bodyguard ponderingly, thinking about the change in their interactions.

The girl was talking to her now, or uttering words in response to question every now and then, at the very least. But they had yet to have a real conversation, strangely enough. Shizuru attributed it to the whirlwind of the past days. Both of them had been so busy that they had hardly a moment's peace together. For some reason, she was certain that Natsuki would not be inclined to having a conversation when others were present. This hunch had been confirmed when she found the younger girl almost as silent as before when others were with them, choosing to reply then with her standard nods and facial expressions. Such was the Otomeian captain's vigilance with her tongue that some of the Himeans even began to wonder if the words she had spoken after the battle had been true or if they had imagined them. These musings had been brought to Shizuru's ears by her senior legate, who laughingly admitted considering the same thing.

"She still doesn't say anything, after all," Chie had sighed. "I even tried to get her to talk to me, but all I got was a nod and a small smile-although I have to say I'm grateful for what I can get! She's never so much as smiled at me before, Shizuru-san."

"Is that so?" Shizuru had replied, immensely amused by her legate's statement. "She looks even more her age when she smiles, do you not think so?"

"Oh she's lovely when she smiles, quite ravishing! She's nineteen, you said?"

"Yes."

" Ecastor ! I can't get over how young some of these Otomeian officers are," Chie had mused. "Captain of an elite division at that age? Anyway, I'm sorry to say she hasn't smiled at any of the others yet, poor bastards."

Chie had laughed at the general's perplexed look before going on.

"Oh, they've been trying to talk to her-probably to see what riddles the Sphinx will finally put to them, now that she's broken the vow of silence." She chuckled heartily at the idea. "Besides, most of them are interested in her, you know, that way ."

Shizuru's only reply had been a polite smile.

"Not that she's answered any of them, mind you, man or woman," the senior legate had continued. "All they get through is one come-on sentence and that awful glare sends them off with their tails between their legs."

"Indeed?"

"So we were all wondering..." Chie had trailed off with a meaningful tilt of the chin towards Shizuru. "You know?"

"If I have fared any better?" Shizuru had filled in, looking pensive. "Now that you mention it, we have barely spoken to each other since the battle-we have been too occupied. Simply an odd word or two, usually when I ask what the surgeons say about her wound."

"Well, at least you get 'an odd word', Shizuru-san. The rest of us have to content ourselves with a smile at most and a horrific glower if we annoy her."

I certainly do not plan on being content with any of those things, Shizuru thought, eyeing the figure against the wall. She would be damned if she chose to let this particular opportunity pass, as the two of them were finally alone. She licked her lips.

"Natsuki."

A slight stir was all the acknowledgement she received.

"Oh, really now," she went on. "You need not look away, you know. We are both women here."

No response.

"And besides," she added, to get a rise out of the girl, "I do not mind my Natsuki looking at my body."

This brought the other's head to face her, eyes narrowed-and determinedly fixed above her neck. Shizuru almost laughed, seeing how intent the girl was on letting her gaze stray no lower.

"Do be at ease, Child. It is nice to get a reprieve, yes?" she said, smiling. "I imagine you have been much harried as well in the past few days. Here, for this brief time before we get ready to join the others at headquarters, no one shall pester you. Well, except for me, and I daresay you could always tell me to stop if I ever annoy you so much that you cannot stand it. Mind that I am not trying to annoy you by talking to you now, however. It is only that I find talking to you soothing. You should know that by now."

Her bodyguard's expression softened. Soon, she bestowed Shizuru with a tiny smile.

"At any rate, you should take a soak as well," Shizuru continued. "Have a long, warm bath. It is wonderfully therapeutic for one who has just been in battle. Or shall it hurt your wound to stay too long in the water?"

The girl looked surprised that she remembered. Of course she remembered -had she not hissed upon seeing it? No one had noticed it at first, for the Otomeian warrior had shown no signs of being in pain and had been so covered in gore that the tell-tale tear in her uniform was obscured at the time, but Shizuru had seen it while covertly scanning the girl as they directed the clean-up of the field. She had then startled Natsuki by suddenly dropping to her knees and giving the Otomeian an order to hold still, so she could inspect the injury on her side.

A falx, she had thought, eyebrows knotting in displeasure. Calling for one of the medics, she had proceeded to interrogate Natsuki as to whether it hurt or not, earning the Otomeian's nonchalant denials and shrugs. Yet she knew it must have hurt. It was a clean slice and judging from the looks of it, the blade had reached a rib.

Watching Natsuki shake her head again as if to say that the wound was nothing made Shizuru tighten her jaw. It was not just that she was growing immensely fond of the young woman: it was also that she had a great appreciation for beauty, and when she saw the gash that would undoubtedly leave a scar on that beautiful white skin, she had been intensely vexed by the idea.

"I have a notion," she said, wicking away the thought and turning to a more light-hearted topic. "Why do you not join me here, then? Shed your clothes and come into the water."

That earned her a purple glare. She stifled a chuckle, having been aiming for that.

"Always that refusal." She sniffed, batting her eyes for good measure. "Am I so offensive to you that you cannot stomach the thought of being in the same pool as I? Or perhaps you think me so predatory a character?" She smirked at the deepening blush on her companion's face. "I would not harm you, Natsuki. I am quite trustworthy, much though it may surprise you to learn it."

The young woman answered by giving her a dry look. Natsuki then pointed to the darts and daggers she carried on her uniform. It took Shizuru a good while before she saw what the other meant.

"Are you saying it is because you are my bodyguard?"

A nod.

"And you think it would be hard to protect me if you were, er, naked?"

A blush.

Shizuru tilted her head. She lifted a hand from the water to rest on the edge of the tub, making a small splashing sound, and asked,

"But if you are indeed my bodyguard, does it not stand in line with your interests to join me?"

Natsuki responded with a lifted eyebrow.

"It would be easier for you to guard this body if you were closer to it," came the teasing words, prompting a new blush to appear on the Otomeian's cheeks.

Shizuru laughed a little, then apologised.

"Forgive my mischief-I do not say these things to be mean," she said. "I shall stop teasing, Natsuki, only talk to me. I would like that so much."

The glare turned into a bewildered expression.

"After all," Shizuru continued, knowing the other was wavering. "You have only done so of late, and we both know it is something I have been looking forward to for a while now. I would like nothing better now than to talk to-no- with you."

There were even brighter spots of colour on the girl's cheeks at this, and she dropped her eyes, biting her lip in a manner that the older woman found almost unbearably fetching when done by that countenance.

"I was ever so happy when you finally spoke," she told the young woman honestly, smiling in reminiscence. "And surprised. I must admit I did not expect you to talk to me at such a time."

She gave a short laugh at the sly lift of the girl's eyes before continuing.

"Nor did I expect your first words to me to be those you said then."

There was a quiet chuckle from the figure against the wall.

"But I am happy, all the same."

A few moments of silence passed with the other fidgeting with her uniform, plucking at the dark cloth of her sleeve.

"Why did you take so long? To talk to me?" Shizuru asked softly. "Or is that simply the way you are? With strangers, that is?"

The other nodded.

"I see."

Closing her eyes in resignation, Shizuru let her head rest on the edge of the tub once more and emitted a deep, drawn-out sigh. She supposed she had to accept herself beaten again by this young woman, who seemed to dole out words as a miser did his coins.

A coin came out just at that moment, however, and surprised her so much it felt as though it had struck her on the head.

"Wuh-why?"

The general's eyes snapped open at the stammered word. She lifted her head, staring at her heretofore-silent companion with a startled look on her face, one that soon turned to delight as she realised that the girl was willing to speak to her after all.

"Why," she echoed, trying to keep her voice calm. "Why what, Natsuki?"

There was a pause. After a few moments of what seemed to be internal struggle, the other decided to open her mouth again, putting butterflies in Shizuru's stomach each time she hesitated and looked as though she would think better of speech after all.

"Why do you..." came the hesitant words, laced with an undertone of curiosity. She stopped again, as if considering her query. It took all of the Himean's considerable self-restraint to resist prodding her on. "Why do you suh-speak funny?"

At these words, a slow smile came to Shizuru's lips.

"It truly amazes me," she said, looking wonderingly at her companion. "How well you speak Himean, Natsuki."

The girl turned a shade pink, then glowered, obviously annoyed at having her question ignored. Shizuru's smile widened and was joined with an apologetic look of the eyes.

"If you would allow me to say this first, before I answer your query: I notice that you speak our language perfectly," the general went on. "And without an accent. How so?"

The other hesitated again, then seemed to decide that it was best to answer.

"His Majesty taught me," she said.

That voice!

"I see," Shizuru said, remembering how the king's Himean had been as natural as that of one born in Hime. "So that is why you speak it so well." Shizuru smiled. "What did Natsuki ask me earlier-why I 'speak funny'?"

Natsuki nodded, eyes trained on the red ones.

"How strange that someone who has only learned our language from another foreigner is able even to discern the difference," Shizuru remarked. "It is due to my birthplace, you see. I was born in a certain part of my country where the language is spoken a little differently, although essentially the same. I was raised there for only the first few years of my life, but as those were the years that I learned to speak, I retained the rhythm later on, if not all the features of the actual accent. You notice how I address my companions too with 'han' instead of 'san'?"

Yet another nod. Even if the girl was willing to talk, it seemed that she was bent on saying as little as possible.

"Well, it was the custom there to do so-although it is an old custom, granted. Most of the commoners from the region no longer use these forms, I understand. It is considerably limited to the upper classes, who are more traditional in language. And other things."

Natsuki nodded again but more slowly, as if assimilating the information.

"What do you think of it?" Shizuru enquired. "My accent?"

Natsuki seemed to pause before answering.

"It is... funny."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow: "Then I am glad I could be of some amusement."

"No, I-no. I am sorry," said the other, obviously afraid that Shizuru had misunderstood her. She looked panicked, displayed with her eyes what Shizuru realised to be the true girl inside the warrior, and tried to explain.

"I huh-huh-have not-I wanted to say it was good," she stammered out, redder in the face than Shizuru had ever seen her to be. "Not funny."

Dear me, the Himean thought gleefully . She does not seem so haughty anymore when she talks.

"I am glad you think so," Shizuru said. "I find your way of speaking good as well."

Natsuki nodded, bowing her head in mortification at what she considered her gaffe. She had to raise it again soon, however, when Shizuru moved on to a new topic.

"Natsuki," said the older woman. "I do not think I have thanked you for what you did, during the battle. You were given honours during the victory ceremony, but you have yet to receive the gratitude I owe personally. Forgive me for that."

The green eyes returned to her, a faint glimmer animating them.

"I know we would not have won the battle if you had not done your part so well. I knew we could rely on you, and you certainly validated that faith. Indeed, I would not be here now were it not for you coming to my side that time. And for that, I thank you personally."

Ever so slowly, a smile crept onto Natsuki's lips. It was not one of the small smiles she generally gave. It was a full-blown grin, one like that she had shown when she had first spoken to the Himean commander, one that knocked said commander's chest now and robbed her of breath. She really could not get over it: the girl had such a face.

"Thank you, Natsuki."

They smiled at each other, a comfortable feeling settling in the room.

"You were magnificent," Shizuru said, resting an elbow on the tub's edge so that she could bring her hand to cradle her chin. "I was certainly very lucky you arrived. Otherwise, I suppose I would be on one of the foe's spits by now. I should make an offering to Fortuna soon for her having you turn up in that particular place on the battlefield. What were the odds of that? That is truly what one calls 'a lucky encounter'."

The other shook her head, making Shizuru's go up.

"What do you mean no?"

"I was..."

The girl paused, then looked away. After a few seconds of silence passed, Shizuru decided to speak.

"Were you..." She trailed off, then went on. "Were you perhaps looking for me, Natsuki?"

It seemed to take forever before the other nodded, although Shizuru knew the answer even before she did. Her heart swelled with gratitude, the warmth inside her suddenly far more powerful than the heat of the water of the pool.

" Ookini. "

Having said this, the general opened her eyes to see the confused expression on her companion's face.

"Ookini," she repeated. "It is a word used in the province where I was born-from the dialect, however, not Himean. It means 'thank you'."

She watched as the other's lips parted and formed an 'O'.

"Oo-" Natsuki began, then cut off as she furrowed her brow.

"Ookini."

"Oo-ki-ni."

This, with a slightly apprehensive, expectant look.

"Yes, perfect." Shizuru smiled encouragingly to reassure her. "You said it perfectly."

She caught her breath as the girl surprised her with another smile as bright as the one earlier. It knocked her on the chest again, scalloping an indefinable, exciting-yet-frightening emptiness through her belly in a manner she could not understand, had never felt before in any way.

As the general was having her morning respite, however, her senior legate was developing a stiff headache, courtesy of the captured Mentulaeen royal. It had been her particular task to see him that morning, as the general was not yet out of her quarters and the soldiers guarding his cell reported that Prince Artaxi was getting increasingly violent, throwing his room into disorder. Out of fear that the man would try to kill himself, Chie had decided to see him—something she grew to regret terribly when he greeted her with epithets and curses.

" Cunni ! All of you are cunni !" he screamed as he struggled with the ropes on his arms, which had been restrained due to Chie's orders. "How dare you place ropes upon my person? May you rot forever for this, you curs! I shall see you die before long! I shall skin you, strip by strip, and boil you alive!"

Chie's eyebrows went up as she shifted in her seat opposite the enraged Mentulaeen.

"Well," she drawled sardonically. "That's very creative of you."

"Bitch!"

"Listen," she said, silencing him by drawing out her sword with a hiss of metal. "Stop screaming and maybe we can actually get somewhere!"

At least I know he's not going to be killing himself any time soon, she thought, noting his obvious apprehension at the sight of the weapon in her hand. Should've known he was too much of a coward for that.

Chie sighed.

"Now that I have your attention, Prince Artaxi," she said, being careful to keep her tone polite. "May I ask what is the cause of all the ruckus? We are treating you well, we did not bind you before you started throwing a fit, we have not even placed you in a dungeon. We are giving you the finest food Argentum can offer at present, and have outfitted your room with as much comfort as one of our officers would get. We have not maltreated you in any way. So what is all this?"

He seemed to fume inwardly at her before replying.

"My father will make you pay for this, mark my words, woman!" he spat. "I am a noble prince of the Mentulaeans, and my father is the King of Kings, the Emperor of the Lands of the Mentulae, the-"

"Yes, yes, the greatest of them all," she cut off, managing to hold in her sigh. "All right, Prince. But why must you act in such a way? If you want to know the truth, you wouldn't be so well-treated if it were some other army... or if the general weren't here. I have a certain red-haired friend who would probably have skinned you alive and set you to boil without turning a hair, as you said. But she isn't here now, and she would never do that while the general is around. So why insult our hospitality, Prince Artaxi?"

He gave her a fierce stare. Unfortunately for him, the legate was unmoved, having stared down worse faces in the past-some of them from the Himean Senate, even. She simply continued to look politely enquiring, the hand with the sword hung loosely at her side.

"You may save your hospitality, Himean," he announced loftily. "I shall not tell you anything! Not a word about my homeland shall you wrest from me, whether by this false kindness or by torture!"

"Not that any of us think you actually know things worth telling that we don't already," she replied with an amused smile. "We're being kind to you because it is not our policy to insult the honour of our foes, Prince, especially when they're already beaten. And because our general would insist on the policy. That's all."

"Lunacy!"

"No, dignity," she replied calmly, fighting back the urge to pinch the bridge of her nose. "It is part of Hime's dignity that her enemies retain theirs, even in defeat. It's for Hime's dignity that we ensure this. We're not savages to torture a noble, Prince, especially when there's nothing to be gained from it."

She sighed, getting up.

"I'll tell them to relieve you of your bonds," she said, running a hand through her hair. "After they've fixed this mess in your room. If you should want anything, please ask the guard outside your door. He'll get it for you. Good day."

Leaving to the sound of his parting insults, she shook her head as she instructed the guards waiting outside to find someone to clean Artaxi's cell. Chie then gingerly returned her sword to its sheath and headed for the inn that the Argentians had given to them for headquarters, a few houses down the road from the edifice she was leaving. Striding quickly along the path, she breathed in the fresh air of the morning, feeling a smile come to her lips at the sweet scent of bread from a bakery.

Might as well get something to eat first, she thought, feeling her stomach rumble in complaint. She stopped by the store and began to eye the pastries, finally settling on some freshly-baked tarts that were sticky with honey and a sort of custard. Asking for a dozen, she began to count out the coins for payment when the shop's proprietor stopped her, shaking his grey head.

"I'd be embarrassed to take money from one of our saviours," the man said, eyes crinkling. "Take it, please, as a way of showing our thanks for what you did."

"Oh, no, no, I couldn't," she replied, embarrassed. "You people already given us so many feasts! Those are enough. Please let me pay for this."

"I insist," he said, pushing the package of tarts towards her. "Please, Legate! Let me do this much."

After a few more protests on her part, she finally gave in and took the pastries. The old man waved her on as she left. As she made her way to the headquarters, the smell got to be too much: she took one of the tarts in hand, put it to her lips and ate on the way. She knocked her boot against the door of the edifice the Argentians had lent them for army headquarters, both her hands being occupied: she was on her second tart.

The door opened and she was let in by one of the other members of the general's staff.

"Hmm," she mumbled, looking about the room. "Only three of us here? I guess everyone's still sleeping like a log." She held out the food she was carrying to the other legate. "Here, Toshi-san, Shohei-san. They're good."

As the other two helped themselves to the tarts, she took a seat near the window. One of the men placed the rest of the tarts on the table nearby before returning to his seat.

"Three of the tribunes were here earlier," Toshi said, smacking his lips at the goodies. "Sent them off to some errands. I gather the general told the scribes to sleep in today-makes sense when you consider that she worked them late into the night yesterday with all those things she was dictating!"

"I see. And did the couriers go already? The ones bound for Hime?"

It was the other man who answered this time, for Toshi had taken a mouthful of one of the treats.

"Yes," Shohei said. "We sent off all the letters already."

"Good."

"How long-" Toshi stopped to lick his lips. "How long do you think it'll be before your account of what's been happening reaches the Senate, Harada-san?"

"Who knows? Almost a month? Half a month?" She shook her head to show she had absolutely no idea. "They're not riding on proper roads, after all. Depends on too many things. But one thing's for sure. It will shut Armitage's yap up when they read the part about the battle we just won."

"May the gods strike me down if it doesn't!" Toshi replied, laughing. "All they'll be able to hear again from the people will be Shizuru Fujino, Shizuru Fujino! How I'd love to see their faces!"

"I don't know about that, Toshi-san-they're pretty ugly," Chie returned.

The men laughed.

"Well, the general is everyone's heroine, anyway," Shohei put in. "They should get used to it already."

"I think that's exactly what they don't want to get used to, Shohei-san," Chie replied. "Anyway, you sent off the letters bound for Otomeia, too, I hope?"

"Of course."

"All's good, then."

"They're for Nao-san and Taro-san, right?" asked Shohei.

"Yes. Shizuru-san wants them to bring up the rest of the Himean legions-the Otomeian infantry is to be left at Otomeia as garrison, I think," she told him. "Oh, yes, and they're also to eject the Mentulae at Stych Gorge. If the Mentulae are still there, that is."

"Really?" asked Toshi, eyes lighting up with interest. He finished the pastry in his hand, then strode over to the table to pick up a jug of water and a basin. "What did the general tell them to do?"

"I just said it, Toshi-san." She gave him a funny look. "Eject them if they're still there."

"I mean how ." Toshi poured water into the basin and set down the jug. He brought the basin and a rag as he returned to the other two, who were done eating as well. As they washed their hands in the water, he lifted an eyebrow at Chie. "What plan did she tell Taro-san and Yuuki-san to use?"

"Well, I don't know what they will be planning."

Toshi looked at her in amazement: "Didn't the general send them a plan?"

The other two turned amused expressions towards him. Unlike Toshi, who was serving as legate to Shizuru for the first time, they had been with her and these legions before, so his surprise at the information was particularly entertaining. It was Shohei who answered, drying his hands on the rag.

"She doesn't need to send one. Does she, Chie-san?"

Chie nodded.

"But why?" asked the bemused Toshi. "Oh, I know generals usually just tell you to do this and that, but I think I've seen the measure of Fujino-san by now to know that she wouldn't trouble a subordinate by making him solve a difficult problem by himself. And that thing at the gorge is a difficult problem, isn't it?"

"Let me put it this way," Chie told him. "When you good subordinates, most problems aren't all that difficult."

Toshi's eyes widened.

"I hope this doesn't come out the wrong way," he said. "But I never knew Taro-san was so esteemed in military strategy."

The other two exchanged brief looks.

"Well, he's not brilliant," Chie qualified. "But he's good . And he's working with a co-commander who happens to be more than good."

Why do you think Shizuru-san actually stipulated that the Ninth Legion's primipilus be the other head of that part of the army when she left, Toshi-san? You have to admit it's not normal for a commander to go so far as to specify it, not to mention to practically put a centurion on equal footing with a legate in the command tent. It may surprise you to know this, but Nao Yuuki is pretty much a great military mind too-oh, not like the general, I doubt anyone's in the same league as she is-but still a great military mind, all the same. She isn't the chief primipilus of our general's favourite legion for nothing. Shizuru-san's actually tried to elevate her to higher positions and even social status, but she kept refusing. I understand, it isn't really her thing, being part of the actual politics. And she fits remarkably well in the world she lives in."

"Really?" he asked, surprised. "Is she that good?"

"She's very good," Shohei told him. "Just take our word for it, Toshi-san. Yuuki-san doesn't need to be told what to do, and she'll help Taro-san do what needs to be done the way our commander would want it."

They stopped talking, hearing the sound of faint footsteps. The three of them turned to the door when it opened. The new arrivals turned out to be the general and her bodyguard, both of whom were offered greetings that only Shizuru returned-verbally, that is.

"A pleasant day, is it not?" the general said, taking the seat at the table as her companion stood behind her. "I feel so rested. I hope you are the same?"

"Yes, thank the gods!" said Chie. "Finally got a good night's sleep. You too, Shizuru-san?"

"Mm, it was refreshing. And Toshi-han? Shohei-han?"

The two in question gave affirmative replies.

"Oh," said Shizuru, looking at the package of tarts on the table. "What is this?"

"Tart pastries. Try them, Shizuru-san, they're delicious. Sweet."

Shizuru smiled and thanked her, then picked up the package. She took one tart, then held it out to her bodyguard first to the surprise of the other three.

"Try it as well, Natsuki," she said. "And sit next to me. Here."

The general tipped her head towards a stool by her own. After only a second's pause-wherein she flicked one of her cautious glances towards the other occupants of the room-Natsuki pushed off from the wall she had been leaning against and complied with Shizuru's wishes, taking the tart and seating herself on the stool. She did the latter in a way that allowed her to draw up both legs up onto the seat. She sat cross-legged on the small area the stool afforded, perfectly balanced. This provoked an amused chuckle from Shizuru, who was taking a tart for herself. After giving the Otomeian a smile, Shizuru turned to her legates.

"Is there any news?"

"Ah," said Shohei, recovering from his surprise at the commander's interaction with her companion. "Yes, we've sent the letters to Hime and the ones to Otomeia. The couriers set off this morning."

"I see."

"And we're giving the troops one day of rest without drills, as per your instructions, General," Toshi followed. "They seem to be sleeping it all off. Along with everyone else given permission."

Shizuru laughed. "As they should. They need it after the past days."

"I should've done that," Chie sighed, earning their attention as she glanced wistfully out of a window. "Slept in. Then I wouldn't have had to deal with that overgrown brat of a prince-do you fancy choking him again with your daos, Natsuki-san? Please do!"

The Otomeian smirked.

"How is he?" Shizuru asked, looking almost naughty with amusement. "Perhaps I should see him again."

"No, don't, please," Chie said. "He'll just ruin your day. I'll make you pay this, I'll torture you that-why, he can't even get up enough courage to slit his throat! And the things he says! Oh, they'd be more impressive if he actually changed his repertoire, but stay with him for a quarter of an hour and you realise he's simply repeating the same things over and over again. All he ever talks about is what he's going to have his father do. Well, I wouldn't be surprised if Father Dearest were so angry at his son's being trounced that he did all those things to Artaxi himself!"

The rest laughed at this tirade.

"I take it he still refuses to settle down, then?" Shizuru asked.

"With a vengeance," Chie answered. "Tore up his room again, like a kid having a tantrum. It's getting comical, Shizuru-san. He even thinks we're going to milk him for information about his homeland. What are we, invading the Mentulae?"

Shizuru smiled at that and took a bite of her tart. Swallowing the morsel she had taken, she squinted one eye at the wall across her.

"I would not be surprised if his father does send another army," she said, making her subordinates snap their heads towards her in alarm. "He will have heard of his son's defeat by now. Surely the 'Great King of the Mentulae' shall not take it sitting down. It is not unlikely, is it?"

"Do you mean..." Chie slowly began. "That we shall be facing another battle so soon, Shizuru-san?"

The general seemed to consider this with calm, the placid smile never leaving her face.

"It is a possibility," she said, at length. "But fear not, Chie-han. I will do all I can to prevent it."

It was a few moments before Chie answered: "What do you mean? How can you?"

But their general merely shrugged and smiled away.

"We shall see," she said, looking around. Realising what she was searching for, Toshi got up and brought the basin of water they had used to wash their hands earlier. He set it onto the table with the rag. Shizuru smiled and thanked him, then proceeded to wash her hands.

"Natsuki," she said, turning to the dark-haired girl beside her. "You are finished? Wash your hands in this basin as well. The tarts were rather sticky, were they not?"

The younger woman nodded and dipped her hands in the water, then finished by drying off with the rag as Shizuru had done. The others in the room watched all of this with rising interest, none daring to make the comment hovering about all their heads.

Shizuru got to her feet.

"Excuse me," she said apologetically. "I suddenly have the urge to see the town. You three really should leave the command post for now, you know. It is unnecessary for you to work when I have allowed everyone a holiday, even myself."

"That's fine, Shizuru-san," Chie answered, unable to help a chuckle from slipping out. "We're not working anyway. We'll be staying here in the meantime, blabbering away like the old gossips we are."

Shizuru nodded: "Then send for me if anything of importance happens. I shall be roaming the streets around the market, and it should be easy to find me."

"All right."

She swept out, her bodyguard in tow. After the door had closed, Chie grinned.

"Her little habit," she explained. "She likes to go around new places to-how does she put it? Oh, yes, she says it 'expands her horizons'."

"You do the same thing, Chie-san."

"Yes," she said with a laugh. "But in a different way. I'm more interested in getting to know the points of their culture, the designs that mark their buildings and arts. She's more interested in talking to people."

"Ah, yes," Shohei said. "That."

"Why?" Toshi asked, brow furrowed. "I noticed that, even back in Hime. She actually talks to anyone, even if it's just a member of the capite censi."

Shohei grinned: "Just the way she is."

"That's not an explanation," Toshi grunted humorously.

"It's because she likes to, and it's good politics," Chie cut in. "But she is really made that way, like Shohei-san says. What's that Kanzaki-san calls her? Ah, yes: The Philosopher-General. Fits her, somehow."

Toshi nodded and rubbed his newly-shaved chin.

"So she's probably out there making more people swoon," he said, thinking of how many of the women in Hime would ooh and ahh over her every time they saw her exiting the meetings of the Senate. "By the way, I meant to ask the two of you, is she always that way?"

"What do you mean? We just told you that's her-"

"No, I mean the way she is with that Otomeian girl."

That made the other two pause and look at each other.

"That's hard to say," Shohei began. "The whole thing's not usual, is it, Chie-san? I mean, she's never taken a bodyguard before Natsuki-san so we don't really know if that's how she'd treat someone in that position regularly."

Chie waved him off.

"No, it's not just that," she said reflectively. "I'd say it's different. Definitely not usual."

The men looked at her.

"Anyway," said Shohei. "Natsuki-san seems fond of the general, doesn't she? It surprised me to see her doing what Fujino-san told her to... meekly too. She didn't even glare!"

Chie turned a sly smile to him.

"Could it be you tried to get her to talk to you, Shohei-san?" she asked, eyebrows quirked comically.

"You can't blame a man for trying!" he returned, laughing right along with them. "But Jupiter! The look she gave me sent me scurrying off, I tell you. I'm not ashamed to admit it. The girl looks like a Grecian Artemis-but I swear that glare feels like a dozen arrows coming for your eyes. Or a daos," he added, grinning.

"You probably pestered her into it," Toshi grunted, in between laughs. "Didn't your mother tell you not to bother Sphinxes?"

"Sure, but how was I to know the Sphinx was a Gorgon?"

They hooted with laughter.

"No one won the bet, right?" Chie asked, referring to the gambles the other officers had placed on when Natsuki would finally say a word to the general. "All a little ahead, I think?"

"Yes!" groaned Shohei. "And here I thought I was going to get the pot for sure-but the girl had to talk three full days before! Oh, how close!"

"You're lucky it's just a gap of three days to your bet," Toshi retorted. "Mine was two weeks!"

This set them off another bout of chuckling, which was interrupted when the sound of heavy and rapid footsteps preceded the door being thrown open. It was one of their aides, his face flushed with excitement.

"Harada-san!" he called, gasping. "One of our scouts... came back"

He stopped to draw a shuddering breath.

"Said he saw another army of Mentulae..." Another gasp. "Over the border and headed for us!"

The legates looked at each other in alarm.

"Jupiter!"

"Is this supposed to be a joke?"

"How large?" asked Chie, voice crisp and cutting off any further comments from the stunned men. "How far off?"

"I don't know-the scout's downstairs."

"Let's go, then," she said, rising with her fellows. She turned to the man who had brought the news. "Catch your breath first, Kamo-kun. Then send someone out to find the general-tell them to stick to the streets around the market in the city. She'll be roving there."

He nodded as they passed him, going to the stairs.

"I'm beginning to think Fujino-san is prescient," Shohei muttered. Chie sent him a sideways look that he caught. "I mean, this turns up just as we were talking about it-one would think she were a seer!"

Toshi interrupted. "It doesn't really help in this situation even if she was able to predict it."

The senior legate gave a dry laugh before replying.

"Like she said, Toshi-san, we'll see."

They scurried down the stairs, cloaks flapping behind them.

Vocabulaire:

1. Consular - A senator who has served as a consul at least once.
2. Client-patron relations - In much the same way as Rome had client-states, Ancient Roman politicians had 'client-persons'. These are people who enrol themselves under the protection and welfare provided by a prominent and powerful politician (patron), who then has them under his or her authority, more or less. In exchange for this power over them, the clients may seek the patron's help for such things as monetary aid or the protection of their interests in legislation.
3. Galatea - A mythological figure. Originally no more than a marble statue, her sculptor fell in love with the beauty he had created and prompted the gods to grant her life.
4. Triumph - This word is sometimes not used in the sense of "victory" in this story. As you recall, Shizuru's troops gave her the army's accolade for a great general after the Battle of Argentum: they hailed her as "imperator". If this happens to a Roman general, he/she must petition the Senate to grant him/her a triumph. The Senate almost always sanctions the triumph or approves the request.

The triumph is a parade of floats with actors depicting scenes from the campaign, entertainers, carts bearing spoils, the army, the commander, and prisoners of war. (The Senate participates as well.) If the prisoner was a particularly noteworthy personage, he was suitably dressed up for the parade, to make it known to those watching that he was a person of great import, thus enhancing the honour of the one who had conquered him.

This was done as a celebration of a general's success, as well as that of the army. Another supposed reason was to impress the captive enemies with the glory and grandeur of Rome (here, Hime), to show the prisoners the splendour of the culture and nation that had conquered them.

5) Tace - "Shut up!"

6) A note on geography: There are disparities between this story's geography and the actual Roman Republican map . Details will be forthcoming in later chapters, as needed.

Shizuru Fujino received the news of another enemy army's approach with more calm than even her senior legate expected. Upon finishing interrogations with the scout who reported the intelligence, the general simply smiled at her staff, then shrugged with a disturbing lack of care.

"So it appears I was right, yes?" she asked the dumbfounded officers, seeming satisfied about it. "They must have been encamped rather close to be able to move so quickly. Or moving in at the time. We really should have given the scouts more rein after the battle. At any rate, it would seem that King Obsidian is truly committed to the expansion of his empire. Ambitious king we have here!"

"Yes, yes, that's all true," replied one of the legates, trying furiously to restrain his impatience. "Shall we call the soldiers to arms?"

He received another maddeningly calm smile.

"I think not," she said. "According to the information, they should arrive no earlier than three days from now. That is, if they are to move at the regular speed for a Himean army... and given what we know about them from the reports, they certainly are not capable of that. Six days would be more likely. Perhaps even seven."

She paused and seemed to consider something.

"It amazes me how little regard for speed these foreign armies have," she noted. "They should accustom their soldiers to more marches, as we do, I think."

"Fujino-san!"

All heads snapped at the sudden outburst. The general herself lifted her eyebrows with a pleasant air and looked at the speaker.

"Yes, Aidou-han?"

The person in question stepped forward, brow dark with annoyance.

"This is not the time to be musing over what can be done to help the enemy's shortcomings," the older man said between clenched teeth, his grey-speckled eyebrows frowning heavily. "Order the centurions to move, I say! You should be mobilising our army now and getting ready for the coming-"

" Tace, Aidou-san!"

Aidou broke off and turned to the one who had cut him off abruptly.

"Nearly all of us here hold the title of senators," came the words, spoken harshly and riddled with reprimand. "And you are among the more senior ones, in that respect. But you are still a legate of this army, and you are still under its rules. You will address its commander with deference."

"Chie-han, please," interrupted the mellifluous tones of the general. "That shall do."

Chie stopped and looked at her friend, whose calm had not been diminished in the least by this little exchange. She tipped her head before sending a final warning glance to Aidou, whose lips thinned in response.

A terse silence descended on the room.

They were gathered in the inn where they had set up headquarters, in the large room the command used on the top floor. After sending for the general, the senior legate had also rounded up the rest of the staff by sending people to rouse them from their beds, thinking that Shizuru might want to have them on hand in case she needed to put plans in motion. They had come swiftly, shivering at the news of another enemy army. Most of them had expected the commander to roll out directions as soon as she arrived, truth be told, so Aidou was not alone in his befuddlement. He was also one of the oldest people in the room, so it was not really all that surprising that he was the one to have broken rank and questioned her for her easygoing attitude.

The veteran Fujino officers, however, looked very much as though they were about to slap him for it.

Understanding this, and realising that the all-too-loud quiet could go on forever, Shizuru broke the stillness once again.

"I understand your concern, Aidou-han," she said, dipping her head gracefully. "But you must understand as well that any mobilisation at this point is futile. For one thing, the army has only recently been in an exhausting battle. To ask them to come to arms and do something such as go through drills when the enemy is not even in sight would not only be a pointless exercise but a detrimental one. Furthermore, we are fairly certain that the enemy shall not be in sight for a few more days. Surely we can afford to let the legionaries spend a day out of their heavy armour. They deserve that much."

She stopped to smile at him, then at the other people in the room.

"I am aware that Aidou-han's outburst was merely due to his concern for everyone's welfare-and that this very concern is so great that it has caused him to overlook a few things, perhaps. Such zeal for our cause should be admired. How can I worry with such men to aid me in times of crisis?"

Well-played, Shizuru-san, thought Chie. The younger woman had just bestowed a pardon that was not a pardon. She understood why Shizuru had done it: the proud old consular's dignity was not made to suffer if the forgiveness for the outburst came in such a way. So deftly had Shizuru administered clemency that Aidou only managed to stare at her with a stunned expression for a good moment before finally opening his mouth to speak an apology.

"Yes, that's so," he harrumphed. "I'm sorry, Fujino-san."

She smiled and told him to think nothing of it.

"But Fujino-san... How are we sure they shall not arrive early?" he stammered again, brow still furrowed deeply.

"Ah," Shizuru replied. "Yes, I was about to tell you-forgive me, I was sidetracked. You see, when I apologised for being late for this meeting earlier, I failed to mention that it was due to my consultation with the head of the scouting unit."

She paused as the members of her staff unconsciously leaned forward, their attention piqued.

"I have given instructions for half of the scouts to be arranged in a formation that ensures an intelligence perimeter for us," she continued. "At least one lookout will cover each salient point on the map. I have arranged it such that we should be informed if any enemies are within proximity at least two days before they reach the city. I hope that puts your fears to rest, Aidou-han?" she asked amiably.

He nodded, stunned.

"In any case, we shall continue with this day of rest. Please call the centurions tomorrow at regular hours, and tell them to put the soldiers-"

"To arms?" came the excited words, spoken by one of the other officers.

The general's eyes sparkled.

"Oh no!" she said. "To shovels. Tomorrow I am going digging and everyone is coming with me."

This elicited mixed reactions: half of the officers put on confused expressions, while the other half nodded, smiles on their faces. Before anyone could ask any more questions, however, the general spoke again.

"I trust those of you who do not understand yet can be enlightened by the others. Preparations should be fairly simple, and I do not think you would need me for them. It should take no more than an hour today, I suppose. Now perhaps we should be off enjoying the rest of the day, yes? There is much work to be done tomorrow."

She rose to her feet, pushing her cloak behind her, and the rest followed suit, stiffening reflexively as she surveyed them.

"Are there any more matters to discuss, perhaps?" she asked.

The senior legate answered readily.

"That's all," she said, blocking any of the others from putting forth any further-in her opinion, senseless -queries. "Shohei-san and the rest know what to do with everything else." A nod from the legate mentioned, as well as several others who knew what to prepare for the morrow. "Are you going back on your rounds?"

She received a chuckle.

"You know me so well," the commander said.

"Well enough to know that," the short-haired woman replied, mouth twitching. "May I accompany you, then?"

"Of course."

Chie turned to the officers.

"Then, Shohei-san, can you oversee the preparations?" she asked. "Make it short-the general did say she wants everyone to enjoy the holiday."

Shohei accepted the assignment. That having been done, Chie turned to the general, who bade the rest a good-day and walked out with legate and bodyguard flanking her on either side. The three women left the room and proceeded down the stairs, silent until they reached the street.

"Aidou-san is getting on my nerves," Chie said as soon as they stepped into the open air. She received an amused look. "He's too rash. The gall of him!"

She stopped talking momentarily as several legionaries going for a walk saluted them. One knew they were legionaries because the soldiers wore their standard-issue tunics even when out of the gear.

"To talk to you like that," she resumed, scratching the hair on the back of her head with irritation. "He might be the elder, between the three of us, and is a consular-though he only ascended to the consulship by bribing to the high heavens and because there were no better candidates during his term-but that was just plain unacceptable . And even if he is a consular, you're the commander."

"Rather earnest and eager, is he not?"

"I love how you manage to make everything so understated," came the laughing reply. "But, yes, he is 'rather eager'. Not very competent as a soldier either, no more than an idiot who's only lasted this long by standing away from the fighting."

A familiar twinkle came into the red eyes: "Not every legate is like Chie-han."

"Oh, I know, I know!" Chie returned, waving her hands. "It's the prerogative of legates to stay out of the battle-valuable strategists and whatnot-but when everyone else is fighting since we're so undermanned, and even the general is at the fore, why, I should think even he would doff his sword and pretend to come out to help, at least!" She grunted, made a face. "You see why Nao hates him."

"Does she?"

"Like a sore," Chie grinned.

Shizuru laughed.

"I confess I do not mind so much as you do, Chie-han," she told her friend. "The only thing that concerns me about Aidou-han would be his carrying out orders properly, and he has not yet failed in that respect, although he has been rather sluggish in doing so, but not to an extent that I am forced to take action to spur him on."

She paused as they approached a juncture in the road.

"Ah, let us take the right," she said. "I believe there is a nice little park that way. Was it this way, Natsuki?"

Chie chewed her lip in thought while the girl confirmed it, deciding their route. She spoke up after a few more paces down the path, ignoring the titters of a group of adolescents passing by and eyeing them with artless interest.

"I wonder now, Shizuru-san," she said. "Why didn't you refuse when he volunteered for this post?"

"Should I have?" Shizuru said. "You know why he volunteered-quite reluctantly too, I might add-do you not?"

"Finances?" Chie ventured. "Word on the grapevine was that he was in some straits over debts to Hime's moneylenders. Pretty bad, so they told me." She tilted her head with an amused expression. "They'd have to be pretty bad for him to be desperate enough to join this campaign, wouldn't they? Like you said, most of these old birds aren't really fond of you. Not that old Aidou-san can do anything about it-this was the only campaign available at the time, or the only one that looked like it had a remote chance of bringing in money."

"Yes. And I suppose that was why he was so earnest earlier, Chie-han. You cannot blame him, if he is pinning his hopes upon getting as much booty as he can on this campaign."

"Huh."

"I was aware of this when I took him on, naturally. And truth be told, I would have preferred to lend him the money instead to pay off his debts-had he only asked. But Aidou-han is of the old school. He would consider it an immense blow to his dignity to ask me, a 'young upstart' of the House, for financial aid. That would have made me his patron, and he, my client."

"True, he'd not swallow that."

They had reached a quiet path, now, and were the only people to be seen. Chie was walking on Shizuru's right, the general's bodyguard taking the left. It had been shady thus far, but now the sun peeked out of a cloud and bathed them with light. Chie turned her face upwards with sheer animal pleasure. Soon the weather would be turning cool, she knew, for summer was coming to its end. And then they would have to suffer what were most likely awful temperatures, for the North was said to be brutal in its falls and winters.

"So," she said. "You accepted because it was the only way you could help him, Shizuru-san."

A laugh came from the other woman.

"That makes me sound so philanthropic," Shizuru said, letting a polite amount of embarrassment seep into her voice. "That would be a secondary reason, Chie-han, if one at all. The point is, one does not easily refuse a consular when he volunteers for a position, especially when said consular is nicely tied to the conservative group by blood connections. It would be far better to take him on and be politic, as well as possibly make a new friend where a near-foe once was. You know better than I do the way things work in Senate."

Chie laughed suddenly, making the keen red eyes turn towards her.

"Well, I don't know how far you'll get with him," she said, shaking her head at Shizuru. "But you are philanthropic, Shizuru-san, aside from being politic."

"It is nice to have it thought so. But I wonder."

Lapsing into companionable silence, they continued along the way. As she walked, Chie thought of the truth behind her friend's actions. No matter how much the general would insist that her only reason for not being able to refuse Aidou's offer of legateship was politics, claiming that she could not have refused him, the truth was that she could have refused it without any damage to her own reputation, and Chie knew that. And as for the argument on gaining a new friend: perhaps Shizuru was right in that she would manage to charm him eventually to thinking better of her-but what did that matter when Aidou was not even one of the better-known, better-regarded consulars, one of those with the most clout in Senate? No, Chie thought, Shizuru had primarily refrained from refusing him a legateship so because it would have damaged the man's dignity irreparably and she thought it little trouble to aid him in the long run.

At least, that's what I think, Chie thought.

She looked up as a flash of colour caught her eye. A young couple had entered the path and were headed in the opposite direction. They were prattling happily to themselves and almost failed to notice the party of soldiers until they were passing each other, whereupon they bowed shyly to the Himean general-everyone in Argentum knew who she was by now, of course-and her companions. Then they skittered off, chattering more excitedly than ever.

"How nice it is to be young."

Broken out of her meditations, Chie turned a laughing face towards her friend.

"Shizuru-san, you say that like you're a doddering old woman!"

That earned her a laugh from the commander and even a grin from the Otomeian with them.

"Well, pardon me," Shizuru said. "I meant, rather, that it is nice to be young of heart. Perhaps I mean 'innocence'?"

"Ah," Chie nodded, albeit dubiously. "I get what you mean. I suppose we don't really fit into that category, relatively young as we are in years compared to our colleagues. More so you than myself."

They had reached the end of the path now, and found themselves at the entrance to the park Shizuru had spoken of earlier. They could see in the distance that a few people were already strolling about, and there were even some Otomeian and Himean soldiers among them. As they walked into the grounds, distant laughter and conversation reached their ears, mingled every now and then with the odd bark from a romping dog scattering pigeons.

"It's good to see everyone so relaxed," Chie commented, stretching her arms above her head. "I'm almost glad Aidou-san irritated me now. I wouldn't have come along otherwise, and I needed this."

Shizuru stopped walking beside a large stone bench, prompting the other two to follow suit.

"Shall we sit here?" she asked, bending to slip off her footwear. "I wish to sit with my feet on the grass... it feels so pleasant."

"Oh yes."

The three of them settled on the seat, smiling at the fresh, clean scent of the grass under their feet. A breeze came up and ruffled their hair.

"You are missing her, are you not?"

Chie chuckled: "You know me too well, too, Shizuru-san."

Shizuru threw her a smile, then turned away and looked around.

"Do you regret coming along with me, Chie-han?" she asked, tone still light. "On this campaign?"

Chie lifted her eyebrows.

"Of course not," she said.

"Even when you could be in Hime instead, with her?"

There was a short silence broken only by the sound of the people nearby.

"What's on your mind, Shizuru-san?" asked the senior legate. "Is something wrong?"

Shizuru turned to face the other woman, an apologetic smile on her lips.

"I was merely wondering, Chie-han," she said. "Forgive me if I have said something out of place."

Chie shook her head with a laugh.

"Oh no, I don't mind being asked that and you know it. I was just surprised that the question would come from you." She paused and smiled mischievously. "And to answer the question, no, I don't regret coming along at all. You know I did it of my own will."

The red eyes softened ever so slightly.

"Then I thank you," she said.

The senior legate tipped her head in acknowledgement.

"What about you?" she asked. "Miss anyone back home yet?"

Shizuru seemed to pause. No surprise there-it was quite a question. Chie understood this and reflected on her own query, wondering what had possessed her to dare to ask it. Her friend did not seem to her to be the type to "miss", for one thing. She had spent so much of recent years on campaign too that she must surely be used to being away from the city. Why ask that, then?

Because they all miss you, she thought, speaking the words only in her mind. There was a truth, at least in Chie's opinion. The Senate was just a bit less exciting, the Forum lost a bit of its thrill, and the politics of their world became just a bit less exhilarating. It was the nature of the brightest stars, she thought, that their absence affected so much more of the sky than did the absence of smaller ones. Everyone missed them, even those who only ever got to look at them from a distance. The sky turned a little darker.

Even the people who hate you miss you, because they're all a little less themselves without you to stand opposite, she noted inwardly. But do you miss anyone back, Shizuru-san?

She had always wondered this, wanted to ask the other woman ever since they had first met. And when had that been? Oh, years and years ago! It had been at a dinner given by Chie's parents for some of their friends-a dinner Shizuru's parents had attended, bringing their only child with them. Chie was already mature then, the elder by nearly seven years, for the Fujino heiress was only eleven. Yet, even then, the younger girl was the already the more famous, already making a reputation for herself as a prodigy, a genius in everything she put her hand or mind to. As was the case with most sources of brilliance, rumours had abounded regarding her. Chie had been naturally curious as to what the child was like.

Undeniably patrician, had been her first thought, for the younger girl already had a way of composing herself even then that spoke volumes about the nobility of her ancestry. And she was so fine-looking! Chie had been tongue-tied for a few moments by the sheer beauty of the face, the lustrous sheen of the tawny hair, the long-limbed form of a body that, while still a bit gangly at the time, was already beginning to promise a shape to set Hime on fire-as it had, soon enough. But what had really caught her attention, when they began to know each other better, was the permanently set expression on Shizuru's face: an affable, seemingly open smile that never faltered. It took a few more meetings before she realised that while it was open in the sense of being inviting, it was actually the opposite in terms of revealing anything about its owner. For that was the point of the smile: to invite but never give away. An unusual thing in a child and in a person. A lonely thing, in fact .

That was her friend's tragedy, perhaps. Shizuru was so-what was the word?-e levated, perhaps, in every respect, so different from everyone else that people sensed it at once and, as if by some primal instinct, kept their distance. With the result that she learned to sense it as well and also kept her distance from others, even while seeming to cultivate their confidence and affection. She would speak to a member of the highest aristocracy and the lowest of the proletarii with the same amiability of manner, setting aside all notions of her own high-unapproachable social rank to set them at ease. And yet, one still felt it on some deeper, inarticulate level: that she was unlike everyone else. And not just in the sense of her aristocracy. It was something else, something about her that could not really be understood, a thing more sensed than seen...

Maybe this was why most of her friends refrained from addressing her without an honorific. Chie was one of them, and for some reason, she could not bring herself to do it either. Shizuru always came with san for her. In return, Shizuru hardly ever addressed anyone without an honorific as well. It was an odd formality between friends. A sense of distance.

She doesn't show it, but I can feel it, Chie thought. A quiet, constant solitude. Always at the centre of a crowd, yet always alone. What was it, exactly, that made her this way? Years after that first meeting, Chie still had no definite word for it.

"Or is there anyone worth missing?" she asked again, looking intently at the face turned in profile, the perfect lines aglow in the light of day. It took a moment before her friend replied, and when she did, she had that smile on again.

"Well, now. I wonder..."

A few seconds passed. Sensing that her friend was not saying anything further, Chie sighed quietly, the sound carried away by the wind. A shrill yap made her turn her head.

A small dog, no more than a pup, had approached the trio on the bench, its stubby little tail wagging furiously. It launched itself at the closest target, the general's bodyguard. The young woman bent down with her hands out and caught it easily. The animal licked her hands, making little snorts as it sniffed the dark-haired woman's uniform. Shizuru laughed, whereas Chie smiled at the change in the Otomeian's normally deadpan expression, which had turned into one of delight.

"Natsuki likes puppies, I see," said the general. "Friendly little creature, eh?"

Natsuki looked at her and they shared a smile. The creature in the girl's arms yipped.

"And it seems that they like Natsuki as well."

As Shizuru reached a hand out to pet the animal, Chie found herself pausing at the words her friend had spoken. What was it that had caught her attention? She furrowed her brow, trying to bring it to mind as her companions fawned over the pup.

The sound of laughter. She turned her eyes to the two women, considering their cheerful countenances.

Complementary.

It was quite a contrast, she observed. From the colour of her hair to her demeanour, Shizuru just seemed so warm, whereas the Otomeian gave off the impression of having been sculpted from ice. A frosty Galatea, that one, her hair the colour of the darkest night-although when she smiled as she was doing now, the ice seemed to suddenly melt away.

They're so good-looking, she sighed ruefully, knowing it was probably not doing a great deal for her to be sitting next to such spectacularly attractive women. She joined their laughter, however, when the pup freed itself from Natsuki's arms and began to chase its own tail. After it dropped-probably having disoriented itself from running in circles-she got to her feet.

The other two looked at her.

"I'm going to go, Shizuru-san," she said. "I suppose I'd better see if the others have started rounding up shovels yet and all that. It's a simple job anyway, as you said, but I'd rather check still. The real work starts tomorrow."

"Of course." Shizuru winked. "Do try to enjoy the day off, Chie-han."

"I will," she grinned. "I'm glad to see you're doing it already."

"Mm." The other woman laughed as the dog at her feet sneezed. "It seems I have this puppy to keep me company, in any case. And Natsuki, of course," she added with another wink at her bodyguard, who lifted an eyebrow. Chie held in a chuckle at the Otomeian's slightly reddened cheeks.

"Well then, I'll leave you to that ball of fluff and Natsuki-san."

She took her leave, treading the path they had taken before. She was already out of the park by the time she realised what had caught her attention earlier.

Shizuru never called her bodyguard 'Natsuki-san'. Only 'Natsuki'.

The King of the Mentulae was angry. Yes, he was decidedly angry.

The first reason for his discontent was the news that, while he worked on expanding his empire, one of his cousins had been steadily gaining popularity at home. Ever wary of potential rivals to the throne, the king had immediately dispatched one of his officials to accompany the ones who had stolen away from Court to report the possible usurper. The order was simple: to execute his cousin and any others who might cultivate thoughts of replacing him.

A thankless job, being king. How many challenges to his position had he put down, how many relatives killed? Among them were his mother, two of his brothers, and even some of his own sons-for that was the price for being the Emperor: to be constantly on guard, to distrust everyone, particularly those who were close enough to the royal bloodline to stake a claim. Pretenders to the throne were easy to dispatch, for they had no lineage to boast of... but if the threat came from one whose blood was the same as his, then it was another thing.

Kill them immediately, his father had shown him. Kill them if they start to assimilate power, because it shall be your downfall if you fail to do it. Wise words from the man who had ruled over the Mentulae for nearly half a century-until he was executed by his wife, Obsidian's mother.

Obsidian learned the lesson. He applied it too... by killing the Queen Mother as soon as he reached twenty, sensing correctly that she would never yield the power of the throne to him so long as she lived. Born Artai the Fourth, he immediately adopted the name Obsidian upon his ascension, seeking to distinguish himself from all those before him. He swore to push the boundaries of his empire until it rivalled that of Alexander's, to become the King of Kings, the Great Emperor. He would conquer the North, and having done that, would conquer the South. Such were his dreams as a young sovereign, and so they remained until now-now, that he was not so young, now that he had several dozen offspring of his own and was finally ready to take on the other nations around his territories.

If only it had not taken so long to consolidate his power! He would have begun his plans long before, had he only the strength to do so, but several decades' worth of internecine squabbles among the Mentulae had taken up his time and resources. By the time he had finished subjugating or executing the last dissident, he found himself a grizzled man of sixty-four, still hardy enough for a war or two, yet no longer having the stamina he once had at the beginning of his reign. Then there was the matter of the other powers in the north, the ones who had colonised the areas he had so wanted for himself. How he ground his teeth and cursed his ill-luck that they had arrived first! It would have been a simple enterprise of invasion had they been anyone else. But no, they happened to be among the few that he genuinely feared: they happened to be Himeans .

That wretched nation! Why did it have to be so strong, so terrifying in the breadth of its influence? What did it have that caused the gods to favour it so? Throughout his life, he had listened to the tales of this southern nation's victories, the seemingly endless litany of conquest that her people wrought upon the lands on every side of the Great Sea that was found to the south and east of his own empire-and which the Himeans even had the gall to call "Our Sea". Their Sea indeed! Insufferably arrogant, he thought, wondering why no one ever seemed to have enough strength or determination to repel them. Then he had seen a Himean for the first time, and he understood why.

This had taken place in his twenty-sixth year, on one of his stealthy excursions through neighbouring lands. Seeking to familiarise himself with the loyalties and particularities of those he would one day invade, he travelled under disguise as a merchant, with his bodyguard posing as slaves. They had stopped for refreshment at a small town near Sosia, one of the Himean colonies, when one of the natives informed them excitedly that a legion was passing through and a famous general leading them. Eager to see what Himeans looked like, Obsidian pushed his way through the crowd, only to be frozen at the sight of the Himean soldiers marching perfectly in step. They formed a single, glittering line of red cloaks and flashing armour.

So entranced was he by the sight of those disciplined legionaries that he almost failed to notice the general until the man's horse was nearly in front of him. He stared, startled by the brightness of the golden cuirass, then nearly turned to stone as the man turned his face towards him. He had the impression of an overpowering nobility and unassailable confidence—two things that he had long despaired of. For, King of the Mentulaeans though he was, he knew that many considered him an unsophisticated, blustering barbarian with a sceptre.

This was the crux of his shortcomings and he knew it: he was unsure of himself. A complex man, he was both arrogant and proud, yet terribly insecure. He knew, for one thing, that he was no great general. Oh, he was a great warrior, with that impressive build and height of his, but what was important in commanding armies was to be a great commander, not a great warrior. And he was not the former, he was sure. Hence he had to rely on his advisors and his grown sons and daughters, for they were more knowledgeable about military tactics than he—all the while keeping a close watch on these same people for fear they would take over his crown.

Now that his plans for expansion were finally in motion, he had distributed his armies among him and a number of his sons. One army remained with a favoured son, who was being monitored closely. The purpose of this army was to guard the heart of his empire should anything happen in his absence. Another army went with another favourite son, Calchis, who had been sent to conquer the lands to the north. The last two armies had gone to himself, as well as to his son Artaxi, who had been tasked with beginning the push across the river boundaries of the east by investing the nearest city, Argentum. It was the result of this latter enterprise that had Obsidian gritting his teeth now.

"How could the fool lose?" he bellowed, causing those around him to drop to their knees. "Do you mean to tell me that an army not even half the size of his managed to beat him?"

It took a good while before anyone got up enough courage to answer.

"Perhaps it is also because some of the soldiers with Prince Artaxi fled, My King."

He growled at that.

"Fled?" he echoed. "Where are they now?"

The same man, one of his chief advisors, answered.

"Some of them are here, my lord. They were the ones who brought the news."

The king looked black as night: "Kill the cowards!"

"Yes, My Lord."

"And save some for the ritual sacrifice."

"Yes, Great King."

With a snap of Obsidian's fingers, one of the lower officials left to execute the command. Meanwhile, the King seemed to take on a meditative air, frowning at his golden-slippered feet.

"Himeans..." he mumbled, looking very gruff and grim. He looked up suddenly, bringing the others to attention. "So fast. Are they sure?"

"Yes, My King." The man paused, then ventured further. "They say that there were Otomeians with them, and that they were led by a famous Himean general, one they call Shizuru Fujino."

There was a palpable tension from the presence on the throne-for the king always travelled with a throne-that made the officials' anxiety rise. They waited, hearts pounding, as the king mused over the information and the lines on his brow grew deeper and deeper. Finally, he spoke.

"What do we know of this Shizuru Fujino?"

"Not a great deal, My King," came the answer. "Other than that she is highly esteemed by Himeans and seems to have won many awards, including their so-called co-"

"Spare me the decorations," the king snapped, effectively silencing the speaker. "I mean what do we know about her? What kind of woman is she? Sly? Underhanded? Methodical?"

His advisors exchanged uncomfortable looks.

"So you don't know," he muttered. "Looks like I'll have to see for myself."

He spent a few more moments muttering unintelligible things, then stood up, which brought everyone scrambling to stand as well. He glared at them, all the same.

"What are you standing around for?" he said. "Hurry up and get moving! I want to see this woman for myself before I beat her army to the ground with mine."

So they eventually set out for Argentum, a fearsome host of soldiers and slaves, nobles and nobodies. It was with great pleasure that the king noted their speedy progress, not knowing that it would be considered slow by Himean standards. Past two weeks into their march from the river borders, they finally reached the city and sat themselves before it, on the very spot where Artaxi once made his camp-which had been dismantled by the Himeans. Unwilling to make the first move, Obsidian contented himself with riding at a good distance from the city walls, staring at the curious sight that presented itself.

He had not known what to expect, but he certainly did not imagine anything like what lay before him. He was looking at the product of the Himeans' work, what their general had jokingly referred to as "digging". The walls of Argentum now stood behind three ditches, each one twenty feet wide and possibly just as deep. The first ditch was filled with water, the second with stakes and various sharp implements, and the last with water once again. There were three pathways, each one corresponding to one of the city's gates. All in all, the sight was most forbidding. The King goggled at it, keeping his stunned face away from his attendants. He had never seen such a manner of fortification. What a strange thing!

He had just returned to his army when a messenger rode up. His chief advisor, Lysander, brought the news to him.

"Oh My King," came the fawning tones. "A messenger from the Himeans. They request a parley."

He straightened, drew himself up: "A parley?"

"Yes, Great and Powerful Lord. The Himean general wishes to speak with you."

He narrowed his eyes, chewing his lip in indecision. Finally, he stared at his advisor.

"What do you think, Lysander?"

Lysander stiffened imperceptibly, mind racing.

What a predicament! the advisor was thinking, wondering what would be a safe answer to such a query. If his answer was not to the king's liking, he well knew that the man would not hesitate to have his head lopped off-and judging by the temperament the king had been showing these days, that was a distinct possibility. If he did not answer swiftly enough, it would be lopping off too that was the likely result. He groaned inwardly at the dilemma, measuring his reply in quick, tactical bursts of thought. It was fortunate that he was used to thinking quickly-it was a necessity if you were to survive in the king's court or presence.

"I think, My Lord King, that it would be prudent to accept the parley," Lysander replied, after another moment of rumination. "There is nothing in our accounts of the Himeans to warrant any suspicion that they would resort to attacking you during such an event. They seem to hold it sacred, at any rate, and under the protection of one of their goddesses, whose name is Concord. All the same, the army should be kept at the ready, close by, to be sure. Milord should also take several good soldiers with him, to ensure against any treachery."

The chief advisor held in his breath as his sovereign appeared to consider his words, no expression flickering over his face. Finally, the king ended Lysander's mental agony by nodding and agreeing to the parley.

"When does the Himean want to meet?"

"In an hour's time, Glorious One. At the end of the path through those..." He paused, tried to think of a word to describe them. "Things. Before the southern gates of the city."

"Good. Tell the men to get into formation and be ready. Pick out some good warriors, too. Maybe ten, twenty. Make sure they're horsed."

"At your behest, Majesty."

"Be ready by the time I come back."

As he headed for the enormous tent that housed his effects, the king occupied himself with his thoughts, even while beckoning to four of his slaves to help him put on his royal armour.

Parley, he thought, shrugging off the richly-embroidered robe he was wearing. What do they want or think to achieve with a parley? I wonder if they'll try to strike a deal. But what could they offer me?

Perhaps they would try to offer Artaxi in exchange for leaving Argentum? He laughed aloud at that thought, startling the slaves lacing up his cuirass.

They have a surprise coming for them, by Dagda! he said gleefully to himself. I don't need that idiot son of mine-he always was too impetuous. I wouldn't be surprised if he came after the crown soon! And to lose a battle that disgracefully... Oh yes, I don't want Artaxi anymore. He's just wasted one of my armies, damn fool boy. They can have him.

He sneered, lifting his foot as one slave strapped on his boot.

But I'll take Artaxi, he decided, if they try to offer him . But I'll behead him on the spot. Then I'll take Argentum as we planned. Yes. Yes, good. That's the right idea. I can do that.

His eyes caught his image in the long plate of polished metal-a mirror-that his entourage carried along with his throne whenever he travelled on official business. At the flash of silver and gold from the reflection, he felt suddenly an echo of the memory from his first encounter with a Himean, the awe he had felt at seeing that godlike general. It scratched at his pride as it had again and again for decades. He scowled and brushed it away.

No, he told himself. Never mind those Himeans. What are Himeans, after all? People. They were only people and they could bleed. He himself was going to prove that today.

He grinned, admiring the imposing figure he cut in his armour. He looked every inch a king no matter how much his detractors ridiculed him for being no more than an unlearned savage. For a man of over sixty, he was still a fine specimen: tall and broad-shouldered, thicker than he had been in his younger years but not rotund, most of his weight in solid flesh, and a fine full head of hair. Who could think, upon seeing him, that he was anything less than a king?

I'm the one to fear, he thought, bolstering his confidence with a private monologue. I'll crush them so thoroughly that everyone on the edges of what is going to be Our-not Theirs any longer-Sea will hear of it and tremble. What is this general I'm going to meet, anyway? Just another of their senators, just another of those toga-wearing ponces I've seen parading up and down these parts time and time again, sniffing at every little smell that tickles their delicate noses! Weak, they're weak, they're just riding on their nation's old achievements. They're toga-wearing ponces, that's all they are.

Whereas he was the King of Kings.

Thus it was that when Obsidian set off for the parley an hour later, attended by ten of his most fearsome warriors, he had an aura of overwhelming pride suffusing every part of his person. He and his entourage rode forward, leaving the Mentulaeen army arranged for battle behind them.

Is that the woman? he wondered, spotting the distant figures already at the meeting site. Setting his broad face into as haughty an expression as he could manage, he was nonetheless surprised at the sight that met him as he came close enough to see the figures in detail.

There were two chairs facing each other at the rendezvous place, and one of them was already occupied. Next to this seat stood a tall, dark-haired girl who met his eyes so impassively that he found himself wondering who she was and what her presence meant.

Choice little piece she is, he thought idly, bringing his horse to a stop once close enough. What gorgeous eyes she has, and so noble-looking! Noble, probably. But what a bizarre costume that is. Is that armour?

For a moment he wondered if the girl he was staring at was Shizuru Fujino, but then decided against that notion. After all, if anyone before him was to be the Himean general, it would surely have to be the oddly garbed figure sitting in one of the chairs, waiting for him to take his own seat.

Surely this is the woman.

He considered the figure from his position atop his horse, unable to see her face. The person in the chair was wearing a white, robe-like tunic that reached her knees. A thick, blue-violet cloak had been thrown over her shoulders, one fold pulled up to hood her face. Perhaps to shelter it against the rays of the sun, which was now directly above them at this point, or from the cruel wind blowing on the plain. The cloth stirred with the wind, but did not fall away.

The figure spoke, revealing an accent the king found strange. He had heard Himeans speak before, after all, and his own Court spoke the language. But the odd tones he heard from her were alien to him.

"Greetings, King Obsidian," said the voice, unmistakably that of a woman's. "I am grateful you have chosen to entertain the invitation. Shall you not take a seat, please?"

Obsidian hesitated. To stay on his horse would give him the advantage of being on the higher position, and thus looking down on the other commander. Yet it would also brand him as uncouth if he refused to take up the polite offer, and might even convince the enemy leader that he was truly the savage his critics accused him of being.

Taking another moment to consider the conundrum, he made up his mind and slipped off his mount, gingerly lowering himself to the offered seat—a far too simple one that did not suit his station, he noted with a fair amount of annoyance.

Composing himself and hiding his vexation, he looked at the figure opposite him, but was irked to find that he still could not make out her face. The hood drawn atop the head fell in such a way that part of it hung almost where her eyes should be, and cast a harsh shadow over her features. The only thing he could make out was the mouth: a reddish, beautifully-shaped mouth that was moving as she spoke to him once again.

"Forgive me for the hood, King Obsidian," she was saying to him, a smile seeming to tug at her lips. "But I am rather sensitive to the sun, you see."

He nodded, feeling more certain of himself now.

As I thought, he told himself. She is no more than a fragile woman. Sensitive to the sun! Surely they were wrong about all those claims of her being a great commander. Why, perhaps some other actually generals the troops while she takes the credit!

Putting on his most arrogant air, he leaned forward in his chair and peered at the face under the hood once again. A breeze ruffled the cloth, bringing out a few stray strands of darkly golden hair from beneath it. Still he was unable to see more of the visage itself.

Never mind her face, then . It's probably not worth seeing.

He drew himself up in his seat, speaking in rumbling tones of great self-assurance.

"Shizuru Fujino," he began, adopting a casual expression. "It's a pleasure to be able to meet you here."

"And here I thought it was anything but," she replied smoothly. "What brings you to Argentum in such a manner?"

He blinked at her forthrightness.

"Argentum falls within my territory," he said, after a brief pause to reconsider his opening lines. "I am merely repossessing what is mine."

"Repossessing?" came the easy reply, perfectly polite, yet biting in its content. "Surely you know that Argentum has long been a sovereign state, of itself."

"It is not," he replied, starting to get rattled and ending up speaking more stiffly and with less confidence than intended. Why was the accursed woman so straightforward? He had expected her to work around it more! "Rather, it has been wrested away from the rightful rule of my ancestors. I'm here to restore it to its proper place."

"By sending your son to besiege its city, to tear down its walls?" She sounded amused, curse her! "That is a queer way of restoration, King. Did you mean to restore it to the earth by reducing it to rabble?"

The King of the Mentulaeans scowled, smarting from the verbal barbs.

"My son..." he began, only to trail off, at a loss for what to say. "Artaxi."

"We have him in our custody," she said in voice devoid of malice. "But I am afraid we cannot turn him over to you. He is guilty of waging battle against clients of Hime as well as Hime herself, in my person and that of my army. He is now legally a prisoner of Hime, and shall be held captive for a triumph in our city."

Stunned, the king attempted to recover from this by giving her his fiercest glare.

"It is customary for those who battle with Hime," she said, as if in explanation. "They are brought to the city after losing the battle. One that, in your son's case, he should not have entered."

"Of course he entered battle!" he said, wondering why he was defending the son he had meant to execute earlier. "Was he to stand back meekly in the face of your attack?"

"We were defending the city. When I say entered, I mean started. He attacked Argentum first, King." A pause, then a slow smile. "As I said earlier, for your, um, 'repossession'."

"Argentum tried to resist," he spat, too irritated to calculate his replies any more. "Such foolishness must be taught a lesson."

"Of course they resisted. Argentum is not yours, after all, but theirs. More precisely, it is under the sovereignty of the Argentians, who have ruled their city longer than you yourself have ruled your own lands."

She sighed, further infuriating him.

"Go home, King," came the clear, tranquil voice. "This is a farce you are attempting to achieve."

"I will not go home," he said sharply, his voice growing louder. "Nor will I be ordered about by some woman who can't even show her face to me. What has Hime to do with this? It's between Argentum and me. I repeat, I will not return to my lands!"

To his amazement, the Himean merely chuckled softly.

"You see how you slip up, King," she said. "You say you will not return to your lands, yet did you not claim before that these were part of your lands too? In that case you would already be home at this moment, would you not?"

He stared at her, feeling a vein steadily throbbing in his temple.

"This is not your affair, Himean!" he cried, vexed beyond control.
"You have no part in this!"

"It is Hime's affair, hence mine as well. Are you paying attention at all? Because I have a horrid feeling you shall keep us going around in circles if we keep at this."

That was too much. He clenched both fists.

"You go too far, Woman," he hissed. "Do you think you can defeat me? With that miserable little army within those walls?"

He swept his hand furiously toward his own legions, his famous temper raging beyond control.

"A hundred thousand!" he roared to her. "I have a hundred thousand over there and a hundred thousand more in reserve if need be. I would swallow you up-and Argentum too-in a heartbeat!"

Still the lips beneath that hood retained their smile.

"You may try," she said in that terrible, polite voice. "And you shall fail. As your son tried and failed. These are Himeans you face, King, and Otomeians as well. Not helpless civilians unschooled in the art of war. Your army is nothing, for all its size. Please be reasonable and go home."

"And let them say a mere woman with no face cowed me?" he snarled sarcastically.

She lifted her arms and brought her hands to the veil. He watched, fascinated, as she brought it down, revealing a face that both stunned and horrified him.

Ye gods! he thought, feeling awe shoot up his spine like ice. So much for her face not being worth seeing!

Then he saw her eyes and felt the ice followed by a skittering horror.

Horrible! his mind screamed, as he met the abnormally red gaze. Pink eyes he was familiar with: he had seen albinos before and had even fathered one himself. But her eyes were not pink in any way.

They were red through and through, not a hint of brown in them, a fearsome and fiery, undiluted red. They were bloody in a way his albino son's were not, and he wondered how his advisors had not warned him of this beforehand. Surely people would think to warn you if you were about to face such eyes!

"There," she said cheerfully, never taking away the steel in those frightening eyes. "I show my face to you, King Obsidian. Now that we have settled that, would you listen to reason and run back to your lands? I imagine your court must be unsettled without you present."

He stammered through his reply, having been so disturbed by the mingled admiration and horror her appearance caused in him that he nearly lost all his royal composure.

"You taunt me, General," he said shakily, trying to calm the panic. "I could kill you now! In fact, I think I will-to make sure you do not meddle in our business again."

All this elicited was a menacing change of stance from the figure beside her. The dark-haired girl he had admired earlier started forward, only to be stopped by the general's hand on hers.

What is this?

Eyes narrowing to slits, the king eyed the raven-haired one, only to be met by a glittering emerald gaze that triggered something in the back of his mind. An intuition warned him that there was more beneath her youth and obvious attractions. Looking closer, he shivered as he realised what was hidden in the glitter of this one's eyes: there was a perfect, unflinching killing intent in those depths, sitting behind the veil.

I see, he thought, collecting his self-control. So this girl is no mere girl at all.

The king turned his eyes back to the general, grinning manically.

"Your army cannot reach you in time to save you," he said. "And this single soldier you have with you will not be enough to keep my men from tearing you in half. Your soldiers will be too busy running mad after seeing your head roll to the ground to avenge you. And then we will take them in a rout! You will all die here!"

And still the immaculate creature before him only smiled and smiled and smiled. He felt shudders threatening to wrack his frame as memories of his first awestruck encounter with Himeans returned to him yet again, her perfect lips signalling an awful portent, seeming to him those of a god suffering a posturing mortal.

"You would not be so foolish as to do such a thing," she said patiently, as one would to a child. "Do you think you would achieve anything by killing me?"

She clucked.

"You would not," she stated. "If you killed me, King, you would bring down the wrath of Hime upon you. I am Shizuru Fujino, endowed with my imperium by the Senate and People of Hime, winner of my people's greatest military decoration, and descendant of Venus herself. Think about that, King, for I assure you all of it is true, including the part about my lineage. One of my ancestors was the son of a god! I am not one to prate about my own worth, but I daresay that if you killed Shizuru Fujino here-on parley, too-you would soon find these lands overrun by Himean legions beyond any force you could imagine. And they shall destroy you."

She leaned forward then, pinning him with those awful eyes.

"Do you think Hime would suffer the outrage of my murder?" she asked, now putting the steel in her voice as well. "You would sign your own death warrant by doing such a thing, oh King of Kings, and I would imagine there is little pleasure in ruling an empire from within a grave."

He was pale by the end of her little speech, hands shaking with anger.

"This," he said, attempting to control his voice. "This will be remembered. You will pay for this one day."

She inclined her head as if to acknowledge his threat.

"Now that that is settled," she said, voice soft once more. "I will say it one more time and only one more. These are the orders of Hime, as her People and her Senate have empowered me to speak to you."

She levelled the full strength of her stare at him.

" Go home, King Artai."

He almost gasped, every cord in his thick neck bulging. She had cast the salt into his wounds, choosing to address him with his given name instead of the imperial one he had chosen upon ascension. Damn her, damn her, damn the bitch! Growling in impotent fury, he gritted his teeth and rose to his feet-avoiding her eyes-and then spun on his heel. A few moments more, and he had mounted his horse, his bodyguards following him as he galloped towards his waiting army.

The pair left by the chairs watched as the king and his companions disappeared into the Mentulaean lines. Neither of them said anything to each other until a good while later, when they saw the great army before them begin to move. It took only one look to see what was happening.

King Obsidian was leaving, and he was taking his troops with him.

"This is when they say 'the king stalked off in high dudgeon'," Shizuru finally said, watching them go. "I suppose it was just as well that I decided to hide my face at first. I have always thought it odd how people seem to be disconcerted by my appearance, my eyes in particular. They are just eyes, even if they have an unusual colour. But at least I can use them for purposes such as this."

She exhaled through her nose while enjoying the display of an army in full retreat.

"The King of the Mentulae," she said thoughtfully to her companion. "Such a childish king-a brat in his ambitions. He has more of a healthy fear of Hime than his son, as expected from one of his generation, and I am thankful for that. To be honest I did not expect that he would be the one leading his army this time. But all is well that turns out well, as they say, and we are spared more fighting for now."

She paused, something seeming to have occurred to her.

"He is not too old," she noted. "Still quite young, as far as kings go. And very powerful, for all his uncertainty. It may be easy to cow him now, but we would do well to be wary of him in the future. Do you not think so?"

She looked up at the girl, only to find her frozen, a strange expression on her countenance. Natsuki was scarlet-faced, eyes locked upon something near Shizuru herself. Curious, the older woman followed the direction of her bodyguard's eyes to the arm of her chair, where she found that their hands had somehow laced together.

"Oh, " she said, feeling a little warmth creep into her own cheeks as she looked the other way to hide her face from the younger woman. Yet she did not attempt to loosen her fingers. "Pardon me."

After taking a pause to get herself under control, Shizuru turned back to her companion and flashed a teasing smile.

"I did not know you were so concerned about my welfare earlier that you felt compelled to do this to my hand," she said, even while wondering just which of them had begun to link their fingers this way. "Thank you," she said, wiggling her eyebrows playfully.

"I duh-duh-did not," the girl stuttered insensibly, to her amusement. "No, I-"

"You?"

"Thuh-that..."

Face still flushed, Natsuki gave up trying to come up with a coherent explanation and attempted to retract the trapped hand instead. She stopped, however, when the older woman's grip tightened. Surprised by this action, she turned her eyes to Shizuru, whose face was turned to the field before them again.

Natsuki stared.

"Rest easy and stay here for a while, Natsuki," the older woman said softly, trying not to sound as nervy as she felt. "The others shall be coming out shortly. But for now... let us stay here for a while."

Vocabulaire:

1. Aegis cape - An effect often attributed to be in Athena's use; a cape that scatters men and women in rout when it is spread before them, particularly in battle. It carries elements of Fear, Discord and Panic
2. Cunnus, cunni - Latin obscenity, a slang word for the female genitalia.
3. "Ecastor!" - Latin exclamation used by women. It is acceptable even in 'proper' company. The male equivalent is "Edepol!"
4. Libation - More a Greek practice than a Roman one, it means spilling some drops from your wine cup as an offering to the gods.
5. Plebeian - Anyone who is not patrician by birth. This is a person not noble in the sense of having traditionally aristocratic lineage, but who may still be noble in the sense of having rich/old families. Regarding the latter, it means that many plebeians are aristocratic in their own right, though not by descent from traditional 'blue-blooded' or patrician families.
6. Praefectus fabrum - A civilian put in charge of managing/acquiring the army's provisions and necessities; in this story, it is Takumi Tokiha.

7. Sestertius [s.], s estercii/sesterces [pl.] - A common Roman coin; made of silver. 25,000 of it make a silver talent.

8. Sol Indiges, Tellus, Liber Pater - Ancient deities invoked by the Romans when they wanted to make an especially binding oath.

9. Tace! - Latin for "Shut up!"

10. Verpa - Latin obscenity that refers to the male genitals when erect.

"So they just up and left?"

Toshi laughed at the incredulous face of his companion.

"Yes," he replied, thoroughly enjoying his role as story-teller and the reflected glory from their commander's doings in it. He had a suspicion he would be telling this particular story for the rest of his life, so unbelievable was it. "Oh, I couldn't believe it either! But our scouts shadowed them and it turns out they betook themselves all the way back to the river and across it, then kept going." He grinned, took a swig of wine. "Suppose Obsidian thought it would be safer to expand closer to his northern borders instead of the eastern ones after all."

The other legate shook his head, mouth still open.

"And you say you didn't have to lift a sword?" he asked Toshi. "All Fujino-san did was talk to them-him, rather?"

"Yes."

"Jupiter!"

"You can say that again."

Taro shook his head again in disbelief, lifting his cup to his mouth as the other did the same. They were in Toshi's room, telling each other of events that had transpired during the time the two halves of the Himean army had been separated. It was the younger legate who had come knocking on the older man's door for a recap of the dealings in Argentum-over a bottle of the best local wine, of course. He had just arrived a few hours earlier with the other half of Shizuru's army, which she left in Otomeia under his and the primipilus Nao Yuuki's care.

Following the general's orders to continue drilling the legionaries in Otomeia, their half of the army had been waiting eagerly for action ever since the general marched off to Argentum. They had thus welcomed the orders for them to move out-which they received at around the same time Obsidian had his parley with their commander. That had been some weeks ago. After a brilliantly short and successful engagement with the Mentulaeans at Stych Gorge, they had pushed on to Argentum only to find a thriving city with nary an enemy soldier before it and stories of their general's doings buzzing on every tongue.

"So I'm afraid you've already missed out on the battle," Toshi chuckled, wiggling his eyebrows at his younger friend. "I was amazed too, Taro, I can tell you that."

"It's unbelievable, still!" cried Taro, a hand clutching his head. Well, there went his chances of getting in some prime glory for the win at the gorge! No matter how well his half of the army had done, it could hardly compare to the general's recent achievements-both of which would surely enter the annals of Himean military history. Oh, it was hard to keep up with the woman!

"So, it's like this," he said, still coming to grips with what his friend was saying. "First you tell me that you ate up an army four times your size with a miraculously small number of casualties and now you're telling me that the general sent another one off on her own? With mere words?"

Toshi nodded, a smug smile on his face. "She's a force, isn't she?"

"If anything!"

Taro lifted his cup after this exclamation and stared thoughtfully into the liquid swirling inside it, setting it down with a shiver after realising that it reminded him of the general's eyes in shadow.

Wicked colour for eyes to have, he thought to himself, before making another remark. "One would think that the goddess had spread her aegis-cape behind Fujino-san. To be able to scare Obsidian off without a single blow!"

"Oh, I don't know," his friend replied, rubbing the stubble on his face and making a mental note to shave it later. "I wouldn't say she didn't strike a single blow. I've since learned from being around her and the others that Fujino -san doesn't necessarily have to resort to using brute force when she wants to strike."

"Yes, that's true, actually..." Taro mumbled, before holding out his hands in exasperation. "But it just doesn't make sense! If she did do as you say-came out to meet him with only that girl of hers with her-why in god's name didn't he take the chance and kill her? And why would he actually back down after what she said? These savages don't stick to the rules of parley, so why should he have respected it now? He did have the advantage of numbers too, you know!"

"So did the Prince Artaxi, and look where he is now."

"Oh, that one's a dimwit," Taro returned. "I don't think they'd make the same mistakes he did after that, do you?"

Toshi sighed before answering.

"No," he said. "They wouldn't. But, see, I don't know war and weaponry all that well just yet, so I'm not going to talk to you about that. What I do know is politics. Fujino-san's threats to that King of theirs weren't idle ones, just so you know! If he had touched her, I have no doubts that the Mentulae would soon find themselves under attack from all the Himean legions around Our Sea. Let savages murder a patrician Fujino and commander of our legions? She was right when she said it: much though some of the senators dislike her, Hime wouldn't take her death sitting down."

"I see it now," Taro said. "Yes, that's true. The whole of Senate would cry foul, even those most opposed to her. Well, good old Obsidian might not be privy to the currents back home as we are, but it's fair enough to say that he probably caught the tone of truth from her. Fujino-san has a knack of making you believe everything she says."

He exhaled and finished: "So he was afraid of getting put on Hime's chopping block, was he?"

"Smart of him to be."

"Oh, definitely."

"Besides, Fujino-san told me that she expected him to be more wary of us than his son," Toshi added. "It makes sense. He's an older man, and probably lived to see or hear about some of the last wars Hime waged around Our Sea. Pretty well into the past-the king must've been just a brat then-but I imagine it'd have made a good impression on him. His sons didn't know any big Himean wars until we got here, I bet."

"I took a look at the one you have here, anyway," Taro harrumphed, frowning in distaste. "And he's a regular idiot, isn't he?"

"Imagine what Harada-san has to put up through when he starts screaming-he usually calls for her by name, just to complain and spew threats again."

The two men shared a dry look, then drank from their cups at the same time.

"So how was Stych Gorge? You haven't told me all that much about it yet."

Taro smiled wryly: "Not much to tell. We sent them packing, as per the general's orders."

"Why the face?" the other asked, catching the change of expression. "You don't seem to have suffered any great number of dead either."

Taro drained his cup mutely, then reached for the wine jug to refill it.

It was true it was partly the fact of the general's recent accomplishments having eclipsed his own victory that was souring his face-but there was another thing. How to put it to his friend, however?

"You know that the general left me in charge with Yuuki-san as support?" Taro said, finally.

Toshi nodded.

Taro sighed, ran a hand through his hair.

"Oh," he blew out. "How do you say this?"

A curious look: "Just say it."

Taro looked at the older legate uneasily, then clucked.

"All right, but it can't go further than the two of us," he warned. "I don't think I'd like anyone else hearing this... even the other legates."

His friend squinted, the warm brown eyes sparkling with interest.

"Right, then," the older man said, to soothe his friend's unease. He straightened in his seat. "By Sol Indiges, Tellus, and Liber Pater, I swear that no word you speak shall go beyond this room, My Friend."

Taro nodded again, a slight smile on his pleasant, almost-boyish face.

"I'd believe you even without that oath." He paused and lowered his voice. "It's this... I don't exactly feel comfortable with that woman."

Toshi wrinkled his brow, looking gravely disapproving: "Of Fujino-san?"

"Oh, no!" Taro was horrified by the idea. "Of course's not! I'm talking about the chief primipilus of the Ninth Legion."

"Yuuki-san?"

"That's her."

"Why?"

Taro paused, then pushed out a huffed breath that his own nose registered as heavy with the scent of alcohol. He twisted his lips into a grimace.

"She's quite barbaric, isn't she?" he said.

"Barbaric?"

"First, there's the way she talks."

Toshi grinned crookedly.

"I didn't take you to be such an old lady, Taro," he said.

Taro scowled at him.

"Come on, doesn't it bother you a little?" he said. "She talks like-like any of the rankers would, and in front of us! There's no respect there!"

"She's just a soldier. It's natural and it's how they talk normally."

"She's not just any soldier. She's a damned top-grade centurion, chief of the centurions of one of our most decorated legions, at that. Not to mention someone Shizuru-san asks into the command tent often for council. You'd think she'd have enough gratitude to get a little polish!"

The older man rested his elbows on the table and folded his hands; he dropped his chin on the interlocked fingers.

"All right, then. It used to catch me off guard, I admit," he said pensively. "But I guess I've become used to it. Yuuki-san is a little brusque. But no more than some of the other soldiers, I think, and if the general can forgive her roughness, I think we can all afford to do the same. Besides, from what the others have told me, her lack of polish doesn't get in the way of her abilities."

Taro sent him a dry look. "It doesn't, I can assure you."

"Oh?" Toshi blinked. "What happened in Otomeia? Or in Stych Gorge?"

There was a short silence, broken only by the sound of the younger legate's gulping down wine. Having drained the cup again, Taro set it onto the table with a sharp thud and looked the other man in the eye.

"The general said I was in command and should be supported by Yuuki-san," he started, licking his lips. "And that was supposed to be how it was. But the primipilus makes me so edgy, Toshi-san. Such an overbearing sort of woman-won't listen to anything that goes against what she wants or thinks is right. She doesn't even have the civility to consider anyone else's ideas carefully or tell you why you might be wrong in courteous terms. Just out and slams you."

"I take it you didn't see eye to eye?"

Taro looked aggrieved.

"The worst of it," he said, "was that the soldiers treated her like she was the one with full command! Because that was the thing, you know, that obliged me to put up with her, more than Fujino-san's order that we work together: the Ninth's soldiered with Yuuki-san as its primipilus for years and years already. They know her, not the way they know me! Who's to say she'd not have started a mutiny if I'd rubbed her wrong when we'd discuss what to do and where?"

The other turned incredulous eyes towards him.

"Surely she'd not do that!" Toshi cried. "Yuuki-san's a decorated primipilus, you know, and partly due to her loyalty!"

"Oh, I wouldn't put it past her," came the vexed response. "And do you know, I think she even got some of the others in on it, on questioning me, I mean. Once, I even told Takumi-san-our praefectus fabrum, Senator Tokiha's brother, you know-to do something for me, and he even asked me if Yuuki-san was aware of it! But they didn't ask that when Yuuki-san was the one telling them to do something, did they? I only ever found out about half of the things she did afterwards, after they'd already been done or were being done!"

"So did you talk to her about it?"

Taro growled, "I tried."

"Tried?"

"I told you, that woman makes me uncomfortable ." He stretched an arm over the table and began to refill his cup once again. "I asked her about it, but she just smiled that awful grin of hers and said that she was sure these were the things I would have wanted done, sooner or later."

Toshi chuckled softly.

"I wouldn't say it's an awful grin, " he said, displaying his own smile at the surprised Taro. "That Yuuki-san has a pretty face. She's still very young as far as top-ranked centurions go, isn't she?"

Taro nodded, a little vexed by his friend's response.

"All right," he nevertheless allowed. "So it's not awful in that sense. But it looks so sly ."

"So what about these orders of hers, were they good or bad?"

"If you talk about that, they're fine. But she still shouldn't have gone behind my back!"

"What-she tried to keep them secret from you afterwards?"

"No, not exactly," the other admitted with reluctance. "But I might have had a problem with some of them, you know, and it's still protocol to tell your superior officer," he grumbled sullenly, swishing the wine in his cup.

Toshi took a sip of his own drink. He was aware that some of the other senatorial officers were also somewhat uneasy with the chief primipilus, although mostly because of the occasional bursts of sharpness she had in her personality, which could fluctuate like a flag in a storm. The woman had a notoriously cutting tongue, as well as a shifty way of eyeing a person that set most people on edge. True, she was naturally amusing in her unpolished way and could fit well into a party when camaraderie was required-but at times, particularly when dealing with people she disliked or felt a general irritation for, she seemed so tremendously predatory. And the change into a predator could come so quickly that it was frightening.

And she is barbaric in that sense, he thought. Whereas the general had a similar trait of intimidation, she was able to discipline it to the extent that it would show only in her eyes. A strangely civilised sort of intimidation. Nao Yuuki, however, simply let her entire stance show it when she was angry: the danger radiated from her as from an unsheathed blade. Someone of Taro's personality would truly be set back, something that would wound the high pride he held, not only for his office but his family's status as one of the older plebeian clans. The latter quality actually complicated the matter.

It was no secret that the primipilus had a general aversion to people of status-although she did make certain exceptions if the person proved his or her worth, some examples being the general and the chief legate. If it was someone she had not worked with before, however, it was understandable if the centurion would choose to disregard the person for the most part... especially if that person was unable to meet her standards.

Or so Harada-san told me, Toshi thought to himself. And she would know.

"What of Stych Gorge?" he prodded. "What happened in the battle? I heard that Fujino-san didn't send you any instructions, other than to eject the Mentulae there. I'm guessing you and Yuuki-san drew up your own strategy, then."

He received a glum stare. "You mean she drew it up."

"What?"

"She did it," Taro replied, frowning. "Most of it, anyway. I tried to offer my ideas, but she just kept finding fault with them, then ordered everyone around and ignored me, all the while telling them that her orders were really mine. How am I supposed to enjoy taking credit for that, then?"

"Ah."

"I'm the damned legate," Taro continued, growling softly. "I'm the one supposed to be in the command tent and drawing up the battle plans. That, at least, is where we're supposed to be above the centurions, no matter how much Fujino-san loves them. Yuuki-san may be a primipilus, but she's still a soldier of the army under us. Under me."

Toshi studied his friend.

There's something else, isn't there? he mused, stroking his chin. Taro rarely spoke in such a careless way. Perhaps it was the wine: the man might have had too much to drink by now. And then there was the matter of pride, too. Both things could get a man drunk on vexation very quickly.

Well, Toshi decided, he might find out what it was soon and he might not. He coughed and lifted his cup to drink again, only to find that it was empty. He reached for the jug, which Taro pushed towards him.

"Anyway, I'm guessing Yuuki-san is keeping the general up to date as well, like you're doing with me," he mumbled to the younger man. "Did the general tell you to talk to her later? She went off for a walk with Harada-san and Yuuki-san first, didn't she?"

"Mm." Taro twisted his mouth and shrugged. "Well, Yuuki-san will probably fill her in, like you say. I wonder what she's telling them."

Toshi noted that, although he did his best to look nonchalant, his friend looked worried.

---

"Nice place they have here."

"I am glad you approve. I myself find it refreshing and have come once or twice just to walk about."

"That's an understatement. She comes here every day, Nao."

The chief of the primipilii laughed and looked about.

"Aren't a lot of people, though," she noted.

Chie followed her friend's gaze, her own eyes alighting on a trio of Argentians walking along the park's routes and glancing at them. She sighed and lifted her eyebrows at the mist from her breath.

"That's because it's getting dark," she said, brushing her hair out of her eyes and looking up at the sky, which was indeed turning a dark grey. "And it's been getting colder these past days."

Nao snorted, which brought the legate's eyes back to her.

"After where I've been stranded for the past weeks, I'll say this is warm as a bleeding rug," she muttered.

"Forgive me for that, Nao-han," the general said, smiling apologetically. "Has it been intolerable up there?"

The primipilus shook her head.

"I was just kidding, General," she replied, piercing green eyes twinkling with humour. "I'm just glad to be in a warmer place, that's all. It is warmer here, isn't it?"

"At this much lower altitude? Gods, yes!" Chie answered. "After all, where you've been-Otomeia, that is-is so high up in the mountains. Though I think the snows will be coming here soon, too."

"I know. The cold's been following us." Nao shifted in her seat, then fixed the fourth member of the party with a furtive look. "Makes me wonder how you can stand it, Na-tsu-ki, being a summer child and all."

The others watched to see if the girl would rise to the bait, but were disappointed. She merely turned a chilly glare to Nao and looked away haughtily afterwards.

"Anyway, what were we talking about before this?" Nao asked. "I forgot, I'm sorry. You know how I am."

"You just finished telling us about Stych Gorge," the senior legate prompted. "And a good job that was, by the way."

"Yes, very efficiently done, Nao-han," came the general's voice. "I knew I could rely on you."

"Oh, it's piddle when compared to what you've been doing here, General," Nao replied honestly. "Wish I'd been here to help."

"You did help, just on a different field. The legions look wonderfully fit too, and I have you and Taro-han to thank for that."

Nao's face changed, shifted closer to the feral, nasty expression it often had when in battle.

"That reminds me," she said grimly. "I have to talk to you about the legate, General, if you'll give me permission."

Shizuru gave it. Nao looked both uneasy and disgusted as she started talking.

"It's damned bad form, this," she said. "I know that, General. No officer should be talking like this about his superior officer. But I'm hoping you'll see why I'm taking the risk, though you could let me go with a dishonourable discharge if I keep going."

Shizuru cut her off.

"No fear of that," she said. "Speak your mind."

"It's like this," the other replied after another uneasy look. "I don't want him commanding the Ninth, if you can see your way to giving us a different superior officer. They're good boys and girls in my legion, General-you know that! They've given you good service time and time again and they'll give good service each time you ask. But Taro's just, well, he's not good enough. He's fine for normal service if you put him in with someone like Kenji-san or Shohei-san-by Dis, I think even Suou-san'd do the job, even if I don't know her all that well yet!"

"What, no mention of me?" Chie interrupted, prompting Shizuru to laugh.

"All right, and Harada too, naturally," Nao continued, unfazed. "But his strategies just aren't the sort I'd trust, you know what I mean? Line up here, stiffen the flanks there-just, well, it's all pretty obvious, is that the word?"

"Textbook," Shizuru smiled. "You are trying to say he is a textbook commander."

"That's it, General."

"I know," Shizuru said, drawing the other women's eyes to her. "Or it would be better to say I suspected it. Still, I had hoped that he would do better if put in a position where he would be forced to bring out his more creative side. He is not actually a fool, after all, and can be relied on quite well for challenges in other areas, such as in politics. I hoped he would show the same ability to extend himself beyond the norm if obliged by circumstances to do it. Apparently, it did not work."

She flicked her eyes quickly to the heavens, a kind of shrug.

"Well, I knew you would not let him fail one way or another, even if he did fall short personally," she told her primipilus. "In which case I should tell you now. Very well done with Stych Gorge. I am certain most of it was you, going from what you have just told me."

Nao looked properly embarrassed, losing her slouch as the soldier in her snapped to attention on her seat.

"It was nothing, General," she said.

"Any other complaints?"

The redhead looked sheepish.

"Just one, begging your pardon for it, General," she confessed awkwardly.

"What is it?"

"Well... see, this one's a bit embarrassing."

"Oh, speak freely, Nao-han, do!" Shizuru grinned. "Given our time campaigning together, I thought you would have known me enough by now to know that I know you."

All three of them laughed at the circuitously phrased statement, Nao unbending enough to begin to slouch again.

"It's about the Mentulae we trounced at the gorge," she said. "See, we dismantled their makeshift camp-poorly done thing it was, too. Anyway, it turns out they were carrying some nice bags of gold with them and a few precious other things. Stuff that belonged to their command, I bet. A proper little sum, actually. Lots of nice silverware and fancy stuff too. Plush!"

"I see. And that booty is now where?"

"With our praefectus fabrum," the centurion said, exhaling with contentment. "I thought it'd help if we came to chewing on our bootstraps here, just in case those verpa back home try to prolong our stay here without adding to the war chest. And it's your army's booty, General. Should be used for it."

"You are a woman after my own heart, Yuuki-han."

"But," Chie interrupted. "What does that have to do with Taro-san?"

"I was getting to that," Nao smirked, red lips turning up into an acidic smile. "See, he tried to take it when we found it. Said he would keep it with him, for safety." A loud snort, sharp and cracking in the cold air. "Safety, my bleeding eye! You can say I'm imagining things, but you know I've never been one to put a gloss on shit to cover the stink. What I mean is, I didn't like that look on his face then, like someone who'd dug up treasure in his yard."

She paused, then lifted a shoulder uncomfortably, getting it to pop.

"It's fine for a commander to get rich from a campaign," she went on, warming to her subject with a fury. "Rights to the spoils and sestercii, and all. But it's another thing to keep it all for yourself when the army could be having problems with funding in the future. You talked to us about it, Fujino-san! You told all of your old campaigners, the legates and me too! Now I don't know if you'll believe me or agree with me on this, but I thought that damn well meant that the legates had to be a little less grabby than usual practice for a while, just to make sure we all get through this mission them stingy senators put us in. And I would've thought that've been fine: we all know how much of the booty you give up, even part of what's rightly yours, after each campaign, just so you can make sure everyone gets to go home rich and stuffed in the pockets. But that dog would've kept it all for himself. I saw it in his face. Damn his itchy fingers-he even took one of the bags of gold and some of the bits, you know, before turning over the rest to me and telling me to have the praefectus fabrum catalogue it. Oh, I let that go, to settle him, but I couldn't let him take the rest!"

She scowled, brow dark as the sky above them once she was done.

"He's been pretty stand-offish ever since, you know," she said. "Like I care. Let him rot on his fucking high horse!"

There were a few moments of silence, during which the three seated members of the party eyed each other thoughtfully. Nao stared at the general with a pleading eye, waiting for her answer.

"All right, Nao-han," the fair-haired woman said at length. "I believe you, and trust that your testimony was tendered with everyone's interests at heart. No one can fault you for this."

The centurion smiled crookedly at her in relief.

"Yes, you did the right thing," Shizuru said. "I confess I had my doubts about Taro-han in that respect as well-he's always had a certain weakness for money, in my opinion-but had no concrete evidence to base it upon. Well, it takes something like this to expose it, I suppose. In any case, how many people know that you refused to allow him to have all of the gold in his keeping?"

"Just the two of us... though I can't be sure. We were arguing about it during camp, in the command tent."

"I see."

Chie groaned loudly, deeming it high time she was back in the conversation.

"Why is it so hard to find good officers these days?" she grumbled. "Most of them don't even have the discretion to set aside some of the plunder for the army's expenses or the soldiers' benefit. Taro had better hope the legions don't get wind of it. They won't love him much as a commander after that."

"Not that they love him all that much, to begin with," Nao scoffed. "Never mind, that's over with."

She looked to Shizuru again.

"I wanted to ask what your plans were, General. I'm sure you don't plan on snoring it up here in Argentum, especially now that you've sent the Mentulae scooting off with a scolding-I still can't get over that, by the way."

"I was here to see it, and I still can't get over it either, Yuuki," Chie laughed. She stretched her legs out happily. "Oh, it was nice to see the Mentulae running away with their tails between their legs!"

"Why not? They don't have anything else hanging there."

"Oh, Jupiter- face!" the legate cried to Nao, even while joining in the general's laughter. "I swear that mouth of yours gets dirtier each year."

"I'll take that as a compliment, Legate," said the centurion. "So what about it, General? What's on the schedule?"

Shizuru tipped her head and bent over, picking up a stick by her feet. She held it in her hand and used it to trace patterns in the gravel as she considered for a moment. The other two watched her quietly, well-used to her little eccentricities.

"You probably know what I am planning, Nao-han," she said softly. "But I must ask a question of you first. I shall be taking a tour of Sosia and Argus, so as to inspect and strengthen their defences-as well as to assess how they are doing in other respects, of course. The Senate did entrust me to look them over, even if only to report back to the House whether the regular accounts we receive, back in Hime, are res ficta or res facta . You know how the senators at home are always worried that the accounts being sent to us by the governors are more literary than literal. So, my seeing to this shall be standard procedure."

Her companions nodded.

"Given the present state of affairs, now is the perfect time to undertake this proceeding, since Obsidian and the Mentulaean army have moved back into their side of the border," she went on.

"According to our reports, they are presently engaged in expanding further north, and shall be occupied there for some time. So Argentium as well as our territories do not stand in any immediate danger for the moment, and I can afford to go about and do my other tasks."

She stopped drawing and dropped the twig in her hand, straightening her seat.

"So what I would like to know, is whether you would prefer to come with me or stay here, as part of Argentum's garrison."

The centurion looked surprised, dropped her eyes as she mulled it over.

"What would you prefer I do, General?" she asked after a while.

Shizuru lifted her hands, the palms up as she shrugged elegantly.

"There is a reason I am giving you a choice," she told the other woman. "I would not like to influence your answer. Either choice is fine for me."

"Still," Nao insisted, obviously amused by the general's reluctance to state her own preferences. "I'd rather know, General."

Shizuru tipped her head demurely.

"Well then," she started, her eyes shut. "I would be happy if you stay in Argentum, since I would be then relieved of a great burden. If it so happens that the city comes under attack while I am away, I would be secure in the knowledge that it is someone of great skill who shall defend it for as long as may be necessary before I can return with the rest of the army. After all, Argentum would most likely be the first city they would hit if ever they did hit anything. Recent experience as well as the lay of the land justifies this idea."

"Then again," she continued. "I would be happy if you choose to come with me instead. The assessment and building up of fortifications and military camps is part of my aims, and this would be done far more quickly if I had someone as knowledgeable as you with me, to share the burden. Furthermore, there is the matter of having to prepare and inspect local militia in the provinces, something in which you have always excelled. Another relief to me if you were present, and with your legion."

Nao started chortling.

"It's awful how you reply without really giving me an answer, Fujino-san," the primipilus sighed, her eyes dancing. "So, I'll just make up my mind for myself, like you wanted. I'll join you, if it's all the same to you."

Shizuru gave her a bright smile in response.

"Always glad to have you on board, Yuuki," Chie said, grinning too. "So, Shizuru-san, when are we leaving?"

"Day after tomorrow, Chie-han. I shall make the dispositions then, as well."

"All right!" the legate cheered, getting up. "I'm feeling pretty famished. I think I'll go have some dinner at that nice little inn I found the other day. It's nearby. Wonderful roasts they do there: you know the type, with the skin still crispy and just a bit of fat running under the meat. Are you coming?"

The general declined.

"I think I'll stay here and enjoy the fresh air a while longer, Chie-han," she replied.

Nao got to her feet.

"I'm hungry too," she said, patting her torso's lower section for effect. "And I wouldn't mind pouring a few libations right now-I'm feeling religious," she said, with a smirk at Chie, who well knew her to be an unreligious rascal.

"Then I bid you two to enjoy your dinner," Shizuru replied, grinning. "Have a good evening."

The two returned her farewell and started walking away. As soon as they were out of earshot, Nao clucked to her friend, who looked at her with a question.

"I thought you said The Sphinx was talking now?" the centurion said in accusation. "Here I was expecting something shocking, and not one peep."

Chie rubbed the back of her neck.

"I said she was talking-not chattering away," she told her friend. "Besides, the only one she really talks to is Shizuru-san."

"Hmph." After a few more steps, the primipilus spoke up. "What's with that, anyway?"

"What?"

"You know. That."

"What are you talking about?"

Nao took her time before answering, shaking her head as though exasperated at the other woman's inability to understand her.

"When Fujino-san goes on her walks, like you said, does she bring someone else along or is it just that girl?" she asked.

The legate's steps slowed slightly.

"Well, most of the time it's just them. But that's because Natsuki-san's her bodyguard, so she has to go with her, doesn't she?"

"Huh. Around what time does she take her-their walks?"

"I don't know. Usually this time, I guess, going on nightfall." Chie stopped walking at the sound of her friend's huff. "What, don't tell me you still don't trust her, Nao-she saved Shizuru-san's life, for heaven's sake. I told you."

"It's not that," Nao snapped, looking irked. "Don't be dense, Chie. I don't distrust her that much-and I don't dislike her, just so you know. The kid's all right," she said with a grudging tone. "She's fine."

They stood staring into each other's eyes for a moment, trying to decipher the other's expression. Finally, Nao looked away and started walking again, the senior legate joining her.

"So then," Chie said, listening to the music coming from a nearby pub, where a glance inside the window showed some musicians playing some local dirty ditties for the customers. "What's on your mind? Why so many questions about Shizuru-san and Natsuki-san?"

"Funny how you say their names together immediately, isn't it?"

"What?"

The primipilus sighed with immense forbearance.

"And here you've spent more time with them than I have," she muttered, before giving a short laugh. "I'll say it straight out, then: don't you think they're getting cosy, the general and that girl of hers?"

Chie's eyebrows went up as head snapped to Nao.

"Are you implying what I think you are?" she demanded.

"You thinking what you think I'm implying?"

They peered at each other, the steady rhythm of their footsteps never faltering. A group of legionaries obviously out to enjoy a night in town hailed them with salutes, and they broke their eye-lock to return the greetings as they passed. After the soldiers had gone, they resumed their discussion.

"See now. You wouldn't even take my words to mean that if you hadn't thought about it, yourself, Chie."

"Shizuru-san..." Chie started, trailing off as she thought over her words. "No. Shizuru-san isn't the type to start things like that, you know. She's never been, and gods know how many opportunities she's had, on campaign or off it."

"Did those opportunities look like that girl?" Nao retorted. "Jupiter's cock, Chie, have you seen her face?"

"Even so!" Chie snapped back, thoroughly disturbed by the notion. "Shizuru-san wouldn't, I think. Highly irregular for her and you know it!"

She ran a hand through her hair, adding: "She doesn't get into things like that. Ever."

"No?" Nao pulled her cloak about her. "You sure?"

Chie threw her an adamant look.

"Fine," Nao said, throwing up both hands. "Fine. I know she doesn't. But that doesn't mean it can't happen. And don't you tell me you didn't notice she's not been all that regular with the girl from the start, anyway. I've been watching them ever since I got here and it's damned out there. Are you going to tell me it's absolutely impossible?"

Chie looked pensive.

"That..." she murmured. "It's just a possibility, I guess. Not a likely one. But of course it's possible."

"It's what it is. I'm telling you, I'd even make a bet on it."

This brought on a short silence that the senior legate ended.

"If it's true," she said quietly. "It would be a surprise."

"I'll say!"

Nao kicked a pebble in her path, smiling as it flew neatly into a barrel lying on its side on the street. She smirked suddenly, as though a thought had just occurred to her.

"Hey, now. Look here, wouldn't it be interesting if some half-mute girl from the barbarian north wins the most-eligible bachelorette in Hime?" She started laughing. "Oh, those stuck-up cunni back home would roar to see Shizuru Fujino with a foreigner-shit, it'd be priceless!" she snorted, still laughing heartily. "Someone finally makes her fall and it's a barbarian!"

"Shhh! Would you be quiet, you ass? And even if that happened..." Chie said, unable to help smiling a little at her friend's mirth. "Anyway, you shouldn't say anything about 'falling' and all that stuff. Even if you're right and our general's having her already, like you say, it doesn't mean we're talking about-well, that!"

Nao peered at her, an eyebrow lifted disbelievingly.

"What makes you think," said the centurion. "We're not talking about that?"

She stared the senior legate in the eyes as if daring her to say something.

---

The general watched her officers leaving, smiling fondly at them as they got farther away. She then turned her attention back to her remaining companion-only to find that the younger woman was occupied with watching the parting Himeans' backs as well, although with rather more seriousness. She let this observation go on for a little longer, then chose to break the girl from her concentration.

"Dear me," she exclaimed, drawing Natsuki's attention. "You are looking at them so intently, Natsuki. Should I be jealous?"

As per usual, Natsuki blushed. Shizuru laughed at the occurrence that was growing more and more common, giving the girl a friendly pat on the arm to calm her. Instead of dropping her hand afterwards, however, she gripped Natsuki's arm and pulled her around from behind the bench, leading the younger woman to take a seat beside her.

"So," she said cheerfully. "Shall you tell me what you find so interesting about them?"

The girl took her time replying, apparently still rattled.

"The centurion," the girl began, then trailed off as she pondered over what to say. "No, the primipilus..."

Shizuru lifted her eyebrows curiously. She chose to speak after the girl continued to show signs of hesitation about going on.

"You mean Yuuki-han, Natsuki?"

A nod.

"She is not, um." Another internal struggle, the girl wrestling with her uncertain tongue. "She is not-not just a legionary."

She paused, then looked questioningly at Shizuru as if to ask the older woman to either confirm or deny it.

"You are quite observant," the Himean said, nodding to show that she understood. "How did you know?"

The girl considered it, mouth turning up very slightly on one side.

"The stance," she said. "The walk. So quiet."

She cocked her head and squinted at Shizuru.

"Always," she said, "such vigilance."

"Ah." Shizuru smiled. "I see now. Nao-han is not just a normal soldier, as you say, Natsuki. You mean that she has received training in another field, do you not?"

Natsuki nodded, loosening a silky lock of hair behind her ears. The older woman watched her tuck it back.

"Yes, the primipilus is more than an ordinary soldier," she explained.

"She used to be-and sometimes still serves purposes similar to it-an intelligencer of no mean talent. She comes from the Sulpician territories of Hime. You are familiar with them?"

The dark-haired girl gave her a slight smile, a knowing look coming to her eyes.

"I read," the girl said shortly. "You call them... 'spies'?"

"Yes," Shizuru said. "There are some schools there known for producing excellent professional spies, intelligence gatherers, really. They receive special training and often end up joining the legions as parts of a small unit that the army sometimes calls on to do extra intelligence work to supplement the scouts. They also usually make up the torture detachment. Someone picked her up from there long ago and asked her to be a centurion. She joined the army officially, soon after that. When I met her, she was already a superb army officer as well as training marshal." She sighed reminiscently. "That was a long time ago, or so it seems."

She smiled at her companion.

"She is a very good warrior," she told her. "As I am sure you can already tell, given such perceptiveness. Are you interested in sparring with her, perhaps?"

The girl lifted an eyebrow as if the thought had never occurred to her. She shook her head, to Shizuru's surprise.

"Really?" The general smiled. "I would have thought you would be interested in it, Natsuki, even if only for the sake of testing yourself. After all, Nao-han once expressed her interest in sparring with you and your daos. But then, I think she wanted to try to learn how to use your weapon too, after she saw how you could wield it."

The Otomeian looked down at her side, where the instrument in question hung from her belt. She lifted the many loops of the chain, setting the metal clinking.

"You-" She stopped, brought her head up shyly. "Do you want to?"

The general's eyes widened.

"You would show me?" she asked, provoking a quick nod from the younger woman. "Then let us have a look. I confess I have been consumed with curiosity about those things too."

They got to their feet and stepped away from the bench, making their way to the middle of the clearing in the park. Upon reaching it, they looked around.

"It is well that there is no one else about," Shizuru noted, checking their surroundings in the dim light. "I did not realise that we were talking for so long. It is well into the night now."

She felt a slight shiver as the wind bit at her skin, the fine hairs on her arms standing to attention. She folded her arms around her waist.

Suddenly her companion ran off.

"Why-where are you going?" she said, startled.

The other had headed back to the bench. It occurred to Shizuru suddenly that she rarely saw Natsuki run, and seeing it now made her smile.

Could it be that she is actually excited to teach me, she wondered, rubbing her arms as she tried to make out what the Otomeian was doing in the dark. She had not long to wait: Natsuki soon returned, holding something in her hands.

"Um," the girl said, urging her to take it.

Shizuru lifted her hands mutely to take her cloak-the one she had left on the bench earlier. She stared at the thick red cloth in her arms, then turned her eyes to Natsuki once more. The girl was shy again, but smiled.

"You-I am-thank you, Natsuki."

She paused, feeling oddly at a loss for words and wondering what was the matter with her that she could not even get through a simple sentence of gratitude without bumbling. What was wrong with her all of a sudden?

"I thank you," she said again. "I was cold."

Wonderful. As if she did not notice that, Shizuru.

The Otomeian tipped her head in acknowledgement, then waited as Shizuru donned the cloak. Once this was accomplished, she looked questioningly at the older woman as if to ask if they could start.

"Yes, let us start," Shizuru mumbled, still irritated with her lapse.

"Yes."

Natsuki eyed her curiously, which Shizuru only noticed after another moment of brooding. When she did perceive it, however, she quickly smiled to settle the girl.

"Perhaps you should give me a demonstration first," she suggested.

"Then I shall attempt to do as you have."

Natsuki obviously thought it suitable. She turned her head and began to survey the area, seeking out a target-and blissfully unaware of the eyes studying her from behind, full of disturbance and self-inquiry.

"Um. That."

Shizuru turned to look at what Natsuki was pointing to: a slim young tree that was twice as tall as herself, she estimated. Natsuki indicated that she should watch first, so she stepped aside and back.

The girl removed the daos from her side. She held the sickle by the handle and dangled the weight by the chain. Swinging it almost like a lasso, she lifted her hand and threw the part called the paw so that it drove the chain forward in a straight line. Then she jerked the chain to force it to curve and wrap neatly around the tree's trunk, the metal weight of the paw locking the binding into place. Afterwards, she made another flicking movement with her wrist that loosened the chain and brought the weight back into her hand. She turned to Shizuru, who sent her a wide grin before coming up.

"I wonder if I can do it half as well as you do," the older woman said with a laugh. She was stopped in the act of taking the instrument by the younger woman mumbling something in Otomeian, however, and motioning for her to wait.

"What is it, Natsuki?" she asked, wondering what the girl was thinking now and why she was fiddling with something on her wrist. "Is something wrong?"

"Hand," came the soft reply. "Please."

Shizuru watched the girl strip off the bandages covering her right hand. She then reached out for the older woman's own palm, wrapping it all the way to the knuckles with the linens. She nodded again when the procedure was done.

"Thank you again, Natsuki," the older woman said, so sombrely that the girl paused before pointing to the target. "That was thoughtful."

The girl moved off.

"Well then," Shizuru said humorously, wondering how she could minimise the possibility of looking ridiculous in the situation. "Let us see if I can touch it, at the very least."

Giving the weight a few good swings, Shizuru let her instincts take over. She flexed her arm muscles and threw the iron weight in what she felt to be a fair imitation of her bodyguard's actions. Her feeling was right: she smiled exultantly as the chain wound around the trunk of the tree and locked around it with a satisfying clank. Turning to her tutor, her smile grew wider upon seeing that the girl looked almost as pleased as she was.

"Not bad for the first time, Natsuki?"

Natsuki nodded, grinning. She tipped her head at the chain still in Shizuru's hand, as if to say that she should pull it back now. Shizuru did so.

With no success.

"Well, it seems reluctant," Shizuru remarked, giving the chain another strong pull. "I do not seem to know how to unwind it."

Natsuki walked up and held out her hand, flicking her wrist in a way that seemed as though she were holding a daos chain between her fingers. She emphasised the wave that Shizuru would have to send up the chain to unlock it, drawing the shape in the air with a finger.

"I see," Shizuru said, as the girl moved away once again. "Like this?"

She imitated the movement, but the chain held fast, to her chagrin. She grimaced, then looked at Natsuki with a wry smile.

"Apparently, I cannot do it."

Natsuki shook her head and repeated the hand movement, stretching her arm forward in the air.

"Do this." She showed the motion. "Wider. It will loosen, you will see. Then you pull," she told Shizuru, who almost laughed when she realised that Natsuki had forgotten some of her shyness in her seriousness at coaching a student.

"All right," Shizuru said, getting herself ready. "I think I understand."

She took position, still holding the end of the chain, then copied the flicking motion her tutor had just presented. A smile came to her face as she felt the taut chain slacken, the end coming loose from around the trunk. In that split second, she remembered the second injunction Natsuki had given her. Using all of her force, she pulled heavily at the loosened chain and it came swiftly back to her-so swiftly, in fact, that she realised the weight was going to hit her squarely in the face unless she ducked. So she did just that and let go of the end holding the rest of the chain as well, mind full of horror at the idea of pounding a hole into her own skull.

A whizzing sound above her head.

" Ecastor !"

Listening to the dull sound of the weight and chain hitting the ground behind her, Shizuru drew herself up and turned to look at the daos stretched out on the grass, shaking her head with a frown as she appreciated how close she had been to getting her brow smashed in like an idiot.

What a dangerous weapon, she shuddered, marvelling now at how easily the Lupine Division seemed to sling it around, causing devastation around them without ever hurting themselves in the process. Well, handling it herself gave her a whole new appreciation for them, certainly! She turned again, intending to make a comment to her companion along those lines, but stopped with her mouth half-open when she saw the girl-who was pressing a fist to her mouth and seemed to be in acute agony. It took her a few seconds before she saw what it was.

"Oh!" she cried, eyes going wide. "You wicked girl!"

Unable to keep her composure after this outburst, Natsuki responded by letting go of the fist she had been biting on and let loose an awful laugh, doubling over as she went on guffawing in what seemed to be near-hysterical laughter. The general watched in astonishment as the Otomeian kept laughing, something she had never seen her do before.

It was, the woman who could not stay vexed at this thought, quite a sight.

"I suppose I must have looked silly ducking like that," Shizuru allowed after a while, half-grinning and half-grimacing at the young woman. "But it is evil to laugh when I might well have killed myself just now, Natsuki."

The girl straightened up, mirth still shining through her eyes. She walked over to the older woman and, to the latter's surprise, patted her shoulder for comfort.

"I am sorry," she said. "It was not so bad, Shizuru."

At the reflexive rise of the older woman's eyebrows, the Otomeian apprehended her gaffe. She drew back as though stung by her own words or the shoulder she was touching, the colours of embarrassment and apprehension working on her face.

"Forgive me," she stammered, still backing away. "Forgive me,

General."

A bow, followed by another. The downcast eyes of a girl expecting to be scolded or struck.

"Forgive me," she said again, the fear in her voice tugging at something in Shizuru's chest.

"Stop that."

The Otomeian froze midway through another bow, too nervous to lift her head.

"Natsuki. Look at me. And stand straight, please. I do not require such bows."

She complied.

"You will call me Shizuru," the older woman said, saying it in a way that made it sound as though she could not decide herself whether to make it an order or a request. "Call me Shizuru. Only Shizuru. Remember that."

The Otomeian reacted with a confused expression.

"Not 'Shizuru-san'," the Himean clarified. "Not 'General'. Just 'Shizuru'."

Natsuki blinked.

"All right?" Shizuru asked. "Do you understand, Natsuki?"

The girl nodded, even if she did look as if she did not.

"Please remember it, then."

Her bodyguard's forehead wrinkled again. She opened her mouth to say something and Shizuru waited on edge, wondering what that something would be.

Perhaps she will say she cannot do that, she thought sadly. Or she will say it is not fitting for her to address me that way because it is improper. Is it? Perhaps it is. Her king did assign her to me as an attendant-cum-bodyguard, after all, and it would be ludicrous for her to address me so familiarly when she is in such a position. Or perhaps she will note that people shall notice and find it bizarre, shall criticise her even more than myself for taking such liberties. It would be understandable if she refused-and she is quite a proper young woman.

Shizuru sighed, a curious disappointment heavy in the pit of her stomach.

"Shizuru."

That was unexpected. She stared at the girl blushing before her.

"Shizuru?" Natsuki whispered again, testing it out. "I will get now... the daos?"

Shizuru smiled at this, giddier than the girl had ever seen her. Relieved, the girl smiled brightly back.

"Thank you," the older woman said. "And yes, pick it up, Natsuki."

The girl nodded before going over to where the daos was on the grass, folding her body to reach it without bending her knees in a graceful display of flexibility.

"I suppose we should get some dinner now," Shizuru mumbled, her eyes fixed on her bodyguard. She watched contentedly as the younger woman went about her task, pulling up the chain into loops to hang once more from her belt. "Yes. They should be serving dinner at our quarters by now."

Strange, she thought. It does not seem so cold anymore, yet the wind is still up.

She loosened the folds of the cloak wrapped about her, ignorant of the colour on her cheeks. The girl was finished and stood before her, waiting. She nodded to the young woman, then started walking, the two of them smiling at nothing in particular.

Vocabulaire:

1 . Cohort - There are ten cohorts in each legion, each with about 600 persons (500 soldiers and 100 non-combatants). This means that ten cohorts per legion is the standard, although there are occasions when legions are "plumped" or "fattened", giving them more than ten cohorts. It is also possible to "thin out" a legion if circumstances make it impossible to form ten cohorts.

2. Vulcan - The god of the forge and fire.

3. Priapus - Roman deity of fecundity, depicted as having a perpetual erection; phallic god.

True to her word, the Himean general set her army in motion again a scant two days after the contingent from Otomeia reunited with the one she had in Argentum. She left that latter city with a garrison of fifteen cohorts, with instructions to send to Otomeia for several thousand more of local infantry to add to that defence force for the meantime. Charged to oversee these troops were two of the Himean legates: Shohei Nagayama and Aidou Yuji.

Shohei was a veteran of the general's army-he had served with her on another campaign before this and been requested specifically by Shizuru for this one-and a staunchly loyal adherent. The other, though the elder man and more senior in terms of past office, was new to the general's staff and held no great love for her, truth be told. As Shizuru herself had confessed to her senior legate, had not financial problems back home pressed him into joining the "senatorial upstart" on this expedition, Aidou would never have volunteered himself into her command. The former was the general's man through and through: the latter had half a foot in the opposing political camp, with the second foot tiptoed on the general's side. Yes, thought the rest of the officers: an odd pair to put together .

Not that anyone questioned the general's dispositions to her face, of course. They knew that everything she did had a reason behind it, and this was surely the case for Shohei and Aidou as well. Only one person actually asked the general about it, and it was more out of curiosity than critique.

"Simple," the general had replied. "If you notice, they get along well enough together despite the differences in their political opinions. Something I attribute to the long history of their families being friendly with each other-the Nagayama and Yuji houses have excellent ties as well as intermarriages, as you know."

"Yes."

"Furthermore," she went on. "They balance each other out supremely well. Shohei-han is obviously exceptional at making decisions, but performs best when he has no rival minds to compete with his strategies. He needs assurance of his own superiority in that field, and leaving him with one who is not of the same mettle in that area gives him latitude to let out his natural creativity. Aidou-han-much though he may protest a decision initially, should he find it not according to his tastes-carries out instructions to the letter afterwards. Oh, he complains a lot, certainly, but he does the job very well because he is a stickler for orders, from whomever they come. His precision goes well with Shohei-han's resourcefulness."

She smiled contentedly at her own choices.

"Besides, I have noticed that Aidou-han is better than anyone else in my staff-excepting you, naturally-at organisation, and that is something essential to the garrison of Argentum: setting up the military fittings they now deem necessary for preservation. Finally being under attack again after nearly a century seems to have reminded the Argentians that they should start training some of their own to be on hand for battle, even if only for a rudimentary defensive militia should sudden attackers strike."

The senior legate had agreed with the reasoning.

"I see," she told Shizuru. "As much as I dislike him, Aidou-san is as you say. But aren't you a little worried, Shizuru-san? After all, this is the same man who didn't even join in our fight against Artaxi-just sat out the battle pretending to make himself useful outside of the field."

Shizuru had only chuckled at this last word of caution.

"True, not very admirable," was her rejoinder. "But still understandable, given that he is quite well on in years, Chie-han, and could hardly be expected to contribute much to the fray. You recall that you once described him as being incompetent. Well, it may be true as far as actual physical war goes, but you yourself have admitted to my statement that he is very competent in other ways... ways that Shohei-han is only passable at."

"I'll concede that." Chie had smiled then, suddenly. "Of course, there's also the point of the pool you're drawing from, isn't it, and how to spread people out?" she asked shrewdly, getting a laugh from her commander.

"Yes. Oh, I would love to leave someone as capable as you or Kenji-han or even Suou-han with Shohei-han, but I am afraid I cannot spare any of you at the moment."

"Because there are other things to consider and more work to be done."

"Precisely."

"All right, I'll admit it. It just might work, Shizuru-san."

"It shall work. Both men, besides, are in fact very much set on winning this campaign, albeit for different reasons. They may actually be among the most determined people in this army, you know. Yes, I have no doubts, Chie-han. It shall work."

And so it did. The appointed legates proceeded to acquit themselves well of any doubts of their partnership as soon as the general and her part of the army passed out of the city: Shohei immediately set to work on building the military fortifications and Aidou began to organise a programme for raising local militia. Thus Argentum found itself under good care whilst the general set off for Sosia, the more northern of the two Himean provinces in the region.

With her went three over-strength Himean legions, for the five cohorts left over from the legion that had been split up to provide five of the fifteen cohorts in Argentum were spread out among the rest. These were escorted by the three legions of cavalry from Otomeia, as well as a baggage train carrying, among other things, their captive Mentulaean prince-who screamed up a storm at the outset of the march until the chief primipilus paid him a visit that ended with him bound and gagged in his carriage.

The army went along at a brisk pace that would have sent another army under another commander complaining. As it was, not one of the soldiers could find the heart to do so given that their general did not ride, but walked beside them nearly the entirety of the way, her feet trudging the same monotonous rhythm theirs did. Besides, how could one mind anything when the general was always making the rounds through the ranks for a chat? She was so impressive and confident, as inspiring as the ideal commander should be. And she was so nice ! Not something you really expected from a general or even from someone so high up the Himean social stratum she was descended from divinity through some ancient ancestor. Never mind the pace then, thought the soldiers: never mind the growing cold, the brutal wind chilling their bones-what was that before the warmth of their general's presence?

So they marched relentlessly yet cheerfully from sunup to sundown, pitching camp in semidarkness and going off again in semidarkness. No one complained about this. After all, they had their general's light to guide them, and it was very strong, very bright.

On the fourth day of their march, Shizuru's army pitched camp beside a river, all of them welcoming the opportunity to bathe and cleanse their effects of any dirt that might have soiled them since their departure from Argentum. The camp was made and fortified properly first, of course, for that was the general's custom: no matter how short the stop, no matter where, a proper camp had to be made. It was thus evening by the time the soldiers who wished to go to the river were able to do so, cursing each other jokingly for having taken so long to set up camp as they dipped into the water-whereupon nearly all of them broke out into fresh curses.

"Shit!"

"Vulcan, this is freezing!"

"Sure, why don't you call on him and maybe he can warm this damn water up!"

"Oh, Jupiter, I think my balls just pulled back all the way to my gut!" another laughed shakily, as the rest cackled. They bathed quickly, groups of women and men taking turns and bathing in separate sections of the river-for it was still custom for soldiers of different sexes to bathe separately, as a matter of modesty. Their friends stood guard at the banks and waited for their turns as they splashed in the water, rubbing down quickly and shivering in the cruel temperature.

The Otomeians with them seemed not to mind, perhaps since they were accustomed to it where they lived. They voiced no complaints, although they did let out some comments of amusement at the Himeans' discomfiture. They also watered their horses by drawing pails for them, although each rider was careful to make sure that the beasts would not come near the river itself, lest they contaminate it.

It was well after the rest of the soldiers had left the riverside that the chief primipilus finally sauntered over, taking her time to look for what she deemed would be a relatively safe place from prying eyes. She had meant to bathe earlier, had it not been for other duties detaining her from doing so. How she had itched for a good dip in the water, watching the others go off to the river while she herself had to stay and oversee the final touches to the camp! For, barbaric though she knew some of the other, more high-born officers might have thought her, she was actually a woman who took her hygiene seriously and liked to be meticulous with her rituals. Indeed, she was nearly as meticulous with personal cleanliness as the general herself, who was famous for her obsession with bodily care.

She strode furtively through the brush, habit making her unconsciously take the path that would betray the least noise of her passage. A moment later, she was looking at the spot she decided would do nicely for her purpose. She was about to start forward when voices from nearby reached her, and she paused to listen.

She strained her ears, trying to identify the speaker. After another second, a smile came to her lips. Yes, the voice would be familiar-it was one of the non-combatant girls in her legion, her body servant, as a matter of fact, and one of whom she was extremely fond. This last was due to her having an unusual relationship with the girl, whom she deemed more or less under her care. Not words that many would dare to associate with Nao Yuuki, and so some even told her. Her only answer to that, however, was: Yes, well. All she would ever say, if pressed for more information, was that they "had history together".

The truth of this "history" was known by only a few people, all of whom chose not to talk about it. All that the rest knew was that Nao had been the one to bring the girl to the army to serve as one of the non-combatant helpers, and that, though the girl was not strictly a slave, she was nonetheless part of the centurion's household as a seemingly high-ranking and possibly favourite servant.

What was not so well known was that the girl came from the slums outside the walls of Hime, the stewards of poverty by the great river. It was Nao who found her there. This came about during one of Nao's jobs-one done not as a centurion but as an intelligencer-where she had had to pose as a poor woman with a child in order to better carry out her orders. As she most certainly had no child of her own, the primipilus had alighted upon a ragged yet oddly composed street urchin with a shy and engaging smile, one that she calculated would work wonders with gullible adults if trouble arose. A quick question if the urchin had family to look for her and an offer of a fresh meal after the job later, the new partnership was in business.

The trouble was that Nao found herself to be one of those "gullible adults" she had hoped to catch with the girl's smile. After the job, she found herself reluctant to leave the girl in the squalor where she found her, to her own chagrin. The girl could be so much more useful elsewhere; she could be raped before she even understood what rape meant; she could be killed on that street corner where she slept and picked at the scraps some well-meaning shop-owners regularly chucked at her, with nothing to her name. So many possibilities, not one of them good!

A waste of a fine girl, thought Nao, who hated wasting things. Besides, she found the girl entertaining. She was so genuinely nice, so innately honest, and yet so understanding about mischief and deception when it had a purpose-and that was unusual, to say the least. So Nao decided to bring her along when she left that cesspool of poverty beside the ebbing banks of the Tiber. An offer and agreement happened, and then they were off to the army. Thus the girl passed from one danger to another, although she found that the new one was preferable to the old. The girl herself often reflected in those first few months in the army that there was remarkably more kindness in the legions than there had been in the streets. A reflection that had the centurion laughing the first time the girl had voiced it out.

All grown up now, cheeky little bugger, the centurion thought with a smirk as she discerned another, unfamiliar voice replying to the girl's words. It was a deeper voice, a rather husky one, in fact, although it had a quality to it that implied youth. A thought struck her and her eyebrows lifted, a smirk building on her mouth.

Ooh, don't tell me you're having night-time trysts already, you sly bird.

She moved carefully towards the direction of the voices, stopping in a grove that hid her from the ones speaking. She stood behind a tree, one hand against its damp and peeling bark as she made out the two persons outlined in the moonlight. The first thing she registered was that the voice she identified earlier was indeed her girl. The second thing was that the girl and the other figure were standing quite far away from each other as they talked. The girl was bending by the riverbank, seeming to be washing something in the water. The other figure- another girl, Nao noted with interest-was seated on a boulder a few meters away from the one by the river's side.

So it isn't a tryst, Nao thought. At least, not if you're planning to stand that far away from each other. She smiled as she wondered whether it was the girl's shyness responsible for that, for the child had always manifested a tendency to be bashful, for all her amiability.

The real question, of course, was what the two were doing here and by themselves at this hour.

"Really, don't you think it's pretty?" came the familiar voice again, soft and sweet as always. "You hardly see the moon this bright."

"It's the full moon," was the answer from the other figure.

"I like it."

A long pause, interrupted by splashes of water.

"It's nice," the other voice said, finally. "I guess."

"I think so."

Nao smiled to herself, thinking that she would leave the two to their chat now. She was turning away to leave when the other voice-that of the girl who was unfamiliar to her-rang out.

"Who's there?"

She stopped and turned back to peer from behind the tree.

"Who's there? Speak, or I will attack!"

Lifting an eyebrow at the challenging tone, Nao paused to eye the figure by the bank first. Her girl had scrambled up to stand behind the other one, the one who was handling two spears in a way that conveyed no hesitation to throw them. That one was glaring in her direction. Nao's eyes widened slightly as she realised that this strange soldier-an Otomeian, from the looks of the dress-was very young, despite the confidence of her threat. Perhaps about the same age as the girl standing behind her, who had only turned seventeen a few months back. And yet, there was something in this foreign youngster's stance that bespoke a composed alertness that reminded the centurion of someone-though she could not place exactly who that was.

"I asked you to speak!" came the voice once again, followed by a whistle as the spear was cast and nearly sheared off a lock of red hair, had the centurion not put her exceptional reflexes to use. Righting herself, Nao grinned as she realised that that cast had only been for warning, and that the warrior knew exactly where she was standing.

"The next one will be aimed at your head. Come out!"

Nao's grin grew wider. Oh, I like her! she thought gleefully, stepping out into the moonlight. There was a gasp from the girl behind the one levelling the remaining spear.

"Nao-senpai!"

The centurion winked. "Erstin. Having secret meetings already?"

"I-no!" The girl rushed up, pale blond hair waving. "I'm so sorry about that! Nina was just trying to-"

Nao cut her off.

"Nina?" she asked, turning her attention to the other girl, who was ducking her head apologetically. "Ah, that's the mystery girl's name?"

The girl called Nina bowed deeply, her stilted movements betraying her discomfiture.

"Forgive me," she said in perfect Himean, keeping her eyes to the ground. "I did not know-"

"Yes, yes, don't worry about it," Nao said, smirking. "Not a bad throw you have there, by the way."

The girl bowed again.

"Otomeian, hm? Light cavalry, right?"

"Yes," she returned respectfully and with a nod of great formality.

"So what are you doing with Erstin?" Nao asked, trying to sound stern. "And in such a suspicious place?"

Nina looked at a loss, her gaze turning to the other adolescent for help. The centurion almost guffawed at the sheer panic in the girl's face.

"I asked her to come with me, Nao-senpai," Erstin said, coming to the other's aid. "I needed to wash some clothes and I felt safer with someone."

"Oh, is that so? I see now." She threw them another round of malicious smirks. "So why did you ask her, specifically?"

This time, even Erstin looked slightly embarrassed, although she was still able to reply.

"She's- we're friends," she told Nao, who grinned at the statement.

"Friends."

A short, painful silence ensued-although it was painful only for the two girls, whereas the older woman endured it with obvious enjoyment. After a while, the primipilus finally let her smirk drop and looked up at the moon, trying to gauge what hour of the evening it was. She decided that she had best get on with her bath before the night wore on even further.

"Are you done here?" she asked the pair. "I'm going to take a bath now, and maybe you girls better go back and get some rest. We'll be marching early again tomorrow."

The Otomeian nodded, a lock of dark hair falling over her eyes as she did. Nao was wondering again who it was, exactly, that this girl reminded her of, when Erstin spoke up.

"If you like, Nao-senpai, I would be happy to help you," she said. "If it's fine with you, Nina, to go back alone, although I could walk you back and return to help Nao-senpai bathe-"

Nao was about to tell her not to bother and to just go back to the camp, but the Otomeian beat her to speech.

"No," Nina said, shaking her head. "I will go. You stay here, Ers. It's fine."

Well, well, calling her by that moniker already, hm? Nao felt a corner of her lip turning up again just as the Otomeian turned her way.

"May I go, Centurion, or would you like me to stand guard for the two of you?"

Nao considered it, wondering what to choose. Oh, it would be amusing to get to know the girl-perhaps figure out why she so reminded Nao of someone, whomever that was-but then again, it would be even more amusing to tease and question Erstin about her, once she left. Screwing up a corner of her mouth, the primipilus made her decision.

"That's fine, you can go," she told the girl. "We'll need everyone in tip-top shape tomorrow, since we'll be getting up early as usual. Go get some shut-eye. And thanks for taking care of Erstin."

Nina bowed formally again and went off, making her way through the brush almost as quietly as Nao had. The two watched her go before turning to the task of getting the primipilus good and ready for bathing.

Interesting girl, Nao thought, making her way to the river and slipping off the pack she was carrying and letting it fall to the earth.

She mulled over her course of attack as Erstin helped her shed her clothes, then stood in the shallow water with her, long tunic pulled up and tied into a knot well above the knees. The girl used the sponge Nao had brought to scrub the centurion's back thoroughly, almost painfully-which she knew was the way the older woman wanted it done. Teeth chattering in the cold, their breath misted as they went about the motions, talking to each other companionably as was their wont.

"So, do you like her?" Nao asked, getting straight to the point.

"Nina? Oh, yes. She's nice," the girl replied, preoccupied with scouring the milky white skin striped with scars. "She looks stern. But she's really nice."

"Don't get vague with me, Erstin."

Erstin smiled, her pale eyes lighting up: "Sorry, Nao-senpai."

"So?" Nao paused to curse as the girl used a ladle to run water over her back and another tremble ran through her body. "Damn, damn, damn ! Icicles better not be hanging from my arse yet!"

Her companion laughed, the soft, tinkling laughter making her smile too.

"The others were saying the same thing earlier," Erstin told her, handing the sponge to her so that she could rub down her own legs as she bent over. "They were so loud. Cursing, too."

"What?" Nao asked, giving a chuckle. "You weren't cursing along with them, girly?"

A giggle. "You know I don't curse, Nao-senpai."

"It's a miracle, is what it is," Nao retorted, biting back a shiver as she focused on rubbing her legs raw. "Given how much you're around me."

Another giggle.

"So tell me more about this Nina." Nao closed her eyes as she straightened, the girl bending over to splash water onto her legs. She closed her eyes and worked on her bare chest as Erstin washed her thighs carefully. "You know, she reminds me of someone."

"Natsuki-san, perhaps?"

Nao's eyes flew open.

"Yes!" She paused, shot a curious look at the blonde bent over before her. "Now how did you know that?"

Erstin straightened. She had grown a little taller, Nao noted idly, and her body was also beginning to fill rather well in certain areas.

Better than mine, even, she sighed to herself, mildly amused as opposed to being envious.

"They're related," Erstin explained to her. "Nina told me that Natsuki-san was her cousin."

"Really," Nao hummed, before nodding her head. "Yes, there's some similarity there, though they don't exactly look that much alike, now that I think about it."

She paused, trying to imagine the faces next to each other.

"Pretty faces. Though I think The Sphinx does have more impact. Could be the eyes. More striking, even with that god-awful glower of hers. Though I'm certainly not about to tell the brat that!" she added with a laugh.

"I like Nina's eyes more."

"Oh?"

The girl let a moment go by before explaining: "Natsuki-san's eyes are too unsettling... even if they are beautiful. Nina's are softer, I think ."

"They weren't soft earlier when she was about to skewer me, hm?"

"She's not always like that," Erstin laughed easily.

"Neither is her cousin," Nao mumbled, an image of the general and her bodyguard coming to her mind. "Downright soft sometimes, I think."

Erstin had taken the sponge and doubled over to wet it in the water again.

"Sorry, Nao-senpai," she said. "What did you say?"

"What colour are they, Nina's eyes?"

"Yellowish brown. Amber, I think?"

"Amber! I much prefer green."

"Could it be because your eyes are green too, Nao-senpai?"

The centurion smirked, looking pointedly at the pale, sea-green eyes of the girl.

"Same to you! Cousins, eh?" Her eyes narrowed, her features betraying a pensive moment. "What are the similarities? Aside from the black hair and pale skin, obviously. Are there any?"

The younger woman knew better than to think the centurion was restricting the topic to the physical traits. She thought on it.

"I think so," she mumbled, scrubbing the older woman's arms. "They sort of act the same. A little. Nina is usually serious too."

"But at least she talks more!" Nao laughed, eliciting answering laughter from the other. "Or... don't tell me she actually made you wait before she finally talked to you, like her cousin did with the general?"

"Oh, no!" Erstin replied with a laugh, finished with her work. She started to ladle water over the centurion's body, apologising as she noticed the elder woman shudder from the cold, her teeth tight together. Nao wrapped her arms around her sides and shook her head at the girl, urging her to continue.

"She was very quiet when I first met her," the girl said. "But she'd talk to me if I asked her something, still." A small chuckle. "Though she was short with anything she said."

"I see," said Nao, smiling. "And you like her?"

The centurion found herself smirking at the girl's reddening face.

"Yes," said Erstin.

"Hrm."

There was the sound of splashing water as they made their way back to the riverbank, Nao deciding that she would be better off not washing her head for the evening.

"I'm cold! I don't want to turn into an icicle," she remarked to the girl, who giggled as she dried the centurion off with a cloth and helped her put on a tunic. "And I still have to talk to the general after this: she said she'd see me and the other officers. Bet it's about these bastard Mentulae that's been shadowing us just past their borders."

Erstin smiled at her quietly, then seemed to pause, a thought hanging unsaid in the air.

"What?" the centurion prompted.

"I just remembered something Nina told me," the girl answered, her pale brows lifted at her master. "About Fujino-san's bodyguard, Nao-senpai. About Natsuki-san, I mean."

The arched eyebrows went up too, the green eyes betraying curiosity. These eyes were sharply acidic, Erstin thought, and very unlike those of the general's bodyguard, which were a deeper yet oddly more vivid green. These were eyes speckled with frank flecks of yellow, beautiful eyes in themselves and worthy of mention too.

"What?" the centurion asked her.

"She said it was unusual for Natsuki-san to do what she did." The girl draped the cloak about Nao's body. "With the general."

"What?" Nao said again, her brow creasing. "You mean The Sphinx actually talks to people more?"

"No," Erstin said, giving a shake of her head. "Not exactly. Nina didn't say anything about that. She just said that it usually takes a longer time. For Natsuki-san to talk to people she doesn't know, I mean. She said she didn't expect her cousin to start speaking to the general so soon-talking, like the two of them talking, the way they do now, she said. Not just talking like officers in an army."

"Chatting, you'd say."

"Yes. That's what she meant, I think."

The girl wondered at the odd look that came to the older woman's face: a blend of interest and vindication sparking there even as a smile came to the thin lips.

"You mean," Nao said, her smile widening into an ever slyer one than what she usually had tickling her mouth's edges, "that that girl, that Nina, thinks her cousin is treating the general special? Or better than she usually does other people?"

Erstin nodded.

"She said that she thought Natsuki-san liked or seemed to like the general." She smiled brightly at this, seeming to find it natural. "But everyone does like Shizuru Fujino-san, right, Nao-senpai? I can see why she'd warm up to the general faster. I mean, / liked her soon as I heard her talking to you way back when-"

She trailed off at the sight of the centurion's countenance, an unreadable expression on it.

"Nao-senpai?" she said, when her silence went unnoticed. "What's wrong?"

The older woman looked at her, the odd look still on her face.

"I knew it," she said. "I can't wait to hear what Harada will say to this."

"What, Nao-senpai?" Erstin asked in befuddlement, not understanding how the senior legate had entered their conversation. "What about Harada-san?"

Nao just smiled her feline smile and reached out with a hand. She ruffled the girl's hair roughly, as she had used to in the times when the latter had been younger and needed reassurance that she had found a place, was no longer an urchin of the streets.

"Nothing, don't worry about it, Girl!" She grunted, threw both eyes heavenwards. "Though I don't know if this makes it better or worse."

She bit her lip, making the girl more instead of less concerned.

"I don't know if any good'll come out of it," she muttered. "But worrying won't do a bloody thing. So let's just go about what we have to do. And let's go back to camp, it's getting more chilly."

---

A little way down the length of the same river was a similar though also different scene: there were two figures as well, one naked and one not. But here the naked one was in the water, and the clothed one standing against a tree by the bank. The one in the water talked while the other made an occasional reply but remained quiet for the most part.

"Good gods," said the one bathing. "It seems that the water is as cold as they say."

The one under the tree said nothing.

"Even so, one must admit this is a lovely sight. I love nights when you can see the start of the autumn chill!" A splash, followed by another. "It has been an age since I bathed in the open and under the sky instead of in a tub or proper bath. There is something to be said for nature's beauty, after all, that merits a return to it every now and then. What do you think, Natsuki? Surely you must see many nights such as these, given your country."

A mumble of agreement, to which the one washing herself answered as though it had been a full-fledged paragraph of a reply.

"Of course, it makes me miss the warm summer nights in Hime," she said, giving a little quiver as she cupped her hands to bring more water to her neck. "But this is beautiful, in its own way. I wonder what a proper, full-blown summer is like here."

Damp strands of golden hair turned into a pale and icy brown as tendrils slipped from the knot of it she had piled on her head.

"In Hime," she went on conversationally. "Nights like this come on in winter. And everyone would bring out warm, mulled wine and have the fires lit. Braziers and hypocausts working at full force, the thickest rugs and blankets brought out for comfort, and for those sensible enough to ignore the fact that they are not exactly fashionable when you are wearing formal Himean dress for company, the best and thickest socks for the feet!"

She chuckled at the picture she had painted, the sound coming out a little shaky as she shuddered from the cold working its way into her skin.

"We are not really a people accustomed to extremes of temperature, I suppose," she confessed. "Even the summer is mild there, compared to that one gets in Fuuka's south. There are some scorching summers, you know. They would likely horrify you."

She fell quiet for a moment as she focused on sloughing off any invisible dirt that might have gathered on her legs, brow furrowed slightly as she attacked her own skin with a vengeance. The rumours of her being obsessive about cleanliness were not all exaggerated: she could slog through days and days of sweaty and bathless marching like a proper soldier, granted, but after that she often fell into frenzies of bathing where she practically rubbed her skin raw in an effort to cleanse herself of what she perceived as unconscionable filth.

A soft voice interrupted her midway through her work on the second leg, giving her cause to look up towards the figure on the banks.

"Um, Shizuru?"

"Yes?" she said. "What is it, Natsuki?"

Natsuki took a moment before answering, her low voice carrying clearly through the stillness surrounding their little private place.

"What is it like," she finally said. "Hime?"

The general straightened, letting drop to her side the hand carrying the rough-woven cloth she used to cleanse herself.

"What is it like," she echoed. "The weather, I suppose? You are asking about the climate?"

The other nodded.

"Well, let me see," she said, turning her eyes up as though attempting to glimpse Hime's skies in these foreign ones. "It is warmer there, no doubt. It can be quite cool-perhaps as cool as this-when winter comes around, yet it never truly snows as it does in Otomeia, save in the higher altitudes. We have more rain or sleet than snow, so the winter is more wet than white."

She brought the rag up to her bare arms and started working on them, all the way up to her shoulders.

"Why do you ask?" she said. "Could it be that you want to visit Hime sometime, Natsu- oh, how cold that is!" she exclaimed, as a stiff and sudden breeze rushed past her, touching off an eruption of gooseflesh on the skin above her waist. She had waded only so far as to let the water reach the top of her hips. "Oh, the things we do for hygiene!"

A chuckle came from the figure standing under the shadow of the tree and Shizuru mock-pouted.

"It helps you understand why the rankers were blaspheming so much earlier," she laughed suddenly, taking in a sharp breath to steel herself against the cold. "Ah well. I am not about the curse the gods for my own eccentricity in selecting a river bath instead of having water heated for me."

"Why?"

She turned her head: "It would be a foolish thing to blaspheme for such a thing, Natsuki."

"No. Not that. Why is it that..." The other paused, thought over her query. "Why are you afraid of not bathing?"

The Himean responded with a grin.

"Noticed it, hm?" she said.

Natsuki smiled too.

"I like to be clean, you see," the older woman explained. "I have what some people call a mortal fear of the things that tend to sprout on dirty bodies. Pests, lice, disease, stink-all of those things. I am lucky I come from a line of fairly smooth and hairless people, so to speak, so I do not have to trouble about plucking out more body hair than most to ensure absolute freedom from these horrors, but I would certainly endure the added pain if the case were otherwise. Oh, some of my friends make fun of me for this mania-I daresay it amuses even the cleanest of them! But I do not mind." She quirked a brow at the girl, who had smiled throughout the explanation. "As long as I am clean, that is."

She nodded at the girl.

"You know, since we are on the subject," she said. "You seem wonderfully clean to me too, Natsuki. I noticed: you are always near me so I have occasion to appreciate how sweet-smelling you are. Yet I never seem to catch you off on bathing trips or errands that take half as long as mine! When do you find the time to do it? I have feared for some time now that you are not given sufficient time away from me to do what you must for yourself and your own needs, though you always seem to find time to cleanse yourself just as well as I do-and I can take quite a time for ablutions, you know that."

"Often morning. Or night."

Shizuru was surprised.

"Never midday?" she asked.

"Sometimes," the girl allowed. "Wuh-when you send me away for a while?"

"When I tell you to take time for yourself or see to your troopers?"

"Yes."

The older woman looked thoughtful.

"Morning or night?" she said. "Truly? You mean earlier even than my waking up?"

There was a nod, which she only barely made out.

"Was it the same in Argentum and Otomeia? You slipped out of our room in the dark hours?"

There was no answer.

"Or could it be you used the baths in or attached to our rooms?"

This time, she discerned another faint nod.

"Both," the young woman said afterwards. "I, um, I do both."

She was quick to add: "Always, I change the water after. And I clean. The bath."

"I believe you: they never looked used when I would use them. I see now."

Shizuru paused to conjure an image of the girl washing herself in the tub or pool she herself had used when they had been in the aforementioned cities. The thought made her feel a little weak in the knees, and she shook her head to clear it of the picture. Now why had it been so easy to conjure the image and not so easy to stand it?

"Odd how I do not hear you," she said, talking to take her mind off her mental disturbance. "Ye gods, you are stealthy! I am not an extremely light sleeper, certainly, but neither do I slumber like a log. And come to think of it, who gets the water for you when you bathe? Unless you ask the servants to come in and fill up the tub with warm water-but I would have heard them coming in, at the very least, and woken up."

She mulled over the question. There could only be one answer.

"Do you mean, Natsuki, that you use the cold water in the cistern?"

There was a nod at which Shizuru grimaced, the sharp line of her nose wrinkling.

"And so early in the morning or night-that means you have been washing in water just as cold as this, for the past two months!" And, most likely, had been suffering that cold longer than she needed, in order to ensure that her ablutions were quiet enough to avoid waking up her charge slumbering in the next room. "Of course you do not soak?"

A mumble of confirmation.

"Still..." the older woman sighed, a little uneasy at the thought of the girl going through such uncomfortable rituals. It was hardly going to inconvenience her to let the girl have time enough to take her bath at leisure during midday, after all! Or to have another bath drawn up for the young woman after hers, for that matter. Natsuki would probably decline both: she would say she could not afford to be so profligate with her time when her charge was going about unwatched, most likely, and answer to the second that it was unseemly for her own charge to have water drawn up especially for her too. Shizuru had the measure of the girl now, and she thought that the girl's sense of honour and dutiful dedication could be a problem sometimes, as in this situation. Really, they should just bathe together for convenience! Although that would be the hardest proposition of all to put to the Otomeian, probably.

A pity, she considered. It was not just convenient, but somehow preferable. Yes, she rather liked the idea of it. It still disturbed her, but it an odd, thrilling sense.

Oh, she was getting eccentric!

"You could simply leave me during the day, you know, to go off and bathe," she said, choosing to start sensibly, with the proposition least likely to get turned down. "I have no difficulty with it."

"Sometimes," the girl said shortly.

"Ah, yes. You said you go in midday on occasion?"

"Mm."

"When I am with Chie-han and the others, I hazard?"

Affirmation.

"I see," Shizuru said. "Yet you are never gone long during those times. You must bathe very quickly or rush through it. You should not have to, you know. You may take your time." A laugh. "Gods know I do!"

There was a shake of the head.

"It is all right," the younger woman said.

"No, really, Natsuki. I would not mind if you did. Or you could spare both of us all the calculation and scheduling and just agree to what I have been proposing for a while now. Bathe with me."

A huff told her the other had been expecting her to say this, and she laughed at it.

"Come now," she said, smiling. "Do not tell me you are prudish after having seen me bathe so many times-might I point out this present situation as one of them, by the way? We have had this conversation before, but I suppose I might as well tell you that I truly would not mind. Perhaps I would even welcome it."

As she said this with a smile, the other took the last statement to be another of her jests, and shook her head patiently at her in response. Shizuru was highly amused by the irony of this. She knew she was much admired for her form, whether it was by the males or the females of Himean society. Not to blow her own bugle, but she was very much aware that there were countless persons who would immediately say yes to the chance of bathing with her and seeing her body. And now that she was finally offering the chance to someone, here she was, turned down and considered a joker.

"I wonder if this is what they call poetic justice," she mumbled, grinning. "Now that I finally offer it, I am declined. What, shall you not even honour me with an argument, Natsuki?"

The only answer was a smirk that told her the other knew she was being baited.

"Well?" Shizuru persisted, a teasing smile on her lips. "At least say something to explain. A shake of the head can only be so eloquent."

"I..." A pause, then a look of impressive gravity. "I have to guard you."

Shizuru burst out into laughter at the delivery.

"Oh no, not that old thing again!" she cried later, still laughing. "At least think of a new defence, please. You have flogged that one to ribbons already!"

The other deigned to laugh with her, albeit a little more quietly. During the final chuckle, the girl stepped out of the shadow of the tree against which she was standing and showed off another of her rare smiles-which were not so rare these days, Shizuru was pleased to note-as she came to stand by the river's very edge. The general returned the expression, noticing, not for the first time, that the other had beautiful teeth: even and fierce and white.

Natsuki tipped her head in a questioning manner, as if to ask the Himean if she would finish soon. Shizuru started to wade out of the water, blowing out a series of quick, sharp breaths as she did.

"Yes, you are right," she muttered as she went. "I have spent long enough here."

She came out, shivering when the wind cooled the water still sheeting off her body. Shutting her eyes, she stepped deliberately if a little stiffly towards the boulder on which she had placed her effects. Her arms wrapped tightly about her sides and she felt the coolness of her body, the sensation of her clammy skin chilling her even more.

Moving this way, she opened her eyes only when her feet set on the damp earth of the bank instead of the pebbly riverbed-and started when in the unveiling of her gaze, her eyes met another glittering pair less than a metre away.

"Natsuki. What is it?"

A cloth was swiftly draped about her shoulders, hands rubbing the thick fabric against her arms as the girl busied herself with drying off Shizuru's form. The older woman stood still, receiving this unexpected attention mutely-which must have worried her companion a little, for the girl stopped her ministrations and peered up with a concerned expression on her face. It was then that Shizuru noticed that her bodyguard, for all the ease with which she had gone about her actions, had a furious blush on her cheeks. Before Shizuru could recover enough to make the teasing comment that had obviously been expected, however, the girl spoke ahead of her.

"All right?" she asked quietly. "Still cold?"

Shizuru smiled at this.

"Ah, no," she answered. "No, I'm fine, Natsuki."

A nod, then a motion asking for permission to go on drying her. She let out a small, foggy breath as she bade the girl return to what she was doing.

"Thank you," she said, attributing the change in her voice to the deepening cold of the night around them. "Would you go on helping me, please?"

Natsuki did. Her bandage-swathed hands carefully patted the general's dripping body to dry, her head averting with modesty whenever she reached a delicate area, to Shizuru's amusement. Although amusement was certainly not the most powerful reaction Shizuru was feeling just then to the attention she was being given so freely, this common practice of camaraderie that the legionaries often engaged in with their closest mates; she knew it was often done in the friendliest of attitudes in the army, a thoughtful gesture for one who did not want his fellow to chill from taking too long drying himself. Yet what she felt now was not entirely friendly, easily distinguishable from the earlier friendliness in their conversation, in fact, and not even remotely similar to the almost-negligible pleasure she felt in having her servants dry her on the rare times she asked them to help her bathe, back in Hime.

I must be mad, she accused herself, feeling blood warm up her own cheeks when her bodyguard knelt and started to dry her legs from the bottom up. There seemed to be a slight quiver in the hands patting her limbs, yet she knew it might only be her own body shivering. She clenched her teeth and held herself deathly still when the cloth started to move upwards, passing her knee and moving to her upper thigh.

She was no fool and she was from a society where the sexual and sensual were freely spoken, obvious things. Which meant she had a good guess of what was happening to her body under the Otomeian's innocent assistance. She shook her head at herself in amazement, wondering why she would be having such feelings now. Was this what they meant when they spoke of the pleasures of intimate touches? Not a woman famous for being lavish with the physical expression of affection, she nonetheless had enough knowledge both intellectual and social to know the enjoyment one took in being kissed by a parent on the brow, a friend on the cheek, or even a-not 'lover', she had never had a lover-another on the lips.

But this feels different from all of them. It feels different. Indeed, perhaps it is that it simply feels.

Her mind went back to the past, to the times with her school companions-for, though her parents could have easily hired the best private pedagogue for the entirety of her former education, they had insisted upon her attending a private and exclusive school with other children once she reached her ninth year. It was with these other young boys and girls of senatorial families that she first grew to appreciate the beauty of the human form absent cloth, the lovely symmetry of muscle, sinew, and bones all put together. Before they came to that age, all of them, male and female, thought no more of the statues of naked women and men littered around them than to wonder why these figures were unclothed when it was obviously so much more comfortable to wear a tunic, especially when winter came. In those days, they did not see why their elders in the institution-those at the stage of puberty-smiled so furtively at the life-sized and dauntingly detailed statue of Priapus in the peristyle garden of the building where they held some classes. The older ones giggled, whereas they simply goggled at it.

Well, when they finally reached the age of understanding what it was that set those older boys and girls to smiling at the statue, Shizuru had not been among those giggling at the handsomely-sized organ jutting out from between Priapus's legs. Instead, she went through a tour of the immense Fujino household, stopping from naked statue to naked statue from the Greek masters, several priceless works of art. She perused each one with new eyes, pleased that she was better able to appreciate the beauty of the human anatomy now, yet disappointed that she seemed to feel no urge to titter at the nakedness of the figures as her schoolmates had, boys and girls both.

She also found then that, though she could admire the statues of a bare Adonis, Achilles or Priapus even, she found something vaguely obscene in the organ hung between their legs. Too obvious, her young mind had pronounced dismissively. Not very pretty, somehow. Better to keep it hidden, was her verdict: hidden like a treasure that one knew was there but could not see. Better the female statues, like that exquisitely done Venus in their house's atrium.

So she attributed it to her particular tastes in art. It was only a little later on that she realised it was due to her particular tastes in another field. This she found out after an innocent game of "spin the stick and kiss" with her closest companions, around the time she was thirteen. A kiss with a girl; another with a boy. Both were smitten by her, she knew with some regret, as she did not feel the same way. Still choosing to go along with the game, she had found a physical pleasure in one's kisses, and only a morbidly detached amusement in the other's. I see, she had reflected and proceeded to test herself in various ways to confirm it before telling her mother nonchalantly of her self-discovery. Whereupon the older woman only replied the same thing: I see .

As it turned out, it little mattered. Though she knew from then on that she preferred women over men, she also knew she had no particular urges to find one to be with at the time-or at any time over the years. Nor did she feel any of the urges her friends spoke of, the ones that sent them into having secret and not so secret trysts with their lovers of the moment. When they asked her why she did not indulge in an affair of some sort at the very least, she simply answered that she did not need one: first, because it was not important to her; second, because she had her friends to tell her about their own dalliances.

Yours are so much more interesting, she would laugh, whereupon they would indulge her and tell her as much as she could ever wish to know, without any more prodding on her part than a few well-placed nods. So she learned about such things, knew about such things, without ever really feeling them herself. I love vicariously, she once said in jest to a friend, who understood that there was more truth to the words than Shizuru let on.

Vicarious until now, she thought upon finishing her reflections, savouring the sensation of the hands still pressing the cloth against her skin. So this was what it meant to feel that urge lovers and poets often bruited about, the desire that seemed to drive so many into insanity? What of Natsuki, then? What did she see in the body she was drying so carefully? Did she admire it, as Shizuru had admired those Greek statues of women in her early adolescence? Did she feel anything like a similar urge, a sudden and unexpected wanting ?

All too soon, Natsuki finished with the task, cutting off further considerations. She held out the older woman's clothes for her, quiet and still again as Shizuru swiftly donned them. The older woman's movements were fluid once more: the chill from her body had seeped away.

"My thanks, Natsuki," she said, finishing by pulling a thick cloak over the rest of her attire. "That was very kind."

Natsuki inclined her head regally: an unconscious hauteur that made the older woman smile and forget, momentarily, her sexual awakening and renewed self-discovery.

"So shall we go?" Shizuru asked, picking up her things. "Or is there anything you yourself want or need to do here by the river?"

Natsuki shook her head, then seemed to realise that there could be a misunderstanding by not answering verbally in this case.

"Let us go," she offered.

"Very well."

The Himean turned and led the way. The Otomeian sped forwards to range herself next to her general, whereupon they went off silently shoulder-to-shoulder, saying nothing as they walked back to the main camp perimeter and walls. Natsuki wondered privately as they walked why the older woman looked so uncommonly pensive all of a sudden. Nor did it escape her that Shizuru sent several looks her way that gave her the feeling of being scrutinised, appraised anew and as if never-before-seen by those strange wine-tinted eyes. It troubled her a little, truth be told, but she said no words and asked no questions.

She was not called a Sphinx for nothing, after all.

Vocabulaire:

1. Aedile - A valuable magistracy or office responsible for the care of Rome's public buildings, streets, water supply and drainage, games, etc. They had the power to fine citizens and non-citizens of Rome for any infringements of regulations appertaining to any of the above.

2. Capite censi - The lowest rank in the social order; the masses (without Marxist connotations, of course!), people so poor that they had only the citizenship of Rome to distinguish them from foreigners, as they were too poor to belong to even the lowest of the five social classes. The lowest "recognised class" is the Fifth, after which are the capite censi-who are thus technically classless, property-less, almost virtually worthless (to a politician, given that they had no voting power) members of the population.

3. Military tribune - Part of the staff of an army. These were unelected officers ranking below legates but above cadets who sometimes did command work.

4. Noble/Famous Families - In Rome, there were several clans known as the Noble or Famous Families, which meant they were the most august clans of all. This was due to their being able to trace the line further back into Rome's history than most of the other families could, as well as their having produced a good number of prominent socio-political figures. Typically, almost all the members of the Roman Upper Class belonged or were related to at least one Famous Family.

Within this category, however, were a few who could boast of being "truly noble". All of these were patrician, since they descended from the original aristocrats. Among these illustrious families were the Julii (clan of Gaius Julius Caesar Dictator) and that of Lucius Sergius Catilina (the subject of Cicero's Catilinarian speeches).

5. Praetor urbanus (L.), urban praetor (Eng.) - Recall that the praetorship is the office that a politician must ascend before attempting to become a consul, the highest position in the political ladder. The number of praetors elected in a year varies from six to eight. One of these is the urban praetor, who is the highest-ranked of the lot, second only to the consuls in his authority in the city.

The urban praetor is tasked with the preliminaries of all civil litigation in the city. This story follows the Roman custom which has it that he/she cannot be out of the city-whether Rome or Hime-for more than ten days since his/her duties are necessary to the metropolis. Take note as well that the urban praetor is traditionally the praetorian candidate who comes in with the most votes.

6. Quaestor - Chiefly a fiscal officer in the Republic, and often the manager of a provincial governor's funds.

Two more figures swept into the tent, joining the others already huddled around the table. Greetings were exchanged cheerfully and as the new arrivals seated themselves, one of the persons already ensconced in a chair and swaddled in his cloak decided to speak, his voice more guttural than usual.

"Stiff joints too, Taro-san, Toshi-san?" he asked jokingly, giving the pair a smile to show he was suffering from the same thing. "Not frozen your posteriors off in that glacier of a river we bathed in?"

"Ye gods-nearly!" returned Taro, pulling his cloak more firmly about him. "One more bath like that, Kenji-san, and I might develop an allergy to water!"

There were chuckles from the rest as he went on.

"What terrible weather," he continued, rubbing his sides. "And they say it isn't even full on winter yet! But this cold is awful and it's getting worse by the second, I'll swear to it!"

"That means the snow's coming," someone remarked. "It'll be upon us any day now."

"It snows regular here?"

"I'd give it two or three days. Four, maybe."

"Jupiter! I suppose that 'll be insufferable, then. And I'm already sick of this!"

This earned him a leer from the Ninth Legion's primipilus, who sat a few chairs away while listening to the exchange.

"The soldiers get tougher shift, Legate," she said acerbically. "They don't get no warm wine to help them, you know, among other things."

Taro scowled at her, saying, "Do you see me with a cup in hand now, Centurion?"

A cough from the person sitting at the head of table stopped them. She had been chatting to her senior legate quietly about something before, but redirected her attention upon seeing the developing exchange.

"Has anyone seen Takumi-han?" she asked.

Nao blinked at Shizuru, then sent Taro a small, unrepentant grimace before turning back to the general.

"You want me to get him too, General?" she asked.

"No, thank you, Yuuki-han," Shizuru said smoothly. "I merely wanted to know how he is handling the climate. He had a bit of a cold that was maturing in Otomeia, I heard."

"He was doing fine on the march," another of the legates said. "Seemed in fair condition to me, Fujino-san."

"He's all right," interrupted the senior legate. "You don't have to worry, Shizuru-san. I passed by his place earlier."

Shizuru cocked her head: "And how was he?"

"A little blue in the nose, but we all are. Akira-kun's making sure he's warm, anyway."

"In what way?" Nao mumbled not-so-quietly, causing several of the people in the tent to start sniggering.

"Er... I am glad to hear that, Chie-han," Shizuru said, after swallowing a chuckle of her own. "In any case, shall we move on to more pressing matters?"

"Such as the Mentulaean army that's been shadowing us ever since we left Argentum, for example?" Chie ventured, eyebrows quirking. "That is our topic, right, General?"

"Well, yes, but only in passing," Shizuru replied. "We have another thing to get out of the way. But we might as well start with this one, I suppose. Did anyone have concerns about it?"

"Do you think they're going to attack?"

All the people in the tent turned their heads to the one who had asked the abrupt question: Toshi.

"They've been shadowing us for a while now," Taro replied to him, eyes rolling upward. "I'd like to know what they're about, if they don't plan to!"

A derisive snicker brought all eyes to the chief primipilus. Shizuru invited her to speak.

"They won't," she said simply, showing off one of her nastier smiles—one she managed by showing the small, pointed canines of her teeth, looking for all the world like a big red cat snarling. Several people eyed the expression with patent discomfort.

"I don't know what the rest of you think, but I'll lay bets they don't attack," she told them.

"True, it's just a show of paranoia," agreed Kenji, leaning forward to place both his elbows on the table. "The cunni aren't so much thinking of jumping on us as making sure we don't jump on them. Right, Fujino-san?"

All heads swivelled to the commander, eager for her opinion.

"I concur," she said. "They have been staying too close to their borders to intend anything else. I predict that in the next day, they shall turn around and be off. Methinks they only want to make sure we do not get any ideas of passing into their territory—it seems that King Obsidian is fearful of anything such as an invasion from Hime into his lands."

"It makes sense," said a female legate, twisting her chapped lips into a smile. "They're simply too far for us to have any worries. Besides which, this army shadowing us is not as big as the one Artaxi was carrying, so the scouts tell us. We have other problems, as the general said."

The general bestowed a beautiful smile on the officer.

"Something on your mind, Suou-han?" she asked.

"Nothing grave, Shizuru-san," the woman replied, returning the grin with one just as stunning. "Just a little caution."

"Caution?" echoed somebody.

Suou nodded, her flaxen hair freeing itself from behind her ears.

"From what our scouts tell us, what we really have to be wary of is that stretch up ahead that is hedged round with forest. We shall reach it by tomorrow, at this pace."

"What's with it?" someone asked. "Bad road?"

"Depends on what you call a bad road. See, there's another route connecting Argentum to Sosia-where's a map? A map, if you please."

One of the military tribunes quickly spread one out on the table, having had it ready from the beginning. The others bent over it as Suou proceeded to trace the locations she was speaking of, talking as her finger glided over the calfskin.

"See, we were supposed to take this one," she said, pointing to a thick brown line depicting a path. "This is the main road and the one the traders and travellers use. The problem is, we can't use it just yet."

"Why not?"

"It seems that it's bisected by this channel-a tributary of one of the main river borders, the River Atinu," she said, showing them the irregular blue stripe on the map. "Most of the time, the route is passable because a bridge sits there. Not at this time, though."

She drew the length of the river, pointing to where it was joined to another distant watercourse.

" This is the problem. The River Atinu, as you can see, is further up and reaches to the land of the Mentulaeans. It originates in the mountains in their north."

"So how does that influence which path we can and can't take?" someone asked.

"Because the Mentulaean mountains have odd seasons."

As expected, this gained her looks of bafflement from the others-save from the general, who merely looked as though she was enjoying Suou's little exercise in drama. The legate putting on the play chuckled, flicking her fringe of very fair hair as her frosty eyes met the general's warm ones.

"A curiosity of the area," she explained to the table. "Their winter comes in two parts, or so the Otomeians tell us. The latter part is when they get the snows, and the first part is when they get rains instead. This would be towards the end of summer and runs all through their fall, in most years. The worst rains usually take place in the northern part of Obsidian's empire, apparently, which means these mountains. Interesting information, you know."

A murmur of assent went around the table.

"So at this time," she continued. "The rains from the north should be affecting the headwaters of the river. Typically, it floods beyond its normal levels, then swells into its tributaries. That's why we can't take that road-the flooding makes it impassable. The bridge itself is eaten up by the water."

There was a buzz around the table.

"I see it now," came a mumble from Chie. "So if what you said is true, everyone else should be taking the other road now, along with us. Is it the road traffic you're worried about?" she asked doubtfully, knowing that someone as intelligent as Suou would hardly deem something like the crowdedness of a passage worthy of mention. As she thought, Suou denied it.

"Of course not, Chie-san," said the woman, her aristocratic features showing surprise at the senior legate's query. "See, this is the time when traffic winds down between Argentum and Sosia. Most of the locals prefer to wait for the river waters to subside if they need to get from here to Sosia or vice versa, instead of taking the other road. But."

She took a slow breath.

"Some do go ahead and pass through the other road. There are people in a hurry." She smiled suggestively while lifting a pale eyebrow, so fair it was near-invisible in the lamplight. "Like that nice little trading party the scouts said is a little ahead of us."

Ever a consummate actress, she decided her production would be better if she affected a yawn-which she did, adding: "Perhaps trying to make a deadline or contract date, you know."

There were several confused expressions as she finished this aside, although she was pleased to note that several faces seemed to be lighting up in interest and waiting for what she would say next.

"Anyway," she said. "Only those who absolutely can't wait for better times actually hazard going through the other route, you know, which some say is damned foolery."

"They take the road in the forest, you mean," Kenji said.

"Yes."

There were several nods.

"Bandits?" Chie asked, voicing what everyone was suspecting.

"Yes," Suou said. "But more than that. The Otomeians said the ones that tend to strike along that road are not just ordinary ones. They're actually exiled Mentulaeans-or people from the conquered tribes that now make up the Mentulaeans, anyway-that went across the border and made a new home in these areas. It isn't said so, but my suspicion is that they're made up of the remnants of armies from other factions that their king purged some years back, or that the nucleus of the force is so composed. In other words, soldiers-turned-bandits, and probably armed like soldiers too. Quite a lot of them: they have been dwelling in these areas for some time and have naturally gathered other burrs to their coat."

She stopped to sigh and lift her eyebrows playfully: "They are a fairly well-organised lot, so the local scouts tell me."

"Any numbers?" someone asked.

Suou shrugged carelessly. The centurion at the table was similarly dismissive.

"Numbers don't really matter in this case, anyway," the red-haired primipilus grunted. "Organised or not, they're dead if they try anything."

She sneered and declared: "We'll chew them up and spit them out."

Suou sent a grin towards the primipilus, who answered with a wicked one. Chie watched the exchange, now understanding exactly what the point of all Suou's information had been. For each comment, she knew, had been calculated, not at all carelessly thrown even if the younger legate's manner made it seem as though it were. She marvelled at her fair-haired colleague's just-revealed flair for delivery, not having had opportunity to see it before. Interesting to think of what she would be like, once she entered the Senate properly: she was probably something to look forward to, once they returned to Hime.

Might turn out to be another great political force, much like her elder sister.

"Thank you for telling us about this, Suou-han," came Shizuru's voice. "We should indeed do well to be on the alert, if nothing else."

"Any orders, General?"

Shizuru nodded.

"Please see to it," she said, "that all the centurions receive this order tomorrow: once we come into sight of those woods, they are to make sure the legionaries have their shields in hand and not on their backs. No drawing out of swords unless actual provocation comes, and have the cavalry troops near the baggage train. They can protect it and themselves."

There were several nods.

"In any case, we do not stand to fear anything from them, even if they do attack," she continued, a small smile coming to her lips. "Whereas they have everything to fear from us."

---

Words that proved prophetic, as usual. The army entered the forest road by late morning of the following day, and was soon set upon by a large force of bandits. These had been observing the glittering length of the Himean line as it entered their territory, wondering what stupidity led the foreigners to use such a long, thinned-out formation when they were obviously in a prime position to be attacked.

Not that the brigands meditated too much on it. Rather, they thanked their gods that the Himeans were silly enough to give them a wonderful opening for taking their baggage, which they suspected held a good amount of gold as well as supplies. Thus it was with high expectations of quick success that they charged towards that part of the Himean column-where, to their dismay, they found themselves fended off contemptuously by a solid wall of no less than Otomeian cavalry troops, the most feared horsed warriors in these lands.

Strangely enough, however, the Otomeians seemed more focused on pushing them back and away rather than on killing them, something that the chiefs of the outlaws realised after a few minutes had passed with relatively fewer losses on their side than expected since they were facing notoriously deadly warriors. Who had not suffered a single casualty yet, come to think of it. And the Himeans did not seem to be in a hurry to join in the fun either! What, by the gods, was going on?

"I don't like it!" cried one of the bandit leaders to his fellow, after a while. "They're too calm! It's like they were waiting for us!"

His friend spat angrily on the ground before replying over the din.

"Keep on, Titus!" he yelled. "And tell the archers to stick to the woods and aim at them. Carefully, or we'll be caught too!"

"Right!"

Just as he was giving the order, however, the sharp sound of arrows whizzing through the air was heard... but it came not from behind them. Rather, the arrows had come from their front. Then came the groans from behind the trees, followed by the dull thump of many a body hitting the earth.

The Otomeians at the back had raised their bows and begun to pick off the bandits still in the forest. They did this with unbelievable accuracy, eyes seeking out each figure behind the cover of the trees and letting fly a superbly aimed arrow that rarely missed its mark. Hoarse screams of dying men disturbed the area as the bandits rushing out of the forest to join the pass were killed before they could make it to their target, the unerring shafts of the Otomeians speeding them on to another, more final destination.

Seeing that they would be overwhelmed if they did not retreat now, the bandits began to move back, fighting all the way as the Otomeians suddenly pushed forward and pressed them into the woods. Just as they thought they were in the safety of the trees, however, more screams came from the forest behind them. The bandits at the fore slackened, taken off-guard by the sound. Better they had not done so: their heads were lopped off immediately by the Otomeians. These had apparently grown tired of merely pushing the enemy to retreat. Besides, those screams in the forest had actually been the signal for the Otomeians to start doing what they did best, and now, as they fell to the enemy with a will, the true carnage began.

From then on, the intended raid developed into a debacle. The brigands had missed the true purpose of the columnar formation of the Himean army: to emulate a snake, with all the advantages of its flexibility and lethal strike. Were any part of the Himean snake attacked, the rest of it would simply curl around the aggressor, catching it in its coils before swallowing the hapless enemy whole—which was exactly what happened to the outlaws, as they fell helplessly under the suddenly bared fangs of the monster hedging them all around.

Little did the bandits know that this was a prearranged battle. The Himean general, foreseeing that the baggage train would likely be the target, had instructed the Otomeian cavalry to dash to its defence as soon as any bandits were sighted, though only to repel any initial attacks—for the snake's coil needed a little time to whip out and slink through the trees until it surrounded the enemy. Hence the result that the outlaws had nowhere to go but straight into the blades of the enemy, eager to dispatch them.

Watching the slaughter a little distance away was Shizuru, shaking her head as she regarded the near-effortless way her troops finished off the foes. The woman at her side smiled at this gesture, and chose to comment on it.

"Want to spare a few of them after all, Shizuru-san?" she asked teasingly.

Shizuru turned an amused face towards her.

"I would if I could," she said. "But as it is, that would only mean taking them along with us as prisoners, Chie-han, to be tried for their crimes against any Himean citizens they may have assaulted, robbed, or even slain in the past... and from what we have learned from the scouts, there are scores of those, not including the ones from other nations."

Chie nodded thoughtfully while replying; "And the penalty for that is flogging followed by death."

"Yes," said Shizuru with an answering nod. "Hence it would be a futile exercise to take them prisoner, not to mention a waste of our resources. We shall not be able to sell them as slaves if they are to become corpses. And besides, Natsuki assured me that there are no longer any rewards out for them to make it worthwhile, since they have inhabited these woods for decades now and the people have accepted their presence with resignation . "

She turned to the girl in question, who stood beside her: "That is correct, is it not, Natsuki?"

Natsuki nodded, then returned to watching the bloodbath. Shizuru regarded her for a moment, then tilted her head in thought.

"Why do you not join them, Natsuki?" she asked. "Go on, you might still catch some action if you do. Your comrades are out there, anyway, and seem to be enjoying themselves-although I notice not one of them is using the daos."

The girl scowled at the figures in the fray, her nostrils pinching together in disdain.

" Weak," she sneered, enunciating the word with pronounced scorn.

"Not worth my time."

A stifled gasp brought her eyes as well as Shizuru's to the chief legate. Who stared at her, hand above the mouth. The light brown eyes were wide and held astonishment.

"Oh, I'm sorry," Chie managed to say as she lowered the hand covering her lips. It revealed a wide grin that had no trace of apology at all. "It's just that this is only the second time I've heard you speak, Natsuki-san."

Shizuru gave a chuckle as Natsuki's cheeks flared, the haughty set of the Otomeian's face suddenly melting into acute embarrassment. The girl attempted to resume watching the fight with her usual aloofness but failed miserably at it, thought Shizuru, who patted the girl's shoulder as if to commiserate in the loss of her frosty dignity.

Just as she was doing this, however, a tickle came to her throat and she was obliged to cough strongly.

"Forgive me," she said to her companions, clearing her throat. "I think I need some water. I have yet to drink anything since breakfast."

She made as if to go to obtain the said need, but was stopped by her bodyguard, who tipped her head to indicate that she would be the one to get it.

"Are you sure, Natsuki?" Her eyes went to her servants, also standing nearby and watching the spectacle. "I can get my slaves to do it."

Natsuki insisted.

"All right then." She bestowed yet another soft smile at the young woman. "Thank you. And take your time! I am in no hurry."

The girl went off and Chie chose that moment to speak.

"Natsuki-san," she said, "is becoming uxorious."

Few people ever truly amazed Shizuru Fujino, and her friend amazed her now. She stared at Chie wide-eyed, then burst into hilarity.

"Oh, Chie-han," she said, a hand holding her stomach as she continued to giggle. "Why that word?"

Chie grinned, letting out a chortle of her own before appraising her friend with a shrewd look.

"Maybe that's not exactly the right word," she said.

"I should think not," Shizuru said, wiping a tear from the corner of her eye as the mirth finally subsided. "After all, I am not Natsuki's wife, nor is she mine."

Chie pursed her lips for a second.

"I know," she replied. "But you might as well be, don't you think?"

The general seemed to grow still, her gaze probing the soft brown eyes before her. After a few seconds of this, Chie looked away first. She resumed her old, cheerful demeanour.

"Anyway," she said flippantly. "It's as good a word as any."

Shizuru nodded.

"In any case, this is still a fine development," she said after a while, looking out at the activity winding up before them. "Not only have we rid the forest of the bandits, but we have also caught their catch in corralling them."

"Oh, lovely," Chie said, pausing to admire her friend's wordplay.

Shizuru smiled indulgently.

"And, yes," Chie said, a moment later. "Brilliant of Suou-san to see that they'd still be carrying the booty from their last raid when they attack us, the greedy pigs!"

She stopped abruptly, turning her eyes to her commander with sudden apprehension.

"But I have to say, Shizuru-san, that I never thought Suou-san would be that devious," she said with care.

"Devious?"

"She might have told us earlier about that trading party, you know, and we could have saved them if we'd moved a little faster." She blew her dark hair out of her eyes, blinking when her breath fogged her sight. "No booty, sure, but at least they'd be alive."

"Ah, that. I did ask Suou-han about it yesterday," Shizuru confessed. "Apparently, she only found out about the merchant party itself before she came to that meeting last night, because she overheard some scouts talking about it. I would like to believe-no, I believe, rather, that she was telling me the truth."

"Oh. I see then. " Chie tilted her head back to look at the grey sky, pointing her nose at the clouds. "Well, I don't think she's the type to lie about it either. So it would have been too late even then, eh?"

"I am afraid so."

She turned to Shizuru with an apologetic grin.

"I have to admit I'm glad that was it, Shizuru-san," she said, making no secret of her feelings. "I don't really know Suou-san-not as well as you do, definitely-but I like her. And of course, there's her elder sister to consider."

Her grin softened as she thought of the woman, the one they had left back in Hime.

" She wouldn't like hearing that her little sister did anything like let innocent civilians get killed just so we could take their wealth off the bandits responsible. She wouldn't like it at all."

The general nodded, her own face softening as she thought of their mutual friend: she was currently serving as urban praetor in Hime and had thus been unable to lend her services to Shizuru's undertaking, much though she had wished to do it. Certainly not out of any pressing need for prestige or money that the campaign could offer, for if there was anyone who could rival Shizuru Fujino in Hime for sheer eminence, wealth, beauty-oh, in any aspect, in fact-it would be she. Another heroine of their city, another of the same brilliance in her career.

Yet she would have joined the campaign as a subordinate officer for the sake of her crimson-eyed friend. Not out of any sense of romance! For she, everyone knew, was madly in love with a certain shy little lady who had the misfortune to be born of extremely obscure ancestors-part of the capite censi, in fact. Thus it had caused a near-furore when Shizuru's friend announced her marriage to that lady-not-born-a-lady, breaking one of the strictest traditions of their class and flouting the rules of the social hierarchy. She did not care, of course, and neither did her truest friends.

That marriage scandal happened a year or so before Shizuru's deputation to the north. When the latter action had been debated upon in Senate, that friend had been absent from the meeting, for she was carrying out an especially important hearing in court at the time-and had thus been unable to lend her voice to those crying foul at the House's decision to appoint only five legions to the expedition. When she did learn of it after the session, however, she was livid.

"I would go with you if I could, My Friend," she had told Shizuru with obvious regret, even while her face retained the serenity for which it was famed. "But as you know, the urban praetor cannot leave the city for more than ten days at a time. There is little to be done, at present. However, my younger sister asked if she could join your campaign in my place. I favour the idea, and ask you to consider it. She is bright, as you know, and quick in everything she does."

"Good to hear you approve of me," that younger sister had interrupted, coming into the room with her long, languid strides. "Good day, Shizuru-san and good to have you auditor to that just now. It's always nice to have a witness when my sister compliments me, in case she forgets she said it."

The elder sister had given a slight smirk in reply.

"Although as you can see," she had gone on, as if her sister had never walked into the room. "Suou is prone to a rather wide streak of levity."

Shizuru smiled through her recollections of that day. She had ended with accepting the younger sister's legateship, of course, which had seen the bastions of the Traditionalist faction-to which most of those opposing her belonged-baulking in incredulity. One simply did not make someone a mere twenty-three years of age a legate, even if she was of that illustrious a family. Why, the woman was not even a senator yet! Of course, the 'senatorial upstart' leading the mission herself had something to say about her choice of appointee, and she said it in ringing tones that brooked no dissent in front of the senators' faces.

"I am a scant year older than she," she had enunciated when called to explain it in the House. "If my age has not been sufficient reason to prevent me from the generalship, then I fail to see why hers should be cause to prevent her from the legateship. And if the complaint is that she has not yet entered this House as one of its members, may I remind this esteemed body that she had been planning to run for quaestor soon anyway? Surely no one here doubts that she would have been elected, given her name. She would then have been entered into the membership rolls of the Senate. May I remind this esteemed body too that its members have given me absolute command of the enterprise, which means I am free to appoint whomever I wish without having to answer to any other senator? Yes? Good, now you are reminded. I wish to appoint Suou-han. That is all."

She knew she would not regret her choice. Suou was definitely an adornment to her army, even if only judging from her performance thus far. Some might have thought it odd to think this was merely the young woman's first time to be a legate, but then again, as Shizuru knew, brilliance did run in Suou's family.

And so do those fair looks, she mused, thinking of the white-skinned, ashen-haired Suou, whose eyes were such a light blue that they often seemed emotionless, cold as ice. They would have seemed colder had it not been for the easy smile that often graced her lips. Yes, Suou was an archetype of her particular family's good looks. It was her elder sister who was the anomaly in the line as far as appearance went: for that friend, while retaining the icy white complexion of their lineage, had dark blue eyes instead, and hair so black that the highlights showed blue instead of red-hair much like Natsuki's, in fact.

Because of the disparity in physical colouring from the rest of the clan, there might have been a temptation to question the authenticity of this friend's parentage, were it not known that her looks had taken after her mother, a famous dark beauty. Besides, there were other similarities between her and the other members of the family. The colouring was misleading, that was all: the woman still had much the same features as her fair-haired, light-eyed sibling. The two of them also had the same strange air of indolence, sharing the deceptively slow pace in which they strolled-due to the length of their legs, for both were exceedingly tall-and even the leisurely way they smiled, which was always as if their lips wished to take their time accomplishing the act.

So different, and yet so alike, she thought, imagining the two sisters next to each other. An easy image to create, since the two were often together. The elder was very fond of Suou, and had been nothing but unfailingly attentive to the younger as they grew up. Never mind that they were not full siblings, for Suou's mother had been married by their father a while after the death of his first wife. That mattered not to them at all, Shizuru knew.

"Indeed," Shizuru said to Chie, after a while. "She would not be pleased at all by such a story, I am certain."

Chie smiled, having gone through her own recollections of their friend.

"In a purely hypothetical pinch," she ventured, "what do you think Himemiya would do? Believe her little sister or you?"

"That's rather good wordplay too, Chie-han-it rhymes," Shizuru said, causing her legate to laugh. "And I think she would believe the person who was telling more truth according to her judgment. Chikane is too astute to be misled by her own allegiances. Or by her affections, I think."

"So she is," Chie replied. "But what an interesting choice of words, Shizuru-san: more truth."

The general nodded.

"I feel it is the proper phrase," she said. "People say things with varying degrees of truth, each according to how they view or choose to view a situation. There is outright fabrication too, of course, but that is different."

She smiled thoughtfully.

"Do you not wonder why there are so many differences in the accounts of our historians? There is no single truth, I think, as far as we mortals are concerned. Everything happens in different ways because it is read differently by different people. We all have natural predispositions to embellish history."

Chie chuckled at her friend's philosophical tangent-one expressed in front of a field of butchery, no less!

"Don't forget," she said to the general. "A lot of people say you're not mortal."

"Which shows you how a lot of people are often wrong."

Chie smiled: "Oh, is that ever the truth!"

A moment later, she turned to her friend again.

"Do you know, Shizuru-san," she said. "I get this feeling that Suou-san is a little more of a-I don't know-a wild blade, I suppose, compared to her sister."

Shizuru seemed to think on it for a second.

"You may be right," she replied after the pause, giving her cloak a flick to loosen the fold that had wrapped about her leg. The fabric fell loose, trailing behind her as the wind caught it. "Perhaps so."

"Not necessarily a bad thing."

A corner of Shizuru's mouth turned up: "Not at all a bad thing."

"She'll make a wonderful ally to have in the Senate, come the day,"

Chie mused. "I'd say that would set the dogs to yapping: both Himemiyas allied to the only remaining Fujino of that name-two of Hime's foremost families against those curs who call themselves the 'Protectors of Tradition'. Oh, what a loss for the Traditionalists, who like to claim they have the Noble Families backing them!" She giggled after her vocal imaginings. "I love it!"

"Chie-han is of august descent, herself," Shizuru retorted, grinning.

"But not august enough for Aoi's father, apparently!" Chie returned, wrinkling her nose as she gave her friend a wry smile. "And besides, dignified though the line may be, the Harada are not part of the Noble Families."

To which Shizuru made no rejoinder, as it was true. Long though the times of kings and queens had vanished from Hime, there were still several lines among the patrician clans that were known to have descended directly from the original blue-bloods. These were still regarded with greater respect than the others, for they were the descendants of the founding fathers and mothers of Hime. There were even some among them-no more than a handful-who could claim descent from the dynastic lines of the original kings and queens of the country. Among these were the Himemiya, as well as the Fujino. In a society where blood and ancestry was everything, that held no small meaning.

Turning from her thoughts of the intricacies of the Himean families, Shizuru beamed when she saw Natsuki making her way back to them. She turned to Chie.

"By the way, where is Suou-han?" she asked. "I cannot see her with the horsed command in there."

Her senior legate smiled, throwing her hands up in a helpless gesture.

"Jumped off her horse and into the fray," Chie answered. "Said she wants to have some fun. Nao is looking out for her though, General, so don't worry."

She added: "The two are pretty chummy with each other, so no problems there."

"Quite," Shizuru sighed. Her next words elicited another laugh from Chie, who clapped jokingly. "Blades of the same mettle fight together in battle."

---

And blades of the same mettle they turned out to be indeed. No weak warrior, Suou acquitted herself well as she killed opponent after opponent, her eager sword flicking many a bandit's life away. She fought her way to the very front of the lines, swinging and thrusting the short Himean blade with the precision of an artist. In this way she managed to kill a good dozen men in a little over half an hour, even with her late entry to the fray.

"Not half bad, Legate!"

Suou turned her eyes to the left. She saw Nao grinning and slashing a bandit's nose off, then deftly swinging back her blade so that the tip touched off a scarlet wound that bloomed on the man's neck, who gurgled before he collapsed onto his knees. The primipilus finished her victim with a hack where his collarbones met the gullet. Suou smiled her own lazy grin in approval and signalled to the legionaries to hold their line.

"Well, hello there, Centurion," she said, taking up a stance beside the army officer.

The centurion tipped her chin in acknowledgement, then returned to the brigands before them. Going about the task with equal eagerness, the two pushed on and led the soldiers at their sides. Their bright hair made them seem beacons of warning to the bandits that day, one white and the other red, as they blazed deeper and deeper into the enemy force's core.

Thus the Himeans fell to the task with ado, cutting down the enemy like stalks of wheat before the scythe. That the bandits were holding out so long was more a testament to the size of their band and the irregularity of the terrain than their own skills. Nao reckoned it would have taken less than an hour to finish the job had it only been a flat plain on which they worked. As it was, it took over an hour before the last bandit fell, his gut split open by none other than the centurion. Which officer lifted her blade and eyed the blood on it with a smile, wiggling her eyebrows at the legate standing next to her.

Dropping her smile with comic speed, the primipilus adopted a dour look.

"I don't think," she deadpanned. "That they were 'well-organised' after all, Legate."

Suou threw back her head and laughed, thrusting her heavy shield into the ground and leaning on it as Nao hooted back. The other soldiers watched the two of them laughing amidst a sea of dead bodies that were ironically mirthless, lifeless forms littering the cold earth.

They lost some time in clearing up the aftermath of the battle from the area, which meant they would have to march a little more quickly from thereon. Not that they minded, since the affair left them much richer. The bandits, as Suou had predicted, were indeed carrying with them the loot they had taken from the cavalcade of traders and businessmen that had been travelling ahead of the army.

"Louts yield some advantage on occasion," Suou had sighed in satisfaction, after having secured their booty to the baggage train, the gold bags and boxes of goods going to the care of the praefectus fabrum. "If they had only been less greedy, they would've passed us up and gone off to hide their takings. Now see what happened. All dead, to a man."

"I can't argue with that," Takumi had replied. "Although it has worked out well for us, Himemiya-san."

"Not that, please! That's what everyone calls my older sister. Call me Suou, if you please, Tokiha-san."

To which he had laughed: "Only if you call me Takumi, Suou-san, since that other name belongs to my elder sister too!"

Thus, when Shizuru's army finally reached Sosia after five more days, a good deal of plunder came with it, to the wonder of the local officers who received the visitors. Added to that which was taken from the bandits were the gold and presents given the army by the Argentians, who had seen them off from their city with great gratitude. It was thus a wealthy force Sosia found entering it on the same evening that the snows began to fall. This particular coincidence with the beginning of the snows was taken by the soldiers to be more of their general's proverbial luck. Not one of them had wanted to don his winter gear in the middle of the march.

"I don't exactly feel up to marching in white stuff right now," Chie admitted to her friend as they were ushered towards the rooms prepared for them in the gubernatorial residence, a couple of their personal servants behind them. "So I'm happy we made it here before it started to come down."

Shizuru agreed: "Fortuitous indeed."

"Not an effect of the famous Fujino luck?" Chie teased.

"More an effect of the famous flings of Fortuna," Shizuru retorted, making her friend chortle. "But it is a pity I shall not be able to meet the governor yet. I never had a chance to speak to him when he was still in Hime as a senator."

"Why isn't he here to greet us, anyway? It's only protocol."

"The quaestor told me he had to make a small trip to one of the outlying mining settlements." She paused as their guides turned a corner, the torchlight before them casting shadows and reflections onto the marble floor. "He said that the governor, Suda Yuuji-han, was actually expecting us to arrive a little later, as he thought we would wait for the river to subside instead of taking the forest path."

They turned another corner, entering a long, lighted hallway with several doors. At one of the portals stood another group of people. It was made up of two servants and two others Chie and Shizuru knew very well: the praefectus fabrum and his boon companion, the military tribune Akira Okuzaki. These two were about to enter the room when they heard the footsteps and looked up to see the approaching party.

"Good evening, Takumi-han, Akira-han," Shizuru said, greeting them with a smile as she halted before their door. "All is well, I hope?"

Takumi grinned boyishly, his reddish-brown hair darker in the firelight.

"With the funds or with us, General?" he asked mirthfully. "Good evening to both of you, Shizuru-san, Chie-san. I see our rooms are not too far from each other this time."

"Takumi-kun, you look a little pale," Chie said, giving him a benevolent look-as was fitting, for she knew his sister very well, the two of them being of the same year and much the same political inclinations. In Hime, that usually made for strong friendships in Senate. The senior legate turned to the young man's quiet companion and addressed her next. "Has he been overexerting himself, Akira-kun, or have you been taking care of him?"

The tribune gave her a very slight smile.

"He's fine, Harada-san," was the answer.

"Please, Chie-san," Takumi interjected gently, giving a chuckle of embarrassment. "The pallor's due to the cold. You're starting to sound like my older sister."

The others smiled.

"I can think," Shizuru said, red eyes dancing, "of worse people to sound like."

Takumi laughed: "Oh, true!"

"Like a certain outgoing senior consul," Chie muttered with a grimace.

"Anyway, I suppose we had best leave you to your nightly repose," Shizuru said to the pair they had accosted. "I wish to speak to you in the morning, Takumi-han, after breakfast. Have a good sleep until then. You too, Akira-han."

"Thank you, General."

"Keep him warm, Akira-kun," Chie called lightly over her shoulder, as the two entered their room. "In whatever way!"

A soft choke floated from the only halfway-shut door that sent the general and her friend into giggles.

"That was evil," Shizuru remarked as they walked.

"I blame Yuuki," Chie said. "She rubs off on me."

Their guides halted before a door on the left, saying that this was where the senior legate would go. Chie stretched her arms.

"Well, it's off and beddy-bye for me, Shizuru-san," she said. "I'll see you in the morning too, so good night for now. And to you too, Natsuki-san," she said, with a nod to the thus-far-silent girl slinking by them like a shadow. The girl inclined her head as Shizuru returned Chie's farewell for the night in more vocal fashion. Afterwards, they left to be taken to their own room.

Chie watched their retreating backs from the doorway, waiting for her servant to light the lamps in her quarters. Once this was done, she asked the woman to lay out her sleeping clothes and herself entered the room before closing the door firmly at her back. She stood for a few moments in front of it, though, apparently too deep in thought to move from the spot just yet.

"Oh, now," she said aloud, to no one in particular. "Should I have asked her to keep Shizuru-san warm, too?"

---

The girl Chie was thinking of was at the moment occupied with doing a survey of all the nooks and crannies of Shizuru's room, moving about quietly but efficiently even as Shizuru's slaves started their work. The general herself watched the Otomeian's doings with increasing amusement, shedding her armour quietly with the assistance of a servant.

Just as Shizuru finished removing her gear, Natsuki went past a heavily curtained pathway to what the Himean assumed was the bathing area. As she did that, the older woman took the soft tunic her servants had brought her. She laid it on the bed and dismissed her servants, intending to give herself a simple sponge bath for the night. She would have taken a proper bath were she not so tired. Her servants lingered only long enough to arrange all she needed for her ablutions, including a large basin and jugs of water from the cistern in the washroom.

Once they had gone, Shizuru got started on a skin-peeling rubdown, which she followed with a wash of her hair.

A few knocks from the other room told her that her young bodyguard was still at it. Shizuru sighed and bent over the basin, using a dipper to get water from it and pour that over her head.

"She would have made a great aedile," she murmured to herself. "I daresay she would examine a building to its foundations in order to ascertain it is in keeping with the regulations. And fine every builder in the city a fortune!"

Once finished with her rituals, she donned her sleeping tunic and perched herself on the bed. The girl had come back by now and was promptly invited to go through her ablutions too. She agreed to with frank gratitude and with a shy request to do so in the other chamber. Shizuru shrugged and agreed.

It was when the girl had already vanished into the bathing room that Shizuru apprehended something.

A dilemma.

Their present room had only one bed. While they had slept in a room with only one bed before, in Otomeia, they had nonetheless slept separate from each other and it had not been so very obvious, since the Otomeian preference for furnishings low to the ground had made it possible for Shizuru to give her enough blankets to create a makeshift bed of her own. Later another mattress had been brought in. Then, in Argentum, they had been given a room with two beds, upon Shizuru's request. As for nights in camp, they slept on separate cots covered, even if they were in the same tent. But now there was only one bed.

Of course, she could just ask for another in the morning. That would be simple enough. And since it would be poor of her to force the girl to sleep on the floor this time, she could just share the bed with the Otomeian for one night. Again, simple enough.

So why in heaven's name was she so worked up about it?

Oh, you know why, her inner voice answered, much to her chagrin.

Just as she was processing these thoughts, the younger woman came out of the bathroom and nodded to indicate that she was done. Shizuru gave her a smile that betrayed none of her inner confusion. In response, the Otomeian headed for a corner of the room, where she cast down what seemed to be a rug, then dropped onto it with her typical poise. Shizuru looked at her guiltily.

"That is very uncomfortable, as I recall I told you when you did that in Otomeia."

A dismissive shrug was all the concern she received.

I could just give her one of these blankets as before, she mused, before recoiling from the thought disgustedly. But how miserly! Yes, there is only one way to go here. I must ask her to share my bed.

She shook her head when the latter idea threw up a medley of images in her mind-images that she knew were not proper for her to have for her young attendant. Feeling a rush of warmth to her cheeks, the usually composed woman turned her head to the side, hoping that Natsuki would not see the blush on her face. And she prayed the girl would not know what had caused it if she did see, for although they were comfortable with each other by now, she was still aware of the romantic suggestion of their situation, the capital that could be had by the less-than-innocent in their setting. Lamplight and an empty room with only one bed and two women to share it? Heavens, but how could she herself have been so ignorant of its sensuality for so long?

Get a hold of yourself, Shizuru Fujino, she berated herself, frowning at the idea. You are turning into an old lecher!

She donned her mask of composure. All she had to do was tell Natsuki to sleep on the bed as well. A simple thing. A thing Shizuru Fujino could handle. After all, there was nothing Shizuru Fujino could not handle, was there?

Strengthening her resolve, Shizuru turned one of her most charming smiles upon the girl. To her surprise, however, Natsuki was already looking at her with an expression of great curiosity. From the look on the girl's face, it was apparent that Shizuru had not been all that successful at concealing her discomfiture: the girl had been watching her internal struggles with acute interest.

Shizuru paused, redoubling her efforts at putting up the mask.

"Shall you do me a favour?" she asked as sweetly as she could manage.

Natsuki lifted black eyebrows in response.

"Shall you sleep beside me tonight?"

An eyebrow came down, the other remaining up. The older woman held her breath, cursing herself for suddenly becoming so prone to anxiety-an emotion she almost never felt.

Decidedly, I am mad, she thought, recalling her words to herself a few days back, when she had pronounced the same thing upon herself while letting Natsuki dry her from a bath.

"I am not joking this time. You see, it is uncomfortable for both you and me if you do not," she reasoned, dropping the teasing tone she had just employed. "If you stay there, it would make you seem ill-used and make me feel horrible for not sharing the... well, the amenity of the bed with you, when it is more than large enough for both of us. And I must confess, Natsuki, that it would sting my pride more than you could understand to have such an appearance of meanness touch my person. Both of us would sleep much better were we spared the discomforts I have mentioned, do you not think so? We can get another bed in here later, perhaps even tomorrow.

But for now, why not use this one?"

The arched brow seemed to settle down at a glacial pace. The older woman felt herself diverted from her worries when she realised that her companion was actually considering it-something the girl would not have done a couple of months earlier, she wagered.

She trusts me now, she mused with pleasure, a fond smile spreading on her lips. It vanished suddenly in the face of a sobering thought.

All the more reason not to alarm her by letting slip my base desires.

She frowned. Oh, that was easy to say, given that she had never had such longings before! She, Shizuru Fujino, wanting her attendant, her bodyguard in that way? And a mere child, at that! What a predicament! Not one she could solve with her usual rational expertise, she was sure. Not one she could ask her friends for help with, either. She nearly sighed aloud at the difficulty of it, and at the alienness of feeling actual difficulty.

A small, nagging thought sprouted from the back of her mind.

But is it even a problem, after all?

She finally sighed, her frustration with her muddled thoughts coming out in the sound.

"Shizuru."

Her head snapped up at the call, her train of thought broken but not destroyed. Natsuki was looking at her with a worried expression.

"Yes."

The older woman's eyes widened. It took another moment before she was able to process her bodyguard's word, short as it was.

"Yes?" she repeated, hardly able to believe she had convinced the girl she often found impervious to her most cunning arguments.

"Yes... Do you mean, you agree, Natsuki?"

Natsuki nodded.

"Well then," Shizuru said. "Come here, Natsuki."

She patted the bed before adding: "You may have this side of the bed."

Natsuki drew herself up in her usual lithesome style, then approached. She stood before it for a second, then perched herself on the edge. She turned her and looked at the older woman, who chuckled at her.

"You may lie down," she told the girl. "Do not mind me."

Natsuki simply gave her a look to mean that she would not rest until Shizuru did as well. Sighing theatrically, the latter gave in.

"Fair enough," she said, pulling back the covers as she shifted to lie full-length on the bed. "And Natsuki?"

It took another moment before the girl emulated her actions, leaving a good deal of space between their bodies as she occupied the other side. Shizuru regarded the girl from the corner of an eye, breathing becoming easier when she realised that her companion seemed stoic as ever.

"I will blow out the lamp?" the girl suddenly asked.

"Yes," Shizuru said.

Satisfied, she shut her eyes.

So she does not know, she thought with relief, praying she was right and that none of her actions would betray the images she found prone to running through her mind these days whenever the two of them were alone. She has not found out yet. She was sure the girl would put up her walls again if she found out, and Shizuru had spent so much time taking those walls down that she could not help but feel aghast at the prospect.

Still, if she had to be honest, perhaps there was that little persistent part of her that wanted to see what would happen if the girl did discover her yearnings. A little part of her that wished to be discovered and discover a like reaction in return.

The mad part, she thought with wry humour.

A movement jolted her from her thoughts and she opened her eyes to see the girl in the dim light of the braziers, sitting on the bed again but seemingly rooting around its foot. She was about to make a questioning comment when the younger woman lay back down, but not before pulling the heaviest blanket-which Shizuru had pushed to the foot of the bed-over the two of them, taking care to flap it so that it covered the older woman as well.

"Thank you," Shizuru whispered when the girl lay down again. She added later, suspecting the girl would not know the meaning of it, "How uxorious indeed."

Dédicace:

Chère (avec vous, ce n'est pas «cher») potiron, permettez-moi d'inscrire votre nom ici ; car j'ai écrit, sur ce chapitre, une phrase qu'on a discutée, dans nos lettres. Cherchez-la, chère amie.

Vocabulaire:

1. Censor - Elected every five years, there are two of them elected to serve in tandem, like the consuls. There is no senior or junior censor, however, unlike the consuls. They are responsible for the census of Roman citizens (hence their name), the acceptance of publicani (s.v) contracts for the Treasury, etc. Take note that to be a censor, one has to be a consular (i.e. has to have served as consul at least once in his lifetime).
2. Consul suffectus (L.) / s uffect consul (Eng.) - Appointed by the Senate and another consul if one of the two consuls dies or is somehow rendered incapable of carrying out the duties of his office.
3. Minerva (L.) - Also known as Pallas Athena (Gk.), Athenaia, Tritogeneia; goddess of wisdom, crafts, and defensive war.
4. Morpheus - Sleep, brother of Death; deity of not only slumber but of dreams.
5. Plato, The Republic (in L., Res Publica ); Ovid - Plato and Ovid are famous literary figures from ancient times: Ovid more for his poetry (particularly the erotica), and Plato for his philosophical dialogues, of which "The Republic" is an example.
6. Publicani (L.) - Roman tax farmers/collectors. The taxes from Roman colonies abroad were collected ("farmed") by these persons, who were contracted by the state for that purpose. The actual nature of the contract is explained-in pared down form-below, in the chapter itself. Note that the word publicani/publicanus refers to either the individual tax farmers or to the tax farming corporation to which they belonged, as publicani formed corporations of their own. Hence, tax collection was a business in itself and often a very profitable one.

7. Traditionalists - This is a term used for the political group most opposed to Shizuru. They are patterned after the Roman faction "boni" (The Good Men). The "boni" were ultraconservative. Note that being "conservative" does not always mean one is part of the Traditionalists.

8. Tribune of the Plebs - To avoid confusion with other "tribune" officers, this office shall generally be referred to in full. Only plebeians can be elected here and only plebeians can vote for election of these officials-because the tribunes of the plebs were meant to defend the lives, property, and rights of all the plebs as a group. The main power of the office lies in two things: 1) the oath taken by the plebs to defend the inviolability of the holders of this office; and 2) the tribunician veto . A tribune of the plebs could veto virtually any decision of fellow government officials (except for the Dictator). As they could enact or veto laws, they were important when it came to legislative action. Hence it was expected of political groups or powerful politicians to "have/own" (be allied to) at least one tribune of the plebs to help with passing legislation. Traditionally, a tribune of the plebs loses his office once he crosses Rome's sacred boundary or the "pomerium", but I shall do away with that tradition for this story.

Inter Nos

Par ethnewinter

Shizuru did not sleep well that first night in Sosia Province. She wondered, during one of the fits of waking that spread themselves throughout the evening, if it was because she hardly ever slept so close to another person. If it was the simple fact of this unusual proximity that kept her restless, and whether or not that signified great paranoia or some other form of distrust. But try as she might, she could not find an iota of distrust for the girl that had come to be such a part of her days as well as evenings, and so ended up dismissing the idea overly quick. As a result, it took her much longer than it should have to come to the answer, which was closer to a distrust of herself.

I wonder if it is a mere matter of getting used to the propinquity of another being, she thought after another sudden awakening, holding in a sigh and trying to make as little movement as possible while changing her position on the bed she was sharing. Lying on her side, she rolled over slowly to end on her back. It was with some surprise that she realised that beams of the ceiling were now vaguely discernible, and thus lifted her head slightly to peek at the window of the distant wall opposite. Between the slats of the shutters she registered the lightening sky, which was not black as it had been what seemed only moments ago, but a brightening grey.

The distant sound of people stirring outside revealed the hour.

Wonderful, she thought grimly. It was perhaps the fourth time she had woken-which gave her how many hours of sleep, in all? She did a series of rapid calculations and came up with a figure that hardly reassured her as to her own state of rest. She had perhaps slept no more than four hours, with three being even more likely. She repressed a groan at this, marvelling that she was not yet feeling any of the slight pinching sensation she often felt around her temples when she failed to meet the demands of her body for rest. Grimacing at the idea that the pain would come later, she strained her ears to see if she could catch any change in the rhythmic breathing from the other occupant of the bed.

Still steady, she observed. And quiet.

Not for the first time, she wondered at how little noise the girl's respiration made. It had hardly been possible to make out her breaths even earlier, even in the dead silence of the night. Surely it is an indication of her athleticism, Shizuru considered; she had long remarked that people of great physical prowess often breathed more quietly and easily than the average, such that they hardly wheezed even after a good run. All the more when they were at rest, then.

Yes, she hardly makes a sound-or moves, for that matter, she noted, making out the shadowed form from a corner of her eye. Natsuki was on her side, her back facing the older woman. Whose next note to herself was that, for all her stillness, the girl's presence seemed strangely overwhelming to her at the moment.

Not in a bad way, she mused, gaze slowly rolling to the ceiling again. A dangerous way, perhaps, but not bad. Not unpleasant. How did one put it? She searched for the proper description and touched upon one that pleased her in mere seconds.

Like being next to a giant, untamed cat.

She smiled at the simile, amused by the aptness of the image her mind had thrown up. There was indeed a sleek, silent beast in her bed. And there was always that question, was there not, when it came to humans dealing with the beasts of nature, that of who posed the danger to whom? Did the danger come from the beast or the human?

Who is the beast, for that matter, she added to herself, before cursing her brain for being awake enough to entertain itself with such remarks at this ungodly hour. Or perhaps not such an ungodly hour anymore, she amended, after a quick survey with her senses. The darkness in the room was now mostly gone, fled in the face of a chilly light seeping in from the cracks of the shutters. And she could hear other sounds also seeping in: the distant, humming sound of people going about for their commerce, the occasional neighs of an odd horse or two, and the low braying of a mule. All muted, as the governor's residence was fairly set back from the roads, what with the garden separating it from the main avenues.

She considered rising. After all, it was unlikely that she would be able to sleep any more. Far more constructive to spend the time doing what needed to be done, instead of lying uselessly in bed and tracing the dim outlines of things in the room. Yes, perhaps she should get up.

No sooner had she made her decision than a stir in the figure beside her made her freeze. Not knowing why, she decided to shut her eyes and feign sleep as she apprehended that her companion was waking.

Wait, you silly fool, she rebuked herself, suddenly assailed by a great urge to slap a hand to her forehead. Whatever are you doing, pretending to be asleep?

She kept her act, however, and concentrated on relaxing her breathing pattern so that it mimicked the regularity of one in slumber. A few moments later, she felt the tremors of the bed indicating that the girl was moving out of it. Fascinated with tracing the movements through the vibrations, Shizuru held in a smile when she realised that the other was taking as much care as possible to get out of the bed without disturbing it too much.

She tracked the other's movements. Once the girl had gone from the sheets, there was the nearly inaudible sound of feet moving across the room and heading for the far corner, traceable only because the vibration travelled from floor to bedposts and finally to mattress. She very much suspected she would not hear the Otomeian moving at all had her own ear not been pressed to something in contact with the floor. After a while, she deemed it safe to peek at whatever her companion was doing and cracked open her eyes for a look.

The girl was facing the wall and had picked up, from the floor, the leather sack she used to carry her effects. After some rummaging, she extracted something dark from it. The implications hit the older woman after another few seconds, wherein Natsuki was engaged in replacing the sack.

She shut her eyes again before the girl could turn around. The footsteps started up once more and she followed their sound until they disappeared.

So today she shall bathe here.

A little while later, there was the sound of water splashing quietly. Shizuru's eyes flew open then and she shook her head at herself, wondering what had possessed her to engage in such a farce. Her gaze turned to the heavy dark curtains of the passageway that led to the bathing area, ears picking out the sounds coming from behind it. So her bodyguard had been telling the truth when she said she sometimes awoke early just to bathe. But how odd that this was Shizuru's first time to see the truth of it.

Or more properly, 'hear', she corrected to herself. I am not actually 'seeing' it.

And unbidden and traitorous, her mind threw up an image of what her Otomeian attendant must look like at the moment. It was enough to prompt her into regulating her breathing, even despite the fact that she knew the girl could not hear. Another splashing sound, and there was another image of the girl. Shizuru felt her breath go shallow as her mind filled with it, the sight of long black hair plastered to the slick, lithe form of a young body.

Ecastor!

She shook her head wildly, shuddering. Her discovery of her own capacity to feel such physical longings was still far too recent for her to make her peace with it, so each occasion of this capacity being made clear to her still had the power to disturb her deeply. It was not that she found anything innately distasteful in having sexual feelings: she was Himean, for one thing, and sex was part of the core around which Himean life revolved, whether as graffiti on the walls or as another strand of the web of relations in Senate. No, Shizuru's problem was simply that she did not know what to do with this newly awakened faculty, this desire not only to gaze upon someone and perhaps entertain the thought of a touch or two but to actually gaze upon someone even with just the mind's eye and want to take said someone apart with more than two touches. Usually, one could sate physical desires by acting upon them. But she could hardly go and sate her newest animal longing on her Otomeian attendant, for god's sake!

And is that not the nucleus of the discomfort, perhaps, she asked herself, considering her dilemma carefully. The inability to solve her problem was as discomfiting as the discovery of the problem itself. A woman known for her powerful confidence and aware of it, she cherished the ability to deal swiftly and efficiently with issues, working out solutions for them almost as soon as they turned up. She could find no simple and non-abusive way to solve this particular issue, however, no matter how many times she turned it over in her head. Inviting the girl to an affair might well turn into compelling the young woman given their military positions, and she was not about to do that to someone she had grown to like so deeply and so well. Seeking out an alternative lover on whom to slake her thirst was tossed away immediately, because the very thought of it seemed repugnant. What ill luck that when her sexual side awoke, it would do so with such strength and at the same time display such particularity!

She groaned softly when another wet sound brought back the pictures she had recently banished.

Stop it, she growled silently, turning her eyes heavenward in supplication. What is the matter with me?

Trying not to conjure up any more images that would set blood rushing to her head again, she applied herself instead to recounting those pieces of literature she had enjoyed enough to remember well after her schooling years. It was a technique she often employed when she needed to drown out the world-or a screaming speech from Senator Armitage. She would put on whatever expression the situation called for outwardly and then lose herself in the private world of literature, be it prose or poetry. As it was, she had been having more of a taste for poetry recently, so that decided which of the two she would be using at present.

So, poetry, she thought, gritting her teeth and trying to ignore the low splashing. Think of poetry, damn you! But poetry by whom?

She went through the gamut of poets she knew, smiling sardonically when Ovid came to her mind. Ovid, whose erotic literature was oft considered the height of classical sensuality. Ovid was rejected in a heartbeat.

Turning her head to the side as she pondered, her eyes fell upon the mural on the wall to her right. It was an exquisitely done piece of a cityscape under a starry night sky. She admired it for a moment before a memory surfaced, unbidden: Natsuki standing beside her in camp, a few nights before they had reached Sosia. Her hair falling free as always, her gaze turned upward as Shizuru pointed out the constellations for her sake.

Her pink, young girl's lips actually smiling.

Automatically, lines from Plato's Aster came rushing in. Shizuru voiced them only in her mind, and they took on a strange power in that bleak grey bedroom.

Light of my life, to the stars your face is turned. Would that I were the heavens... looking back at you with ten thousand eyes.

Feeling strangely sobered, she broke off her recollection. Aster had always been one of her favourites, one of the most beautiful. Yet it had never moved her as it did this day.

It was odd, she thought, that Plato wrote some of the most beautiful epigrams she had ever read, and yet condemned poetry-and the rest of the Arts, in general-in his book, The Republic. It made one wonder whether it was true when people said that feelings were the most dangerous swords of all. For that was similar to Plato's argument, was it not? That the Arts evoked emotion, and emotion was akin to danger and discord, if not the same thing.

But still...

Was it not perhaps a fair price for that beauty? To be part of the heavens, to burn up knowing what it felt like to be among the stars? Surely, Shizuru thought, surely to perish in such a way was one of the most enviable ways of achieving death.

After a moment she shook her head self-deprecatingly, smiling a little.

You feel lust for the first time and suddenly get too sentimental, were her words to herself.

Stirring from the other room made her snap out of her contemplations. Shutting her eyes again, she disciplined her breathing into subtlety once more and waited for Natsuki to come back.

Again the near-weightless footsteps.

Shizuru tracked her return, ears approximating where the girl was moving. The sounds told her that the younger woman had gone to the corner where the sack lay, apparently to put her effects into the pack. After a few more sounds of shuffling, the footsteps returned and made their way to the other side of the bed.

The steps ceased.

A shift in the bed told her the girl had seated herself on the edge. There were a few more shuffles of movement. And then there was only stillness, and the sounds getting louder from outside their room.

Willing herself immobile, Shizuru strained to hear anything that might give her an idea of what the girl was doing. To no avail. After a few more seconds of silence passed, Shizuru surmised that Natsuki had settled herself to her contentment and was perhaps only waiting for her to wake. The girl was always up by the time Shizuru rose, so she guessed this was part of the routine. Well, it was not an unpleasant routine. And ever since the girl had talked to her, Shizuru had had the benefit of waking to a small but beautiful smile each day, the girl's eyes narrowing in cheerful greeting at her own slightly sleep-blurred ones.

She pondered whether to get up yet or not. She knew she should not keep her companion waiting for too long, yet there was something strangely amusing about secretly observing what the girl's usual rituals were when waiting. After a while, however, a sudden odd thought pushed its way to the fore.

I wonder what she looks like with her hair wet.

Yet more indication of insanity, she thought to herself. Why would she want to know that? It was such a curious point of interest! Still, she had to admit that she did want to know what the girl was doing at the moment. Perhaps it would not be a bad thing, after all, to take a little peek?

Just to see, she reasoned. How could it hurt?

Making her decision, she gingerly opened one eye to peep at the girl, taking care not to move her head as she did it.

Only to freeze when she found herself looking up into great green eyes.

Ah.

Feeling very much as though she had been caught doing something naughty, Shizuru's mind worked to assess the situation, regardless of her surprise. Contrary to what she had expected, the girl had not been turned away. While Natsuki was in fact seated on the edge of the bed, she was also half-turned to the Himean and had her upper body in a position that indicated she had been facing Shizuru for some time. Shizuru registered the girl's surprise at being caught in this arrangement, even as she struggled with her own shock.

Seconds passed without any movement in the room, save for two pairs of eyebrows lifting in unison.

Was she looking at me too, I wonder, Shizuru thought while slowly opening her other eye. Though far from extravagant, that small gesture seemed to push the girl out of her daze. The Otomeian snapped her gaze away and turned, leaving the bed. She headed for a window, put a hand to the shutters as if to open them, then seemed to think better of it and turned around again. She turned stiffly once more like one locked in a room with no way out, then headed for the wall at the foot of which her pack rested. There she stopped in front of the wall, her back radiating acute embarrassment.

She was watching me, Shizuru thought, not entirely sure of it but feeling it to be so. She had to be watching me.

Silence seemed to pervade the room, although a litany of unspoken words crackled in between the two women.

Ye gods, was she really watching me?

"Natsuki," she said, careful to keep her voice steady as always.
"Good morning, Natsuki."

She exhaled as the girl turned again, this time to face her although she kept her head down.

Why was she watching me?

"Would you open the windows? It is morning."

The girl nodded. She went to the windows and began pulling back the shutters, flooding the room with the light of the dawn. By the second window enough light had entered the room to show the burning of her cheeks.

Shizuru gazed at their colour and thought, reflectively, that waking to this sort of face was not a bad way to begin a day either.

It was much later that Shizuru and her companion were finally ready to leave their room: half of the time was spent with the former putting the latter at ease, and the other half spent with the former's own morning rituals. By the time Shizuru had finished bathing and dressing herself, both of them were comfortable with each other once more, Natsuki even unbending so far as to inquire why the older woman chose to wear a toga for the day.

"Oh, this?" Shizuru replied, plucking at the garment folded and draped over her white tunic. "I suppose it is because we are in a Himean province now. I shall not look out of place wearing it here."

Natsuki nodded, fascination clear on her face. She looked as if she wanted to take apart the odd bolt of cloth and dissect it, thought her amused subject.

"But to be honest," Shizuru continued, "it is also because all these folds..." She paused to indicate the burgundy cloth draped about her with a satisfied smile. "They provide so much insulation. Very handy clothing, you perceive. What do you think?"

Her arms lifted slightly at her sides.

"I never did ask what you thought of it when I first wore one," she told the girl.

The Otomeian tilted her head one way then the other, eyebrows drawing together as she considered it.

"Fine," she pronounced.

Shizuru chuckled: "Only fine? I am disappointed!"

"I luh-" the girl started, hesitating and colouring slightly. "I like it."

Shizuru smiled.

"You are sweet," she said. "And I am pleased. I shall wear this more often, perhaps. But only to please you, Natsuki."

She tipped her head at the door.

"At any rate, shall we go? I am famished and am eager to break my fast. Are you hungry too?"

The Otomeian shrugged, her usual reply to that particular question. The older woman was about to comment on it when a thought came unbidden to her mind and she halted, looking around the room.

"Why, I think I did not notice it so much before," she said slowly, eyes roaming. "Because it was night-time when we got here. But now that I look at it in the light of the morning, it occurs to me that this room reminds me of a friend's study, back in Hime. Oh, not the details, but... the theme and the general impression. She always did have a taste for moonlit themes-I daresay I teased her often enough for it."

She smiled, thinking of that friend whom she treasured deeply. She turned the smile to her companion.

"I myself tend towards crimson and purple," she confessed. "Which she always said was very royal of me."

She moved towards the door after this and the girl followed. No sooner had they opened it, however, than they came face to face with the senior legate, who looked as though she had been about to knock.

"Careful where you knock, Chie-han," Shizuru said, eyeing the knuckles about to rap her on the nose. "Some doors fight back, you know."

"Pardon, you surprised me!" The senior legate tipped her head at the girl behind her commander. "Natsuki-san, too. Good morning to both of you."

"Good morning. What did you need, so early in the day?"

"News."

"As I have been sleeping all night," Shizuru lied, "I am hardly the best source of it."

"Oh, no, sorry," Chie grinned. "I mean that I have news."

"Yes, and I gather it is important enough to bring you to my door at such an hour to fetch me personally." Shizuru cuddled the folds of her toga over her shoulder. "Shall we hear it over breakfast? I am hungry, and I am sure Natsuki is as well."

"Oh, yes, of course," said the other woman. "Actually, they're waiting for us in the dining room."

"They?"

The three women now began to walk, Chie leading the way.

"The local quaestor and someone else," she told Shizuru.

"So much mystery in the morning."

The legate laughed.

"Don't rob me of my small pleasures, please. You'll see," she said, turning a corner. "It's part of the news."

"Indeed."

When they finally entered the atrium where the governor had had meals for them arranged, Shizuru saw two men waiting at the table. The pair rose to their feet upon seeing the women enter, one of them mopping his mouth hurriedly with a handkerchief: they had just broken their fasts themselves. Shizuru eyed the pair as they bowed their heads in greeting, and she noted that both were wearing togas as well. She already knew the quaestor, having met him last night, but she had yet to meet the other one-although she did know who he was. Most of the senators from good families knew each other by sight.

Chie interrupted her assessment of the two men.

"You've already met Homura-san, the quaestor of the province," she told Shizuru, as they seated themselves opposite the men.

"Yes. Good morning, Homura-han," she said to the shorter of the pair.

"Good morning, Fujino-san," he returned. "I hope all was well with your bedroom and you managed to get a good night's rest?"

The general only barely managed to stop her lips from twitching.

"I was very well rested," she said.

Chie moved on to introducing the other person at the table.

"And this is-"

Shizuru finished for her, giving the other man a welcoming smile.

"Takeda Masashi-han, correct?"

The taller of the two men nodded his head in acknowledgment. His eyes strayed idly past her for a second and, to the curiosity of Shizuru, who was watching him closely, he stiffened from top to toe, even the short hairs on the top of his head seeming to stand to attention. Shizuru wondered what it was that had affected him, and would have turned her head to see for herself, had she not recalled that her bodyguard was standing at her rear.

Ah, I suppose he has never seen someone garbed in such a way, she thought, waiting for the man to get over his surprise. When it became apparent that they he was not about to do so anytime soon-even Homura and Chie had noticed by now, and were looking at him askance-Shizuru decided she had better do something, all the while remarking to herself what an odd reaction the man was having to

Natsuki.

Turning her head to the side, she beckoned to her bodyguard, who dutifully came closer.

She does not seem the least bit worried by Masashi-han's stare, at least. If anything, Shizuru guessed from the subtle slant of the dark brows that the Otomeian was actually a little irritated. That made sense: Natsuki seemed to dislike being the subject of either discussion or attention very much; Shizuru had seen the girl grow intensely uncomfortable before when suffering either case.

"Natsuki," she said, keeping her eyes on the girl's face as the latter leaned forward so that she would not have to speak aloud. "Would you sit by me, please?"

Natsuki responded with a mildly questioning look, one that threatened to glance at the other Himeans around the table for argument. The older woman nodded her rebuttal.

Giving in, the girl pulled out the chair next to Shizuru's and settled on it, preoccupying herself with shifting her gaze about the surroundings-and not on the people at the table, who were all looking at her by this time. Shizuru saved her the discomfort by gaining their attention, addressing the still-stricken Takeda Masashi loudly and asking if he and Homura had already concluded their breakfast.

The two men affirmed it.

"And I must say, Fujino-san, it's a surprise you know me," Takeda said, finally having recovered from whatever it was about the Otomeian that had shocked him moments before. "I'm flattered that you should even know my name."

Shizuru shook her head.

"Only natural, Masashi-han," she returned, quietly noting the way his eyes seemed to flicker over to the Otomeian at her side every few seconds. "After all, you do have a reputation for being one of the best sport swordsmen in the land."

"Please," he deferred. "I'm hardly as well-known as that. Just a sportsman too."

"Who served in the Battle of Larentia, with great distinction, so I have heard," Shizuru followed smoothly. "Besides which, you were one of our tribunes of the plebs for the past term, I think?"

Chie interrupted: "Actually, Shizuru-san, Takeda-san is an outgoing tribune of the plebs."

The hint took. A light eyebrow went up.

"Outgoing?" Shizuru echoed, letting the tiniest amount of mystification into her voice.

"Yes. He's not actually been replaced yet, to be precise, in his seat in the Plebeian Tribunes' College."

A scant second went by, during which Shizuru's mind shot into lightning speed and began working out scenarios that might explain the irregularity of Chie's statement. Having listed all the possibilities in her mind, she then proceeded to question her legate, to see which case was correct.

"How can that be?" she asked. "Surely our elections must have been finished by now. In fact, I would have expected the elected candidates to have been announced and inducted to office at this time." She looked at them thoughtfully. "Unless the turn-over has been postponed due to some emergency?"

It was Takeda who let out a short breath, shaking his head.

"If only that had been what happened, Fujino-san," he said with a grimace. "No, the turn-over hasn't been postponed. It's the elections were put off."

This time, both light eyebrows lifted.

"I confess that is a surprise," Shizuru said. "Why?"

"It's actually do several things, Fujino-san. But before anything else, you must know that the junior consul's seat has been empty for the past few months," Takeda said, assuming an even graver air than before. "Utada Asou-san is dead."

"Ah!"

"It's his illness did him in," Takeda said. "You know that he has the wheezing disease, Fujino-san?"

She nodded equably: "I recall he used to complain of it often, especially in summer and winter."

"It came upon him one evening and his wife woke up to find him turning blue. She sent for the doctor, but it was too late."

She shook her head with polite lament. After a moment, she sent him another inquiring look.

"But," she said, "I fail to see how this affects the elections, tragedy though it may be."

"That's because there's more," said Chie, deeming it time that she re-entered the conversation. "That's actually the second part of the story, Shizuru-san."

"Then it appears we have violated the rules of storytelling, yes?" Shizuru grinned. "Please be so good as to tell me the prologue."

"Takeda-san?" Chie prompted.

The man launched into his story.

"We'd been getting reports from Africa Province ever since you left," he said. "About the tribes living near the Mauretanians. The natives were restless and giving their king trouble. Nothing to make anyone worry at first. You know how it is, Fujino-san: the natives always come crying to us about every little thing, and we can't just indulge the savages with their paranoia, else they'll depend on us even just to pick out their clothes for them."

She nodded.

"Just when we were getting used to it, up came the news that some subordinate tribal chief's son was inciting rebellion up in Mauretania. And they did. It's that civil war put our province in a bind."

"Ah." Shizuru smiled. "And since we have a treaty with the Mauretanian king, I suppose the governor of our Africa Province supported that side?"

"Yes," he answered. "But he got himself trounced in the first battle he fought for them. Not a military man. He retreated into the city after defeat, barricaded the gates, and prepared himself for a siege." Takeda frowned. "Good thing he still managed to send off for help from Hime, otherwise we might not have learned in time. Africa Province would've been eaten up quickly: it's not as militarised as it used to be, I think, now that most of your legions from your previous campaign have been transferred to new posts. And like I said, they're not led by a capable military woman any longer."

The woman with the red eyes squinted them thoughtfully.

"May I make a guess, then," she ventured, "as to how all of this involves the postponement of elections?"

Although he looked doubtful of her ability to guess it rightly, Takeda gave his assent.

"Then, please correct me if I am wrong," she responded, before launching into her venture. "I suppose that, when news from Africa came along, the Senate put to debate what the proper response would be. Whereupon it was decided-with great reluctance, I imagine-that it would be necessary to send a relief army to that province. Oh, not for the sake of concentrating efforts on helping the King of the Mauretanians win the war in his country! Rather to concentrate on keeping the war out of our own territory."

The tribune's smile faltered.

"Go on," he said.

"And the condition was this," Shizuru proceeded. "That the sent army would be under the command of one of the archconservatives, the Traditionalists being rather strong in influence at the moment-I am thinking Armitage-han was chosen, as Kikukawa-han has just announced her candidacy for consul and that would be sufficient reason to prevent her from going on a prolonged campaign abroad. It would surely be more in their interests if she stayed and prepared instead for her impending election to the consulship."

Takeda's smile was gone by now.

"Correct, it's Armitage-san," he told her, trying not to show his amazement too much at her statements. "You know our fellows so well, Fujino-san."

"Just enough. And this is why the elections were postponed," Shizuru continued. "Because Utada Asou-han suffered his fatal attack a little after the senior consul departed for Africa. By the time the message reached Armitage-han, she was perhaps already heavily committed to the military engagement, which meant-if I know anything at all of Armitage-han-she refused to return to Hime just for the sake of presiding over election week."

She tapped a finger thoughtfully on her lip and concluded: "I am guessing that our dear senior consul has thus far refused to abandon her post in Africa Province despite all the calls for her return that Senate must have sent by now, no doubt citing the ongoing civil war and threat to the African territories as her reason for not returning. This meant that no elections could be held, for it is necessary that at least one consul be present when they occur. Is that correct?"

Chie smirked, watching the two men at the table stare at her friend with frank admiration.

"Yes," Takeda said. "That is what happened, Fujino-san."

"You left the city only recently, Masashi-han?"

"Yes."

"By that time, did anyone think to point out to our senior consul that she could simply return to Hime for a single day, just enough time so that the Senate could appoint the consul suffectus?"

Takeda shook his head bitterly.

"No," he said. "Refused even that, said she was too busy! So the Senate couldn't appoint a suffect consul and the whole city's in a bind."

He paused, face setting into severe lines.

"The city is presently without consuls," he told the Himeans around him. "And the Senate is helpless. I'm here now because I didn't see how I could be of any use to Hime at this time. Even the tribunes of the plebs are quiet, everything's gone into a kind of frozen state. I couldn't bear to stay there any longer, thought I'd go off for a visit to the north for a bit, especially since I had to see an old friend here as well. Still, I'll be going back south in two days or so. I can only pray to the gods that they'll have resolved this by then."

"In two days?" Chie said to him. "You must not know Armitage very well."

He sighed with great feeling, knowing she was probably right.

"It's embarrassing," he said. "Absolutely shameful! I can't believe Armitage-san is refusing to see reason here, to be frank. She always seemed such an upstanding person to me before!"

If he noticed that Shizuru's face took on a look of scepticism at this, he made no remark on it.

"She might be interested in prolonging her consulship," Chie suggested, only half-heartedly.

"That's impossible!" he said. "I doubt very much that Armitage-san would do that, at least. I think, rather, she's just being overly cautious. There's such a thing in warfare, really. She probably doesn't want to take the chance of leaving Africa Province without her command of her legions for a day."

"I am sure that is it," Shizuru said, again with a look of dry scepticism.

"Yes, what else can it be?" Takeda asked, blissfully unaware of the other Himean's heavy sense of irony. "Still, I wish she'd unbend. I mean, surely there are sub-commanders-legates, for example-who can take over for a few days! Hime shouldn't be left like this, with the elections dangling over everyone's head. And no consuls, even suffect ones, are in the city too! It's against all the rules, all tradition."

Using his eyes to probe Shizuru's, he waited for a reaction, having invested quite a bit of his own passion into his speech. It was only natural that he hoped for a response echoing his feelings.

Shizuru disappointed him sorely in that hope, unfortunately.

"Quite," she sighed unconcernedly.

Having expected a more animated response, the tribune of the plebs as well as the quaestor of Sosia stared at the other Himean, who simply reached out and took a loaf of bread from the platter on the table, then tore the loaf apart with her hands. Chie hid a grin as the fair-haired woman went on to put one half onto her plate, then put the other half on the plate before her bodyguard. She did all of this with a cheerful smile that said she was troubled by absolutely nothing.

"There we are," she said after pulling a saucer of olive oil between her Otomeian's plate and her own. She stopped to look up after that and appeared to notice only then the silence of the men.

"Well, yes, it is a pity, as you say," she told them, still sounding far too nonchalant about it for Takeda's taste. "But do cheer up, Masashi-han! An unfortunate turn of events must not be allowed to ruin breakfast. I dearly hope it has not ruined yours."

She smiled at the girl next to her and proceeded to show her how to dip pieces of bread into the dish of olive oil near them.

"If Hime has no consul within her walls at the moment, then surely the other magistrates can suffice," she went on to say, dipping her own piece of bread into the oil. "What else do we elect so many for, if that is not case? Those of them we do not pay too much rob the Treasury dry of revenue wherever they can, anyway, so they should be able to stand a little overtime. Let them earn their keep, I say. Not that it concerns me overmuch at the moment, given that I am part of neither the old term's elected officials nor the candidates for the next one. In the end, my opinion counts for little. So I say we just all enjoy our meal and ignore them back in the city."

She was about to put the morsel in her mouth before glancing at her senior legate and pausing.

"Why, Chie-han," she said, with complete innocence. "Shall you not eat?"

Chie's lips trembled right before she started laughing.

---

"That was so good," Chie said later, wiggling her eyebrows as she walked beside her friend. "So very good! You had both Takeda-san and Homura-san gaping at you."

Shizuru grinned while recalling the events at breakfast.

"I wonder why," she said. "I fail to see why they should expect me to react otherwise. It is not as though my worrying-or failing to enjoy my breakfast, for that matter-could have done anything for Hime's situation."

"Oh so rational." A low chuckle. "I hope Takeda-san doesn't go back to Hime saying you're perfectly indifferent to the woes of the city."

"He just might, but it matters little," Shizuru said, letting out a giggle of her own. "Even were I to worry, it would be senseless. After all, if there are no consuls in Hime, it means that Chikane, being urban praetor, is now the highest-ranked magistrate the city possesses. There is no need to worry if she is present."

"Oh, damn it! That reminds me."

Chie stopped walking, prompting the other two women to do the same as they watched her fumble into the folds of her toga. After another moment of digging around, she finally produced a scroll and held it out to Shizuru.

"The latest batch of letters," she explained. "They came just this morning, you know, and actually tried to catch up with us on the march. The rest of your letters are in my room, but I thought you would like to read this one as soon as possible."

"Indeed?" Shizuru mumbled, opening the tube casing and pulling out the roll of parchment within it. Her eyes lit up as she recognised the seal of blue-black wax on the missive. "A letter from Chikane!"

"Yes," Chie said, grinning. "She hardly ever writes, so this probably means it's something important." A lift of the eyebrows. "Besides, like you said, she's practically in charge of the city now and is probably constantly busy, so her taking the time to write now is even more interesting."

"True," Shizuru said, breaking the seal. "I wonder what it could be."

Unrolling the parchment, she moved to the nearest window and skimmed through the letter, her eyes flicking rapidly over the characters and separating them into words and sentences.

"Anything interesting?" Chie asked.

"A few things..."

Shizuru trailed off as she resumed her reading. Chie waited on edge, dying to know what was inside the missive. After what seemed to her an unbelievably short amount of time, her friend rolled up the scroll and assumed a pensive look.

"Jupiter!" Chie exclaimed, frowning. "You're still as fast at reading as when we were younger, Shizuru-san."

Shizuru smiled: "You say that as though you do not see me reading every day at my desk in headquarters."

"Since I'm often occupied by my work as well at those times, General, I don't really notice how fast you are unlike just now."

"I see."

"So, what did it say?"

"Chikane merely talked about events in Hime," she said. "And something I must think on."

Chie's brow knotted; she wanted to know more.

"Perhaps we should move on?" Shizuru resumed, tucking the scroll into the folds of her own toga. "Takumi-han is probably waiting for us. I did tell him I would see him today."

Chie nodded, masking her disappointment at not being able to learn the contents of the epistle she had delivered.

"Yes," she said. "You're right. Let's go meet him."

They went to see the praefectus fabrum in the quarters set aside for his professional use. The room, they found, was already occupied by scroll buckets, abacuses, and rolls of paper. Three accountants-cum-scribes sat at the large table overflowing with quills and ledgers, busily jotting down figures and accounts for the army's supplies purveyor.

"The typical accountant's chaos," Chie whispered to Shizuru, as they received salutations from the occupants of the room.

The praefectus himself sat at a desk, conversing with a pepper-haired man with the look of a plutocrat-which he turned out to be, as the visitors found out.

"Fujino-san, Chie-san, this is Masao Shikishima-san," said Takumi, getting up from his seat to greet Shizuru and Chie. "One of the more prominent individuals of this fair province. He's here as the representative of Sosia's grain and vegetable merchants, so I'm drawing up supply contracts through him."

"I am honoured to meet you, Fujino Shizuru-san," said the man, bowing deeply where he stood. "The news of your victory at Argentum had all of us breathing easier."

"My thanks, Shikishima-han," the general returned, bowing slightly. "That victory was actually due in no small part to the efforts of my senior legate here, Chie Harada."

After a few more social preliminaries were made, all four settled to business. They drew up chairs into a circle beside the table-for Takumi, mindful of proprieties, did not deem it proper to occupy the position of power behind his table when the commander of the army was present as well.

"To say that we are pleased with the way you do business would be an understatement, Fujino-san," said Shikishima. "Takumi-san has told me that you intend to pay for whatever you consume in immediate cash and not by promissory notes from the Treasury. Indeed a surprise, and almost unbelievable given what the usual method is."

"I assure you that what Takumi-han says is true," Shizuru replied. "Whatever my army takes, my army shall pay for as soon as it can. I presume you have already agreed on the prices for the contracts?"

"Ah, yes," the man said, smiling. "Another thing that pleases us. Takumi-san readily agreed upon the prices in these parts, for which we are grateful. We gave a discount for the bulk sum, of course! But we gave it willingly."

Shizuru gave him a wry smile. She knew that some Himean officials often used their clout to force businessmen to sell goods to them at a far lower price than usual. Sometimes, it reached the point of actual extortion, she thought, especially when you were buying from someone who was Himean too: there was little benefit to the Republic as a whole when one member cheated another, in her opinion.

"It is only proper to conduct business so," she said.

"Alas, it is not commonplace."

That brought an amused smile to the red lips.

"I am sure that the great Fujino-san understands," the man added.

The smile became wider.

"I suppose she would, if she were here," came her reply. "As it is, I am afraid you only have a regular Fujino-san before you, and certainly no great one."

Chie let out a peculiar sound that seemed a cross between a giggle and a choke.

"Although I can assure you that this "-Shizuru paused to indicate herself-" very regular Fujino-san understands," Shizuru continued, watching the older man's eyebrows climb almost to the top of his hairline before he started laughing.

"Oh, forgive me," he said once he had his composure again. "I must say I did not exactly expect the grea-the much-talked about Fujino-san, rather, to be so..." He flapped his hands while seeking the right term. "Agreeable!"

"I am pleased you find me to be to that," Shizuru replied.

"It makes the other business easier to bring up, perhaps."

"And that would be?"

The older man licked his lips, looking slightly uncomfortable.

"This is a more dangerous matter, Fujino-san," he said.

"How dangerous?"

"Dangerous enough that I worry over saying it even here, in the private rooms of your praefectus ."

Shizuru glanced at Takumi and interpreted his nod in an instant.

"Yet you have already told him of it, I see," she said to the man.

"Not all of it."

"I see." She turned her head to the other persons in the room, the assistants. "Please leave us for a moment. Give us an hour, at least."

The addressed persons got up and left instantly, shutting the door behind them. Shikishima noted that she did not ask the black-haired girl with her to leave too. Well, that was enough: if she trusted the young woman, he would have to as well.

"Shikishima-han, if you please."

"It concerns the governor, Suda Yuuji-san," he started.

Shizuru inclined her head, maintaining her pleasantly enquiring expression. The man looked unwilling to elaborate even now that the room had been cleared, however, and it was the praefectus who finally decided to introduce the topic.

"Shikishima-san and some of the other worthy citizens of Sosia say they have an issue that has been making them uneasy for some time now," the younger man said, after a meaningful look at the local plutocrat. "It concerns certain... uh, practices Suda Yuuji-san has been carrying out as an order of business but that cross over into orders of state."

The only reply was another polite tilt of the head from his commander, although the senior legate did furrow her brow in expectation. Takumi sent a look towards Shikishima that seemed to say that it was his turn to explain now. The older man sighed.

"You've not been around Sosia long enough to notice it, Fujino-san," Shikishima said. "But you would possibly note, after a day of going about the city, that there is an excessive number of foreigners within the walls."

"Indeed?"

"An inordinate number, in fact, even considering that this is a city known for trade."

Shizuru nodded patiently.

"I am afraid that it is not exactly trade that concerns these foreigners," Shikishima continued. "But a different kind of commerce. Perhaps it may be considered trade as well, but it is an illegal one, and one that I and the rest of the Himeans within this city do not approve of in the least, for it threatens our very identities."

There was patent curiosity in the face before him now. Taking heart, he went straight to it.

"Governor Suda Yuuji-san," he said, biting off his words crisply to show his displeasure, "has been selling the Himean citizenship to foreigners."

He paused for effect but did not receive any powerful response save a raised eyebrow. He was about to go on when an audible huff from the other woman-the senior legate-stopped him.

"You have proof, Shikishima-san?" she asked.

"We have witnesses," he answered. "As well as people who have bought the citizenship themselves."

"Willing to incriminate themselves?" Chie asked, incredulous. "After all, they get themselves in trouble too by testifying that they bought the citizenship, even while they get the governor in trouble."

"We sent them to buy the citizenship for that purpose." His thin lips came up to form the shrewd smile of a businessman. "Everyone in Sosia has known for a while now that Suda Yuuji-san sells the citizenship to the unworthy. There has just been no opportunity to call him out for it. He is the legally-appointed governor, after all, and has the strength of his office-and the local soldiers under him."

He lifted his hands in supplication.

"But when the opportunity loomed, we knew we had to act. Once we learned that Senator Shizuru Fujino was in the north and nearby, we decided to present the case to her." He waved his hands eloquently and continued: "Of course, one does not bring allegations about a senator of Hime before another without garnishing one's case with proof. Hence the seemingly odd, ah, circumstance of there being witnesses as well as persons willing to step forward and give testimony to the crime."

Chie's lips turned up: "A set-up."

"Yes, Harada-san. So the witnesses are protected by the law, at least."

"They will have to be hidden after this is brought before court, if it is brought before a court."

"We shall see to their protection."

Shizuru shifted her position slightly, which brought all eyes to her despite the motion's subtlety.

"I shall see the witnesses later," she said in her usual calm tone.

"And I shall talk to the people as well. Should I be satisfied that the case is indeed as you say, Shikishima-han, I promise you I shall put a cease to this dastardly business. But first of all, I need to know that it is indeed dastardly. So I fear that I cannot promise to do anything for now, as I wish to be certain of the matter first."

Shikishima nodded. "A fair proposition."

"So that is settled for now?"

"Of course," he said, bowing his head. "Although this is only part of the reason I wished to see you, Fujino-san."

He stopped to look at Chie with an appraising eye.

"And we have Harada-san here too," he said. "Which makes my hopes a little better as we now have two senators to listen to our case. And senators are what we need. We need senators to talk to badly."

"Regarding?" Chie prompted.

"Taxation."

Shizuru stifled a giggle as her friend groaned audibly, falling back into her chair. The praeфекtus, in contrast, chuckled outright.

"As always," the short-haired woman mumbled ironically, sending Shizuru a wry smile. "Taxation."

Shikishima grinned as well, understanding the reaction.

"I know that Hime's other foreign provinces must bring up the issue often," he said. "But it is the only way we can be sure that the problem remains at the forefront of the officials' minds, for it grows more and more pressing."

He paused to draw a deep breath, savouring the smell of ledgers and drying ink-scents he was used to, especially in his occupation.

"My fellow citizens are growing restive," he went on. "Not only are we being made to suffer the outrage of outsiders lording it about the city as though they were true Himean citizens, but there is also the matter of the tax rates having risen to excessive levels. We understand that it is necessary for Hime to tax us, as we are her province and members and many of us members of her people. But the taxes being demanded are far beyond the permissible amount now."

"May I ask for figures?" the younger of the two senators before him said.

He nodded and proceeded to quote the present against the feasible tax rate to her-to which she replied with more queries that startled him with her obvious grasp of finance. They bantered on for a little longer, his respect for the youthful senator growing by leaps and bounds when he found her as well-versed in accounting and business as he was.

The senior legate listened to this with an amused look on her face, only half-understanding the conversation. She had never had a penchant for figures, so she tended to avoid such technical discussions when confronted. No shame there, since most of the senators were the same. After all, that was what bankers and accountants were for. More efficient to compartmentalise functions and let the abacus-toters handle those aspects of government. There were no expectations of senators to be good accountants, so while Shizuru was most definitely impressive, she was not necessarily emulated.

Still, it's a pity too, she admitted. After all, the present attitude often reinforced the notion that politicians did not need to learn the ins and outs of fiscal policy-something many of them would do better to know since it enhanced their grasp of administration. One could count on two hands those senators who actually understood economics, and if one were to talk about those who actually understood it well enough to be considered proficient in its management, she suspected the count would come down to one hand.

No wonder people tend to view her as a god, she thought with detached enjoyment, watching her friend and the Sosian plutocrat continue to trot out figures and debate the merits of charging this much interest and that. How intelligent Shizuru sounded, even compared to the mired-in-figures merchantman! She was so crisp and confident, so creditable. She really was much too good at everything.

It was perhaps what made her so unsettling, Chie reflected.

At this point, the two had finished their technical conversation. Shizuru's smile was dry.

"I see," she said. "Far too much indeed."

"I am happy you see our point, Fujino-san."

She sighed with obvious distaste. "How could one not? This sort of thing is becoming excessive, as you said, to the point where it cannot be concealed anymore beneath the usual bureaucratic paper layers. No wonder the foreign territories often complain."

"That bad?" Chie asked.

"Very." Shizuru paused. "Perhaps even worse. It occurs to me, Shikishima-han, that these are such high fees that not everyone can afford to pay them. Nor can everyone who affords to do so pay them with equanimity, I think."

Shikishima's heavy-lidded blue eyes turned flinty as the arrow hit the mark.

"You're right," he said. "Which means that the publicani often use the governor's legionaries to collect their fees under duress. Or use the same legionaries to force people into borrowing money from them... then taking that borrowed money as the tax due. It ends with locals being heavily indebted to their own tax collectors."

The two women exchanged a look, whereas the praefectus fabrum, who had been listening to the conversation, felt his eyes go wide. He had heard the talk, back in Hime, of the publicani of the foreign provinces using Himean governors' troops to collect the taxes or terrorising the citizens when they were unable to deliver. Though he admitted the possibility, he had thought such reports to be more exaggerated than exact. Yet the way Shikishima stated it was so direct, so frank, that he could not help but believe all the worst rumours it now.

Surely my sister should know about this, he thought, his mind going to his sibling in Hime. She should do something about this-I know she hates this sort of thing in particular.

"Then," intruded his general's voice, a welcome and soothing sound. "May I presume they have been applying more force recently?"

"You may indeed, Fujino-san," said Shikishima. "That is why we decided to bring it up before you, in fact. Too much, just too much! Surely it is not in Hime's interests to impoverish her provinces or to ravage them when they are unable to deliver an impossible amount."

Shizuru smiled dryly again: "I would think it is not. You have incidents? Cases with evidence?"

"Enough to wet anyone's eyes with pity and rage, Fujino-san."

"No more be said on that, then. I am familiar enough with these things to guess at it."

"Then please help us."

She considered him for a moment, then leaned back against her chair.

"You know I cannot do much about it until I return to Hime," she said. "For only then can I introduce the necessary legislation to the House that will-let us hope!-alleviate the problem."

He nodded.

"We know," he said. "And we are willing to place our faith in that event."

He stopped, held out his hand in appeal.

"All that we ask now," he said. "Is that Senator Fujino-and Harada-san, if she wishes to espouse the cause as well-vow to take up the matter upon return to Hime and the Senate. In exchange, of course, we become part of your constituency." He paused to impress the weight of the offer. "By 'we' I really do mean 'we', Fujino-san. Nearly all the plutocrats of Sosia, in fact, from the mining corporations to those like me who deal in import and storage, have agreed to henceforth enrol as part of your clientele, should you only pledge to see to this issue."

The red eyes showed a spark of interest, although it was too short for the businessman to assess what the woman was thinking. After a few more moments, Shizuru turned to face her friend and fellow senator, who had a far more intrigued look on her countenance.

"Chie-han," she said gently. "It is a good offer. Are you interested?"

"I can't stand figures and you know it," Chie said with a wide smile. "But whatever you do, I'll support it."

Shizuru turned to the Sosia merchant.

"I accept," she said.

"Well!" said Shikishima, obviously delighted to have two senators on his side already. "That is wonderful! Consider us in your debt, Senators."

"I would be wary of talking about debt again, Shikishima-han," Shizuru replied, a mischievous twinkle in her eye. "After all, that is one of your problems, is it not?"

He laughed appreciatively: "Do I have your leave to tell the others?"

"I suppose it is all right." She tilted her head back, the tawny tresses waving softly with the motion. "But you understand, of course, that the only problem I can truly remedy with finality while I am here is the first one-that having to do with the illicit sale of the citizenship. I can stop that, I think, even without needing to take it to the Bribery Court in Hime. If I waited for the opportunity to take it there, it would take too long and too many potentially unsavoury characters will have gained the citizenship illegally by that time."

She exhaled softly and went on. "While I can perhaps alleviate the second now, it shall be only to a moderate extent. As I said earlier, the publicani's contracts are made with the Treasury through the censors, so a more final solution shall have to wait until I go home to bring up legislation regarding it. Or have someone bring up that legislation for me."

She regarded him warmly.

"Patience is of value when you are working in a world such as ours, Shikishima-han," she told him. "As is faith in the right people. You have my assurance that I shall work on it, once I return to Hime, so have faith in me."

"We are eternally grateful," he said.

"Much though I appreciate it, it is not your gratitude that I would prize most," she said suddenly. "But your loyalty."

Shikishima blinked, his gaze meeting the unflinching one before him. After a while, he smiled, eyes sparkling with interest.

"And you have it, Fujino-san."

---

"I wish," Chie said later that day while tipping her cup to her lips, "that the publicani would be a little less greedy and a little more realistic when they make their bids."

Shizuru nodded, nursing her own goblet in one slender hand. They were presently in her room, to which they had retired after the meeting with Masao Shikishima and Takumi Tokiha. The venue was calculated: here, they could speak more freely regarding the issues that had just been brought to their attention, as well as mull over the possible solutions over a comforting goblet of warm and watered wine. Having finished discussing the alleged misdeeds of Sosia's governor-which they both deplored-they were now talking about the problem of the publicani .

An institution that had somehow managed to become indispensable to Hime's policy with her foreign territories, the publicani had come to represent, for most citizens of those territories, an unavoidable evil. The evil was in the way the publicani came up with the contracts allowing them to collect the taxes from a specific province. There were various publicani companies, of course, and these competed with each other to win the state contract to collect taxes in this or that province. The competition was settled through a bidding process.

At the start of every fiscal year, Hime's Treasury would announce the minimum amount of tax it was willing to receive (or collect, that is) from a province. The publicani interested in that province would then run up figures to estimate how much they could afford to give to the Treasury-always adding to that minimum figure, of course-while still making a profit for themselves.

To use a crude example, if the Treasury stipulated the minimum tax for a certain province to be 5 denarii, the publicani might post a bid saying that they would be able to collect a total of 9 denarii instead, where they would give the state 6 instead of the original 5 being asked-thus increasing the Treasury's revenue-and keep the remaining 3 denarii, to make a profit. To counter this, another publicanus might raise the bid to 12 denarii and offer 7 or 8 denarii to the Treasury, in an attempt to outbid the other.

The publicani's concern, of course, was to attract the State into granting them the contracts: they did it by offering it as much money as possible while still making a fat profit. After all, the Treasury only cared about the amount that it received, and not about that which the publicani got on the side. The result was that bids tended to escalate beyond reasonable figures, with the Treasury and the publicani benefiting, while the provinces were the ones left to produce the figures that the publicani had essentially drawn from thin air.

"The problem too," said Shizuru, meditating on these things. "Is that the censors, even if they do appreciate the impracticality of the figures, are obliged by law to choose the contracts with the highest profit for the State." She sighed, swished the wine in her cup. "These irrational laws need to go."

"Have an idea?" Chie asked, eyes twinkling.

Shizuru nodded. "I have given thought to the issue before, Chie-han. It has not escaped me that many of our foreign citizens complain of it. You recall we have run into the same thing several times before, during our other campaign."

"Yes, that's true."

"So," the younger woman went on, smiling meditatively. "Once I am able to, I think I shall legislate to remove all such contracts from the publicani."

"Ecaster!" The other stared at her friend, who merely regarded her with amusement. "Oh, you're mad! Even you can't get away with that!"

Shizuru tilted her head inquiringly, whereas Chie shook hers.

"They're an institution," the latter explained. "A powerful one, too, among the lot of them. There'll be definite opposition in those ranks—not to mention from their patrons in the House."

She frowned, a little exasperated when the smile on her friend's face did not even falter.

"And how are we going to collect the taxes without them?" she added. "It can't be done!"

Shizuru took a drink from her cup before replying.

"It can be done," she said serenely. "All we must do is to leave the tax collection in the hands of able governors or local officials. Quaestors can do it as well. At least, if the one collecting the taxes is already bound by office, there shall be no need for contracts binding him to the Treasury, thus ending the escalation of taxes by bidding.

Besides which, there is little fear of the local official failing to deliver the taxes to the Treasury, because he would be questioned by the Treasury officials immediately if the amount is lacking or missing. A direct case for the Embezzlement Court, so to speak."

She set her chalice on the table.

"Further, it greatly benefits Hime in that it streamlines the administration of the foreign provinces. They have become, I think, too bureaucratically necessary to Hime, perpetually adding expenses to the State due to layers of middlemen and the redundant paperwork they generate. If each district collects its own taxes and tributes, Hime still receives the money, but does not have to be saddled with the bother of collection. A little more effort for the government itself, but with generous rewards for all."

"Except for the publicani ."

"Oh, except for them." She smiled. "As for the local people, they do not have to fall prey to the ruthless methods of collection that the publicani employ, nor do they have to suffer the injustice of being made to pay for the unreasonably high revenues the publicani promise the Treasury. So I truly think it would be for the best if we did away with the publicani once and for all and replaced them with a specially arranged, properly organised tax collection system regulated by those in the actual provinces and administered by those who can feel the threat of the Embezzlement Court hanging over their heads. This means the Embezzlement Court shall have to be strengthened, naturally, but that may well be the easier part of the plan."

Chie took her time to consider it, blinking slowly.

"Now that you put it that way," she said, "it seems doable. No, it seems right ."

"I am pleased you think so."

The other shook her head, still mulling over the proposal.

"What really strikes me," said Chie, "is that it all sounds so rational when you say it. Anyone else and it would probably sound like a fool's dream. But the way you say it... It almost makes me wonder why no one ever thought of that before."

Shizuru lifted her shoulders, a hint of mischief in her eyes.

"Perhaps," she offered cannily. "Because they are not as willing to murder unnecessary traditions as I am?"

Chie smirked.

"That," she said. "Is one of the best ways to describe it."

"Call me a murderer, do," Shizuru grinned.

"But what an idea!" the other exclaimed suddenly after a long swallow of her drink. "The dogs would be let out to howl as soon as you propose it to the House, you know-it'd be an uphill fight all the way. You'll get a terrible lot of opposition, even from the ones who aren't part of the Traditionalists or in their pay. Yet it makes so much sense! It's perfectly sensible, but it goes against all custom, and that's why it's going to come out as perfectly mad!"

She set her empty cup onto the table with a sharp clatter.

"The conservatives," Chie resumed, "will say you're trying to radicalise everything again. You know how they stick up for the old ways."

"The problem with the old ways," Shizuru responded. "Is that they are old. "

Chie laughed, her brow relaxing.

"Certainly it is laudable to have such a passion for tradition and the established way of doing things," Shizuru went on. "But what Haruka-han-and the rest of the conservatives-fail to see is that tradition itself is not static. It is being made every day and evolves continuously."

"I like that way of describing it," her friend replied. "It's rather like... like what the Princes once said: that instead of the other way around, they're serving the machine, don't you think?"

"You see why they dislike change so much," Shizuru answered. "When they do talk of preparation, they merely end with projecting the familiar into the future."

She hummed.

"Creativity," she sighed. "Is sacrificed to the ashes of orthodoxy."

Her friend suddenly extracted a small roll of paper from the sinus of her toga, then looked about the room frantically.

"Do you have any ink?" Chie asked, sounding urgent. "Quill?"

"Oh... yes, I do," Shizuru replied, still puzzled by this reaction. "Over there, where is-ah, thank you, Natsuki."

Taking the implements from her hovering bodyguard, she then handed the ink and quill to Chie, who nodded her thanks and began to set up to write, placing the effects on the table.

"Wait," she told Shizuru. "Wait."

Feeling torn between mirth and curiosity, the general pulled in her lips to avoid either laughing or asking the woman what in the name of heaven she was doing. She turned in her seat and sent a bemused look towards the Otomeian sitting with them, who responded with a curious twitch of her eyebrows.

"Wait!" Chie muttered again, despite the fact that no one was rushing her. "Projecting... familiar... ashes of orthodoxy. Wait, let me get it down."

"Ecaster!" Shizuru cried, comprehension dawning as she laughed. "Chie-han, taking sound-bites?"

"Mm..." Chie said, glancing up and giving her a devilish smile. "Yours are always good value."

"Oh, you're awful!"

"Yes, yes, you know they make you even more famous." She stopped scribbling and regarded the neatly written lines with pleasure, the ink glistening wetly on the paper. "So may I use this sometime and attribute it to you?"

"Planning to popularise it?" Shizuru giggled.

"Oh, yes. I'll write an article," she smiled, taking on a dreamy look. "And publish it as ' Shizuru Fujino on the Imperative of Change in Government '. Impressive, don't you think? The Traditionalists will buy bucket-loads of copies to read and try to find something wrong with it, while everyone else will buy it just to see what the ruckus is all about. They'll eat it up."

"And be perfectly livid about it," came the laughing retort. "Harukahan and the others, that is."

"But it's a good idea."

Shizuru stopped chuckling.

"You know, it reminds me of something Chikane once told me," she said.

"Ah, Himemiya? You mean in that letter you read earlier?"

"No, not from that letter." An inhale. "Although I suppose that is why I remembered her now."

"So, what is it? And when was it?"

"Oh, a long time ago." The crimson eyes lost focus, their gaze turning inward. "It was when I proposed my first law to the House."

The hand holding the quill relaxed.

"Oh, I remember that! It was a brilliant law, too!" The senior legate winced. "Even if it got turned down because of those cunni in the Senate."

"Thank you for the compliment, at least," Shizuru said with perfect courtesy. "Well, I was young then, and still new to the way things worked, so as you remember, I was quite down after that."

"Down?" Chie's eyes widened. "What do you mean 'as you remember'? I don't remember you being any depressed after that session."

"No?" the other smiled.

"Ah, I get it!" Che laughed. "Didn't notice. You looked as composed as ever, you know. But no-one ever could tell what you were thinking."

"Chikane did. She asked me to come have a drink with her that day."

"Really?" A long hum. "Well, it makes sense she'd see. The two of you are cast from like moulds-both of them broken afterwards."

"Now that is a good sound-bite."

Chie grinned: "You think?"

"Yes. Oh, wait, wait- do write it down."

"Don't tease me !"

They burst into laughter. Afterwards, Chie wiggled her eyebrows at her friend.

"So...?" she asked.

"So I came over for a drink. And dinner, actually."

"That must have been a long talk."

"Not really." She chuckled. "I suppose she wanted to prevent me from going home early to brood on the disappointment alone."

"Better to brood together, hm?"

"Or analyse the reason for it, at any rate."

"This was when she said whatever she said."

"Yes." Shizuru smiled reminiscently, leaning back. "It was good advice, actually. She said not to be disheartened, and that the law I proposed had been exactly what we needed. It had simply been beyond the Traditionalists' lights to see it."

"Sensible."

"I told her-and you must recall that I was truly more dismayed than I let on, Chie-han," she said. "I told her that it might have been simply because the law had come from me that it had met opposition."

She tilted her head to the side, looking slightly amused.

"And that if it was so, then my presence in the House might as well be for naught," she continued. "As I would be unable to contribute anything to Hime. Even if the laws I proposed were 'exactly what we needed', they would be useless if they were all turned down."

Chie leaned forward. "Go on. What did Himemiya say?"

The other woman shut her eyes for a moment, then opened them slowly, a grin spreading on her face.

"She said, in response to my inkling that the law had only met opposition because it came from me, that I was right." A faint but amused grimace. "So, she said yes."

"Well!"

"She said that it would always be my fate-as well as hers, to some extent-to have to work against the tide. That it was inescapable, given the opposition of the conservatives."

"Ooh, blunt." The dark eyebrows went up. "Himemiya said that? I wouldn't have expected her to be so frank."

"She also said that the conservatives, while still a significant force, were merely the dying waves ebbing out, whereas we were rushing in. She said that was inescapable too."

Chie chortled, bringing up her hands to clap as she chuckled.

"Bravo!" She paused, delight on her face. "Really, her metaphors rival those of the Princeps, no?"

"Plan to publish some of her sound-bites too?" the other asked playfully.

"I'll talk to her about it someday," Chie returned airily, before assuming a more serious expression. "But she is right. The Traditionalists aren't so much opposing you for your actions as for what you are-although I guess your actions are a part of that."

She nodded sagely as she went on.

"But it's the total of what you stand for. That's where you and Himemiya converge, you know." She frowned and angled her head to one side while admitting a qualifier. "Though you do tend to be more of an outside horse because you made it up the ladder so young. It's doubly offensive for those green sticks-in-the-mud."

"I know."

"I'm not saying that it's just the age."

Shizuru gave her a slightly searching look. Chie wrinkled her nose in response, searching her mind for what she meant to say.

"It's that you do things so differently," she said. "Or you think up new ways of doing things. What's the word? Oh! Innovator."

She nodded, pleased at having found the label in the recesses of her mind.

"The things you think up are so far into the future they're beyond normal sight, Shizuru-san." She gave her friend a jaunty grin and added: "Even mine."

Shizuru shook her head at that.

"I wonder," she eventually said. "I do grant you the fact that I am a bit of radical, as the Traditionalists say. It does get me into difficulty, does it not?"

"Oh, undoubtedly," the other replied, stressing the word with all her strength.

Shizuru laughed.

"But that's what makes you yourself," Chie followed. "And that's what makes you better than the rest. I wonder sometimes why they-Wang, Armitage, Akagi, all that lot-can't seem to see how much more sensible the changes you propose are, even after you explain them. Awful curtains over their eyes, really."

"It is because they wish to see a future that is merely an updated version of the present, Chie-han," Shizuru said, sipping from her cup. "They shall oppose every step I take, because it does not seem the proper one to them."

Her smile widened, yet at the same time assumed a more secretive aspect. An expression only she could manage, thought Chie, who nodded at her words feelingly.

"I know that now, and it no longer bothers me," Shizuru continued. "True innovation, after all, is bound to run counter to prevailing standards. Hence, they may counter me as they wish. It cannot be otherwise."

She stopped to raise her hand, reaching behind her to lift her hair from the nape of her neck. The gesture made the sleeve of her tunic and the fold of the toga covering it slide and uncover an arm that made the senior legate's eyes widen. Beneath that ivory-white skin lay a surprisingly taut and well-formed cord of muscle-the slenderness of the limb a deception hiding the fact that there was a lethal strength there, always ready to strike. It was so easy to forget, Chie thought, due to the relaxed atmosphere of their familiarity, that her young friend was commander of an army at her age for a reason. The strength in the woman!

"Yes," Shizuru was saying to her. "They are free to oppose me all they like, Chie-han. It matters not. I shall prevail and they shall give in." The perfect teeth came out. "For that cannot be otherwise either."

Chie nodded.

"I believe you," she said seriously.

---

Shizuru escorted her friend to the door, watching the other woman walk down the marble-tiled corridor. The legate had taken a cup of wine with her, jesting that she needed it as she was about to have a chat with her friend, the chief primipilus of the Ninth Legion. After Chie had gone, it was Shizuru who shut the door gently. She stood there for another moment afterwards, her face only a foot away from the carved panel of wood.

It appears, she thought to herself. That I have made my decision.

She turned around and smiled at the other occupant of the room, who gave her an inquisitive look.

"Natsuki."

The girl's head tipped slightly upwards as a response.

"Come," Shizuru said, moving towards the table and pouring herself more of the watered wine. "Have a drink with me, if you please."

She stopped to look at the goblet in her hand.

"Although I am afraid we shall have to share this cup, as Chie-han has taken the other one. Do you mind? We can ask someone to bring another, if you wish."

Natsuki shook her head to indicate it was all right.

"Then please sit with me."

Instead of going to the chairs before the table, however, the older woman moved to the bed and sat on the sheets, her back against the pillows. Drawing up one of her knees, she chuckled when she saw the puzzled expression on her bodyguard's face.

That look is adorable on her, she thought, before wryly adding: But I am beginning to think I find every look adorable on her.

"To be more comfortable," she explained. "Besides, I thought you would prefer being able to sit on a surface such as this instead of on the chair. You prefer to pull up your legs, do you not?"

The girl's lips formed a small 'O'. She climbed onto the bed as well and Shizuru made her shuffle closer until she was only about an arm's width away, the Himean pointing out that it would be easier to hand the cup of wine back and forth if they were closer to each other.

"I feel a little tired today," Shizuru admitted, speaking with the utter lack of restraint she had grown used to when addressing Natsuki. "But I suppose it is simply an after-effect of all the marching these past few days. The army did go at a much faster pace than usual, after all. Although I could not very well show them my own exhaustion, now, could I? Especially since I was the one who made everyone march faster."

She hummed and added: "I did not want us to be on the march when the snows hit."

A moment of silence went by, but it was not uncomfortable.

"What of you, Natsuki? Do you think..." she suddenly said, taking a sip from the cup. "Do you think the Mentulaeans shall desist from attacking again, in the future?"

She turned her head to find the intelligent green eyes looking her way and nearly dropping the cup as she fell into them as she often did of late. The girl's eyes enraptured her persistently, especially from up close. From this meagre distance she could see the ring of almost blue-green jade circling the brighter emerald colour of the irises, which were shot near the centre with minute flecks. She knew that an even closer look in brighter light would reveal that the flecks ramified into a hundred cracks, and that the fissures and flecking were devoid of yellow or brown but were instead of a light, greenish white.

Like flames, she thought once again, entranced as always by the extraordinary eyes . They say mine are like flames too, or so I hear.

So absorbed was she in her inspection of those irises that she nearly missed the shake of the girl's head in response to her query.

"Neither do I," she said. "Here, Natsuki."

She passed the cup to the other, who took it but simply looked at the liquid swirling inside.

"Oh, really now," Shizuru teased, amused. "Do not tell me you are afraid of sharing a cup with me. Are my lips so sullied in your eyes that you would avoid what I touch with them?"

Natsuki frowned and proceeded to take a small sip out of the goblet, licking her lips after she did so. Shizuru took in the motion, her eyes following the small, pink tip of the tongue as it peeked out from between the girl's teeth and drew a quick arc against the soft lower lip. She held her breath until it disappeared.

"Well," she said. "So you do not believe in indirect kisses after all?"

Natsuki scowled again, although a hint of red did creep into her cheeks. She further rewarded her tormentor with a word.

"Silly," she growled softly, eliciting a laugh from the delighted woman.

Shizuru leaned back into the pillows.

"Yes, of course they shall attack," she said. "They shall attempt again and again to infringe on our borders, as well as those of the other states here. Why should what happened at Argentum convince them never to try again? The most I have done is to delay them- which I am still thankful for, at any rate."

She reflected on the events of the past months, her mind going back to the letter she had pulled out of her toga earlier while taking it off. She reached for it where she had left it on one side of the bed and then regarded the broken seal on it contemplatively.

Another thing to consider from this, she thought, setting the letter beside her. And I have considered it. Or have I? Has everything been taken into account?

She shook her head, lips setting into a tight line. It was impossible to take everything into account, she told herself. Impossible, unless one were a god-which she certainly was not, despite some people's opinions to the contrary, and despite her distant divine ancestor.

The most one can do, she thought. Is to hope everything that can be taken into account has been. One must exercise one's reason as far as possible, to that end. And as for everything else... everything else is up to Fate.

She sighed, mumbling to herself: "Not entirely a welcome thing for many, especially those living here, but it is for the good of Hime. Yes. It must be done."

"What?"

She started at the husky voice.

"What?" the girl sitting beside her asked again.

Shizuru blinked in confusion.

"Forgive me, Natsuki," she began. She tipped her head inquisitively. "What do you mean 'what'?"

The Otomeian's brow darkened.

"What 'must be done'?" she said, to Shizuru's astonishment.

"Oh," Shizuru said. "So you were listening?"

The Otomeian's brow darkened even more.

"My apologies, I was muttering to myself," Shizuru smiled. "I did not realise you were even listening to that."

"I was," the girl said in a tone that gave Shizuru pause. It had a hint of reproach and a touch of injury. "I was... I..."

The older woman's mouth parted but issued no sound.

"I..." Natsuki pursued, obviously trying her hardest not to stammer.
"I do."

She sent Shizuru a reproving glance that held no hatred, yet seemed to burn the older woman's skin. Shizuru bit her lip as the girl looked away and jerkily assumed her old stoic countenance... something she had not done in a while when only the two of them were together, so comfortable had they become in recent weeks. Yet now Shizuru saw the possibility of the silent chasm opening up once more, the yawning gap she had opened with her own thoughtlessness.

"Natsuki," she said. "Forgive me, please. I did not mean that."

The girl was unmoved, no change in her impassive expression save for two little scarlet spots on her cheeks. Had she actually turned and looked at the person apologising to her, though, she might have seen something very few persons had ever seen: Shizuru Fujino at a loss.

Idiot! the Himean was mentally screaming at herself. Shizuru Fujino, you are a complete idiot! Truly, as Chie-han says, when you do something you do it well!

"Natsuki," she said again, putting all her honesty into the name and the words. "Forgive me."

The girl nodded but still did not deign to look at her. Shizuru decided she should try again, dissatisfied with the response. She ran her mind over the many things she could say and wondered which was best, most likely to soothe the girl. It took her far longer than it had ever taken for her to think on what to say to someone. She had never felt so anxious when giving an apology before, yet had never been more conscious of the desire to give it. Was this why the words seemed so sticky all of a sudden, so inadequate?

"Forgive me," she said again, at length. "I was merely... chattering nonsense to myself that time. It was impolite of me, and I do apologise."

She stopped, feeling awkward.

"I should not have done that while I was talking to you," she said, before repeating the crucial point. "Natsuki, I was talking to you earlier. I simply forgot and fell into my usual routine. Like a fool."

The other's frosty demeanour started to thaw.

"I am very sorry."

After what seemed an eternal pause, the girl shrugged, easing Shizuru's anxiety a little.

"Do you forgive me?" she asked, actually interested in the answer.

Again an eternity seemed to pass before she obtained a reaction. She felt an immense degree of relief, however, when it did come.

The girl nodded to her.

"Thank you," she said. "I did not mean to offend you, Natsuki."

Another nod, but the green eyes refused to return. And how much she wanted them to do that!

"You know how important it is to me that you are always listening to what I have to say," Shizuru went on, trying to coax the girl into facing her again. "It is merely that I wonder sometimes if you do not get tired of hearing me speak. I must be a chore to look over just because of it. All I ever seem to do is assault your hearing with talk. Perhaps I should stop."

That worked. Natsuki turned to frown at her again, obviously in disapproval of the idea.

"So you do not get tired of it after all?" Shizuru prodded, feeling a great weight lift from her shoulders. "My blather?"

The other huffed and shook her head.

"Really?" Shizuru replied, mouth quirking after she obtained a nod. "Natsuki, I wonder at your attentiveness to me. I do run on and on, after all! Do you always listen to what I am saying, truly?"

Though the girl still looked a little piqued, she deigned to nod once more. Deciding that her young companion needed a little more nudging, Shizuru smiled mischievously and asked another question.

"If that is so, would you remember what I was saying this morning, about the bedroom?"

The girl took the challenge. She even answered a trifle smugly, thought the older woman, who was fast falling head over heels for the charms of this unusual and unique creature assigned to look out for her.

"The theme and general impression," Natsuki said, her low and cool voice almost repeating Shizuru's words verbatim. "Remind you of a friend's study."

Shizuru was torn between showing her pleasure or her amusement.

"And would you remember what I said about my bedroom in Hime?"

Natsuki turned to Shizuru and rolled her eyes, unknowingly delighting the older woman with that relaxed gesture.

"You never," the Otomeian said haughtily, pronouncing the words with care, "said anything about that."

"But I did, I remember."

"No."

"I must disagree."

"You said," the younger of the two retorted with a look of burning conviction, "your preference, it is fuh-for crimson and purple. I know not if it is so in your bedroom. And your friend is right. Your preference is most royal."

Shizuru was unable to hold it in any more at such a speech. She folded over genuine mirth.

"I give in!" she said, shaking with hilarity. "So you really do listen to me!"

The younger woman watched her chuckle a few more times before letting her own lips form a tentative smile. When the last trickle of Shizuru's mirth had passed, the room was silent once again, though considerably lighter than before.

"Really," Shizuru said wistfully to her companion. "I wish that some of the senators back home would do me the same courtesy you do."

She was about to say more when the sweet scent of wine reached her nose. Natsuki was holding the goblet out to her. She took it and smiled, revelling in the little warmth rising from the liquid within-as well as that still lingering from where Natsuki had held it.

"Thank you," she said, cradling the cup in her hand. "Wine can be a danger, as one of my opponents in Senate always says, but I must say that it is only so when taken absent moderation. Most things are double-edged. Even this potentially mind-addling substance can be a comfort, can it not?"

She lifted the cup to her mouth and stopped halfway.

"I must say something to you," she said to the girl, not bothering to lower the cup hovering before her lips. "It is that I truly meant what I said earlier, Natsuki, about you always listening to me."

The Otomeian said nothing.

"I thank you for it," Shizuru said. "You are one of my greatest comforts here, Natsuki."

She knew, even before her eyes flicked surreptitiously to the side to see it, that the blood was already dancing beneath the girl's cheeks. She paused to admire the sight as stealthily as possible before lowering the hand with the cup to her side.

Her face is killing me.

She leaned further against the pillows, shutting her eyes away from the guileless killer. A while later, she felt the girl beside her shift to do the same, and a smile built on her lips at the feeling of warmth very near an arm. They remained quiet for a time this way, neither moving nor speaking. Yet Shizuru felt no awkwardness in the silence, and let her body and mind have the moment's respite. She had not felt so comfortable in a long while, so she would certainly cherish it. And indeed, she did not even apprehend the fact that she was fast drifting off to sleep, nor did she feel it when her companion gently took the cup from her hand to set it on a stand beside the bed.

An odd thing for someone who was a light sleeper.

But perhaps it was because her mind, even in sleep, was not fully at rest. In the black, veined darkness of her sealed gaze, the words of the letter she read earlier in the waking world were rising up and occupying her powerful mind once again, their import chasing her to her dreams. In those dreams, she read over the last parts of that letter once more, the hand of Morpheus augmenting her memory as she mulled over what the letter contained and what it meant.

The Traditionalists are proving themselves scurrilous as ever. As they could not denounce you publicly (although I confess I wanted to see them try, especially in public, so that the People eat them alive), they did the opposite, Shizuru. They lauded you to high heavens for having won a great battle with hardly any losses, as well as having prevented an actual war from breaking out by the power of your presence alone. The latter is the point they stress.

I wondered at that, as did some others. It is not like the Traditionalists to be twittering with their tonsils to praise you, and that is putting it mildly, as you are aware. I ask you to forgive me for my oversight here, for had I been more on guard, I should have seen what was coming. I do not know if I could have averted it, but I feel responsible for it, in a way, by failing to see it beforehand. You see, after they managed to drill the point of your having 'prevented war from breaking out' into everyone's heads, they suddenly declared that as a result, your campaign was henceforth no longer one of war, but a mere expedition of precautionary defence. Of fortification, to be precise.

You see the difference and the difficulty. By doing this, they can lower the reserve allocation of the budget granted to you, so your funds will be even poorer. In fact, I doubt you will be able to get any more money if you were to ask for it now. Furthermore, they shall not be granting you any additional legions. They can also keep you there for as long as they deem fit, simply by claiming that the 'fortification' is yet inadequate-something they may well claim for eternity or a length approaching it. They have put you, in effect, in an underhanded form of exile.

All of this they put before the House, which was fool enough to be swayed. I shall spare you the euphemistic way in which they worded their resolution at the end. In sum-which is to say, in reality -you shall be stranded there for as long as they like, with no additional money to fund the actual enterprise of war (which is not recognised) that is going on. As you know, this means that you shall have to either give up your legions when the money runs out, or pay for them yourself.

You will find all of this in the official communication they have sent you. If you wish to spare yourself the euphemisms, as I have done, then cast it into the fire as soon as you receive it.

All this being said, I admit it was a good move on their parts, infinitely better than their other ones. Perhaps going up against a certain brilliant 'upstart' has rather sharpened the dull rocks they have atop their shoulders? But a rock, no matter how sharp it is, shall always only be a rock.

Although they may be right, in a sense, that outright war between us and the Mentulaeans has yet to break out completely, it eventually will. I feel it in my bones, and I know you do too. Repelling them can only succeed for so long, especially when they have already managed to push their boundaries all the way to the old river borders. They are a growing empire, and it is in the nature of growing empires to butt heads with every other power it encounters in its spread from its nucleus. Ultimately, we must go to war against them. And ultimately, we must invade.

We spoke about this before you left, and I recall that you said something to the effect that you had no intention of invading the King Obsidian's lands on this mission. But I know you, and I know that the manner in which you phrased it should be indicative of a loophole to me. I know too that you know the idea I am about to propose is inevitable, given the way they are acting. I am aware that you tendered your opinion to me only because it was the opinion of Hime, which is to say that you have no intent of invasion only because Hime has no intent of invasion. But were your more practical and personal side to speak, the opinion would be vastly different, would it not?

I recognise that you dislike the idea of aggression, on principle, but we understand the necessities of practice. You see as well as I do that Obsidian is intent on expansion. He lusts after our territories as well as all others within his reach. If he is already willing to attack what has long been known as one of our allied provinces, a city that is also a client-state, one can hardly doubt that he is willing to attack our provinces as well. That which differentiates the two is a scrap, a tissue of little worth. Soon enough, Obsidian shall consider even Hime itself as being within reach of his invasive efforts. That, I cannot condone. Nor can you.

Hence I am making an offer and a request. First, the request: try to hold out for a little longer. If the funds become low and the stipend you received from the Treasury runs out, then use your own moneys to run the enterprise for now. I will reimburse you for any withdrawals you make from your banks, although I know we can both afford to stand the financial strain for a good while. It is a matter of honour to me, since I am the one who is proposing this venture, so there need be no qualms about the cash. If you would prefer the money in advance, I can also arrange for a transfer immediately through your banker. What I would ask you to do for now, simply, is that you keep on doing what you are doing for as long as you can. I would ask you to give me time. For the Battle of Argentum can still be interpreted by the fools in Senate as a strike against a mere ally and not as a strike against Hime herself. But the latter interpretation is coming, and it is only a matter of time. So the point is to wait and be prepared for it.

If something comes to you that may aid in presenting such an interpretation to the Senate, I ask too that you send a missive to me immediately. You know what I shall be trying to do on my side: I shall attempt to persuade the senate to annex the Mentulaeans' lands-that is to say, persuade them to grant a sanction for not just a defensive but also an aggressive war.

It shall take some time, some powerful backing, and some more evidence of Obsidian's intent to encroach on our very own provinces. You know how Senate is-so afraid of taking a definite stance! I am almost certain that, were one of our own territories to be attacked, all they would advocate is to push the invading Mentulae back to their side of the borders again, not even to retaliate by breaching those borders and showing the would-be-invaders how invasions are properly done. Well, we know the foolishness and inadequacy of taking such a policy against those who have threatened us time and time again. It is why I shall do my best to persuade them that we must invade and shall press them to pass a decree to that end. Trust that I can do this, for I shall. Not as a regular senator, nor as the urban praetor. I shall do it as consul.

Perhaps you wonder how that can be possible, since my name is not even in the present list of candidates. You see, I have instructed the tribune of the plebs Kaneda Izumi-san-he is my man, you know-to propose a law to the Assemblies. The purpose of the law is plain: it is meant to allow, in the case of a prolonged postponement of elections (as we have now), a second Nomination Period for those who wish to run for curule offices like the consulship but were prevented from making the cut-off date for the first Nomination Period due to various circumstances. Once it is passed, I shall announce my candidacy. Not to be arrogant, but I am certain I shall get in, even with late entry.

So wait a little longer, if you please, and I shall attain a sanction of invasion once every cog is in place. Then the wheels shall turn. I wish they were turning now, in fact, so urgent are my premonitions of Obsidian's rapacious ambitions. He has the cunning of a rat, this Mentulaean king, and he has even sent agents to woo our senators and people (for there is a very rich party of Mentulaean noblemen here now, throwing parties for anyone gullible enough to come and listen to their speeches about the Mentulae being peaceful!) at the same time that he sends armies to pillage our lands and those belonging to peoples we call friends. How can anyone with sense trust such duplicity?

We must eliminate the threat Obsidian poses, for the sake of all we hold dear. We must invade and conquer the Mentulaeen Empire. I would not mind doing it, but something tells me that it is not I who is fated to command this war when it drops onto our laps, even if I am the one who shall pluck it from Fortuna's hands. I shall see to it, at least, that it drops on your lap. Or it may be better to say that the gods shall see to it that it drops there. Something-a presentiment from some agent of Minerva, perhaps?-has been chorusing in my mind ever since I decided upon this course. It tells me that this war was always and ever only yours.

The rapid knocks, followed by the visitor's announcement, brought Nao's head up with a smile. She looked at the girl at the other end of the room and tipped her head towards the door. The girl was quick: she had not even waited for the centurion's gesture to get up and head for the sounds. No sooner had the bolt been unlatched than the door swung open and revealed the senior legate with a shaky, grimacing sort of smile.

"Thanks, thanks," she said, striding quickly into the room and heading for the fireplace. "Oh, good god, I'm about ready to jump into the fire! Close the door, please, quickly."

Erstin gave a small chuckle as she bolted the door again.

"I'm surprised to see you're not wearing a thicker cloak, Chie-san," she said. "It's no wonder you're feeling chilly. Would you like me to warm some wine for you?"

"No, thanks though," said Chie. "The way I'm feeling right now, I wouldn't be surprised if the wine chilled in my throat."

She turned to Nao, rubbing her sides as she spoke.

"Ye gods, Nao," she said, chattering through her words as fine shivers rattled her teeth. "Why didn't you give me clearer directions? I must've gone through every inn on this block, thinking it was the right one. To think I believed you when you said I'd be able to find this one easily-that's why I didn't bother with going back to my room to get a thicker cloak, Erstin! Blame it on this rat-oh, stop laughing, Yuuki! It's on account of your oblique way with words that I'm frozen and just about done for!"

"It's your fault you couldn't find this quickly," Nao grinned, highly amused by the diatribe. "And it isn't my fault you're half blind."

The legate's eyes narrowed; her sight was somewhat less than perfect. Still, it was not so bad as to be deemed "half blind", which Nao knew.

"Oh, be quiet," she said.

"Well, lah-de-dah!" the other exclaimed, widening her eyes farcically. "No witty comebacks today?"

"Let me catch my breath first, then I'll take you on," the other woman replied, putting a hand against the wall to brace herself. "I'm too tired to banter."

"You do look a little winded, Chie-san," Erstin noted.

" Winded? " was the wry answer. "Why, I'm only staying on my feet out of sheer habit!"

All three of them laughed.

"Right," Nao said. "Come draw up a chair, Chie, and do that breath-catching before we go out again."

"Oh, don't talk about going out yet," the other groaned, coming to settle herself beside the small oak table. "Give me time to recover and get used to the idea. Why did you have to move quarters, anyway? The old place was fine."

Nao made a vague gesture: "I ran into an old friend the other day and he told me to come stay at his place. Here."

"I see."

"Anyway, you took long enough. I was almost worried," she smirked. "We've been waiting a while."

Chie threw her a dour look and muttered, "Don't complain when I'm the one who's been trudging in snow."

The centurion flicked her eyes towards the other occupant of the room. She laughed suddenly, startling both the girl and Chie.

"Oh, Sons of Dis, Erstin," she said, shaking her head at the girl hovering near the door. " Go already . We don't need you to look over us, anyway. We can take care of ourselves. Don't keep your friend waiting."

Erstin coloured brightly.

"What do you mean, Nao-senpai?" she asked, attempting to look as though she did not know what Nao meant and failing miserably at it.

The red-haired woman snorted.

"I mean, go already and meet that Otomeian girl," she answered. "You've been fidgeting there all this time and looking like you're about ready to run away. Been mooning about all day, I can tell. Go! It's fine."

Then, almost as an afterthought: "Just be careful, you hear?"

Chie smiled as the girl hesitated, inching her head this way and that as though unable to make her mind. Finally, her resolve appeared to strengthen and she headed for the door while thanking the primipilus-who stopped her just as she was halfway out of the exit.

"Come back here, Idiot," said the chortling Nao, her mirth growing as the girl retreated into the room with a bewildered expression. "Put on something warm, will you, or you'll catch your death of cold before you even make it there. It'd be a hard job for us to warm you back to life if that happens. Unless your girl wants to give it a try."

This time Chie laughed as well. Erstin, for her part, turned a deeper shade of red, although she did show an embarrassed smile too. After pulling on a few more garments as ordered, she left the two women in the room.

"The silly fool," Nao said affectionately. "Can you believe she was about to go out there in just a robe?"

"Who's this other girl she's meeting?"

"Don't you remember? I told you about her. It's the Sphinx's cousin."

"Oh," Chie said. "So it's that one?"

"Yes."

"Well, well. When you told me they were getting cosy I didn't think they were getting cosy that way. You didn't really elaborate, you know." She screwed up her eyes to the ceiling. "So little Ers-chan has grown up."

"Funny, isn't it? Somehow, it feels like not too long ago that she was just a little tot trailing in my tracks."

"Makes you feel old, doesn't it?" Chie said, smiling.

"Please. I never feel old."

Chie responded with a droll look.

"We'd better go," she said to Nao, after a second.

"Before we do that, I wanted to show you something."

Nao got up and made her way to a closet. She retrieved a leather bundle from within and returned, whereupon she laid the item on the table. Chie eyed it with curiosity.

"What's this?" the legate asked.

"Some things I just bought," was the answer. The bundle was unwrapped, revealing the glint of metal tucked into the flaps. "Have a look."

Chie peered at the contents of the bundle, then reached for a thin metal star whose circumference was roughly the same as the width of her palm. She held it up, eyeing the five sharp points at the edges of the disc.

"I'm not really an expert on these things," she said. "Never been good with projectiles. But I do know enough to say this is a good piece of metalwork." She turned her eyes to the other, similar discs in the unwrapped bundle. "Where'd you get them?"

"Some blacksmith out at the edge of town. Great stuff. I'm damned glad I talked to the tribune-Akira Okuzaki, I mean-yesterday, or I wouldn't have known to go there."

"Akira-kun?" Chie replied, setting down the weapon. "Oh, yes, I've seen her carrying some of these too. Shuriken, you call them, right?"

Nao nodded: " She would have some. Her family comes from the same place I got trained, you know."

"Oh, yes, the Okuzaki were originally Sulpicians. But most of them stay in Hime now."

"Like everyone else looking to go up in politics." Nao picked up another object, slipping her fingers through the holes in the implement and showing it to Chie. "What I really like is this. Look at the detail. Good. Great grip, too. Slips in real smooth and fits beautifully, like sex."

Chie laughed, a hand thrown over her eyes.

"What a simile!" she said.

Nao laughed too. "No, really. You try it. Here."

She slipped it off and handed it to Chie, who put it on. It reminded her of those crude 'knuckles' that some of the more violent members of the Himean populace employed during their street fights. The difference was that, whereas those only had slight bumps or ridges at the 'knuckles,' this was fitted with razor-sharp, outstretched claws. She made a slight face at the weapon, grudgingly admitting that it was handsomely worked even if she could not quite countenance the brutality of its purpose.

"What an awful-looking thing!" she said, wrinkling her brow. "What do you call it again, Nao?"

"Depends. But where I come from, we just call it the claw."

"What do you plan to do with this, anyway? You can't use it for battle, since it couldn't possibly cut through a cuirass-unless you put all your strength into the blow, I suppose. It's an assassin's weapon, isn't it?"

"Yes. I left my old one at home, and figured I might as well get a new one. Especially since the stuff here is much cheaper than anywhere else, even when it's such good quality."

"Right." Chie took off the wicked-looking instrument. "Why do I have this feeling you're planning to use it on someone?"

"I probably will. That's what weapons are for."

"Oh, Jupiter!"

"Sure, call him." The centurion chuckled. "I'm just keeping my weapons up to date. You know, the way you like to pick every new bird's feather for your collection."

A laugh erupted from the other's mouth.

"Quills, they're called quills!" said the legate. "And you just made it sound as though I go around plucking the tail feathers from whatever poor fowl comes my way."

"Speaking of birds," Nao said. "I'd love a good cooked one right about now. Actually, I'll take anything cooked at this point. Come on, I'm hungry. Let's go already."

"Anywhere in mind?"

"There's this place nearby that Kenji-san told me about. How he described the roast boar there had my belly roaring." Nao closed her eyes in anticipation of the culinary delights to come, her tongue coming out to lick at her lips. "Good wine, too, he said. And the desserts he told me about! Custardy rolls and fig pastries. Oh, let's go already, damn it."

"Goodness!" Chie cried, grinning. "The notoriously hardy Nao Yuuki, a sybarite?"

"I like good food," the centurion retorted. "Anyone would pick oysters over plain olives any day. I don't mind roughing it when there's nothing else to be had, but my goal is to kill myself from eating as much as I can when there's good stuff in front of me, to make up for the other times."

"Admirable goal," Chie replied. "Mind if I join you on this mission?"

"Shit, we can share the same boat trip down the goddamned river. I don't think Charon would mind."

"If he does, we'll set aside a leg of boar to bribe him with."

Nao grinned and threw a garment at her: "Here, you borrow one of my cloaks, Legate, or you'll be making that trip before I even get started. Glad you had sense enough to put on your thickest socks, at least."

After wrapping themselves snugly in their capes, they went out. They found empty streets to greet them, with only a few odd stragglers sitting by the warmth of an outdoor brazier or a fire. The early evening was washed with the deep midnight blue of the sky and the colour was reflected by the snow that blanketed almost all the surfaces, the whiteness taking on an azure-tinted aspect. Here and there, the monochrome was interrupted by swathes of yellow light coming from windows or open doorways, as well as the lamps hanging from taverns and shops by the path. Chie noted to her companion that the city looked 'rather lonely'.

"More snow coming is why," Nao commented. "Look, it's covered everything already."

"I know-I spent nearly an hour walking in it earlier, remember?"

After a while, she asked: "Is it far, Nao?"

"No, we're close."

"I hope so."

"Relax, we'll get there faster than you can say Aoi Senou."

"You don't know how fast I can say that," Chie said, letting out a chuckle.

"I'll bet you'd give Mercury's feet a run for their money. Hey, isn't that the general?"

Chie turned to look, narrowing her eyes to slits as she squinted at the gazebo Nao was pointing to. It was in the middle of a snow-filled clearing, one of the market spaces usually filled with shoppers and stalls. It was empty now, however, and what few stalls had not been packed up by their owners were bleak-looking and empty. After a while, she finally made out the figures standing in the gazebo in the middle: it was their commander and her Otomeian bodyguard. She and Nao made their way to them, speculating on the reasons for the pair being out there in such weather and without anyone nearby.

"Shizuru-san!" Chie called out, waving.

The figures in the distance looked their way. The taller, blonde figure waved.

"It is them. Whatever are they doing out here?" Chie mumbled as she walked forward. "It's too frosty to be out. Why, there's hardly anyone else on the street!"

Nao grinned, lifting her eyebrows suggestively.

"Yes," she said. "Good point. Maybe that 's why they're out here."

"If that's what it is, the sensible thing would have been to stay inside Shizuru-san's room," Chie returned, unable to help getting in on the joke. She paused to adjust her footwear and pull a sock up, which prompted her companion to stop as well. In the few moments before they began walking again, she took in the scenery surrounding the pergola they were approaching, from the twisted branches of the few ice-spangled trees in plantboxes to the clean, white smoothness of the snow blanketing the entire space. All of it gave the scene an otherworldly quality.

"Pretty," she puffed out. "The setting is nice, I mean, even considering the awful cold. I bet it doesn't look as pretty when it's summer, what with all the merchants and people around here. But right now it's really beautiful, in a lonely sort of way."

"Ooh, the romance of it all," was the sarcastic reply.

Chie smiled dreamily.

"Ah, don't you feel it, Nao?" she jested. "There's something in the air."

"Whatever the fuck it is, it's freezing me to death," Nao snickered. "But the lovebirds over there don't look like they're minding it."

"Quiet! They'll hear you."

"Why, afraid they won't let you get close enough to pluck their tails?"

Chie laughed and shushed her, saying that they were fairly well within earshot by now since whispers carried in the winter silence. After a few more strides, they called out again in greeting.

"Hello there," came the response. "Chie-han, Nao-han. Out for a walk?"

"Heading to dinner," Chie answered. "What are you doing here, Shizuru-san? It's cold." Her breath turned into mist as she spoke, and she wiggled an eyebrow at it. "See?"

"Cold in more ways than one," Nao put in, with a small smirk for the girl beside Shizuru. It was a wasted effort, however, as the dark-haired girl had her eyes fixed on a piece of wood that she was worrying with a knife. "Enjoying the fresh air, General?"

"Yes, and resting," Shizuru replied, giving them a bright smile. "We have been going about the town all day-you recall I ran into you earlier, Chie-han-talking to some of the citizens."

"Don't tell me. The issue about the governor, is it?" said Nao.

"Quite so."

"How does it look, Shizuru-san?" Chie asked. Shizuru sighed before responding.

"It appears Shikishima-han was telling the truth," she stated simply.

Nao sneered, her fine red brows trying to meet.

"Course it's true. If someone says something bad about a politician, you can expect it's an understatement," she muttered, to the other two's amusement.

"Does that sweeping statement include us?" Chie asked, pointing to herself and their general.

"It's an expression or-whatchamacallit, a common saying. And no, you know it doesn't."

"A common saying."

The other two Himeans shared a wry smile.

"The sad part is, I can't blame people for coming up with it," Chie sighed. "So. I guess we wait for Suda Yuuji-san to come home, then?"

Shizuru nodded.

"As it is, that is all we can do," she said. "I do wish he were here now, all the same."

"What is taking him so long, I wonder?" Chie mused aloud. "He should know we're here-surely the news must have reached him already. Any other governor would've come rushing back by now, or at least sent a message."

"I do not mind," Shizuru said. "If it is indeed on account of some public business that he is not present. The delay is of no matter, in that case."

"Well, seeing as he doesn't have any scruples about the citizenship itself, I don't think he'll have any scruples about making us wait for the sake of something that's a little less than public business," Chie told her.

"We could fetch him if you want, General," Nao put in.

"I do not think," Shizuru answered with a mischievous look, "we need to have you do any 'fetching' yet."

Nao and Chie laughed.

"Oh, now, I'd play nice, General," the primipilus protested jokingly.

"I think Shizuru-san would feel better if you said you wouldn't play at all," Chie quipped. "You said the same thing when you went to 'ask Prince Artaxi to be quiet' during the march, if I recall."

"Well, I shut him up, didn't I? From the sound of things, seems like this Yuuji can do with some trussing up, too."

"Yuuji, Yuuji," Shizuru mumbled, drawing their attention. "Ah, Chie-han, I meant to ask this earlier, but it slipped my mind. Is Suda Yuuji-han related to Aidou-han?"

Nao blinked at the commander question, then brought up her eyebrows as she hit upon it.

"Oh, right! Legate Aidou's a Yuji, isn't he?" she asked, getting a nod from the fair-haired woman. "Well that explains a lot, don't it?"

The other two women smiled, knowing the centurion disliked the legate in question.

"As far as I remember, they are related," Chie said later. "But distantly. The Yuji with one U and Yuuji with two U's come from one main bloodline, but the branches split off and became distinct from each other a while back. So the relation is now relatively remote, for most purposes."

Shizuru digested this. "I see. Thank you for clearing that up for me."

"They seem like enough to me," Nao muttered, drawing her lips into an expressive grimace. "A coward and a cunnus selling the citizenship. Pah!"

"Old sourpuss," Chie said, nodding warmly at her friend's sneer. "Why don't you show Shizuru-san those new things of yours, Nao? Has she seen them?"

The centurion's expression relaxed.

"No," she said, drawing one of the metal stars from the pouch in her cloak. "Just got them, General, and a pretty lot they are, too. What do you think?"

Shizuru took the proffered object and brought it up to her face. Her eyes took in the fine, razor-thin edge and gleam of metal hungry for flesh to bite.

"Most impressive," she said, after a moment. "A good find, Nao-han."

"I thought so."

"How was the price?"

"I'd say cheap, considering the quality."

"Ah." She hummed, eyes growing thoughtful. "I suppose I had better get my naginata's blade seen to."

"We've been sending the serviceable swords for whetting," Chie told her. "I don't think we'll need to get any good number of replacements, though. What with the enemy armour we took from our battles, and all. Most of what we're getting done will be maintenance."

"That is good." A pause. "On another subject, has the mail bound for Hime not departed yet?"

"Just did, a few hours ago," answered the legate. "I put the letters you wrote in there, too, along with the report for the Senate."

"Thank you."

Chie acknowledged her with a brief nod: "I actually meant to entrust them to Takeda-san, but I couldn't, it turns out."

"Why?"

"Oh, you didn't know? He didn't go down to Argus to catch his ship after all. Said he'd prolong his stay here and wait for the next one."

Shizuru's eyes narrowed, which Chie interpreted to mean she wanted to know why, again.

"I don't know why," she said.

"Odd, that," Nao said. "To decide to winter here instead of Hime. I mean, it's not like he didn't have a choice."

"Well, now," said Shizuru, a teasing twinkle coming to her eye. "You make it sound as though you yourself would rather be in Hime, Centurion! Can you stand being in my army no longer?"

Nao laughed at the tease.

"I can stand it fine, General," she declared. "Just give me a good fight and good people to fight with and I'll stand the pits of Dis fine, if I have to."

"There," said Chie, smile breaking out. "I'd drink to that."

"As would I," said the general.

"Then by the gods, let's all drink to it now!" Nao exclaimed, throwing up her hands. "That's what we were going to do, anyway. We're going for a nip, General. Come on, and we'll sample the best food and wine this town can serve up. What do you say?" She turned a short smirk to the silent figure beside Shizuru. "That includes you too, Kid. Not like we can leave you out, anyway, as you're always with Fujino-san."

The girl's eyes flashed to Shizuru as if by instinct. The general smiled at them.

"Are you hungry, Natsuki?" she asked genially, actually seeming to defer the decision to her attendant. "We can go and have dinner with Nao-han and Chie-han, if you are. Or if you want to come in out of the cold now, at least."

This brought a small, vaguely apologetic gesture indicating that the younger woman did not wish to go in yet, followed by another that managed to convey a suggestion that Shizuru should go if she wished. The older woman shook her head, still smiling.

"It is all right," Shizuru said. "I myself do not feel hungry yet."

She turned to her primipilus.

"Shall you take our apologies, Nao-han, that I cannot take you up on your offer?" she asked. "Perhaps it shall be my turn to invite you next time, but I am afraid I-no, we -must decline for now."

"Sure, more for me!" the centurion replied heartily, to their amusement. "Mind if we go?"

"Not at all. Please enjoy yourselves."

"We'll be off, then," Chie said, giving a small wave as she moved away. She tipped her chin jauntily at her friend's bodyguard-cum-attendant. "Try to make her come in soon, Natsuki-san-I'd hate to see two woman-shaped blocks of ice here tomorrow."

"I suppose that means I should cancel my plan to make snowmen."

After a few more jests, the two Himeans left, stepping high and fast through the snow. Shizuru watched them go before turning back to her bodyguard. She was about to ask the girl if she did not feel cold yet when her gaze fell on the object in Natsuki's hands.

"What is that, Natsuki?" she asked, gesturing to it.

Natsuki dropped her eyes to the object, then looked back up at Shizuru and held it out to her. The older woman took it and realised that it was the block of wood Natsuki had been chipping at the entire day as they made the rounds of the city. It was no longer a mere block of wood.

Her eyebrows went up in admiration.

"Why, this is quite well-done," Shizuru said, turning over the small figurine in her hands. "A wolf, is it not?"

She looked up to see the girl's nod.

"It is very nice." She sighed. "I myself am not much good at carving small objects like this. Oh, I daresay I can turn out a decent wooden horse or soldier. But not with the detail you have put into this. I can actually see the wave of the coat."

She said this while tracing the lines of the little wooden wolf, trying to feel the nuances of the grain and the chipped edges through her fingers, which were faintly numbed by the chilly air.

"This brings back memories," she said.

A small sound from the other brought her eyes back up. There was a curious look on the younger woman's face and she smiled at the silent question there.

"You see," she explained, "when I was younger, much younger, I used to know some friends whose parents would come back from campaign with something like this. A little Trojan horse perhaps, or a small wooden doll. I thought it ever so sweet, you know. For a parent to make such a thing on campaign and come back with it."

She paused and turned to lean against a cool pillar, her hands still playing with the carving as she went on.

"Odd whims we get when we are children. I used to hope," she said, "for my father to come home from campaign with one for me too. Even if he was not a mere ranker and could afford to purchase a carving instead, even if it was badly done. I would not have minded. I only wanted him to make one for me."

She sighed and followed it with a chuckle. After a few seconds of silence, the other finally took it upon herself to prod Shizuru into talking again.

"He did?" was the question.

Shizuru shook her head.

"No, he never did," she told the girl looking at her. "And I never did ask him to. Not that I really minded, nor that I ever thought less of his love for me due to that. It is simply that he was not that kind of man. He was a good father nonetheless. And he brought me back other things, riches and treasures found in campaign, which I liked too."

She shrugged.

"Although I still did wish he made me at least one carving." The older woman laughed at herself. "I am hard to please, it seems. Ah, well."

She was about to hand back the object to Natsuki when the girl asked another question.

"You like it?" the Otomeian asked.

Shizuru stopped in the act of holding out the wooden wolf. She flicked her eyes to it to ask if it was Natsuki was talking about, and the girl nodded.

"Yes," she said. "Yes, I do. It is very well-made, as I said before, and the detail is impressive considering it is so small I can swallow it with my hand. I like it very much."

The girl made a sort of half-shrug.

"You," she said quietly. "If you like it."

Shizuru tilted her head, wondering what the girl was trying to say.

"Forgive me, Natsuki," she said. "What was that?"

The girl nodded at the tiny figurine in Shizuru's hand.

"You may have it," she said, making the older woman's eyebrows go up.

"Oh no," Shizuru replied, feeling something like shyness stir inside her. "I couldn't, Natsuki. After all, you might have made this for some-"

"No one," the girl interrupted.

Shizuru looked her in the eye.

"Are you certain?" she asked, feeling rather warmer than before. "Would you truly like to give it to me?"

Natsuki nodded.

"Yours," she told Shizuru, who smiled at the hushed statement.

"I see," the older woman said at length. "Thank you, Natsuki."

Natsuki said nothing.

"I will keep it with me at all times-indeed, wherever I go," Shizuru said, bringing a hint of colour to her companion's cheeks, as well as a small mumble of disbelief. "Do you not believe me? I shall, you know."

Unexpectedly, Natsuki lifted an eyebrow and smirked humorously at her.

"It is true," Shizuru protested, laughing a little at the girl's scepticism. "I promise. I shall take it everywhere I go. It shall go right into the chest I use to house the other things I always bring with me on campaign. Why, I might even bring it along with me everywhere! I may put it on a chain of some kind, and carry it thus, just to spite you for your lack of faith in me."

The girl mumbled something that she failed to catch, and she leaned forward to hear better.

"What?" she asked, hoping Natsuki would repeat it, which the girl did.

"Even when you bathe?"

"Why, yes, I shall bring it even when I bathe," Shizuru answered, laughing at what was obviously a tease. "I shall call it my little Natsuki, my personal charm."

This brought on a full blush and a series of mutters. Shizuru laughed, shaking her head at her companion.

"Do not tell me you dislike the name," she said. "It is yours, after all."

More muttering, the words turning into curling tendrils of white fog as Natsuki moved her lips. The older woman moved a step closer to lean her hip against the cool marble railing, her face showing her enjoyment of the reaction she had provoked.

"Well then, give me another name for it, if you will," she said through a few more chuckles.

Natsuki scowled at her, obviously still piqued by the jab.

"Unless you do so, I shall continue to call it my little Natsuki," the older woman threatened.

The scowl remained and the girl turned away as though snubbing her.

Shizuru sighed.

"All right then," she said, disappointed that the girl did not bite. "So little Natsuki it is-"

A soft grumble interrupted her and she stopped speaking. Her head snapped to the side.

"What was that, Natsuki?"

The girl took a moment before answering. When she did, Shizuru heard her clearly.

"Call it Duran."

The older woman echoed the cryptic pronouncement.

"Du... ran?" she said.

A tilt of the chin: "Duran."

"Do you mean that is what we should call it?" Shizuru asked.

A nod. Shizuru smiled, pleased by the sound of the foreign name.

"What does it mean?" she asked, knowing Otomeians often picked names for children or pets based on meaning.

"It means," Natsuki said, "from the cold."

"Fitting," Shizuru nodded. "And ironic, considering it comes from a summer child."

Natsuki held out a hand to her, seeming to want the figurine back.

"Oh," she said, grinning. "What did I say now? Are you taking it back already?"

The girl looked surprised at this interpretation.

"No," she said.

"What do you want with it, then?"

She handed the sculpture to Natsuki, who took it as carefully as one would take a delicate flower, plucking it cautiously from her hands. The girl had drawn out the knife she had been using for carving, and she looked at Shizuru.

"I will, um," she began. "Carve. Your name."

Shizuru's forehead wrinkled.

"My name...?" she asked, trying to probe the eyes trained on hers. After a few seconds: "Are you going to put it there?"

A nod.

Interesting, Shizuru thought. Must be a custom with them.

Natsuki nodded again: "How..."

"How?"

Natsuki gave an eloquent shrug, pointing the tip of the knife at the object in her hand. Shizuru's head came up as she apprehended what the girl wanted to know.

"Oh, yes," she said, pushing off from the railing and looking around. "Of course. Let me see now..."

She began to walk, making her way down the marble steps of the portico with Natsuki following her. Once she reached the snow, she lifted her foot and began to trace her name in the white powder, Natsuki watching the movements.

"My name is written this way," she said afterwards.

The girl hummed and began to copy the symbols into the sculpture.

"Thank you," said Shizuru when she was done, making no move to take the carving being held out.

Natsuki nodded, still holding out the object.

"May I ask you to do something else for me?" Shizuru asked, prompting the hand holding out the carving to drop. "Would you please carve your name here, too?"

Natsuki made a small sound of perplexity, her face showing confusion at the request. Shizuru took it upon herself to explain further, aware of sounding more earnest than normal.

"To prove that it is a gift from you," she explained, the corners of her mouth turning up. "It is a gift, is it not?"

Natsuki eyed her for a moment before answering in the affirmative.

"Then," Shizuru said, feeling a little self-conscious before that unwavering gaze. "Would you be kind enough to put your name there as well?"

The girl seemed uncertain; Shizuru registered it.

"Please?" she asked.

The word was all it took to nudge Natsuki to a decision. Nodding quickly, the girl started to carve her own name on the wolf as well. Shizuru smiled brightly at that and murmured her thanks as she watched the girl fulfil her request.

"Oh, yes," she said, as the girl worked. "Why did you make a wolf, by the way? To refer to the daos, I suppose?"

Natsuki nodded, still intent on her task.

"I see."

"Also..."

"Yes?"

"I... I like them also."

"Wolves?"

Another nod.

"Ah," said the older woman. "You do have some around Otomeia, yes?"

An affirmative sound, then, later: "In the forest."

"As expected," Shizuru said. "Do you know that wolves are actually quite an important to Hime, at least in its mythology? Because of the tale of the twins Romulus and Remus?"

This time the girl even smiled, glancing up briefly from her work.

"Ah, so you are familiar with it," Shizuru observed.

"Mm-hm." The girl seemed pleased with her own knowledge. "I read."

"In a book on Hime, I shall wager?"

"Mm-hm."

"I see." A pause. "Do you like to read?"

"Yes."

"I see."

Natsuki looked up.

"Very much," she added to her earlier answer.

Shizuru smiled brightly.

"I see," she said again.

The Otomeian lifted her chin, apparently finished with what she was doing, and handed the figurine back to Shizuru. Shizuru took it and read the characters on the side.

"That is good," she murmured absently, inspecting the way Natsuki had carved the names: the girl really had a talent for detailed work, she could see now, for the carved characters were below the length of her smallest fingernail in height. She gave the girl another smile of thanks before parting the ends of her cape and tucking the object into her pouch.

"Shizuru..."

"Yes?" she answered quickly, too quickly in fact. Natsuki spoke so rarely and she valued each rare occasion so much that each opportunity for it tended still to excite her into trying to grasp at each pithy word from the girl's mouth. "What is it, Natsuki?"

"Duh-duh-do you, um."

The girl stopped and looked dejected for having succumbed to her stammer. Shizuru had noticed that it tended to surface when she was most anxious, which was a difficulty as the girl got even more anxious when she noted her own stutter.

Shizuru tried to encourage her with a smile.

"Go on, Natsuki," she said. "What is it?"

It did not seem to be enough, for the crease between the girl's brows only deepened.

"Do not worry," she went on. "You may ask anything of me."

Natsuki sent her a doubtful look that brought to mind a child afraid to say something for fear of a reprimand. The older woman felt herself softening even more at the sight, and wondered at it.

I had not thought myself so affected by children, she thought to herself. Yet this particular child has the power to melt so much of me. The girl struck her as something still young and fresh, even despite all the Otomeian's years as a warrior. The girl's past, her origins, the slaughter of her original people and now her career as leader of a cavalry regiment famed for their abilities at slaughtering the enemy—all of this had not the strength to dull the still-existing but powerfully repressed child that had been denied its day yet still lived within. Shizuru had learned to look for it, waiting eagerly for the girl to let it slip and peek an engaging eye at her between the chinks.

"Truly," she said now with great solicitude, smiling at the child in the Otomeian that was still afraid to say what it wanted to say. "You may ask me anything at all, Natsuki, and I will answer anything you ask honestly. I am hardly a brute to get angry for a question, especially a well-meaning one."

The girl finally seemed to take heart. Shizuru schooled her face into pleasant anticipation as she waited for the other to start.

"You have, um," Natsuki began. "Do you have parents?"

The rusty eyes widened at the query, for Shizuru had not expected those words. She recovered quickly, however, when she saw the effect her reaction had on Natsuki. The younger woman did not move, but something in her eyes and stance seemed to bespeak a sharp inward flinch, an expectation of reproach for daring to ask such a thing. It was a mute, tightly-coiled apprehension that reminded her of another creature that had manifested much the same apprehension once: a new colt for her birthday, a sleek and fine specimen that had yet to be broken in. It was there in the way her bodyguard stood, reminding her of the nervous flicking of the ears; there in that green gaze, somehow similar to the anxiety of the animal's large, wet eyes.

So wary, she thought, reaching out to touch the girl's shoulder. The shining eyes followed her hand with tense attention, reminding her yet again of the way the colt had looked. Of the way it had been ready to turn either teeth or hooves to her if she hurt it. And when she put her palm on Natsuki's shoulder, she remembered too the feeling of touching that long-gone animal, the muscles that had rippled under the taut, sleek hide.

It was the feeling of touching dread.

You should not be afraid of me, she thought, willing the girl to understand it even if she did not speak it aloud. Her hand curled around the shoulder, almost as though massaging it, and she accompanied the touch with a smile. At this, she felt the other begin to relax.

"Do I have parents," Shizuru said, repeating the question. "Everyone does, Dear Girl. I suppose you mean if they are still alive?"

Natsuki nodded with care.

"I see." Shizuru replied, not bothering to remove her hand where it sat. "No, they have already passed away."

There was a soft murmur of apology.

"Oh, it is all right, Natsuki," she said. "I do not mind it now. It was a long time ago, you see. Around the end of my sixteenth year. For my father, anyway."

Natsuki said nothing, her eyes dropping to her feet. Shizuru kept her eyes on the girl.

"Would you like to know what happened?" she offered, her mind more on the murky shadows of the girl's past rather than her own. "I do not mind talking about it, so do not worry."

This brought the other's gaze back up.

"There is not," she uttered, "pain?"

Shizuru smiled: "Not of the sort you are fearing. I have made my peace with it."

"Umm."

Shizuru reluctantly let go of the shoulder under her palm, knowing she had to let go of it or Natsuki would begin to wonder.

"My father died on campaign," she started. "He was a senator too, as was my mother, and he was commander of that campaign. He contracted an illness on the march and died after a battle. Exhaustion of the body, perhaps."

Natsuki surprised the older woman by taking her hand. To be precise, she took only one finger and pulled the Himean with it.

"What-oh," Shizuru said, letting herself be led back to the pergola they had been standing in earlier. Natsuki brought the two of them to the railing, whereupon she got up onto the wide balustrade and patted the space next to her as if to invite Shizuru there. The older woman chuckled at the friendly-if-childlike gesture and followed suit.

"Thank you, my feet were freezing," she said playfully, before going on with her story. She told Natsuki how her father's death had been the reason for her decision to enter the military enterprise.

"I applied to be a contubernalis for that same campaign," she told the girl, who was listening avidly to her story. "Do you know what that is, the contubernalis?"

Natsuki shook her head.

"A contubernalis is actually a cadet of the Himean army," Shizuru told her. "In Hime, almost all soldiers go through at least that phase of military service, to fulfil the requirements of the state for all citizens to render service to the armed forces. However, as with most things, that position is altered somewhat in the case of, well, people of higher social status. In our case, we are not 'normal' cadets but made to be the special assistants of the highest officers- the better the family's connections, the higher the officer. The objective, of course, is to keep us out of actual fighting... or out of danger. I am sure you can see why, given that our lives do not revolve entirely around the military. We are potential senators first, we offspring of the upper classes, and soldiers and officers only after."

Natsuki nodded, her intelligent eyes lighting up in comprehension.

"But I was not really concerned about being kept out of danger at the time," Shizuru said. "I was more eager to actually contribute something to the battle, in terms of fighting. The contubernalis position was only a means to that goal- to get out on the same battlefield that had, in a way, killed my father."

She laughed all of a sudden, wrinkling her nose at her juvenile self.

"I suppose I felt I had to do that much, at least," she said. "And I do think was being a little cocky then, in thinking I could do much at all. I felt, vaguely, that my presence would make a great difference somehow, as though fate would aid us better were I only present. How silly I was back then, now that I think on it! In my defence, it was only my first time so I was still quite green and perhaps, I do not know... romantic? Perhaps I went there fancying myself something of the protagonist in the story."

She smiled at the girl, who lifted a dark eyebrow curiously.

"First time?" Natsuki asked.

"To be in a war," Shizuru nodded. "So, really, I was a touch daunted when I first saw the slaughter on the battlefield. Really not at all as the poets describe it. Do you know what I mean?"

The girl actually grinned.

"War is glorious in writing," she offered. "Gory otherwise."

"Precisely," Shizuru said, exceedingly pleased by the answer. "That said, I was-and am still-a headstrong person. I disregarded my commander's instructions to stay out of the fighting and ran off into the fray the first chance I got. An insubordinate cadet. Ye gods, I was a horror."

The two of them chuckled.

"It took merely a few minutes to show me I was nothing but a foolish girl," Shizuru went on after that. "Still wet behind the ears yet jumping into battle in some misguided notion of being the hero of an epic. Ah well. Life disabuses us of all our cherished romances of self-perception at some point or another."

Natsuki's voice slipped into her ears: "But you won, no?"

"Yes, we did," Shizuru replied. "I thank the gods for that, and not for my sake alone."

"No," said the girl, shaking her head. "Shizuru, you won."

Shizuru gave the girl a baffled look, wondering what she was talking about.

"The corona obsidionalis," explained the younger woman, bringing a smile to the Himean's face. "You won it then, no?"

"You know about that?" Shizuru said wonderingly.

"Mm-hm."

"I see." Shizuru exhaled, watching the mist of her breath float up before vanishing in the dim light of the torches in the pergola. "Well, yes, I did win it."

She turned to her companion.

"My mother, she passed away while I was on that campaign," she said tranquilly. "Oh, it was no surprise-or no great one, at least. She was already ill when I left. The disease began the day she received the news that my father died..."

She paused.

"I suppose I did not expect her to go on without him, strong woman though she was. They were very fond of each other."

Natsuki said nothing, her eyes speaking sympathy.

"Hence, when I returned to Hime after the war, I was an orphan," Shizuru went on. "A war hero, yes, having won the corona obsidionalis, and automatically entitled to enter the Senate, making me the youngest senator in history, at the age of nineteen. Accomplishments for which people praise me and for which I have much to thank Fortuna. But I suppose that war cost me nearly as much as I gained."

"Sorry," said the girl. "I am sorry, Shizuru."

The older woman shook her head, diverted from her reminiscences by the pleasant sound of her name on Natsuki's lips.

"It's all right," she told her. "I do not feel bad about it anymore. There is nothing to be gained by dwelling on the past, or so I think, save if the recall is done to analyse it. So I prefer to busy myself with moving forward."

"And I shall be taking Hime with me as I do, much though some may hate me for it," she added, smiling wickedly.

"They call you a-a radical."

Shizuru's stared at her companion, startled.

"Yes, they do. Yes. Now, where did you hear that, Scamp?" she asked the girl laughingly.

The other only grinned.

"Well, I can make a guess, really," Shizuru said. "You are always with me, after all. I suppose I should not be surprised you have heard that word. And you, what do you think? Do you think I am a radical?"

The girl considered it, her eyes squinting.

"Well?" Shizuru urged.

"Is that good, being radical?" Natsuki replied, making the general grin again.

"It depends on whom you ask, Natsuki," Shizuru told her frankly. "If I told you that I am indeed a radical, would you think it was good or bad?"

"Good."

"Why?" she asked, amused by the swift answer.

"You are..."

"I?"

Natsuki smiled, her eyes shining.

"You are not bad, I think," she told Shizuru, who felt her joking smile fall a little at the words and prayed the girl would not notice.

"Well. That is very nice of you to say, Natsuki. Just to be clear," she said in mischief. "Does that mean you like me or not?"

The girl's eyes had just begun to widen when she decided to add something else.

"Or, put another way," she said. "Is that good or bad?"

She watched the girl's expression, amused by the inner fumble for words that could be read clearly on the pale countenance. It tinted the ivory cheek with a roseate stain.

"I think," came the husky voice. "I think it is good."

A curt inhalation before the girl added: "You."

She dropped her eyes after getting this out and thus failed to see Shizuru's blush rising in tandem with her own, much to the latter's relief. Shizuru blushed seldom and painfully, and it hurt her like a burn. The blush she was experiencing at this moment felt as though she had her face against a furnace, and she knew it probably looked like that as well.

The older woman slid off the banister and turned away to hide her face.

"Thank you," she said, ensuring her voice remained calm. "I think the same of you."

She shot a quick glance over her shoulder, glad to see that she was not the only one who seemed in danger of dying from blood-rush to the head.

"Natsuki," she said, turning away again. "I think we had better come in now, or risk catching cold. Let us have dinner as well."

She heard the soft mumble of agreement, then the muted sound of the girl's feet hitting the floor as she came down from the balustrade. She waited for Natsuki to stand next to her before taking a step forward, her lips pulling up unconsciously into a smile.

They left the pergola and went their way in comfortable-if-shy silence.

---

Meanwhile, another pair was walking out of the chilly streets of Sosia and also intent upon their evening repast. They entered a well-lit establishment and were duly welcomed by the proprietor, who ushered them to a table with great pomp after recognising the richness of their clothing. After telling the man to bring them some wine and food, they were left to their conversation.

"It's always good to see a fellow swordsman," said the male in the pair, smiling at his companion. "Or swordswoman, of course. It's been a while, Suou-kun."

Suou settled herself in her seat. "Almost all the people in our army are swordsmen and swordswomen."

He moved a hand dismissively.

"I mean true followers of swordplay as an art," he said. "Those like us, who understand its more elevated purpose."

This brought on a faint smirk, which he noted without real insult. After all, they had always disagreed on this subject, even in the early days when they had been training under the same master. She had always faulted the elitist principle their master-and Takeda-espoused regarding their sport, for she was of the contrary opinion that there should be little difference between those who trained in the choice schools of sportsmanship and those who had been trained by the battlefield itself. To her, the only real measure of excellence in swordsmanship was that of being skilled enough to win against an opponent in combat, whereas he considered the distinction of being a true 'sportsman' against being a mere 'soldier' one of import where valuation of skill was concerned.

"Anyway," he said, deciding not to worry their old disagreement. "You look well."

"Thank you," the fair woman told him, her extremely pale eyes turning grey in the low tavern light. "I think campaigning agrees with me."

"No plans to head back to Hime yet, then, even despite the issues with your campaign's funding?"

"Of course not."

"Hmm. Though it isn't like you can exactly just jump ship and go," he conceded. "You are a legate, after all. Fujino-san might not let you leave, even if you are family friends."

"She would if I asked."

"You sound so sure, Suou-kun."

"Because I know her better than you do, Takeda-san," she told him with a slightly mocking tone on the honorific. "She would give any of us an honourable discharge if we actually asked for it. See, she dislikes the language of obligation. She has no need of it, anyway."

"Is that so?"

She nodded.

"The woman," he said. "Strikes me as a little odd."

Suou gave him an enquiring look.

"I don't know why," he said. "From what I have to go on, I just feel that way, is all. I don't think I understand her way of doing things."

"Few people do."

"She seems a little too easygoing, though."

"You've always said the same thing of me," she retorted, a grin spreading on her face. "I guess easygoers do quite well after all. Just look at us. One a legate without being a senator and the other commander of a campaign in her early twenties. Not half bad, would you agree?"

He laughed, but it was reluctant. His smiling companion did not fail to mark it.

A woman came up and set a bottle of wine and two cups onto their table. Takeda poured for both of them and they resumed their dialogue.

"I thought you were going to go home today," Suou began, sipping at her beverage. "What happened?"

"I decided to postpone it."

"Oh, I didn't notice!" she said at his statement of the obvious. "Because ?"

He shrugged: "Just a few loose ends here and there."

"I see." A smile. "How was my sister, by the way, last you saw her in the city?"

There was no need to ask if he had in fact seen her: Suou's sister was one of the busier senators, not to mention one of those easiest to spot.

"A vision as always," he said, eyeing the woman before him who could count as one herself. Suou and her sister were among the most stunning members of the senatorial clans and, many said, of Hime. "She seemed happy, from what I could see of her."

A corner of her lips curled up lazily, letting him know she had noticed his deliberate evasion of the topic of her sister's controversial wife, who was popularly denounced by the conservatives for her low birth. And Takeda was definitely no liberal. All the same, he was delicate enough to know he would be better off avoiding any pronouncements on the issue, as he was something of a friend-or-old acquaintance-to Suou, though not to her sister.

"I suppose she's getting rather swamped with work right now," Suou hummed. "Being left to take care of the city and all."

"Yes, somewhat. But she carries it well."

"Like everything else."

She drank more of her wine, noting that he had yet to touch his. She devoted her attention to her drink, pretending to take small sips of it every now and then as she waited for him to talk.

"Suou," he said to her later. "I've a question."

"Yes?"

He met her eyes. "Do you know that Otomeian, the dark-haired one? Her name's Natsuki, I think."

Suou blinked slowly.

"You mean the general's girl," she said.

"The general's girl?"

"Yes, that's what we call her. After all, she looks like she belongs to the general, doesn't she?"

"Oh. I see. Right." He seemed to withdraw after that, his eyes narrowing. "Do you mean to say they're...?" He shrugged for emphasis. "That way?"

Suou lifted a silvery eyebrow.

"I'm not saying anything," she said coolly. "All I'm saying is that it looks that way. But looks can be deceiving."

He nodded vaguely.

"Why do you ask?" she said. "Interested?"

"What do you mean?" he murmured, his face that of a man with a great deal on his mind. His companion eyed him unenthusiastically, not feeling like putting up with his company this way: slow brooders like Takeda irritated Suou, especially when they had a habit of coming up with all the wrong conclusions, which she thought they did.

I had better shock him out of it, she decided.

"Do you want Fujino-san's girl for yourself?" she asked with near-perfect innocence, her very light eyes twinkling. "Turn her into Takeda-san's girl?"

His head snapped up at this.

"Perhaps you might like to take that up with Fujino-san, you know," she went on, hiding her inward grin. "And ask her about some things to see if it's at all possible. I would hardly be the best judge of it, after all."

"What are you talking about, Suou-kun?" he asked stiffly.

"Nothing, really," she answered, before feigning slight shock, her eyes growing wide as though she had just realised something of importance. "Could that be the loose end you were talking about earlier? Dear me!"

She laughed as he spluttered, knowing he would be visibly colouring now were his skin lighter.

"It's not that," he said curtly. Her eyebrow lifted once more as she reflected that her random shot might actually have hit a mark.

"Then why the questions about Natsuki-san?" she asked, keeping her tone light. The proprietor chose that particular moment to come up to the table, bearing plates and plates of food for them. After laying their dinner on the table, the man bowed and left them to their meal. Suou began before Takeda, reaching for the bread. She bit into the roll she had picked up, chewing carefully as she eyed the man in front of her. He looked mildly annoyed with her now, and that amused her to no end.

"I'm just curious," he told her finally. "That's all there is to it."

"Curious?" she said.

"Yes," he replied gruffly, taking a roll for himself. "I was just curious about them."

Suou sighed, letting another lazy smile drift over her face.

"Why, Takeda-kun," she said. "Aren't we all?"

Vocabulaire:

1. Circe - An immortal and sorceress known for her charms (both feminine and magical); she may also be found in Homer's Odyssey.
  2. 'First row of senators' - A reference to the seating arrangement of the House. The Roman Senate sat according to rank, with the most prominent members being at the front rows.
  3. Edepol! - Another Latin exclamation considered suitable for formal company; often used by men as the equivalent of the women's exclamation "Ecastor!"
  4. Patriciate - The collective term for the Patrician aristocracy.
  5. Prorogue - This word may actually be found in your regular English dictionary, but the meaning employed here is rarely included in the smaller-sized lexicons as many of them consider it obsolete. I personally do not, and find it apt to use this term here in its earlier sense in both English and Latin ("prorogo"), given the setting of the tale. The word means, in its usage for the rest of this story, "to extend (specifically, a person's term of office) ."

Inter Nos

It took another four days before the governor of Sosia returned to his station, giving the excuse that his business had taken longer than expected. Upon arrival, he invited some of the visiting army's officers to a lavishly-thrown banquet in his-and their, for the time being-residence. It was a cheerful affair, and instead of tables and chairs, the governor chose to implement the more classical as well as casual Himean way of seating. Long, upholstered couches were brought out and set before tables, allowing the guests to recline during the meal if they wished. He himself now lay stretched out on his own couch, observing the attendees as the servants brought in the last course for dinner.

A good collection of personalities, was his verdict as he took his time to appraise each visitor. It pleased him that his banquet was well-attended-so well-attended, in fact, that he doubted any host in Hime could do better, unless they invited the entire first row of senators to their feast. He had taken care to invite only those officials who were socially prominent. It was unnecessary to invite even the centurions or lower-ranked officers. Suda Yuuji believed that one of his standing did not trouble with those who were not among the distinguished. Besides which, his guest-list was a reflection of the political logic that it was useful to know certain people early on, for the sake of one's career. He needed support to be prorogued in his province too.

His eyes went around the couches, ticking off names and credentials. Besides his quaestor, he had invited Senator Tokiha's younger brother, named Takumi; the pre-senatorial legate and hugely patrician aristocrat, Suou Himemiya; the senior legate of the visiting army and senator, Chie Harada; the tribune of the plebs and famous swordsman, Takeda Masashi; and the young commander of the visiting army, Senator Shizuru Fujino herself. Now there was a list of guests that would make any socialite or politician die of envy! Clout, fame, and fortune all in one gathering!

The only anomaly here, he thought, was the very pretty dark-haired girl sitting beside General Fujino. She would not even be seated there were it not that the general herself insisted on having the girl by her side, something that pricked his curiosity. But that was nothing, really, after he took his quaestor aside and the man explained that the girl seemed to be the general's attendant. In any case, he attributed it the peculiarities of the patriciate. The girl's sulky and silent presence did not affect the quality of guests at his table, anyhow, and that was his main concern. Yes, he was very content with the party indeed.

He giggled to himself, feeling more expansive than usual, and listened to the conversation taking place.

"It's amazing how much snow you get," Takumi was saying. "And how fast it falls. Why, everything was white after a night!"

"That's true," the senior legate agreed. "Blanketed with it, and all in a few hours' time. I was a little surprised, to tell you the truth."

"It's a shame you could not have seen the city during the sunny months," Suda told her, joining in the discussion. "It is much more pleasurable to look at, I assure you, Harada-san. Far nicer than now."

He sighed dramatically afterwards, fingers plucking a grape from the bowl before him.

"The winter in these parts makes me long for the Himean summer," he said. "Snow, all snow, and nothing else. If I weren't so conscious of, hmmm, of my duties to Hime, I would not have stayed here for this season. As it is, I have become somewhat fond of this bleak old place."

This brought on a faint smirk from Chie, which Suda missed. Takumi did not.

"I think it has its own beauty," said a smooth voice.

It was Suou, the younger of the Himemiya sisters. Suda gave her his rapt attention, aware of the family's immense influence.

"Please go on, Himemiya-san," he told her.

"Suou, if you please, because the other name belongs more to my sister," she told him diffidently. "See, I actually find it alluring in a dramatic way. There is something in the blankness of it that is in itself appealing to me, in the clean beauty of a landscape devoid of nature's flamboyant colours. It renders every small spot of colour set against it doubly striking, by contrast."

"And I suppose it might help that I don't mind the cold either," she added to the company, sending a sly wink to Takumi. "Some of the others would probably disagree."

"Oh, I can't really say I like it," Takumi said to that, laughing. "You know why. But I do agree with you, Suou-san, that it's pretty in its own way. How you can stand it so well is beyond me, though. Why, you're skinny yourself!"

It was Chie who answered, her dark brows jumping up and down.

"The Himemiya are winter children," she declared. "Born to be cool, whether in attitude, appearance, or atmosphere."

The company laughed, for there was an ongoing joke in the Himean upper class about 'the legendary Himemiya cool', in fact. It was partly due to their appearances: no-one could deny that the members of the family were indeed wintry-looking, with their light eyes and fair hair.

"Sitting here, on the other hand," Chie continued, with a gesture to her left. "You have a summer child. Oh-wait-two of them, in fact!"

There was laughter yet again, although only among the members of the general's army. The other diners listened curiously as the governor took it upon himself to ask why there were two 'summer children'.

"I'm sure one is Fujino-san herself," he said, with a dip of his chin towards the smiling woman. "Because of her wonderful colouring, no doubt. But who is the other?"

"Natsuki-san," was the reply.

Takeda interrupted, speaking for perhaps only the tenth time since his arrival. The tribune of the plebs seemed to be uncommonly quiet tonight, thought Suda, and when he did speak, it came out in an uncharacteristically tongue-tied fashion, as it did now.

"Natsu-what-can I ask why?" the swordsman stumbled out, his eyes flicking from the Otomeian girl to Chie several times. "What does that mean?"

"It's because of Natsuki-san's name, Takeda-kun," Suou told him as she gave a quick smile to the girl in question. "Her name, they tell us, means something along those lines. Summer child, that is."

All heads turned to the dark-haired girl, whose cheeks were now splashed with a pink. It was obvious that she did not relish the attention given her by the party, and if the crease between her brows was any indication, was even irked by it.

"I am amused that you should call us summer children, Chie-han," said Shizuru, drawing all eyes to her. "After all, Natsuki and I have both suffered accusations of being cool as well."

Chie smiled at her friend.

"True," she said. "But I guess I was thinking more in terms of pure physical looks this time-as far as you are concerned, anyway, Shizuru-san."

"Do I look so warm of appearance, then?" Shizuru grinned.

"The famous flaming eyes," Suda put in, sighing exaggeratedly. "I have always wanted to see them up close, Fujino-san. Really, such an unusual colour! I wonder if your parents were not surprised to see them. I remember it was said, even back when I was still in Hime, that your eyes were far redder than anyone else to have ever had the supposed red eyes in your clan. And I have yet to see eyes of the shade you have, in fact."

Shizuru inclined her head, golden lashes drooping modestly before sweeping back up.

"They have led me to some trouble in the past," she said, her lips turning up as she sent a playful smile to the Himemiya sitting across her. "Although only in trifling things. I recall very well what Suou-han said about them, the first time we met."

"Ecaster !" Suou groaned, starting to laugh. "Don't tell me you still remember that, Shizuru-san. My sister teased me about it for a week. Come to think of it, she teases me about it until now."

"It was quite memorable."

"In its own way." Suou stopped to smile shamefacedly at Chie. "That was one time the 'legendary Himemiya cool' melted, Chie-san. I'm surprised you appear not to know it. I would have thought my sister would tell you, given how much she relishes my discomfiture."

This piqued everyone's interest, of course, and they pressed the two patricians to reveal the details. It was Suou who acquiesced and began the story.

"See, Shizuru-san and my sister met each other before we did," she explained, with a nod to Shizuru. "They met months before the two of us. Shizuru-san and I only met when I was seven, or barely seven. I give that as my defence, incidentally, for what happens in the story. I was very young and innocent."

Shizuru let out a laugh: "Pre-empting the tease?"

"Yes, you know you would do it too," Suou replied. "So to go on, the Fujino came over to dinner one day and this was when we encountered each other for the first time. It was strange, but I managed to stay ignorant of the rumours about her eyes until then, and since my sister never commented on them when she told me her impressions of the Fujino heiress, I had no idea what colour they were." She feigned frustration. "See, all Chikane ever told me was that Shizuru-san was very pleasant, very smart, and the like. You think she would say a word about something as distinctive as true red eyes, but no, not one peep."

She stopped to exchange a smile with Shizuru.

"My sister," she said very dryly, "is too cool sometimes."

The others laughed.

"Anyhow," Suou resumed. "I came down late and couldn't find my sister or Shizuru-san. The adults were in the study. So I wandered into the garden, knowing they would call for me once the dinner was set. I ran into Shizuru-san there, and she introduced herself to me. However, we were standing away from the torches at that time so I was unable to notice her eyes. Or their precise shade, that is."

She stopped here and, making a face, asked Shizuru to tell the rest. The other woman obliged.

"Shortly after we made our introductions, I suggested that we return indoors," Shizuru told them. "And Suou-han agreed. No sooner had we stepped into the light, however, than she turned to me and made as though to say something." She chuckled. "Not that she ever got to say it. She gave me one look of pure horror and ran off into the house, screaming something that forced me to run after her, if only just to calm her panic."

"What?" asked Chie. "What was she screaming?"

"She was screaming..." Shizuru answered, her shoulders shaking with suppressed mirth. "To call for a doctor because my eyes were bleeding out."

Suou winced playfully as chortles erupted around the tables.

"She gave the adults such a fright, you know, for by the time she reached them, the words had become something about my eyes falling out of the sockets," Shizuru laughed. "I suppose they thought I had an accident while playing in the garden. What a horrid image you did conjure up!"

"Again, please do not forget," Suou retorted. "I was young, oh so very young."

"That's a good story, though, Suou-san," Takumi told her. "I think it's adorable."

"Do you think so?" Suou said, her slow smile coming out.

"It has good, ah, anecdotal value," Chie told her, lifting a goblet to the younger woman in salute.

"I suppose I would think so, too," said younger woman replied. "But it's hard when the value comes at my expense, you know."

They laughed at the dry remark.

"I like to think of it as a normal reaction," she went on. "Even now, Shizuru-san's eyes startle people."

"So they do," put in Sosia's governor. "But, really... so beautiful!"

He said this in a fawning fashion that made others aside from Chie smirk this time. Not a single person at that table could miss the fact that he was trying to cull favour with the army general, who herself pretended ignorance.

"My thanks for the compliment, Yuuji-han," she was telling him. "Although you need not say it so often, or my head shall soon no longer be able to fit in the room."

"Oh, no, no," he replied swiftly. "I'm sure Fujino-san is too modest to be affected by my remarks!"

Chie exchanged a quick look with Suou, who was also stifling her mirth. The former quirked her lips at the younger legate, her message clear: I'm going to break up this farce.

"Yuuji-san," said the senior legate, lifting her voice. "That reminds me of something. Some of your staff were saying that the gardens adjoining your residence look absolutely stunning even during this season, having been designed with the winter months in mind. It's wonderful how space can actually be dedicated to huge lawns in these territories! I suppose the gubernatorial mansions were planned out early on, probably at the same time the city walls went up. But I'm getting off topic. Shizuru-san was telling me just this morning that she would love to see the gardens' beauty for herself. If she only had someone to lead her through them: they're so large, you see." She smiled at her commander. "And she's just too modest to ask someone to do it so here I am daring on her behalf."

Suda sat up at this, looking delighted. He clapped his hands together as a grin made two lines at the sides of his mouth more articulated, the grooves eating into the flesh. His loose cheeks shook with excitement.

"Oh, of course, of course," he exclaimed. "I would be glad to do it, Fujino-san. I daresay I know my own residence better than anyone. I shall be your guide."

Shizuru sent a small and grateful smile to her legate before answering Suda.

"Thank you, Yuuji-han," she spoke. "That is most gracious of you."

"Not at all!" he cried, taking a quick peek at the window on the far side of the room. "I see it is still light. We can do it after you finish with your dessert, Fujino-san, or perhaps tomorrow, so you may see it better. What would you prefer?"

"I am actually finished," she replied. "But if you are not, then we may-"

"No, no, I don't mind," he said, rising to his feet. "Would you excuse us?" he asked the others. "There is a breathtaking part of the garden that looks best either under the moon or in twilight-you know it, Homura-and I would love to have Fujino-san see it. This is the perfect time. It's going on evening."

They signalled their assent and Shizuru stood up as well, Natsuki following suit. Just as they were moving off from the party, however, another rose to join them.

"I-I'd like to, uh, accompany-the gardens," said Takeda, striding to the three who had stopped to look at him. "If I may."

The others tried to make sense of the stammered words.

"Oh, why, Takeda-kun?" Suou asked, understanding his ploy. "Are the gardens going somewhere?"

He promptly flushed and grimaced at her.

"No! I meant, I'm going to accompany Suda-san and the others to the gardens," he retorted, slowing his speech to avoid tripping over his words once again. "I'm going with them."

Homura spoke up.

"But Takeda-san," he said, pointing to something on the table. "You haven't even touched your dessert."

Takeda frowned lightly, running a hand through his short, dark hair.

"I never eat dessert," he answered curtly, seeming annoyed by the suggestion. "It's those silly sweet concoctions make a sportsman's hands weak."

Homura digested this with a patently puzzled expression.

"Spoken like a true sportsman-" Suou mumbled slyly under her breath, so that only those at her side could hear. "-of the thumb-wrestle."

Takumi and Chie giggled, hiding their faces by putting their cups to their mouths. The swordsman, however, had already turned away to join the ones leaving the room. Once the quartet had gone off, those who remained went on merrily about their conversation.

"Edepol!" Takumi laughed. "How strange of Takeda-san. Imagine never eating dessert for that reason."

"Silly sweet concoctions, eh?" Suou smiled, her beautiful face lighting up with amusement. "He always was ridiculous in his statements, you know."

Chie was still giggling, and she grinned at the other legate.

"I'm still laughing over the 'thumb-wrestle' bit," she said. "But, yes, what an odd thing to say!"

Suou shrugged.

"For myself, I always like dessert after a meal, and I don't think I've ever missed a chance to have it when it's there." She lifted her eyebrow questioningly at Chie. "You consider me a sportswoman, Chie-san. Do you think my hands are weak?"

"Anything but!"

The company chuckled and continued to discuss the merits of having dessert at the end of a meal, Takeda and his 'odd' pronouncements set aside.

---

After a detour to obtain their cloaks, the other group of guests reached the patio of the gubernatorial palace, from where they looked out onto the path leading into the main gardens. It was covered with snow, but was still discernible due to the high, trimmed bushes marking its sides.

"We should take the path," the governor explained to his guests. "That way, we'll not step and fall into drifts. The snow makes it hard to tell where the depressions are."

"I see," Shizuru replied, painfully aware of the other man with them—who was making a conscious effort to stay uncomfortably near her, for whatever reason. "Shall we go, then?"

As they made their way along the path, Suda pointed out various statues and groves that he thought would interest his Himean companions. While they nodded and made noncommittal remarks, however, neither of them was actually paying attention to the surroundings. The only one who seemed to be looking about with an impression of one noting down details was the unspeaking Otomeian with them. The other two maintained a charade of interest that Suda failed to notice for what it was, so earnest was he in his commentary.

"And this," Suda said, moving on to point to a marble statue. "Is one of my particular favourites. It's of Alexander the Great."

"Mm, it's good," Takeda murmured, whilst the general said something about it showing fine craftsmanship. Suda grinned and resumed his remarks, still too preoccupied with it to notice the boredom of his companions. Not that he could have actually seen Shizuru's, of course, but it was there, nonetheless. In fact, were it not that the younger senator was a master of composing her expression, what might have been seen there was not only boredom but irritation as well. As it was, she merely smiled and nodded at the governor of Sosia and his commentary.

How troublesome, she was thinking. She had to talk to him too, about the matter with the illegal citizens. Instead, she was being led through a frosted garden in winter, forced to nod at his inconsequential notes on art and topiary. She could hardly do otherwise when an unwanted hanger-on had just attached himself to them.

She sent a quick, fleeting glance to the other man in the party.

Thick, she determined wryly. Anyone else would have caught in Chie's request an intention that she meet with the governor alone, but Takeda Masashi had obviously not noticed-or was pretending not to notice it. Whatever the case, it made her very wary of him. She wanted him to leave already! Yet the man kept sticking close, far too close for her taste.

She did not sense anything from the swordsman that would indicate he was attracted to her, and yet it was obvious he was striving to keep as little distance between them as possible. His strange behaviour moved her to pay more attention to him than Suda, just in case she could figure out what it all meant. It was only after a good while had passed that it struck her exactly what he was doing-and on whom his eyes were fixed.

Ecastor!

"This is the statue I commissioned," went Suda's voice, droning in the background. "It cost me a lot, mind you, but it was worth it, I think. After all, the sculptor was of great fame..."

Shizuru nodded idly again, conscious of a terrible dislike rising within her as she noticed the man with them trying to move closer to her once more-or rather, to move closer to her Otomeian companion. It took all of her famed cool not to send him a withering glare at the act. Instead, she sped up her walk a little, which prompted her bodyguard to do the same. To her chagrin, Takeda did it as well.

Upon my word, she thought. The man is like a leech!

She clenched her teeth, resisting the very honest, instinctive urge to kick him away from the girl. So suddenly had the epiphany of Takeda's intentions burst upon her that she forgot even to take a moment to analyze the emotions it provoked, as she typically did. Rather, she leapt straight into reaction this time, a thrill of annoyance running through her veins.

So that is why he acts so strangely around us, and why he wanted to come along now, she thought, seething. Why, the little...

She took a deep breath to calm herself, and her bodyguard caught the sound. Natsuki turned towards her, studying her face with an expression of innocent curiosity. Shizuru would have taken the time to admire the immensely appealing quality of the girl's face just then, had she not been aware that Takeda would probably do the same.

She decided to shield her from him, failing to notice the irony of her being the one to defend her bodyguard. She beckoned the girl to come even closer, though they were already walking next to each other, and Natsuki complied, perhaps thinking that the older woman wanted to say something without being heard by their other companions. She made no motion to move away, however, when Shizuru simply went on walking afterwards without saying anything.

He cannot come closer without being considered rude now, Shizuru was thinking triumphantly, her arm pressed against the girl's due to her ploy. That gave her a measure of assurance, although she could still feel the intrusive presence just behind them, dogging their footsteps. If only he would leave! That... that...

She searched her mind, trying to come up with a suitably pejorative term for the cause of her ire.

That complete idiot.

Suda chose that moment to draw her attention and was slightly disconcerted by the brief flash of annoyance he sensed from her when she faced him again. She smiled quickly to defuse the wariness caused by her mask's slip. She still had business to attend to, after all, which did not concern Takeda but the governor. The sooner she finished it, the better.

And the sooner she could get Natsuki away from her clumsy admirer.

"You have such attractive scenery here, Yuuji-han," she told Suda, who beamed at the compliment. "Most relaxing."

"Yes, don't you think?" he said, putting on his most amiable expression. "This is just what you need, Fujino-san, given how hard you have been working on this campaign. A lot of things must be on your mind."

"Indeed, a lot of things," she answered with grim humour, her eyes flicking to the swordsman near them. "It does not help that I find more things to occupy me wherever I go. Really so taxing to one's health, you know."

"Oh, yes, yes," he answered earnestly. "I hope you shall be able to rest here. It is a most peaceful place, my little province."

She gave him a small smile. "That is what I had hoped too, although now that you mention it, I did find some things to occupy me again, here. Oh, but forgive me! I should not trouble you with my small concerns..."

"No, no!" he answered, eager to ingratiate himself. "Please, do tell me how I can be of service."

"Certain things," she said, "have come to attention, Yuuji-han."

"May I ask what they are?" he ventured.

"Oh, merely some trifles," she replied. "Things to do with the usual political concerns... citizenship, money and the like. Tedious things, you know."

He turned to her, his formerly jovial expression replaced by a guarded one. She maintained her smile.

"Still and all," she went on. "One must accord some time to them, being a servant of Hime, yes? But what am I saying? I need not say such things to one as conscious of one's duties as yourself. Surely you understand all this, without my saying it."

He looked almost panicked now, his big, wide face creased with worry. She smiled and inclined her head very slightly to remind him that they were in the presence of others and that he should be careful.

"Of course, oh yes," he replied, shooting their companions a glance. "Shall we move a little away for a moment, maybe? There are times when-when it would be best to be careful when speaking of politics."

"Yes, of course. Even trifles can be dangerous, on occasion."

"Takeda-san," Suda said, looking at the other man. "Would you please excuse us for a while? Just some things we have to talk about. Just the two of us, as a matter of-of-protocol."

"Hm?" Takeda responded, still too focused on Natsuki to listen properly. "Yes. Yes, please go ahead."

Shizuru grit her teeth as she knew what she had to do next. She inclined her head and turned to her bodyguard, silently cursing Suda for having said that the conversation would only be between the two of them.

"Natsuki," she said very gently. "You heard Yuuji-han. Shall you wait for me here? We shall only be a little way off, and it shall not be long."

She watched as the girl's ears seemed to perk up at this, a light frown signalling her displeasure at the notion. Takeda, however, obviously felt otherwise.

"Don't worry, Fujino-san," he said to Shizuru, his grave face looking most impressive-or so he hoped. "I'll be with her."

Shizuru looked at him with a faint lift of her eyebrows, conscious of her cresting aversion to the man. Don't worry? She disliked the idea of leaving him with her bodyguard just as much as the latter seemed to dislike the idea of leaving her with the governor. She eyed the tribune of the plebs with veiled annoyance, wondering how the man could be so galling without knowing it. Or did he know it?

"Quite," she said, after a measured pause. "I confess I was not worried, Takeda-han. I would have thought you would be capable enough to fend for yourself if you were attacked."

Surprise crossed his face as she continued, still pretending to have misunderstood his words.

"However, if you would truly feel safer with my bodyguard in the vicinity, then who am I to refuse such a great swordsman that measure of protection? Do not worry," she drawled, watching the colour rise angrily in his face. "Natsuki is strong enough to protect both of you easily."

With this parting shot, she reached for the girl's hand and squeezed it before walking away, Suda at her side. The latter seemed to have missed the show, however, judging from the frown on his face. He was still too concerned about his own hide to pay attention to Shizuru's interaction with Takeda. Unease, on occasion, made a person likely to lose sight of his surroundings-and Suda was very, very uneasy. Little did he know it, but the person responsible for his own unease was feeling quite a bit of the same discomfort herself. She kept her frown inside, though, as she scolded herself silently.

Now when did I become so possessive? she pondered, wondering at her own actions. She was rarely this domineering-or, to be more precise, was never so when it came to people. Not with friends, not with relatives, not even with slaves. Apparently only with Natsuki. Was she so jealous when it came to this Otomeian girl, then? She, jealous? Now there was something you hardly saw everyday! The mere idea sent a chill of wonder down her spine. Surely it was something other than jealousy, she hoped, something more rational. All the same, she itched with every step to go back to the girl and drag her away from the pest.

And if that is not jealousy speaking, she sighed to herself resignedly, I shall eat my armour, cloak and all.

"Fujino-san?"

She set aside her musings and turned to the governor. They eyed each other for a few seconds, trying to get each other's measure, and it was clear that it was Shizuru who was found more difficult to put on the scales. Thus Suda spoke first, giving up on reading that pleasantly smiling facade.

"I think this is far enough," he said, gesturing towards the pair they had left a few meters away. "They can't hear us anymore, I'm sure."

"Of course," she said. "Although you never know. They might be able to read lips."

He looked confused again and she smiled. She had a particular enjoyment for confusing people she was about to quiz.

"Well then," she said, readying herself for an unpleasant conversation. "Shall we talk about the sales of the citizenship you have been brokering?"

---

A little away from the Shizuru and Suda, a conversation no less unpleasant was taking place. Indeed, it was even questionable as to whether or not it could be called a conversation, as it had more of the quality of a monologue.

"So, uh, Natsuki-san. That's a pretty name, eh?"

Takeda almost sighed as the girl at his side continued to ignore him, her eyes focused on the pair standing a way off from them. He tried again, being a believer in the power of perseverance.

"It's pretty cold," he said. "Are you fine standing here? Maybe we could wait for them inside."

He winced as she snapped him a brief but terrifically glacial look. There could be no misreading the refusal in that glance.

Jupiter, he thought wryly. The weather's not the only thing that's freezing here. How was he going to get her to talk to him when she seemed so focused on something else? He pondered the question while studying her, marking that her white face was grim with concentration even while turned away.

It was such a lovely face. That was the first thing that had gone through Takeda's mind when he had first seen her, and it remained, an impression etched deeper into his memory with each encounter he had with the girl. She was just so good-looking, he mused. Enough to render him speechless, in fact, and though he had seen a lot of good-looking women, he had never felt his tongue as tied, his throat as dry as when he had first seen her. Oh, yes, she was perfection! One would have to be speechless when faced with her.

The only problem, he discovered soon enough, was that the perfection herself seemed speechless as well. Oh, not due to his awesome presence, or anyone else's, for that matter. Rather, she seemed to have a natural aversion to talking, which explained the nickname General Fujino's army had given her. The only person to whom she actually spoke regularly, they told him, was the commander herself. How envious he had been to hear that! He so wanted to hear the girl talk, to see if her voice was as godlike as her appearance, to see if it was the kind of voice-like her expression-that made a man want to break it, whether in pleasure or pain...

Damned infatuation . She made his blood boil, and he could not explain it. He doubted it would make a difference if he could, anyway. The simple fact was that she fascinated him, had fascinated him the first time he laid eyes on her, and fascinated him even more each time after that. Each time he saw her made it worse, for the girl certainly bore watching. It had taken only a few encounters for his admiration to turn into something bordering obsession, and now here he was, suffering the cruel weather-not to mention Suda's blathering just now-just to see more of her. And, if he was very lucky, hear something of her.

But the damn girl actually does live up to her nickname.

Still, he was not someone who was easily defeated, was he? He could not let himself be daunted by the girl's silence. He had not become a great swordsman by accepting every defeat. He meditated on the problem, his mind coming to the conclusion that this task was similar to a duel: he was the one on the offensive, and the enemy was merely someone of great defensive skill.

Yes, that was it: he needed to try harder.

"Uh, Natsuki-san," he began, taking a step closer. "I see you're going to wait for Fujino-san. She takes you everywhere she goes, doesn't she?"

He rubbed his hands absent-mindedly, trying to work away some of the cold sweat that was there.

"I hope they don't take too long," he went on, starting to take another step towards the girl. "It's too cold here to leave someone waiting like this."

He stopped mid-stride as the girl reached for something from the leather sheathing her thigh, her hand coming up with a small dagger. He stepped back on instinct, realising a second too late that he was not the target.

Stupid, he told himself. Now I look like a jumpy greenhorn.

The Otomeian still had her eyes trained on the governor and her general, and her ears seemed to be trained on them as well. Takeda took in the way her body tensed with slow fluidity, as if in response to the faint sounds from the other two in the garden. He tore himself away from her image and finally looked at the source of the sounds.

The noises were coming from the governor, who was looking agitated even from a distance. The man's body movements bespoke a strong anxiety, and his loud and hissing whispers were further indication of this emotion. The woman facing him, however, still appeared deathly serene. Takeda frowned at the pair, then turned back to the girl beside him.

A goddess, he thought to himself, taking in the beauty of her stance, something the swordsman in him could appreciate as a high expression of athleticism and art. It was tense yet flexible, coiled-up in its power yet casual in its form; he knew without a doubt that she would let fly the dagger she was fingering in her hands and hit the Sosia governor in the eye if she so desired, if the man gave her reason to do it by attacking the woman she considered her charge. Takeda could see the fixedness of her killer's gaze, the eyes lucent in the dying light. He stared at them and almost lost himself in the emerald depths, averted as they were. His hands felt cold again and he found he could not lift a muscle, enchanted as he was by those great, green eyes. How they stirred his blood! He was wound up, hot with desire, and yet he was also frozen to the spot, and it drove him to reconsider his earlier thought.

Not a goddess, but a witch. Her eyes seemed to him those of Circe, and he loved them. He could feel a faint stirring between his legs, and he knew it was her doing. His Circe.

"My apologies for having made you wait. I hope you have not frozen yet?"

The melodic words broke the spell and Takeda blinked, shaking his head. He was surprised to see that, during his stupor, the governor and the general had managed to finish their talk and were now standing before him. He grimaced at his own carelessness, a touch of red darkening his cheeks as he pulled the edges of his cloak together.

"No," he said, gruffly. "I-we're fine."

It was Suda who replied to this, looking somewhat disturbed.

"Ah," said the governor. "Yes. That's a relief."

The man gave Takeda a shaky smile.

"A relief," he said again, arousing the swordsman's intrigue.

"Are you feeling fine, Suda-san?" Takeda asked, eyeing him with interest. He forgot about Circe for a moment as he wondered at the sudden change in manner that the governor was exhibiting. Suda actually looked morose, which was a far cry from how he had been earlier. What exactly had they been talking about, he and Fujino? Why had Suda seemed so agitated at the end of their conversation?

Takeda brought his eyes to the female senator, only to be met by her usual, unrevealing smile.

"I fear Yuuji-han has had a touch of indigestion," she told Takeda, her voice taking on a slight note of concern. "Perhaps Masashi-han, you would be kind enough to help him inside for us? I am not sure I could support Yuuji-han's weight easily, after all, and you seem as though you could do it much better."

His eyes snapped once again to the governor, who did look like he was about to vomit. Then they went to Shizuru, who looked, despite her claim to the contrary, strong enough to support the man's weight herself. She was uncommonly tall for a Himean, for one thing- Takeda himself was a good height for a man but fell several inches short of her-and though she was very slender, Takeda knew enough of her repute as well as of athletic musculature to recognise powerful arms and legs when he saw them.

After a few seconds of appraisal, Takeda wrinkled his brow and nodded. He took the man's arm, guessing correctly that it was on account of their secret conversation that Shizuru was asking him to escort the older senator instead of doing it herself.

"I'll get him inside," he said, taking care to show no exertion on his face in case the dark-haired girl was watching. "You two should go in too, Fujino-san. It's getting dark."

The general thanked him and he went off with Suda, unable to see the smile slip away from her face as she watched them leave.

And there go two species of parasite, Shizuru was thinking, only just able to keep from sneering with annoyance. She would have to be more careful around Takeda Masashi, or try to avoid him altogether, so as to keep him away from Natsuki. If he had he only been like the all the others, who generally gave up trying after a single glare from her bodyguard! But the man was apparently persistent to a fault. He had been trailing them for a while now, even before this day. She had simply failed to see it earlier, and now had to suffer for her oversight.

But she was not a person patient at suffering nuisances, much though she pretended to be.

She went over the possibilities. There was always the option of pushing him into going back to Hime early. She would have to check when the next transport left Argus for Hime, and make sure he left Sosia and booked passage on it. There were surely ways to convince him to do that. She could persuade him to return to his duties in the city, appeal to his more honourable nature and love for the Republic. She could point out the problems with a Hime that was run with what he himself had said to be a very meagre lot of officials, hint at the opportunities to be discovered there if he distinguished himself at such a time of need for the city. Or she could just flat-out ask him to leave, please, because he was being annoying. And if he refused after all of those things, perhaps, ask a certain primipilus to tie him up and shove him into the ship's hold by force and-and-

And ye gods, what am I thinking? She berated herself in her mind, almost shocked by her own schemes. Not because she was unaware of her capacity for them: she was a Himean politician, not to mention a very ambitious person, and that meant one had to be capable of certain modes of duress or forcible action. What surprised her was that she could think of doing them for such a thing as this, and to a man who had done nothing to her, strictly speaking. What could she gain from such machinations that was so great it justified their doing? A release from a petty annoyance? The ability to walk around Sosia without Natsuki's admirer dogging their footsteps?

Or... Natsuki herself?

"Shizuru?"

She remembered, only then, that the girl responsible for all this dark calculation was at her side. Oh, no, that was rather an immature thing to say, was it not? Why should she blame the child for her own faults? No, she decided, Natsuki was innocent here. The Otomeian most likely had no idea, in fact, of the emotions she was able to stir up in her charge.

Not that said charge had much of a better understanding of them, either.

Setting aside the thoughts disturbing her for the moment, she turned to the girl. She paused at the familiar flash of metal. There was a dart in Natsuki's hand, one of her small throwing daggers. Her eyes went to the Otomeian's face, and she read the explanation for the weapon there. Immensely pleased by this show of protectiveness-especially in light of her own recent burst of possessive feeling-she felt her earlier irritation slipping away under the girl's gaze, dropping from her like melted snow.

"Oh, my dear, dear Natsuki," she said quietly, a smile coming to her lips. "Is that for my sake, or is it because Takeda-han was annoying you again?"

The girl smirked, showing that she shared the joke. So she had noticed! Shizuru cursed herself again for having failed to mark his infatuation before the girl herself. Then she might have been able to take care of him earlier and spared herself the irritation.

"Were you so worried about me that you had to take it out?" she asked as the girl slid the dart into its sheath again. "Were you worried that Suda-han would try something?"

Natsuki nodded.

"You silly girl," Shizuru said, giving the younger woman a dashing smile. "I would have broken his arm first."

The other grinned at that, her green eyes lighting up.

"But thank you," Shizuru went on, before taking Natsuki's hand and pressing it, feeling the warmth even through the bandages swathing the skin. "I was actually worried about you, too, you know."

A dark eyebrow came up questioningly as Natsuki eyed her with mild surprise, perhaps wondering what the older woman meant by being worried about her. Shizuru took the opportunity to sigh and released the girl's hand.

"I was worried because I feared Takeda-han would try something as well, though in another fashion," she explained rather grimly. "After all, the two of you were alone here. In a rather dark, secluded place. The sort of place where two people, well, try something. Though it seems that you would not countenance anything of the sort, one still worries for your sake. Many of my fellows can be quite crude in their interests. Not to mention arrogant in the presumption that their status as Himean senators permits them to satisfy every interest that may take them."

The girl seemed to choke, her eyebrows slanting darkly together as she gaped at this black suggestion. Shizuru watched her carefully, noting that she seemed truly dismayed by the idea. Good!

"So I need not worry about you, then?" the older woman asked, keeping a faintly concerned expression on her face. "You draw a lot of interest, Child, little though you may enjoy it, I know. I only worry because it might catch you off-guard, and you too might be prey to the silly belief many have that Himeans-senatorial ones and ones with offices, that is-must be permitted everything."

The girl shot her another glaring look, telling her with it that such was a silly belief indeed.

"Wonderful," Shizuru said, hiding most of her relief because she did not want to be caught out just yet. "Then allow me to assure Natsuki that she need not worry either, for I would not let anyone, Suda-han least of all, try something on me."

She paused to swallow a chuckle, knowing the girl would be getting confused soon.

"I am flattered, Natsuki-" here her smile grew wider "-that you would be so affected by such a thing. I did not think you to be the jealous type, and here you take out a dagger at one small instance."

A puzzled look told her the girl was wondering what she was talking about now.

"Rest assured that only you can take me aside in the snow," she promised, trying to suppress a giggle at the comprehension slowly dawning on her companion's face. "Only you may try something on me, I promise you . "

As soon as she had finished, a series of strangled noises made their way from the other's throat, which the Himean took to be the girl's attempts at refuting what had just been stated. Shizuru bit her tongue to stay the laughter, then paused to watch her companion turn purple before turning away and walking ahead towards the mansion.

"Shall we go in now?" she asked, her voice stifled by the amusement still threatening to erupt from her. "Come along, Natsuki."

It took all of her strength not to show her hilarity as she sauntered, straight-backed and dignified, towards the mansion. She suddenly felt better and a little more like herself, even smiling broadly as she strode through the deep snow. Her feet made small, trudging sounds with each step she took. Soft sounds. At the same moment she thought that, she also realised that she could not hear similar sounds from behind her. She stopped walking and looked back, wondering if Natsuki had been so incensed with her jest as to refuse to follow. Had her tease gone too far this time? Surely not! The girl was not the kind to be-

"Ahh!"

Shizuru shook her head dazedly after this small cry. She found herself sitting in the snow. Blinking several times, she vaguely recalled a very large blob of something cold and white hitting her squarely in the face and so suddenly that it had robbed her temporarily of balance.

A shadow loomed over her and she looked up: Natsuki was standing over her with a triumphant smirk. Shizuru opened her mouth in surprise as she realised what had happened. The other smiled evilly and shrugged.

"Shizuru," said the girl. "I tried something."

She held a hand out to the fallen woman, obviously intending to help her up. Shizuru took the offered hand and let her do just that-right before making a sudden tug and pulling the younger woman to the snow as well. The Himean scrambled up as a surprised Natsuki tumbled into a deep drift, rolling into it like a small, dark missile. Shizuru grinned foolishly at this, inwardly cursing the folds of her heavy cloak as they made it more difficult for her to move about and regain balance.

"Not fair earlier!" she cried, still laughing. "You gave no warning, you little brat!"

She gathered up a handful of snow-probably two or three handfuls' worth, really, given that she had hands commensurate with her height-and packed it quickly. She then launched it at the girl, who was just getting up. The ball of powder hit Natsuki on the head and made her reel until she fell back into the drift. Afterwards, the dark-haired girl half-sat and half-lay there, not even attempting to rise.

"Natsuki," Shizuru called, worried upon receiving no answer. "Are you all right, Natsuki?"

A little concerned that the younger woman had been hurt during the first tumble, Shizuru approached her, only to be pelted by another snowball. She brushed away the chilly remains of the projectile and opened her eyes. At the same moment, Natsuki jumped up and dashed towards her, another clump of snow in hand.

"Oh, no you don't!" Shizuru laughed, meeting the charge. She launched herself at the girl, her hands reaching out to grab the latter's clothes and pulling her once more to the ground. After a flurry of snow and muffled laughter, both of them fell into a drift, their hands still clutching at each other's garments.

"What a mess we are."

Taking a few moments to catch her breath after pronouncing this, Shizuru lay there for a moment, her eyes closed. She realised she was disoriented by their scuffle when looked up and registered only an expanse of greyish white.

Am I looking up, or down, she wondered, right before a flash of green caught her attention.

"Ah, there you are, Natsuki."

The girl was leaning over her and had her pinned against the powder-like bank of snow. The Otomeian's mouth was slightly parted, her breathing still heavy from the exertion of their game. The misting breaths issuing from between her lips bridged the gap between them, and Shizuru revelled in them, amazed that she could both see and feel their warmth.

Beautiful.

The thought was unbidden but sincere. She took in every detail of the girl's face, which was a mere foot away from hers. The younger woman was so close that Shizuru could see the white flames banked in the depths of her eyes, could see every hairline depression in the girl's sensuously curved lower lip. The black hair was curtained to one side, and taken with her clothes and complexion, the younger woman had the aspect of a statue carved out of marble and ebony.

She had never seen such beauty, Shizuru decided, nor had she ever wanted to touch another so much. She was about to do so when she realised that the object of her admiration was smiling, mischief glittering in her eyes.

"Natsu-mmph!"

Shizuru laughed and began spluttering as the girl continued to rub snow onto her face, chortling all the while. She did not struggle, however, and let the girl do as she wished. The attack ceased after a few moments and she felt as well as heard the other's delighted giggle-one of victory, she noted-before the small weight on top of her shifted off.

"Was that really necessary?" she chuckled, finally able to open her eyes without having snow dropped onto her face. She was no longer being pinned and she pushed herself up until she was sitting with her back straight and her legs stretched out. "You mean girl..."

She looked at said girl, who was lying beside her and smirking happily. Shizuru smiled at this, very much enjoying the combination of youth and happiness on Natsuki.

"I should get you for that," she threatened, putting on a very clearly false anger when Natsuki merely lifted an eyebrow and made a face that dared her to take revenge. "That was cold."

"Mmm," was the only answer.

"But it was amusing." She stopped, shaking her head. "No, rather, it was fun."

She brushed a few trace amounts of snow from her hair with her hands, then grinned as something came to her. She looked at her supine companion.

"Oh," she said. "Would you believe I have never played in the snow before, Natsuki? I just thought of it now."

Natsuki lifted her eyebrows and smiled, making another humming sound. Shizuru nodded at the silent query.

"I suppose you must do it all the time, though," she surmised as she turned her face to the rapidly darkening sky. "In your beautiful, snowy Otomeia."

The answer came a few seconds later.

"No."

Shizuru shifted her position so that she was sitting straight again.

"Really?" she asked.

Natsuki nodded.

"I see. That is too bad." She grinned after a moment. "But we are playing now."

She reached out swiftly and Natsuki shut her eyes, the tightly-pressed lips showing she expected Shizuru to do the same thing she had done to the older woman. The girl's eyes shot open, however, when she felt Shizuru's hand cupping her cheek instead. She looked lost then, and bewildered by the gesture. She looked, thought Shizuru, innocent and adorable and very young.

"Are you cold?" she asked the girl, stroking the warming skin with a thumb. "Do you feel cold?"

Natsuki shook her head slowly, her colour rising magnificently against the snow.

"I see. That is good."

The girl said nothing to this and merely turned her eyes away. She refused to meet Shizuru's gaze, but the latter did not mind. In fact, she felt quite content just then.

She could feel the burning cheek leaning subtly into her touch, after all.

Chapter 16

Dear me, another long-delayed update. I fear they shall be coming at this pace for a while, you see, given everything that is taxing me these days. This also means I shall return to my old (well, actually... usual) practice of uploading first drafts, such as this chapter. My apologies for this and thanks to the reviewers.

Notes:

1. Augury - The modern definition holds this to be the practice/art of divining from omens or signs (such as bird sightings) what the future holds. That is the definition used in this chapter.

2. Dura lex sed lex - A well-known phrase. It means "the law is hard (but/and) that is the law".

3. Talent - Used to measure gold and silver in Latin times; one talent is the load of gold/silver that a man can carry.

4. NOTE on Slavery - The Latins, as most people in those times, usually had slaves for their servants. These slaves were often foreigners from defeated nations, people bought from slave-traders, and the like. This does not imply that the slaves were treated badly. Many were treated fairly well and some even valued.

Being slaves, some could and would suffer occasional abuse (as we, with our contemporary notions of human rights, would understand it). Floggings could happen, for instance, usually for punishment if the slave did something that displeased his/her owner, although it would only be considered abusive in Ancient Roman times if it went beyond the permissible degree of punishment (which could be interpreted quite arbitrarily). Rarer would be the odd crucifixion of an unfortunate slave by an intemperate master. Forced sexual favours were likely, too, although most upper class owners refrained from the practice-or at least, from making it public knowledge-since it was frowned upon (but not condemned) in the highest echelons of society.

Inter Nos

When Shizuru first made up her mind to loathe Takeda Masashi, she did so with a faint reluctance courtesy of her conscience. The fact that the man had not actually insulted her person galled Shizuru into guilt and led her to vacillate between two stances towards him: hate and simple wariness. What strengthened her original resolution towards the former attitude was the insult- still an indirect one, she noted- of the swordsman trying to follow her and Natsuki around Sosa. Still, she had to admit that he was unfailingly genial if absurdly clumsy during those times. Sometimes, she found herself wishing that he had no geniality at all, for then she would have an excuse to send him off with a flea in his ear.

Although I wonder if you can put a flea in another flea's ear, she would think dryly, eyeing the man she had come to think of as a two-legged parasite- or rather, a three-legged one, as her wit would later put into her head. The man could stick like burr if given a chance. Though she would have liked to close off all chances of that with finality, she knew she had yet to find a pretext, or an acceptable one to her more principled side at least, that would let her do so. So the burr-cum-flea stuck, much to her chagrin.

Truth be told, her wavering over the matter prevented her from actually showing him hostility- outright, that is. She was aware that some of her dislike was so powerful that it slipped even her control sometimes, but she was also aware that it did so in a subtle way, which meant that most people failed to notice. Takeda himself was among these people.

Shizuru was grateful for this at first, because she had yet to truly strengthen her resolve to hate him. Had she known that he would give her cause to do so a scant four days after the incident that first led to her ire, she might have been less indecisive in her treatment. But she had no way of knowing, of course, and there were no premonitions to warn her. Not that she thought of omens, like most people did, as foretelling the future. Though she did have a good knowledge of augury, she did not really believe in it. It was, she thought, a pitiful thing to rely on such arbitrary interpretations of fortune rather than determining one's fortune oneself.

In any case, she began that particular day with little thought for Takeda Masashi. She busied herself with seeing to a certain matter in the morning and simply stayed in her room with Natsuki for the afternoon, having to come of late to prefer the Otomeian's company to all others. They passed the time with her reading a copy of Iphigenia aloud. The girl listened keenly to the story even though she pretended not to be so interested at first. Her eyes betrayed her, however: they sparkled like cut emeralds spun at end of a cord.

Shizuru stopped at one point in her reading, deciding to tease her enthralled listener.

"Perhaps we should stop here," she said. "I have bored you for long enough, Natsuki."

The girl started and frowned.

"It is fine," she said, pointing her chin to Shizuru as if to say that the latter should go on. The Himean pretended not to believe her, however, and went on to say that Natsuki need not lie for her sake.

"I know it is such a dull story," she said, trying not to giggle and give it away. "And I am no lively reader. You need not be so kind, Natsuki."

Having said this, she made as if to put the tome away. A small sound of negation stopped her in the act.

"No," Natsuki said, looking embarrassed and discomfited. "No. Please, Shizuru."

She said this with the faintest trace of a pout on her lips, her brow wrinkled. Although Shizuru had been planning to tease her for a bit longer, the older woman relented at the sight. Nodding at the girl, she returned to reading the story, consciously putting a little more effort into her narrative. She was later rewarded by a glance at her companion's face, which had the appearance of someone absolutely caught up in the tale.

They were nearly finished when there was a knock on the door and in burst the senior legate, an exasperated look on her face.

"All right, I give, I can't take it anymore!"

Shizuru gave her friend an amused look at the outburst. She turned to Natsuki.

"Well, Natsuki, it appears I am a terrible story-teller after all-see how it managed to displease even Chie-han at a distance," she quipped.

Chie ignored her friend's comedy.

"It's been four days," the senior legate went on, starting to pace. "Four days of inquiry and thinking. And no, I still haven't found out what you told Yuuji-san. So, tell me already, for Jupiter's sake. You win. There! You win."

The other chuckled at this explanation, shaking her blonde head: "So I do."

"Don't you ever get tired of winning?" Chie asked, laughing as well. She pulled out the other chair at the table where Shizuru herself was seated. "I knew it was a bad idea to take you up on that little dare of yours. The only thing I had going for me was that there was no money involved. But, oh !" She clutched the fabric over her chest, rolling her eyes theatrically. "My pride!"

They laughed again as the legate sank into the seat.

"To be fair, I did think you had a fine chance," Shizuru said. "I honestly thought you might be able to find out what I said to him without resorting to asking me. I have often been amazed by your ability to sniff out the most obscure rumours or news, Chie-han. I thought you would amaze me again this time."

Chie sighed.

"Well, it appears you're wrong," she replied. "Though I guess that's little consolation-even when you're wrong, you still win."

Again her friend chuckled.

"Now, the dare's over. So I'm actually asking you," Chie said, putting her elbows on the table as she peered from behind steeped hands. "Shizuru-san. What did you tell him?"

The other woman smiled at the blunt question.

"Merely what I was duty-bound to tell him," she replied. "That he had to stop whatever he was doing wrong, before it came back to bite his, well, rear."

"Really."

"Yes."

"That's it."

"Yes."

"As intimidating as you are, I doubt that would have been enough to put him in that state," Chie said. "He was pale as death when he returned, you know."

"Oh dear. I do hope he is feeling better now."

"Stop teasing me already!"

Shizuru laughed: "Forgive me."

"So what did you tell him? I know you probably did warn him off in that roundabout way you have, but what else did you say to get him so frightened? He's been acting like a little mouse these days-almost a model governor, you know, and a little mouse." Chie tilted her head pensively, thinking of the governor's fairly exemplary behaviour in the recent days. "You threatened him, didn't you? You did, tell me you did."

Shizuru shrugged, her smile showing the answer. Chie clapped.

"What did you say?" she asked again. "Let me guess. That you'd take it to the Courts?"

Shizuru nodded. "Oh, yes, and I told him to be more careful."

The other smiled, waiting.

"Although if I found out he was being 'more careful' in the wrong way, I said I would personally express to him our-I speak as a servant of Hime, of course-extreme displeasure."

She stopped to let the legate chuckle, and went on, smiling too.

"Of course, if he desisted from all manner of illegal activity now and gave me a full list of all those who had gained the citizenship through his little business, I said that I would perhaps conveniently forget about lodging a case against him in the Bribery Court once we return to Hime. Then he would have a fair chance at continuing his political career. As long as he refrains from doing anything like that in the future, of course."

Chie narrowed her eyes and blew a lock of sooty hair away from them. It fell back in the same place as before, but she made no move to brush it away. Shizuru held back her smile, conscious of the other's sense of anti-climax.

"Well..." the legate hummed, leaning back in her chair. "So that's it? I didn't think you'd let him off the hook that easy, though. But, you're right, I guess it's reasonable. Otherwise, he could just milk the province until his time is about up, then make a run for it. After all, you can't arrest a governor until his term is finished, and if he already knows that someone's waiting for that time to arrest him, he'll be making preparations to scuttle away as soon as possible."

She shrugged and ended by saying for punctuation: "Oh, well."

There was a slight twitch in Shizuru's lips as she replied to this.

"But all I promised was that I would forget about lodging a complaint against him when we return," she said suggestively. "Is it not so?"

Chie's brows quirked, a spark of interest coming to the brown eyes beneath them.

"So?" she echoed.

" So I have already submitted a detailed report to Tokiha-han about the matter. It was in the last batch of letters we sent to Hime."

"Jupiter!"

"Where?"

Chie shot forward in her chair, trying not to laugh with the woman in front of her.

"Shizuru-san!" she cried, trying to feign anger and failing miserably due to several ill-timed chortles. "Anyway, no, really, did you really do that?"

The younger woman nodded, sending several blonde tresses waving softly.

"You're just amazing, you know," Chie whistled.

"Actually, I do," said the younger woman, her eyes dancing. "Although I am gratified you share my opinion."

The legate snorted. She looked at the other occupant of the room, who was sitting cross-legged on the bed.

"How you manage to put up with her teasing is beyond me, Natsuki-san," she told her. "Sometimes, she's just hopeless."

She turned back to her friend and they shared a smile.

"My apologies, Chie-han. You know I am only jesting. Now to return to the topic, I thought it was the best course of action. You see," Shizuru explained, "all I said was that I would not bring the case formally to the court myself. I said nothing about sending it to one who would be able-and very willing-to do that in my stead. And I had to send it. Would you not have done so?"

"Mm, yes," Chie answered, with a faint smile. "It's rather too shameless, what he did. Our citizenship isn't a pasty to be sold at every corner!"

"Tokiha-han will know when the time is right to arraign Yuuji-han," Shizuru said contentedly. "She has a good knowledge of the delicacy of such matters."

"She is a veteran of the Bribery Court, after all." Chie lifted her eyebrows with the look of a conspirator. "So, naturally, Suda Yuuji has no idea you've done this."

"Naturally," was the reply. "You did not think I would really let him be, Chie-han? He cannot be allowed to gain a position in government again. There are better men and women out there who deserve office more, so I think, especially for such a province as this. It is germane to my interests as commander of the Northern Provinces' defence that the provincial governors with whom I work are efficient as well as reliable enough to stay away from crimes of this type. We have no idea of how long we shall stay here. As such, it serves me well to set up a web of people I prefer to ones I do not."

Chie tapped a finger on the table and angled her head at the younger woman.

"I had forgotten," she finally said, "how ruthless you can be, Shizuru-san."

"Am I?"

"Now, I agree with what you did," Chie said. "Definitely! I'm relieved you did that. Sosia would be the better for it, I agree."

Shizuru smiled and waited.

"But," Chie continued, "don't you think-and I'm not gainsaying your actions here, mind you!-don't you think it was enough to hold that threat over his head instead of actually acting on it, if your goal was to secure a more preferable state of affairs in the area as far as the officials of the provinces are concerned? After all, he might become useful in the future, and I hardly think he'd dare to do anything of the sort afterwards, knowing you of all people are watching him."

"Keep him beholden to me, you mean?" Shizuru asked.

"Well, yes."

The younger senator took some time to mull over the idea, a small smile playing at the corners of her mouth.

"As I see it, I do not think I would care to have such a person among my allies," she said at length but with firm decision. "Gratitude, particularly that kind of gratitude, is a feeble thing. It often leads to antipathy. People often detest those to whom they are beholden."

She exhaled softly.

"I do agree that any rational person put in like circumstances would accede to the conditions I gave Yuuji-han," she continued. "Yet I fear there is a problem with that scenario. My conditions for letting him 'off the hook' were an appeal to his logic. People are rarely logical."

"Dear, dear, becoming pessimistic about the nature of man, Shizuru-san?" Chie put in, chuckling at this assessment. "Didn't know you had it in you, humanistic philosopher that you are."

Shizuru bowed her head with a chuckle.

"It is necessary to be wary in dealing with people," she answered. "That is to say, I wish to be as thorough as possible. Even if I did let him go now, with a warning not to do like things in the future, what is to prevent Yuuji-han from simply devising more convoluted schemes later where it would be more difficult to trace his involvement? And after meeting him, well, I feel that he would do exactly that."

"Is that what your gut tells you?" Chie asked, knowing full well that the other woman was usually correct in her evaluation of people's characters. "That he's one dog that won't stay trained for long?"

The general lifted an eyebrow at this.

"What an interesting way of putting it," she said, before lifting a hand contemplatively to her cheek. "I cannot say it is just a gut feeling, Chie-han, or not precisely. I am afraid I distrust that term."

"Why?"

"Let me see," Shizuru began. "I think it is due to the fact that gut feelings are said to be purely random instincts, thrown to one by Fortuna. Whereas I believe that these things are actually the product of unconscious rational processes in our minds, where things we notice subconsciously are stored without our being truly aware of it. Things we notice but do not remember noticing."

"Hmm. You mean perhaps things we think too trivial to really pay attention to? Like what colour tunic Nao was wearing the other day and what the innkeeper was wearing in that last tavern I visited and so on?"

"Yes. We decide not to pay attention to them, but in doing so, we already have. So they are taken into the unconscious, or perhaps that intermediary part of the mind between waking and sleeping. That strange part of the mind that we do not control. We must all have one. Else why would fevers bring on such odd visions? Why do we sometimes dream the things we do?"

"You don't believe in dreams sent to us by the gods, Shizuru-san?" Chie asked.

"I believe some dreams may be portentous. I doubt most are. I once dreamt I had an ape's tail. I find my rear lacking that accoutrement even now, and believe me when I say I inspected more than once."

The other Himean was laughing, as was the girl listening to them. The latter only did it more quietly.

"Portents aren't always literal," Chie pointed out.

"And portents are not always portents, but things only made out to seem like them by random interpretations. Witness the regularity of differing interpretations from seers and mystics for the same event or supposed sign. Is it not the case for Senate as well, sometimes? The official interpretation is merely the one that gets in first. Who is to say then that any interpretation reading the event as a pure coincidence is of less validity?"

"Fair enough. So not all visions are sent to us by the gods."

"And not all our visions are under our control."

"Right. Go on."

Shizuru continued what she was saying earlier.

"Returning to the matter of things we notice but not consciously," she said, "sometimes they are processed, in my opinion, without us really knowing it. Used as factors in a formula-again, by that part of the mind I described-and then we have the product thrown up into our consciousness, without knowing that we ourselves arrived at it through a kind of non-volitional logic. So, I think that it is more proper for me to say that, post-calculation, that is what I think of Yuuji-han. Hence I am afraid this is one time I cannot risk being lenient."

The other nodded, seeming to agree.

"Yes, of course," she told Shizuru. "You're right. About that gut thing and about him. I don't know why I even brought it up. Why, I'd love to send the fool to exile right now, for what he's done! They sully Hime, all these curs who worm their way into government. Then we get the rebellious provinces or maybe the complaints that become revolts later on... Oh, yes, good riddance to the man, I say."

Later, she asked: "So who else knows you've already sent the information to Mai-san?"

"For now, just you."

"I see. That's wise." A curious look. "You didn't tell The Princeps? Or Himemiya?"

"I forbore telling Reito-han because I do not think he needs to know about it yet," Shizuru replied. "And he must have his hands full of rather unruly senators at the moment, with no consul to oversee the sessions of the House. He shall learn of it in his own way, at any rate. I have no doubt of that."

"Right."

"As for the other, I did tell Tokiha-han to tell Chikane if she thought she would need advice or help with the matter. It is not so grave that I need to trouble so many of our good colleagues, and Chikane is busy these days, being urban praetor."

The other agreed, sighing at the neatness of Shizuru's resolution to the matter.

"All right," she said, lifting her arms and stretching. She groaned with satisfaction as she felt a few joints pop, her eyes falling shut.

"You've wrapped everything up so well, Shizuru-san. Typical! Ahh..."

It was the cold, she thought, that made her feel rigid all over. She felt a little stiff at the hinges, like armour left in the snow to rust. She shook her head at the idea and moved her shoulder gingerly, clapping a hand over it.

"You know, I've the feeling I've been getting paler," she said nonchalantly, earning herself a curious look from her friend. "It's the climate. Lack of good, clear sun. Don't you feel the same?"

Shizuru lifted her own hands in response, studying them.

"I suppose my hands do seem a little whiter these days," she told Chie, making out the traceries of veins that showed a faint blue beneath her skin. "Although I cannot really tell, Chie-han. One does not see oneself as objectively as other people."

Chie nodded. "Well, since I'm 'other people'-oh, what bad grammar!- I suppose I can tell you you're paler too."

"Am I?"

"Yes." The legate grinned and pointed to herself. "Me?"

Shizuru took a moment to look her over.

"Yes," the younger woman said, afterwards. "I daresay you are right, Chie-han. Your countenance has lightened a shade."

"Not as much as Suda-san's did that night, I hope," Chie giggled, grinning wickedly. "He looked like he'd been powdered with flour, you know. And it didn't help at all that it was Takeda-san with him, because that one's so dark."

For an infinitely small space of time, she thought she saw irritation flash across her friend's features. Before she could comment on it, however, Shizuru spoke.

"Masashi-han has been postponing his departure for a while now, has he not?" said the younger woman, sounding very casual. "I think another group heading for Argus and intending to go from there to Hime left the other day too."

Chie voiced affirmation.

"I wonder why when Homura-san tells me all he does is grumble about this place," she sighed, noting Shizuru's look of interest at the statement. "He says that Takeda-san thinks this an awful country. All the snow, cold, foreigners, and so on. The usual complaints. Added to which is his gripe that the climate is stiffening his sword arm."

Shizuru's eyes narrowed ever so slightly, a hint of something sharp flashing-like the glint of steel hiding deep behind the trees, an assassin lurking in the background and in the dark.

"Then one wonders if Masashi-han would not be happier back in Hime," she told Chie. "He need not stay here if he feels that way."

A pause, then she added words: "There is nothing keeping him here."

Chie found herself surprised by the hostile undertone. From anyone else, she would have queried it; from Shizuru, she decided it would be best not to remark. Sometimes, she had the feeling that underneath that pleasant façade her friend kept, there lurked something dangerous just waiting to be prodded into waking. She had no explanation for this feeling, of course, unless Shizuru's own theory about nonvolitional thought processes was considered. But whatever the case, she did consider it only rational to follow the adage about letting sleeping beasts lie.

Better to try and figure it out myself, she thought, going through the possibilities that could explain the apparent annoyance Shizuru had just let slip. She could think of no reason for the younger woman to be unfriendly to the man whose name had just been mentioned, however. What piqued her interest further was her realisation that the younger woman had been acting slightly cool towards Takeda lately. Oh, most people would not notice it, but Chie knew better. Shizuru was unfailingly warm to most persons, especially to fellow senators. So when she lost a bit of that warmth, she still appeared most courteous-yet it was the slight loss of warmth that gave her away.

Well, in this case, anyhow, Chie added, thinking that this was perhaps the most noteworthy incident she had yet seen to fit that theory about her friend. What had caused this? Had Takeda Masashi said anything to incur Shizuru's wrath? That was unlikely. Few people had the courage-or stupidity-to either offend or insult her friend to her face. Shizuru tended to inspire a great deal of awe, which meant a great deal of care.

She studied her friend carefully, trying to read what was going on behind that wonderfully aristocratic and serenely impassive face, trying to tease some meaning from the smouldering red eyes that met her gaze equably.

And really, who am I kidding, she thought with dry humour. Reading Shizuru-san is just about as easy as reading Egyptian: squiggly line, big eye, jug, something-that-looks-like-an-owl, another squiggly line...

To change the subject, she asked if her friend did not want to eat.

"The clock says it's close to supper, and I haven't eaten yet-save for a little snack that hardly counts as lunch," she said, after gesturing to the water chronometer on the nightstand. "No breakfast either. Just kept forgetting about meals today, would you believe?"

"Heavens! You must be starving."

"I do think I could eat a horse at this point."

"Then please stay away from our cavalry camp."

Shizuru looked over her shoulder and addressed Natsuki, who was still perched on the bed they shared-a little detail of their accommodations that Chie was aware of and which intrigued her to no end.

"Natsuki," said Shizuru. "Would you like to continue the book later? We should eat now, perhaps."

The girl nodded just as a giggle came from the direction of the senior legate. Shizuru turned to look at her friend.

"It's the way you talk," Chie explained. "Like you're always asking for Natsuki-san's permission to do things instead of it being the other way around."

Shizuru stood up, amused, and said, "Is that how it seems?"

"Yes."

The legate got to her feet as well and watched the bodyguard come up to take her position beside her friend-who gave the girl a wink.

"I suppose it is only natural," Shizuru said, keeping her eyes on the Otomeian. "In a way, you might say that Natsuki is my keeper."

Chie grinned at the dark-haired girl's weak scowl.

"And vice-versa," she chuckled. She pushed away her chair and threw her cloak around her shoulders before walking to the door. The two followed.

"Where do you want to eat?" she asked, stepping out of the room. "If you want, I can take you to that place Nao and I go to. It's a little distance from here but the food's well worth the walk. Delightful!"

"Who am I to refuse delight? Lead on, Chie-han."

They went their way, grateful that the size of the gubernatorial residence prevented them from running into too many people in the corridors. Most of those they did meet during their walk were servants who bowed to them as they went along. After a while, they found themselves outside, walking the path that led out of the premises. Only then did Chie ask what Shizuru had been doing the past few days, for the younger woman had seemed to be busy.

"I have been finding all of the illegal citizens I could," Shizuru replied. "I am glad to say I have covered a good deal of those on the list Yuuji-han gave me-though more than a third are still unaccounted for."

"Is that what you've been doing?" Chie asked, surprised. "I haven't gotten wind of any floggings."

"That is because there were none," came the reply, prompting her to send a shrewd look to her companion.

"Himean law states that such an act is punishable by flogging," Chie said, thoughtfully. "Among other things."

The other let out a breath that curled in the air.

"Yes, but I preferred to use more discreet measures," she answered, her long, steady strides never faltering. "Even the law can and should bend under certain circumstances. I am not a believer, I am afraid, in the saying we have in our courts: dura lex sed lex."

They walked on for a little more before Chie finally realised that no explanation would come unless she asked for it. She deigned to ask, but received a question instead of an answer.

"Why do you think people wish to be Himean citizens?" Shizuru asked her, prompting a quick response.

"To avail of the privileges that come with being one."

"True. We are indeed a strong and fortunate nation, and our citizenship is among-if not the-most advantageous in the world," Shizuru answered, brows furrowed. "So we understand why many dream of attaining it. It is for this reason that some foreigners throw in their lot with us during battles and fight at the front lines, hoping to win the award of citizenship by putting their lives at stake."

"Or," Chie replied, half-jokingly, "they simply pay an unscrupulous politician enough money to get him to put them on the census rolls."

"Indeed," Shizuru said. "And, obviously, that would be the easier way to do it. But sometimes one must inquire a bit deeper into matters, to see where one stands. It is true that almost everyone wants our citizenship, yet not everyone has been willing to risk acquiring it through illicit methods-the harshness of the law is one deterrent, naturally. So one wonders why, when there are people who do try despite said deterrent."

A stiff gust of wind blew past them. Shizuru paused to look at the other member of their trio, asking her if she did not need a cloak to protect herself from the cold. Natsuki shook her head with an amused expression, and Shizuru went on talking.

"I am not such a fool, Chie-han, that I would pretend to be indignant with people who simply saw a practical way to their goal and took it," she resumed. "Yes, I am aware it is a crime, so I must still treat it with disapproval, generally. But I am also ethically bound to find out why they wanted it badly enough to flout the law and take-or rather, buy the citizenship."

"Take the case of one of the men on the list, for instance," she went on. "He needed the citizenship for his four children, two of whom were ill. What they call the mental diseases, I believe. The man, a widower, could hardly support all of them with his wages forever. Hence, he saved and borrowed money to pay Yuuji-han for the citizenship. It would be a great help to have it, after all."

She looked feelingly at her friend and was gratified to see that the other woman had a look of comprehension on her face.

"The grain dole," Chie murmured, referring to the cheap grain issued by Hime to all its citizens. "And the reduced prices for most basic goods in these parts for Himean citizens."

Shizuru nodded at this.

"That would have made a big difference with so many mouths to feed," she said. "There were other cases, but I think that you understand now, Chie-han. I could not possibly flog the man for such a thing."

The legate let out a small breath, smiling crookedly.

"No," she said. "No, you couldn't, could you? What did you do to him?"

Shizuru looked relaxed.

"Ah," she sighed. "I think you know."

"Yes, I think I do-and just so you know, I approve," Chie said, smiling, before a sobering thought came to her. "But what about the others, Shizuru-san? You can't tell me all of them were like that man."

"Of course not." The younger woman blew through her nose, expressing displeasure. "I am afraid I had to apply the law more strictly there, although there was still no flogging. I would prefer for this matter to be dealt with quietly, after all, and without breeding too much enmity among the foreigners who clamour for our citizenship. To confiscate property, or levy a fine... those are two things. To do both of these things while also wounding a person's dignity by flaying his back is another, and is likely to make him hate you and yours forever. In most cases, that is. Can we really afford to breed such enmity, especially at a time when war threatens us here?"

Chie nodded to show that she understood, and looked around. They were on the street now and she instructed her friend to turn right at the next corner.

"Spoken like Solomon," she mumbled, causing Shizuru to laugh. "You do know him, of course."

"The fabled 'Wise King' of the Jewish peoples, yes, although I am astonished you do."

"Two of my favourite scribes back home are Jewish. They talk a lot while they're copying books. Mostly about their people's heroes, which is how I heard of that character."

The general flashed her teeth as they reached the corner and said: "Well, I have heard of him myself. Although I wonder if he would have put away the money gained from the offenders' fines and added it to his war chest."

"Is that what you did?" Chie asked, grinning too. "Smart of you! You're the one who instituted the punishment, so you should be the one to collect. Besides, you were acting as a senator of Hime. You have more right to it than Yuuji-san does at this point, even if this is his province."

Shizuru inclined her head to this.

"How is our war chest?" Chie asked later. "It seems quite rich to me, but I'm no abacus-toter and I can't be too sure."

"It is, as you say, quite rich," Shizuru told her. "In fact, a little more than 'quite'. Over the past few days, you see, Shikishima-han and the other plutocrats of Sosia have been paying me visits-as well as gifts. All of which I have added to our reserve funds."

Chie sighed happily: "Wonderful!"

"Indeed. So you need not worry."

"Rumours are starting to get around, though."

Shizuru lifted her eyebrows in enquiry.

"About the Senate cramping your funds." The legate held up a hand and made as if batting an annoying invisible insect away. "Of course, we expected that to get around. It's not like we're the only ones receiving mail about news from home. It was inevitable that the soldiers would learn where those asses in the House are blowing their wind these days."

"What do the soldiers say?" the general asked curiously. "Are they afraid they shall not be paid?"

Chie looked delighted.

"In the words of our favourite primipilus," she said. " They don't give a rat's fart which way the Senate's farting ."

The two of them burst out laughing and she went on.

"They'll soldier for you, General," she said, snapping her young friend a jaunty salute followed by a gentle pat on the back. " I'll soldier for you. I know you have something going on in that head of yours, and that whatever it is, you shan't be leaving the legionaries hanging. Don't worry about the rumours getting to them-they came here for you, didn't they?"

She watched the fiery red eyes soften as Shizuru gave her a genuine, grateful smile.

"My thanks," the young woman said with sincerity. "To all of you."

"Ahh, now." Chie waved it away, pleased by the younger woman's reaction. "We know. As I said, don't worry about it."

She looked up and saw the tavern just a few houses away.

"There it is, Shizuru-san" she said, pointing to the brown walls of the building. "And look who's there-Ers-chan!"

Her call carried easily through the early evening air, reaching the blonde girl standing outside their destination. Said girl showed a dazzling smile in response and waved to them, seeming to gesture to her companion-another girl, this time in white Otomeian garb-to wait.

"Good evening," she said, once the new arrivals reached her. She bowed deeply to both women. "I didn't think I'd run into you here, Fujino-san, Chie-san."

"Neither did we," Chie answered. "Yuuki?"

"Oh, she went out with some of the other soldiers. To drink somewhere, I think."

Chie would have said something about Nao's outstanding capacity to imbibe liquor had it not been for Erstin's companion, who suddenly stepped forward and bowed her head with great dignity to Shizuru's bodyguard.

"Natsuki," she said, in a tone that yet seemed to hint at familiarity. Natsuki, for her part, simply lifted her eyebrows in acknowledgement.

It was Erstin who explained it for the other Himeans standing with them.

"Oh, yes, you haven't met Nina yet, have you?" she began, speaking in a slightly embarrassed manner. "Nina, this is Fujino-san and Chie-san."

She addressed the two elder women once more and added: "Nina is Natsuki-san's cousin."

Two pairs of eyebrows flew up readily, and the younger of the two Otomeians suddenly found herself under the scrutiny of two hugely interested gazes: one crimson, one earthen. She flinched, moving a step backwards.

"Ah, where are my manners?" Shizuru said apologetically, realising she had unintentionally made the girl uncomfortable. "Forgive me, but it is simply that I could not help but take note of your similarities to Natsuki. I did not mean to stare at you so, Nina-han."

Soft amber eyes met hers before flicking downwards respectfully.

"No," said the girl with a bow, her Himean just as perfect as her cousin's. "I do not mind, General." She bowed to Chie afterwards. "Legate."

"This one talks," Chie whispered under her breath, causing Shizuru to stifle a chuckle.

"Don't mind us, Nina-san," Chie told the Otomeian. "We're just eccentric people. I have to say I'm pleased to meet you, at long last. Nao's told me about you, and Erstin here has too."

Nina exchanged a look with Erstin, who was somewhat pink at the moment.

"I admit though," Chie went on, inspecting as politely as possible the two Otomeians standing beside each other. "I'm a little angry she didn't tell me you anything about your appearance. Good looks run in your lineage, apparently," she noted, addressing Natsuki as well. "How striking!"

To general amusement, the pair under scrutiny responded by promptly turning scarlet-at the same time.

"O-oh," Shizuru giggled, covering her mouth with a hand as she tried not to laugh too loudly. "The blush seems to be a family trait too."

Chie managed a nod, pulling her lips inward. It was the youngest Himean present who proved most charitable of all and saved the two Otomeians, suggesting that they all go into the tavern now and have dinner as they seemed to all be outside the tavern for it. Thus it was that a short time later, all five of them were seated comfortably at a table and waiting for their victuals, the cousins' embarrassment forgotten.

"I was wondering," Chie said, sipping some wine. "How much longer we're going to stay here in Sosia."

"Eager to move, Chie-han?"

Chie waved that away.

"I'm simply curious," she replied to Shizuru. "We have one more province to go to, and knowing you, you're probably more eager to see it than I am. We weren't able to sightsee when we disembarked at the ports there, after all."

"True," Shizuru replied. "I suppose we can be off in a week or so, although I shall have to check how the routes to Argus are. If they are passable, that is, to an army in winter. One can never be too sure, and it would be a foolish thing to force our way through when it might simply be better to wait for a while."

Erstin joined the conversation gently, asking them to excuse her for her interruption.

"Nao-senpai told me that the present governor of Argus is a friend of yours, Chie-san," she said. "As well as yours, Fujino-san."

The two elder women nodded, suddenly looking pleased.

"Yes, she is an old friend, though she might not like that particular phrase being used to describe her, given the modifier," Chie revealed. "I can't wait to see her too. She's great fun if you recall, Shizuru-san."

"Oh, do I ever!" said Shizuru, laughing. "I confess I am curious as to how she is now. How long it has been! A pity she was away when we made our brief pass through Argus."

"I'm sure she's waiting impatiently for us right now," Chie said, lowering her voice slightly with her next words. "Well, it will be a relief to see a proper governor in a properly administered province. Argus looked good to me when we passed. Though, of course, it's hard to tell when you spend barely a day there. Still, it looked well."

Shizuru assented to this just as the tavern's owner came to their table with a servant, bearing their repast. As all of them were hungry and the food looked and smelled so appetising, the conversation was abandoned momentarily for dinner. Even afterwards, however, the discussion could not be resumed. It turned out that Erstin and Nina had to go off quickly. Chie herself admitted that she had somewhere to be, and could not stay.

"Promised a friend I'd come and see him," she explained to Shizuru as they parted ways. "You don't mind, do you? Anyway, you have Natsuki-san here to keep you company."

"Of course, and Natsuki is definitely not poor company, at that," Shizuru replied. "Go on, Chie-han."

Shizuru watched her walk away, then turned to the girl left with her.

"It appears we are by ourselves again, Natsuki," she said, smiling as they began to walk. "Although, if I were to tell you a secret, I do believe I prefer it this way."

Natsuki looked at her curiously.

"Your cousin is an interesting girl," she said. "How old is she?"

There was a short gap of time between the question and the reply.

"Seventeen."

"Another young warrior," Shizuru noted. "Has she been in the army long?"

"Mmh."

"Quite impressive. She is an interesting girl." She smiled and added: "But, of course, not as interesting as my Natsuki."

She glanced at her companion to see a blush at her use of the possessive form once more. They walked on for a little more before Natsuki spoke.

"She likes you, I think."

"Does she now?"

"Not-not like, that way. But... she likes you," Natsuki struggled to get out, her brow creasing again as she tried to organise her words. Shizuru waited patiently, although she already understood what the girl was trying to say. She still preferred to hear her speak, instead of finishing her sentences for her.

As she waited, she thought of Natsuki's cousin. She had been observing the other Otomeian during the meal and noted that, although Nina was also inclined to brevity in speech, she was still more willing to engage in conversations. Indeed, this was only the start of a long list of differences between the two relatives, despite her statements about their similarities earlier. Nina was not as intimidating, for one thing, and not as striking in her looks as her older cousin, despite the fact that she had her own charms and appeal. She radiated far less coiled-up intensity, displayed much fewer wild glints in her eyes. And she was definitely less subtle. Shizuru had discovered her own Otomeian to be capable of surprising subtlety in observation of others, and she recognised in Nina a lack of that same subtlety: the younger Otomeian could be furtive, yes, as indeed she had been in sending occasional inspecting glances at Shizuru herself during their meal. Even so, it was furtiveness easily apprehended by someone with a properly sensitised mind.

"Respect," Natsuki finally said. "She respects you, I think. Or admires."

Shizuru hummed with a pleased air.

"That is nice to hear," she told the girl. "I am quite flattered now."

Natsuki nodded, looking relieved that she did not have to explain any further. Again Shizuru marvelled at her companion's discomfort with speech. Even now that they had reached such comfort with each other's presence, when she spoke, her remarks seemed calculated to making the older woman monopolise the dominant end of the conversation. Shizuru was infinitely thankful that they even had conversations, but she did find herself noticing sometimes that for every word or nod from Natsuki, she herself let out at least two full-fledged sentences.

Not that she found this particularly uncomfortable, of course. Her only qualm was that she hardly heard as much of the girl as she would have liked to. Thus it was that whenever Natsuki spoke, she tried to savour each note of that husky, attractive voice as though it were a rare delicacy.

Which it is, really, she told herself. I should do well to remember that.

"Are the two of you close, you and your cousin?" she asked her companion, only to be surprised when the latter looked put out by the query.

"Forgive me," she quickly followed. "Perhaps that was a rude question."

Natsuki shook her head, sending her silky curtain of straight and gleaming hair waving. It was so black, thought Shizuru, who preferred black hair.

"No," the girl said meaningfully, looking at Shizuru with a little colour still dashing about her wonderful cheekbones. "Not rude. And we-we are fine."

"I see," Shizuru answered, caressing the few syllables to make them more soothing to the girl's ears. "Of course. I understand."

That is the best word, perhaps, she thought. Fine. Natsuki and Nina had appeared to be fine, throughout dinner. She doubted they would make the cut for 'very close', however. From what she had seen tonight, she felt she had a fairly good guess about Nina's character, which she took to be reticent too-though not in Natsuki's league, certainly.

The younger cousin also spoke, she felt, with a hint of what the senior legate might have called a serious streak. It had been there in her formal replies to their questions, and the slight, official bows of her head to all of the statements addressed to her. It made Shizuru recall how Natsuki had been during their early days together.

She guessed this was perhaps one of the things that prevented the cousins from becoming truly 'close'. Given two people of similarly earnest temperaments, it was unlikely they could hold enough dialogue of the kind that would lead to real intimacy. One had to be a person used to provoking people into speech for either of them to open up, just as she had done with her bodyguard.

She turned to Natsuki.

"I suppose you would like me to finish the story when we get back?" she said with a friendly tone. "Although only a little is left, Natsuki. But I shall try to find other plays afterwards, from the library."

The girl's eyes shone: she was pleased.

"Shizuru," she said softly.

"Yes, Natsuki?"

"How-" She stopped, thought over what to say. "How is it yuh-you read so?"

"Hmm. How exactly do I read?"

"Swiftly."

Shizuru grinned.

"I myself do not know exactly how it happened," she confessed, knowing what the girl meant: it was a common query directed to her, even by her peers. It was not a simple thing to read Himean, given that one had to guess for oneself where one sentence ended and a new one began; even words ran together. "It was simply always so. As soon as I was taught to read, I discovered myself able to read at a glance."

The Otomeian's eyes shone again, this time with a bright and wondering amazement.

"A handy ability, hm?" Shizuru prodded.

"Yes," the girl said with great feeling. "It is."

"Well, I am pleased to offer it in service to you, My Dear," the older woman offered. "I do not mind reading out more tomes for you if you wish it. Why, had I known that you liked literature so very much, I would have read to you before instead of simply prattling on about so many things."

"Buh-but..."

She looked at the girl, who had uttered the word so softly she barely heard it.

"Yes?" she asked.

Natsuki seemed to quicken her steps unconsciously, but the elder woman kept pace.

"I liked... that," the girl finally said, rather lamely.

"Liked what, Natsuki?"

The girl sighed a cloud and Shizuru wished she could catch it on her tongue. Such a thought might have shocked her before, but she only registered it with mild resignation now.

What odd fancies you do get when you desire someone, she thought, sighing too. Natsuki's tardy answer came out just then, as her own breath fogged in the air.

"You," she told Shizuru. "Talking."

Later, like an afterthought: "About so many things."

Shizuru felt herself grin.

"Truly, Natsuki?" she asked.

Natsuki nodded seriously before saying, with a quick flash of humour: "Ookini."

The older woman laughed, saying the word as well. She felt wonderful, she felt all of a sudden, and thought that the day had been a good one. It was with a light step that she reached the gubernatorial residence, Natsuki at her side. They had already entered the main hall, about to go to their quarters, when a slave came forward and accosted them.

"Oh, I'm sorry, General Fujino," he said, addressing Shizuru with so many bows that he made her dizzy. "Masashi-san was looking for you. He said to ask you if you would speak with him once you arrived."

"Masashi-han?" Shizuru said, irritated by the reminder of her flea's existence at such a juncture: and here it had been shaping up to be a good day! She smiled at the servant, however, and lifted her eyebrows questioningly his way. "Has he been waiting long? Is he waiting even now?"

"Yes, General Fujino," said the man. "He is waiting in the second dining room, the one just around that corner. He's been waiting for a while now. Two or so hours, I think."

The general looked surprised at this piece of intelligence.

"How strange," she said. "And did he give you any indication what it was that he wanted to speak to me about?"

The servant shook his head with conscientious regret.

"He did look a little serious," was all he could tell her. "Like he was thinking of something, thinking hard."

Shizuru was tempted to say that Takeda would indeed find thinking hard. She thanked the man and began walking slowly towards the dining room, trying not to look too unenthusiastic.

"Natsuki. What do you think of Takeda-han?"

She looked at the girl to see her reaction, which was a shrug.

"What does that mean?" she prodded, wanting-perhaps even needing-to get something more definitely negative. "Humour me, Natsuki. What do you think of him?"

She watched as Natsuki made a motion as if to shrug again but stopped. After a short pause, the girl finally spoke.

"I do not," Natsuki said.

Shizuru was confused.

"Do not what?" she asked.

"Think of him."

That made her laugh. They reached the room soon after and she found the swordsman sitting at a polished wooden table. He got to his feet when he saw them come in and did it so quickly that he looked as though he had been pricked with a needle. He looked a little anxious, Shizuru thought. Or was it eagerness she saw on him instead? She studied his face as she and Natsuki seated themselves opposite the man, the fact that he spent more time gazing at her Otomeian companion than anything else not lost on her.

"Good evening to you both. Have you eaten?" he said, sounding a little more collected than usual. Shizuru nodded, wondering why exactly she thought that. Something there, she felt, was familiar. Something she could categorise. What tone was that again?

Oh, yes, I know, she realised. It was the sound of someone who had just come to a decision.

"I was talking to Homura-san today," he said, clearly trying to put on a casual manner. "He said he expected you to be going on soon? To Argus?"

Shizuru prayed he would not ask to join them.

"Perhaps and perhaps not," she answered obliquely. "I am not certain yet, Masashi-han. And you? Some tell me too that they expect you to be going soon?"

She affected her warmest smile, wryly wishing he would catch fire from it.

"Yes, well, maybe," he said, looking a touch uncomfortable then. He shifted in his seat and licked his lips, which were very chapped. "I think I'll have to be going in around, uh, a week's time. Or two."

She barely managed to hold in her grin: "I see."

"I wanted to ask when you would be going," he said after a deep breath. "To Argus. A rough guess, maybe?"

She pretended to think it over, then smiled helplessly at him.

"I confess I really have no idea," she answered. "Perhaps in a month, perhaps three weeks. Perhaps we might even be leaving by tomorrow. I fear I am a capricious commander. Fortunately, my troops are trustworthy ones. Which means I need not fear that they shall fail to meet my capricious demands."

He frowned at this. She sent him another apologetic smile as she rose.

"Well," she said. "If that is all, we should be going."

Natsuki had already gone to stand beside her when the swordsman started, holding up his hand in supplication.

"Ah, please," he begged. "Fujino-san, may I have a word? Before you go."

Shizuru looked at him, slowly returning to her seat. The man watched her at first. But then he continued to watch her for a good while afterwards, still saying nothing. It was obvious that he was deliberating on how to begin whatever he wanted to say, and had it been anyone else, Shizuru would have been more inclined to let their thoughts take time to form. But given that it was he...

"Yes?" she said crisply, breaking him out of his mental exercises. "What is it?"

Takeda twisted his lips. His brow had furrowed at this interruption, and he lifted a hand to caress the back of his neck warily, shooting her another anxious look that travelled to her companion towards the end.

"Could we maybe discuss this alone?" He smiled in apology to Natsuki, who was already eyeing him askance. "It would be easier. To talk, I mean. I'm sorry."

Shizuru was now wondering what on earth the man had to say. She turned it over in her mind but came to no conclusion as to what he wanted from her. The thought that she could not predict what he was about to say was irritating, but not entirely surprising. Strictly speaking, after all, the two of them had no commerce with each other.

Which is how I would prefer to keep it, she thought with great annoyance.

Fixing him with her expressionless stare for perhaps a little longer than necessary, she took her time in enjoying the slight fidgets of his facial muscles. Perhaps due to this silence, he decided to speak again before she could say anything.

"You don't have to send, uh, Natsuki-san away completely," he explained. "Just a little off. As you did with Suda Yuuji-san."

She digested this for a few seconds.

"Indeed," she replied.

She turned her head to the side and looked up to find Natsuki hovering there, a small frown on her pretty face. She smiled to assuage the girl and-for reasons she later reflected to have stemmed from possessiveness once again-put up her hand to draw the younger woman's face closer to her own, keeping her eyes on the green ones.

She was pleased to see that there was only the faintest hint of surprise in those eyes at her action.

"You heard Masashi-han, Natsuki," she said, speaking with a softness that was meant for the girl and the girl alone. "Shall you stand a small distance away and wait for me there, perhaps?"

Their gazes locked for a moment and it seemed to her that everything else fell away-that all she could see was the younger woman's face and the cascade of dark hair framing that face. She could almost hear the girl telling her she did not trust the man, although no words were spoken, and could almost see the many reasons in the Otomeian's unspoken argument.

She smiled to assuage the worries she could read so plainly now in the girl's eyes.

"It's all right," she promised. "I shall not take long either, this time."

She nodded encouragingly.

"Then we can return to reading Iphigenia."

Natsuki exhaled through her nose, showing that though she did not like the idea she would give in to her charge's wishes. Shizuru shot her eyes to the side, catching Takeda's face as it shifted between surprise and envy at their interactions.

"Masashi-han?" she prompted, not too keen on having him watch the girl walk away. "Your concerns?"

He snapped his eyes to her, his swarthy face showing that whatever he had to say was serious. Shizuru looked at him inquiringly and wished he would get to his point as soon as possible. As far as outward appearances were concerned, of course, she looked calm as she waited. Her body and face were too disciplined to show her inner thoughts, which were taken up by wondering how to make this short conversation much shorter and very unpleasant for the other senator. Had she known that displaying her impatience would have made the man before her more unnerved, she might have let down her façade. But then, the ill-fated interview might also have taken even longer.

Takeda was taking his time. He was wondering how to begin the discussion-and although the woman before him showed no sign of rushing, he could still feel a faint impatience coming from her. His main distraction had already gone off, fortunately, and although he knew she was standing just beneath the arch of the room's entrance, she was not in his direct line of sight any longer, which rather left his tongue and throat freer.

So let's get this over with, the voice in him urged.

"It... well, it's actually a little embarrassing," he finally began, glad to find that his speech flowed more easily without his dark-haired temptress nearby. "But I prefer to discuss things like this without the person present, you see. It seems more appropriate."

Shizuru gave him a puzzled expression.

"The person?" she asked, actually mystified.

"Yes," he replied, turning his head to steal a quick glance at the girl at the other end of the room. After satisfying himself that she could not possibly hear their conversation, he went on.

"It actually concerns that girl," he confessed. "So I had to ask you to-"

"Natsuki?" Shizuru interrupted, looking more and more curious by the second. "It concerns Natsuki?"

"Yes, Natsuki-san," he said, licking his lips. "Yes, ah. An excellent attendant you have there, Shizuru-san. I have to say."

Shizuru had to restrain herself from lifting an eyebrow at his casual use of her first name so suddenly. She nodded with dangerous sloth, wondering what the man was getting at and whether or not he knew that he was coming perilously close to the fire.

"That is true," she said, in reply to his words. "I must admit I find myself hardly able to get by without her."

Takeda's brow furrowed as he put on an even more serious air.

"Yes, I see," he said, pinching his nose between his thumb and forefinger before sniffing. "Hm. Can I ask where you picked her up, Shizuru-san?"

This time, Shizuru's eyebrow did lift, starting a slow crawl upwards even as she replied.

"Otomeia," she told him, her answer a little more curt than she had intended. She fixed him with a searching look and got straight to the point, hoping he would emulate her example.

"May I ask, Masashi-han, what the reason is for all this interest in Natsuki?" she asked. "Why the queries? And why request that she be sent away? I fear I have a great many things to do myself, so I must request that you come now to the matter at hand, whatever it may be."

The swordsman's dark eyes widened for a few seconds before he regained himself and nodded, looking deeply apologetic.

"Oh, of course," he said. "I'm sorry, I should've thought of that! Please pardon me. Of course, I was getting to that."

He brought his hands together and clasped them, his elbows resting on the table. He endeavoured to meet her eyes without flinching, ignoring the odd twinges of alarm their eerie colour provoked all the time.

"You see, Shizuru-san, I've been looking for-for an attendant for a while now," he said, dropping his voice to its lowest and what he fancied to be its most businesslike audible register. "I've gone through dozens, maybe even hundreds, of possibilities, and I've yet to see one I like. It's so hard to find a good one, you know."

He paused and sighed to give more gravity to his presentation.

"So I had almost given up looking," he went on. "Until Na- your Otomeian impressed me. She impressed me very favourably. This is the reason for all my questions, Shizuru-san. I wanted to make you an offer. I would like to purchase her from you." He tipped his head carelessly. "Please don't worry about price, as I would be glad to pay any amount for such an attendant."

He stopped here, as the woman in front of him now looked even more confused than before. She seemed to be doubting what he had just told her, her eyes wide open as she stared at him with more amazement than he had ever seen her show.

"Fujino-san?" he said, snapping her out of the strange expression on her face.

She opened her mouth, although no sound came out the first time. After a small, bizarrely pained blink, she tried again.

"Pardon me, Masashi-han," she murmured, her voice down to the very floor. "I am not sure I heard you correctly. Did you just...?"

She seemed to wince disbelievingly at something, shaking her head.

He nodded and took this to be the old haggler's trick. He almost sighed, wondering why she would feel the need to do that when he already told her that he would be willing to pay any price.

Unless, of course, she plans to ask for an insanely large amount, he thought wryly. Well, no matter. He could cover it, of that he was certain. What was money to him? And come to think of it, what was money to the woman he was speaking with, anyway? She was supposed to be one of the richest people in Hime, after all—richer than Croesus, if the rumours were true. If so, she should not even be haggling. So what was this game, in that case, and why was she speaking this way?

"Come now, Shizuru-san," he coaxed. "As you heard, I'm already prepared to pay whatever price you ask. Even you must concede it's a generous offer."

He turned to look at the girl in question, who was still standing at the other end of the room. His eyes were on her as he went on, a small smile coming to his lips as he thought of finishing this business and finally owning her.

In every way possible.

"In fact, I should even tell you," he said offhandedly, feeling excitement tremble in his flesh, "I'm willing to pay more than a few talents for her-slaves like that are worth their weight in gold, after all-"

" Ecastor!"

The furiously whispered word silenced him. He looked at the woman across the table, discovering that she had risen to her feet and was now standing with hands clenched and shaking at her sides. Her eyes were shut, her finely furred brows slashing downwards with obvious displeasure.

"Shizuru-san?" he said uncertainly, just as red eyes unveiled themselves once more.

The look she gave him set a dozen maggots crawling at the back of his skull.

Chapter 17

Thanks to all the reviewers. Regarding Chapter 16, I understand that there may be misgivings among some of you regarding Takeda's act , but if you would be so kind as to allow an explanation, then I refer you to King of Esca ' s review, in which she explains very concisely why Takeda was led into his "proposition". Thank you to Mlle. Esca, by the way, for pointing all those things out-it saves one some trouble, which element (unfortunately) seems to be the constituting factor in so many things of late. Thanks as well to Sylverlyf, from whose review one appropriated a detail for use in this chapter.

Notes:

1. Maleficum - Simply put, evil; that which is maleficent.
2. Aspects of the gods (e.g. Apollo the Healer and Apollo of the Torments) - The Romans believed gods to have various aspects or manifestations. The example given, that of Apollo as Healer against Apollo as Tormentor, is an illustration of how some of these aspects could show the varied, contrasting sides of a god's personality.
3. "Tace!" - Latin for "Shut up!"
4. Dignitas - This is one of the most important terms to understand when speaking of Roman culture. Do not be misled into translating it into the English word "dignity", for it is far more complicated than that. There are no serious Latin scholars/commentators who attempt to translate it, for it cannot be reduced to a single contemporary term (as far as the modern languages are concerned).

Shizuru gives a little insight into dignitas later in this chapter, but to explain: it is a person's personal worth, his public standing, his prerogative to respect and treatment as a human being. It comes not only from his personal qualities but also from his achievements, which enhance his dignitas if they are worthy ones.

Why is it important to know dignitas? Because it was often the most sensitive asset possessed by a Roman (here, a Himean). An insult against dignitas could be enough reason-as justified by societal culture-to destroy someone. In fact, almost anything was risked to defend dignitas, whether it be one's property, one's name, one's life, or even one's family.

5. Bacchante - Worshippers of Bacchus or Dionysus, who was the god of wine and revelry. Some stories depict them as intoxicated women tearing savagely through the country and hills, dancing and feasting in a blind passion.

6. Condemno - The "guilty" sentence in Roman courts.

7. Imperium - Imperium is the degree of authority owned by a magistrate, governor, or army commander .

What in the world...?

Takeda stared in amazement at the woman he had only ever known to be pleasant and even-tempered, stunned by the alien snarl on her face. Her usual smile had become a savage-looking parody of itself, and he would be damned if those teeth did not look ready to tear into his neck. The most alarming change was perhaps with her eyes. The brightly coloured irises, disturbing enough in their normal stillness, now danced and swam with living blood. Maleficum!

His hand struck out at his side, falling to the sword that hung there-a sword, he recalled, that was not actually the one he often carried. That other weapon had been left with a sword polisher in town, and he had taken to carrying this spare in the meantime. It was of inferior make, this blade whose hilt he had in hand, and that discrepancy bothered him now. Yet it should not. It was not as though he planned to use the thing. And most certainly not against the woman in front of him!

A low voice focused his attention upon her again. He looked up as she spoke, for which he cursed himself later as her gaze set off a brush of lightning.

"You-I cannot," she murmured, her voice still bearing traces of disbelief. "You presume-?"

A deep intake of breath, cut short when she spat it out indignantly: "You dare?"

He pushed himself a little further into his seat, instinctively moving away. A short burst of air hissed from her teeth again, and she leaned very slightly forward as if to follow him. The tense movement bespoke volumes of powerfully coiled self-restraint-as did her voice, which came out in a throaty rumble.

"I trust I do not mistake your meaning, Masashi-han," she said, pronouncing his name in a fashion that implied it sullied her tongue. "When you just offered to buy Natsuki from me just now. Is it not so?"

It took a few seconds of being subject to that intense stare before he finally understood that she was waiting for an answer. He nodded mutely, still wondering what was the matter. He would find out soon, however, for she suddenly threw him a look that was even angrier than the last, her features throwing off what restraint had been dressing them until now and suddenly contorting into a portrait of nude rage.

Monstrous, Takeda gasped, shivering at the image his fellow senator now revealed to him. It was a possessed Phidias statue he regarded, one vested with every classical proportion but unfrozen from its marble shell and showing the dynamic and demonic being inhabiting it. So beautiful! Yet also so ugly! There was something about beautiful people, he decided then, that made them look even more horrific than the average person when driven to anger. The same quality that made their beauty unearthly seemed to make them grotesque to him. Like divinities turned on their heads. Like having Apollo the Healer transmute into Apollo of the Torments in a thunderclap. Such a fantastic change! He felt himself shrink a little before the spectacle and felt shamed by the reaction.

Why am I so damned anxious before her?

The question roused him as well as his considerable pride. Takeda did not like feeling cowed, and despised the cowardly. Which meant that he despised himself for flinching, even if before a patrician Fujino obviously angered. Why should he flinch before her, after all, when he had not flinched before dozens of opponents before-opponents who had brandished swords, whereas the woman before him did not? Yes, she was a formidable woman, even a woman who could brandish her very reputation as a weapon. Yet, his ego argued, was that not the case with him as well? What mattered it to him that she was said to be the star on the rise of Hime's horizon? Why, there were some who said the same thing of him!

Yes, he simply needed to keep calm. The reaction was unprecedented, but he had no reason to fear it. He needed only to look away from those eerie eyes and regain composure.

And he needed to find out what exactly was happening.

"Please sit, Shizuru-san," he finally said, still a little too weakly for his liking. "I just asked if I could buy-"

"Hold your tongue."

His head snapped back at the harsh command.

"Hold your tongue," she whispered again, still glaring at him with that awesome anger streaked across her face. "How dare you insult her-and me-by bartering for her as though she were a mere slave and I some slipshod slave trader? Does either of us look so mean in your estimation to be treated thusly? How dare you?"

He swallowed, not knowing what to say in the face of this mounting fury. This was not turning out in the least as he had expected. He was still a little unsure of what had spurred her to this passion, but her words had at least given him a general idea of his error, and he groaned inwardly. Evidently he had gone wrong somewhere, made a wrong assumption, and he attempted to say it. One had to save face, at the very least!

Although he highly resented having to do that at all.

"I didn't mean-I'm sorry, I misunderstood," he managed, a small sense of alarm clogging his throat even as he ranted inwardly. "You see."

Humiliating!

"I thought she was one," he muttered. "I don't really get it, but... Well, it's just a misunderstanding."

Still she said nothing, her expression not softening in the least. He saw this and felt annoyance welling within him. Why were the rules of the game so unclear now, when he had thought this such a simple undertaking before? This was such a hateful situation: patrician and Fujino though she might be, it did not come easily to him to have to beg pardon of her, and he was not enjoying this little exercise in chagrin in the least.

"Sorry," he said quickly again, grimacing at his own inarticulacy. "I mean, you can't blame me, really! I just, well, I thought that-"

"On the contrary, it appears you have not thought much at all," she interjected, growling out the words so softly he had to turn his ear towards her. "Enough, if you please. Enough of the excuses. To impute slavish status upon her-and she from one of the oldest dynastic lines of history, by rights!-then to actually ask me to-"

She broke off here, and shut her eyes.

"The imprudence of it astounds me," she muttered, one fist pressed to her brow. "This. This is the Takeda Masashi? The swordsman said to have one of the sharpest swords in Hime? Is this all we can expect of such a man?"

She lowered her fist and raked coal-hot eyes over him, lips turning up in disgust.

"Frankly, your sword must indeed be sharp, to compensate for your significant shortcomings," she drawled heavily. "And let it be understood I speak of the sword hanging at your side rather than the other that hangs elsewhere, if indeed you have the latter at all, judging by this unmanly display."

Takeda rushed to his feet, stung to the quick by that scathing insult. He was barely able to hold back the curse threatening to leap from his tongue, held there only by the last cords of confusion.

"I say, I don't think this calls for that, Fujino!" he said brusquely, tacking on the cavalier address at the last moment. "It's just a simple mistake, whatever you think it is."

She pretended surprise, the expression particularly sarcastic as she made it.

"Simple mistake?" The mirthless echo slipped softly from her lips. "Just a simple mistake?"

She laughed humourlessly.

"Yes, a simple mistake," she said, speaking in tones he found absurdly gentle for the situation-almost amorous, in fact. "A curious one. Consider, for instance, that you could have asked any of the officers, any of my staff, before meeting me, to confirm your idiotic assumption as to her standing. Anyone with a grain of sense would have done such a thing, and yet you did not."

She shrugged. There was nothing casual about it.

"Or if indeed you did," she proceeded, "then either my people have misled you deliberately or your own ignorance has accomplished that. My soldiers are not in the habit of misleading others on intention. So perhaps you had best return to your inquiries-if you made any-and ponder the veracity of any conclusions you may have drawn from them. I am certain you shall find that you failed to see the very simple facts: she is a high-ranking officer of the army, she is not a slave, she is my bodyguard and my personal attendant. But I did not pay for her, nor did I coerce her into assuming this responsibility. She agreed to it as a request from her king."

She scoffed here, giving a small shake of her head.

"You say I cannot blame you for this mistake, it being due to ignorance, but people can still be held culpable for ignorance insofar as it proceeds due to negligence. And you neglected to inquire properly into the matter before making this rash judgement! Oh, what a strategy! One wonders what kind of general you would be, Masashi-han. As far as I know, it is still customary for soldiers to have a basic grasp of the terrain before they jump into battle... and here you have pretended to scale a mountain when in fact you have been plunging into the sea."

She smirked briefly at his obvious discomfiture, and continued in that soft but punishing voice.

"All that aside, you did not even have the sense to realise that the girl has not an ounce of slave in either bearing or appearance. So, yes indeed, it was certainly a simple mistake. Only a true simpleton could have made it," she sneered, with a quiet, venomous laugh. "You give me cause to wonder, Masashi-han. When you cannot even see a thing as obvious as this, how could you hope to see a swing coming at you from the front?"

He squared his stance, a low rumble coming up in his throat. He had had enough of this. Fujino though she might be, she had absolutely no right to talk to him that way! What galled him more was that he had let her abuse him for so long, struck dumb by the spectacle of her rare fury and her scathing speech. Her barbs had lodged poisonously in what he knew was the greatest chink in his armour, his ego, and it smarted more than any sword wound ever had in his flesh.

She'll pay for this, he vowed, returning her glare. What does she think I am, some lily-livered fool she can bully with words so easily?

"You'd better watch what you say," he scowled, his nose wrinkling. "Just because I made a mistake there doesn't mean I'll make a mistake with my sword!"

The golden brows shot up haughtily: "Is that a threat?"

"Maybe it is!" he hissed, his hand now resting fully on the hilt of his weapon. "Don't think that just because you're who you are, Fujino, I'm afraid of you. You don't scare me! And why does it matter to you so much if I want to buy her, anyway? It may be an insult to her, but this doesn't concern you!"

"Then why did you come to me about it!" she shot back.

He blew out his breath as though trying to release steam. His lips pulled in for a moment like those of a man close to losing his temper or already losing it.

"I guess I really did come to the wrong person!" he finally said, giving her an angry caricature of a grin. "I'd better see the Otomeian king, then, and see if he won't consider a request from me! You know these foreign kings as well as I do, and a subject is just a subject to them-he just might transfer her to being my attendant if I asked nicely enough!"

Shizuru looked surprised that he had even had the strength to answer her, but the anger in her face did not go away.

"Oh, yes, you are a paragon of asking nicely, are you not? I am sure you shall manage to offend the king as much as you have just offended me. Please do not let me dissuade you from it! Yes, I do know these foreign kings," she said dryly. "And they would only be too glad to deal you a good lashing for your folly. Oh, go and get yourself into trouble that way, Masashi-han, do!"

"Now you see here-!" he began wrathfully, only to be cut off by her again.

"No, you see here!" she snapped, eyes flashing. "This is not merely a question of the offence you have made to her standing, unforgivable though it may be! Do you think I have not been watching you? First you had the audacity to follow us-to hound Natsuki-around the province like-like a dog in heat. You made overtures towards her and somehow managed to ignore all the glaring signs that she is not in the least interested. Well, that is fine. That is irritating but still pardonable. But now you do this!"

She leaned forward again as she went on, her voice somehow caressing the accents of fury that managed to work themselves into her lilt. Her stare blazed and seared into Takeda's eyes like red steel, and something in him quailed against his own volition at the heat.

"You did yourself a disservice when you became impatient," she told him. "You were fool enough to follow us around, but I did not think you would actually be fool enough to try this. Did you think that, since she refused your advances, you would force them on her after bartering with me? Did you think I could not see your intentions from a mile away? Indeed, if that is so, you were wrong."

Takeda shook his head as though slapped, startled by the savagery of her words and the bone-hard way in which she exposed him. He knew she understood the blow she had just dealt when she smirked viciously at his expression. He knew something else, then: that he hated her deeply.

"Yes, you were planning to do that to her, were you not?" she drawled on. "Such base intent, really. I suppose you would have tried to hide it, too, else your reputation as a perfectly disciplined, abstemious sportsman and senatorial son of the most traditional fashion would crumble. To say nothing of your reputation for refraining from dessert. My word, how you revolt me!"

She finally paused, seeming to draw breath as well as composure. There was a short silence, then, where she seemed to wait for him to say something. But he said nothing, too choked by rage to reply just yet. When it was clear he was speechless, she finally waved her hand as one would to shoo away an insect, letting out another long-suffering sigh of great restraint.

"To think you even dared to threaten me," she said disdainfully. "Go now, Masashi-han, and forget all your ideas about Natsuki. You cannot have her-you cannot even touch her! Do you hear me? You will not, will never touch her! I swear it!"

Her breathing having grown more agitated from this outburst, she shook her head with wrath.

"It would be best," she said, "if you went home as soon as possible. In fact, I am telling you to go home as soon as possible for your own sake."

This brought him out of his silence.

"Don't think you can tell me what to do, Fujino," he growled.

"Ah, but," she said with a contemptuous smile, "I believe I just did."

Out came his sword with a soft screech of metal, his temper gone and scattered by her words.

"Nobody tells me what to do!" he cried, only to be cut off by a crisp and very loud crack from the entrance to the room. He and Shizuru snapped their heads to that direction with similar expressions of alarm. They both gasped in surprise, however, at the unexpected sight of the girl they had been quarrelling over as she fell their way, tumbling in the air.

The two rivals thought the same thing, just then: Ye gods!

There was a short moment where all they could see was Natsuki's form suspended in space, all they could hear the whistling sound made by her body as it somersaulted towards them. Then came another whizzing sound, which ended with the intrusive noise of metal hitting metal along with the splintering crash of the table being rent.

"Shit!" Takeda exclaimed, half-standing, half-backed into his pulled-out chair. "What on earth-?"

He broke off as his eyes dropped upon countless slivers of wood. Then onto the table, which had a horrific cut torn through a hand's length of the polished wooden surface.

His eyes travelled to the girl rising from her crouch near him. She was standing at the head of the table, almost between him and the other senator, and her eyes were dropped demurely, he noted, conscious of a sense of irony in that detail. For all the modesty in her expression, there was still no mistaking the warning in her stance or the menace of the scythe she had in hand. He would have likened her to an Amazon at that moment, were it not that he felt her too graceful to be one. He thought, rather, of Diana the goddess.

Yes, the Queen of the Hunt...

He was conscious of a burning sensation on his cheek.

... the crescent moon a sickle in her hand.

He remembered the sword in his own hand just then. Flexing his wrist, he realised that the weapon felt oddly light at the moment, so he looked at it. And started in astonishment.

The thin blade of his sword was broken, a good length of steel missing. His head snapped back to the girl who had broken it, surprise etched into his features.

A disturbed silence overtook the room.

---

Shizuru, for her part, was also more than a little surprised by what had just transpired. Even her own rage had dissipated somewhat from the shock, and she stood there for some seconds, simply looking-or better, staring-at her Otomeian bodyguard, who stood before her with nothing but the usual grim expression.

What happened?

The crimson eyes drifted, taking in the details.

She saw the scarred table, and the thick chain lying on the floor directly beneath the cracked wood.

She saw the spiked, rectangular weight now embedded in the floor and attached to the chain, which led in a trail to Natsuki's hand.

She looked at the other end of the room, her mind taking in the splintering holes and cracks in the ceiling and forming a series of rapid calculations.

And she understood.

Natsuki, it appeared, had been watching the two Himeans argue. Unsure as to whether or not she needed to return to her charge's side, she had finally decided to intervene when Takeda drew his sword. Taking this as undisguised provocation, the girl had then thrown the weight of her daos towards the ceiling and broken through, whipping the chain about to swing its head back downwards until it wrapped around one of the exposed joists.

She had swung herself up with the dangling chain, running to add to the momentum and half-climbing as she did so. Its whipping length had extended her leap to her destination. At the very peak of the swing, she had somersaulted and used the power of that sudden tug to free her chain again. Shizuru guessed that the girl had hooked the chain with her elbow in the somersault for this, as she had seen the Otomeian do many times when playing against targets during practice sessions. Her elbow now the fulcrum and the spike now the swung object, this had resulted in the sudden whip of that end of the chain and the ferocious lash it and the weight had dealt to an edge of the table. This blow was then followed by the outstretched hack of her sickle upon Takeda's sword, which ended with the latter's blade being broken and the table's head being cloven in two.

That weapon's paw is better named a claw, Shizuru found herself thinking, still silent as she stared at the damage it had wrought. What a slash that claw had just made! She eyed the girl with unreserved awe and would have forgotten-for the most part-her anger with the other occupant of the room had she not then glanced at him.

The first thing she noticed was the blood pouring from his cheek. There were two crossed cuts responsible for this, and the more lucid part of her mind noted that one slash was deeper and larger than the other. She deduced it to have come from the tip of Natsuki's scythe catching his skin, whereas the other slash must have come from a shard of either the wooden table or the broken sword flying into the air. She knew enough about injuries to tell that there was a possibility the wounds would scar. She felt no pity. Indeed, the sight of the man bleeding gave her a strong sense of satisfaction. A further assessment of him took away that momentary pleasure as she registered the expression in his face.

Takeda was staring at Natsuki with an unabashed mixture of admiration and awe-similar to what she herself had been feeling for the girl just a moment earlier. His moss-coloured eyes were fixed on the Otomeian too with a gleam of desire, and that made Shizuru's blood boil again.

"General Fujino! Masashi-san!"

"Oh, by the gods, what happened?"

They all turned to the sudden cries, which had come from the doorway. Two servants stood there, looking frantic and worried by the scene before them. They stared at the three people in the room, and Shizuru thought, vaguely, that the confusion seemed bright and dumb on their faces.

In any case, she decided that it was time to go, seeing that the crash had been heard by several people. More would be coming soon, and that would make the situation even more unpleasant. She looked at the man opposite her, her look making it clear that she wanted to cut this short.

"Masashi-han."

He met her gaze and she sent him another withering look. He answered with a retaliatory sneer, though with slightly less effect.

"I trust I have made everything clear," she said with prodigious calm, considering her turmoil. "I would advise you to leave Sosia now and return to Hime. Immediately."

She said this in her most dismissive tones, drenching them with as much quiet antipathy as possible. She then turned to her bodyguard and nodded to the girl.

"Let us go, Natsuki."

Natsuki gave her a searching look, as if to ask if she was sure.

"Yes," she nodded shortly. " Let us leave him. "

The girl drew up the loops of her weapon efficiently and took her place by the older woman's side, neither of them sparing Takeda a second glance as they walked away. He followed them with his eyes, saying nothing as they turned their backs on him.

It was when they were just about to reach the exit to the room, the servants standing there still and gawking incredulously at the scene, that he called out.

"Fujino-san!"

Shizuru stopped and saw her companion do the same. She looked over her shoulder then, feeling a small vein in her temple pulsing harder than usual.

She saw Takeda scowling darkly at her, his swarthy face distorted with resentment.

"I'll remember this," he said ominously.

E-cas-tor, she thought, stifling the urge to roll her eyes. Of all the trite things to say!

She gave him another majestic sneer before replying.

"So shall I, and in case you have any concerns about the object of the matter, do not worry," she said, a mocking lilt to her words-which he had spoken to her, some days prior. " / shall be with her."

With that parting shot, she resumed her exit with Natsuki in train. When the two servants in the doorway came forward, Shizuru waved them away with less than her customary grace, not even looking at them as she stalked off. She doubted she could even speak coherently at the moment, for the anger had returned in full force and had filled her throat. A final, called-out statement from behind her nearly broke that fragile composure.

"She doesn't belong to you!"

She kept walking and pretended to ignore him, emotion setting off tiny explosions of rage in her mind. The blood pounding in her ears seemed thunderous, and she could barely hear the quiet clinking of the chains of Natsuki's daos behind her-and above that, the sound of the servants exclaiming concern for the injured man she had left in the room, that wretch!

She was aware that she was moving without her usual calm. In fact, she walked so aggressively that her strides ate up the ground, her feet thudding audibly with each step. She was even tempted to take the steps they encountered two at a time, but settled for simply passing each one more quickly than she normally would.

She understood what was happening. She was trying to channel her fury outwards, trying to let it seep out of her by directing the energy into the quick snap of muscles and limbs as she often did when she was irked by something. On those occasions, she saved the emotion for use in battle. Yet it failed this time, for each movement only doubled her irritation. If only she could strike something! Or even kill someone!

This is why I loathe getting angry, she thought, tugging loose a fold of the suddenly cumbersome cloak still wrapped around her. She clenched her hand afterwards, because it took all of her strength not to tear the cloth, which would have been a foolish thing to do indeed. In a sense, even her behaviour earlier, her allowing herself to get roused to this, had been a foolish thing to do as well.

But that is it-I do foolish things when I am angry, she cried out in her mind, very aware of her failings of temper. Oh, why did I even have to get so angry? Curse it all!

A small part of her wondered when it had been, the last time she had been this livid. Not that her mind could supply an answer, for it was not working as lucidly as usual. This was the bane of her personality, which most people hardly ever saw beneath that easy-going mask. Her mother had been the first to notice it, and she had often cautioned Shizuru about allowing her anger to get the better of her.

When you snap, Shizuru, you do it perfectly, as with everything else, that elder lady once said. So beware yourself, and hide that half for as long as you can. The younger Fujino had not understood the words entirely back then, but had still taken the warning. And now she saw clearer than ever before what her mother had meant. The indignation-the white-hot anger-she was feeling was so perfect, so complete in its own way, that it had almost consumed her more rational side or half, as her mother put it.

And all because of that cretin downstairs!

Takeda Masashi. Decidedly a proud man. She had not missed that, even before he had drawn his sword, the look in his eyes admitted his already measuring the distance between them with his mind's blade. She did not think he would have had the audacity to actually strike an unarmed person as well as one with her status and name... but the mere intimation of it through that naked sword had been enough indication of his willingness to engage her in a duel over the matter. Did he want Natsuki so badly, or was it due to his pride that he had done such a thing?

Well, whatever it had been before, she knew he would always feel this strongly about the matter now. Emotions had a way of getting stronger after crises.

Let him run after the impossible, then, she thought viciously. She knew he would not engage her in an old-fashioned duel at this time-or could not, given that she was still on a campaign and endowed with the untouchable authority of her imperium -but the possibility just might arise in the future. True, duels were outdated concepts, particularly duels to the death for such things, but there were always ways around the written and unwritten laws preventing it. Takeda would certainly know, and she herself had no issues with exercising an archaism when she found it beneficial. She had no fear of his sword technique, although it was admittedly formidable from what she had seen in one athletic contest. He had a good, quick swing, with a clean slash that carried a considerable amount of power. A good execution of the most popular and highly-revered technique.

But it is hardly good enough, she thought, glaring with that dead-certain intent that often had enemy soldiers flinching in battle even before her attack. It is not enough to stop me.

It took a few moments before she apprehended she had even begun to visualise killing the man.

Shaking her head disgustedly, she turned into the corridor. She was painfully aware that her companion still had yet to say a word to her, and she wished she herself could say one to the girl. But her throat tightened each time she attempted to say something. With each failed attempt, her blood thundered louder, sounding remarkably like the army's drums playing the call to a charge. She was nearly deaf to everything else by the time she reached the passage leading to their room.

It did not help, she thought, that she was angry with herself as well for actually becoming so furious over such a thing. And yet, how could she help it? The things the man said-the look in his eyes when he eyed her Natsuki!

But, yes, there it was again: her Natsuki. All of this was due to her thinking of the girl as her Natsuki. But Natsuki was not truly hers, was she? Was that not the crux of the argument, after all? That Natsuki was not hers to give-or sell, for that matter-because Natsuki was her own person and belonged to no one else? That Natsuki was Natsuki's, and belonged only to herself? She certainly belonged not to Takeda Masashi.

The furnace in her breast threw out a little tongue of flame: Not even to Shizuru Fujino.

"Ah, tace !"

She could feel the girl's eyes on her again at this outburst, but she ignored it for now. There was the door of their room, finally, up ahead. She quickened her steps towards it, still debating with herself.

No, she thought. It cannot simply be a matter of that .

It was not just the idea of ownership, she decided. It was the unmitigated gall of that insult-the lowest known to a Himean-of calling a freeborn person a slave, which took away one's dignitas . Only a free person had dignitas . And to have no dignitas, strictly speaking, was to have no life at all. To have no dignitas was to be a mere animal.

Was that what had irked her so much, then? The unpardonable insult Takeda had done to Natsuki's very personhood, her worth as a human being? Surely it was the worst offence one could do to another through mere words-or such was her own opinion and had always been. But then again, if that was the case, would she not be guilty of using her own standards to measure the insult against Natsuki-who was not even Himean and who, for all she knew, might not even interpret the insult to be as large a one as Shizuru had? Did the Otomeians even have a concept comparable to dignitas? Besides all of which, it was not really a grave insult against Shizuru, was it? It was one against Natsuki, and as the swordsman told Shizuru, she had no concern in it, very strictly speaking.

No!

She shook away that thought. She had every concern in it. Her anger was justified, for she had every right to be indignant on behalf of the girl. After all, Natsuki was her... what?

"Furies take that man!" she hissed vehemently.

She burst into their room, striding across the floor as Natsuki followed and shut the door for both of them. Shizuru made her way to the window and stood there, leaning against the wall as she fumed. She was facing the night sky, the curtains drawn back and stirring gently in the breeze-which she did not feel on her burning face. Her body felt so warm that she was surprised there was no steam rising from her skin yet.

As though that would be possible, she told herself, her mind a tangled mass of confusion. Steaming skin? What am I thinking!

Taking a few deep breaths, she addressed a brief query to her companion.

"Did you hear?"

She turned to the girl in time to see the negative shake of the head, which somehow made her feel a little relieved. Still, it could not quell the fury that was thrumming in her nerves, and she nearly bit her tongue when she tried to formulate a proper response. That made her blood rise again.

Supposing that it would be safer to be short, she settled instead for saying a single word.

"Well."

Brilliant reply! She chastised herself soundly, seeing how the girl's wariness of her rose under that curt word. Oh, what was she to say? What could she say? She could not possibly tell Natsuki what had transpired. Yet she could not leave the girl in the dark, after everything that had occurred.

But what could she tell her?

"Natsuki."

She beckoned her nearer with a tip of the head, and Natsuki obeyed. They stood by the window, both leaning on the frame and facing each other, though Natsuki kept her eyes down before Shizuru's intense gaze.

The older woman was trying to come up with something to tell the girl.

"What happened just now," she began. "You see..."

Natsuki lifted her chin, and Shizuru faltered before that innocently prying look.

How I hate that man for this!

"No." She waved her hand abruptly, pressing her eyes shut with the other. "Never mind."

She turned away with a frown and strode to the bed, where she flung on top of the covers in a way she had not done since she was a child. She lay there quietly for a while, one arm over her eyes as she tried to achieve calm by parodying it. So engrossed was she in this enterprise that she hardly perceived Natsuki's gradual approach until the girl was finally sitting on the edge, beside her.

I am surprised she is even willing to sit beside me with the way I have been acting, she thought wryly, not making any motion to acknowledge the girl's presence. Perhaps Natsuki was wondering who this stranger was and where her true charge had gone. Perhaps she was wondering what had transpired during that conversation for this sudden change of personality to result.

But this is who I am as well, Shizuru thought moodily. Even this anger is mine, and now she, of all people, has to see it.

She felt the weight at the edge of the bed shift, moving closer, and heard her companion's voice.

"Shizuru."

She did not realise it, but the tightness of her mouth relaxed a little at this. She did not remove her arm from over her eyes but hummed in response, soothed slightly by the sound of her name on Natsuki's lips. No one else ever said her name that way, really. It was only Natsuki that made it seem so beautiful that she wondered if she was worthy of it.

But Natsuki makes every word sound beautiful.

She would have smiled at the thought, had not another intruded itself upon her: if that was true, could Natsuki make every name sound beautiful?

That bothered her. She rarely heard Natsuki say people's proper names, as the girl preferred to speak of and to them using their titles. She even preferred to speak of her own cousin by referring to her as "my cousin" instead of simply calling the other girl "Nina". Now Shizuru wondered what it would be like to hear Natsuki do otherwise regularly. Could Natsuki caress someone else's name the same way she did hers? Could the girl's tongue lift someone else's appellation to the same heights?

Could she say even Takeda Masashi's name in that same sensuous lilt, with the same fatalistic drop at the end?

I would die first rather than hearing that, the older woman decided, her ire returning in full force. The thought was unbearable! She even groaned at the idea, but felt the groan soften into a sighing breath at an unexpected touch: something in her hair, stroking close to her scalp with a light caress.

"Shizuru."

She finally removed her arm from her eyes, turning a little to look at the girl who sat next to her. Natsuki went on caressing her hair, although the actions of her hand became more tentative in the face of Shizuru's still-burning eyes. The girl did not stop, however, and Shizuru was grateful for it.

Such kindness, Shizuru mused, studying the girl's face as the latter looked away from her with a blush. And such charm . Irresistible. The Otomeian could not possibly have any idea how much strength Shizuru was expending just to resist pulling her down and finally doing what she had been fantasising about for a while now, to turn that furious emotion still raging in her chest into something else-to end all the worries that had led to this and perhaps make it so that no-one could ever pose a threat again-to make Natsuki finally, decisively, her own-

Good god, what am I thinking of again?

She winced at the apprehension that she had fallen into something similar to Takeda's way of thinking once more, hot shame tightening her jaw as she mentally slapped herself for being so-what was the word for it? Mad, perhaps?

It would not be far from accuracy, she told herself dryly. Oh, why was she like this? Why did her emotions have to be so unstable, so volatile, when everything else about her seemed so firmly entrenched in reason? Or was that merely her façade? She was aware, even now, that her anger was mixing with a heady desire for the girl beside her, a maddening possessiveness... and all of it was becoming intertwined in a sickening knot of feeling in her stomach that was so strong and abrupt that it frightened even her.

Yet that nagging sense: that this knot had been present even before now. If so, had Takeda's insult only been the thing to unwrap it from whatever had been hiding it?

Am I no better than he, then, she wondered, trembling with suppressed fury. Would I do the same thing as that wretch was planning to do to her? Indeed, it would be even simpler for her than for him to do so, she being a present and powerful general who would not be condemned for carrying on with a beautiful young woman, personal attendant though the girl might be. It was even routine for most generals to have, during campaign, a foreign lover or several upon which to slake their desires while away from home—and in some cases, while away from a spouse. One could even say it was expected.

But Shizuru had never done that, had she? She had been much too concerned with the enterprise of campaigning itself as well as the welfare of her soldiers to have time for anything else. These concerns, joined with her concerns of proving her worthiness of commanding entire armies despite her youth, had until now managed to prevent her from giving any thought to that particular pleasure during her early forays in the military. It was not that she had absolutely no desire for it, but that she considered herself as having no time to give it. Thus, that certain channel of passion was given the fate of all the others for which she thought she had no time: it was dammed up and forgotten, and soon almost completely ignored into nonexistence. It took not long before the expedient became the routine. That channel stayed dammed, stayed forgotten and nonexistent.

But passions were compared to rivers for a reason, were they not? Dammed, they turned inwards and flowed into themselves like lakes gathering water for a sudden flood... at which time the dam would be swept away by the sheer force of the current. And here was the flood, one of conflicting emotions and desire. Here too was the current, and it was torrential.

The tide was drowning her.

Stop that, she told herself, groaning lightly. Her head was aching, and that awful, pricking sensation in her breast was getting worse, as though some beast had suddenly decided to settle there and was beginning to scrape its way out.

Indeed, perhaps that beast has been there all along.

She groaned yet another time, shutting her eyes in exasperation. Images of the swordsman's face came to her, his fawning gaze at Natsuki driving her mad all over again. And Natsuki's face too was in her mind, that lovely face that she could not bear to think of being touched by someone else.

This is too much, she brooded. This is something I never expected, and I am not prepared for it.

She could hear that awful thudding of her heart, a protest against its own unusual agitation.

I am always in control. I am not supposed to be like this.

She probed into herself pitilessly, admitting that some part of her had become somewhat arrogant in that regard, had begun to truly admit of her supposed elevation from other people this way. She had begun to think herself immune to such dilemmas as this, she realised, and now that conceit had thrown reality into her face with a slap.

This was never supposed to happen to me, but it has.

The fingers threading into her locks continued their motions, and for each stroke, that monster in her chest raged a little more, all the heretofore hidden uncertainties swarming out of her depths and baring their fangs.

I know not what to do about it!

That thought rocked her. She opened her eyes and stared at Natsuki with patent distress, wondering how this girl who had only ever been a comfort to her had suddenly turned into her undoing.

Is this all because of you, she wondered. Is it all on your account that I am thrust into this now?

The beast roared.

"Shizuru?"

The girl was looking at her now, the caresses stilled. They stared at each other and fought a silent battle as to who would dare to speak first, and ironically, it was Natsuki who sighed and began to talk.

"Down there," she murmured. "Downstairs."

Oh, do not ask me! Shizuru thought, panicked. I will not know what to say. Please, Natsuki.

"Wuh-wuh-"

Do not ask me!

"Why did..."

Natsuki paused here, and Shizuru prayed to Jupiter, to all the gods of her faith, that the girl would not continue, for the beast was just about to break out. Still Natsuki went on, heedless of her companion's unspoken prayers-and the first word that issued from her mouth after the pause sent the beast into a howl.

"Takeda-"

The last shreds of self-control left in Shizuru snapped and she shot up, the beast moving her clawed hands. She seized the girl's arms and gripped them so tightly that she felt the muscles beneath the thick fabric of the shirt tighten in protest, felt the agonised spasm of flesh being held far too tight.

" Do not say it!" she said angrily, her eyes so wild that she could hardly see the girl's face before her. "Never do that! Never say his name!"

She said this while shaking the girl, looming over her on the bed. Natsuki simply stared back in silence, apparently dumbfounded. The older woman was practically crushing her arms, fingers digging deep into the flesh, and yet the girl made no move to counter the assault. She simply looked into the angry crimson eyes, watching the slow trickle of excitement draining from the older woman.

"Do not," Shizuru muttered, now more quietly. "Natsuki."

Natsuki continued to watch with those eyes of hers, still not struggling.

"Natsuki."

Shizuru shut her eyes in an effort to clear her head. Everything had become tangled up there, threads of reason drawn into a tightly-spinning bundle that made her feel off-kilter: not herself, yet more truly herself than usual. So vaguely remembered, this sensation . It was a feeling of baring oneself, of becoming suddenly and all-too-mortally vulnerable. A feeling she hardly ever experienced anymore.

It almost hurts.

"Ahh."

She opened her eyes at the little sound.

Natsuki.

They were so close. She realised it when Natsuki's open-mouthed breaths made her lips tingle, and drew her eyes downward to the girl's mouth. It seemed to taunt her. But it was such a beautiful mouth. It was no surprise, seeing it this way, that it could make every word slipping from it seem beautiful as well. Every name.

Perhaps even Takeda Masashi's.

Something inside her cried out at the thought, and the man's words came rushing back.

She doesn't belong to you!

Everything she was feeling convulsed tightly in reaction, her growl hardly audible as her arms tightened, flexing so quickly the girl had no time to pull away.

My Natsuki.

Her body tingled, soaking in the moment with a wild and desperate thirst. It was as if allowing the beast to come out had heightened her perceptions so far that each sense became drunk on feeling, revelling in the offering of sensations like Bacchante tearing through the land that was her body. Her eyes had shut to accommodate the delicious intoxication and her entire consciousness focused on wrapping around the girl's lips, over which were her own.

She is my Natsuki after all.

She tightened her grip further at the thought and felt the sleek heat beneath those dark clothes, the warmth of the flesh underneath them so much more real than any other's. She could even feel the body of the younger woman stiffening, suddenly frozen in shock and yet not pushing her away. Yes, the body was stiff, but the lips were soft-so gloriously soft-and they moved against hers, teasing her mouth. She pushed against them, forcing her tongue into that soft opening... and it seemed almost as though those lips trembled against hers.

But, no, they were not trembling, were they? They could not be. Natsuki was not the kind to tremble. That body never trembled, and that mouth could not be otherwise.

No, Shizuru thought, drunk on the feel of those lips on her own. They do not tremble, for Natsuki does not tremble. Natsuki is steadfast, and Natsuki is mine. Yet Natsuki's lips seemed to be moving in an attempt to say something, and she did not know what that was. Could it be protest? Could Natsuki be trying to protest against what she was doing to her? But what was she doing to her? Ye gods, what was she doing to her?

Her reason, that formerly ever-present thing, returned in that pitiless flash and she released the girl in an abrupt movement. She even pushed Natsuki away with her hands and drew back, shaken by her own actions.

Oh god, what have I done?

"Na-Natsuki."

She cringed after having said the name, afraid to look at the girl. That legendary boldness of hers seemed to have vanished into thin air, abandoning her just as reason seemed to have abandoned her a few moments ago when she had taken the Otomeian's lips by force. Would it-her daring -return as cruelly in the future as it had vanished just now, then? Would it choose to let her do another awful thing just before it came back, making the act even worse by its late but oh-so-close return?

"I am so... Oh, Natsuki!"

She finally summoned the strength to look at the girl and found Natsuki rigid with shock, one hand over her mouth-that mouth that had just been violated-and her eyes wide, brighter than ever before.

Oh, no, no, Natsuki.

Shizuru winced when she met those eyes, noting the odd shimmer that flickered in their alarmingly green depths. What was it in them that shone so brilliantly? What was that emotion? She started to lift her hand towards the girl, but stopped herself.

Fear?

The girl stifled a sound that was caught between being a choke and a whimper, and Shizuru felt it hit her like a flagellated whip. Was this what it felt to be on the receiving end of the lash, then? Was this what the defendants in the courts felt when they received the verdict condemno ?

"Forgive me. "

The whisper fled from her lips so quickly she was hardly conscious of having uttered it.

"Please forgive me," Shizuru whispered again. "Natsuki."

And again the stillness in the accursed room, the only sound from the girl being those ragged, frightened breaths.

"I... Please, Natsuki."

She mumbled out the anguished pleas, repeating them with frantic desperation as she recoiled from the memory of what she had done. But she could not shut it out, try as she might, for it remained tingling in her lips, against her fingers, on her tongue-but most of all, in Natsuki's large, wet eyes.

"Forgive me, Natsuki. I did not intend to hurt you. Truly."

Her own pleas seemed so shoddy, so shamefully feeble to her ears. She finally rose from the bed, almost reeling in her haste, and took a stumbling step away. She drew her regret about her like a pitifully transparent and tattered cloak, and she found she could not hide in it.

"I am so sorry."

Hatred for herself welled up in her chest.

"Please forgive me," she whispered, finally, before turning around and rushing towards the door.

She fled from the room and from those accusing, emerald-green eyes.

Chapter 18

Thank you to the readers and reviewers. A quick note, since someone recently reminded that many classical expressions of language are now not so well-known: whenever a word in boldface in the "Vocabulaire" section of a chapter is followed by the bracketed initials "s.v.", it means "sub verbo". Those familiar with classical tomes and the older encyclopaedias know this: it signifies that there is an entry for the preceding word (the one in boldface) in the same text of definitions or explanations-in this case, in the given "Vocabulaire" for the chapter.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. In suo anno - In literal translation: "in his year". This was a Roman expression referring to a man's achieving curule (i.e. praetorian or consular) office at the exact age and time prescribed by the law. A great distinction, since it not only implied adherence to the mos maiorum (s.v.) but also the possession of clout, given that it meant the person had to have won the praetorian or consular election on his very first attempt to run for office.
2. " Before the Republic " - A reference to the earlier parts of Rome's (Hime's) history, when there were still kings/titled aristocrats instead of elected officials.
3. Comitia - Also called Assembly, a gathering of the People to deal with political matters, it took place in the place called the Well of the Comitia, near the Senate's Hall. Assemblies were often called to discuss legislation to be passed.

In this chapter, the specific type of comitia convoked is the Plebeian Assembly, which is distinctive in that it could only be called by a tribune of the plebs and allowed only plebeians to participate. Patricians could not join the assembly and often had to wait for it to finish before finding out from their plebeian acquaintances what had taken place. For other patricians with privileged vantage points

(such as the patrician senators, who could watch the proceedings from the Curia/senate steps, which overlooked the Well of the Comitia), they could listen to and watch what was happening, but never address or interrupt the assembly.

4. Mos maiorum - The established custom, tradition; the way things had always been done and "should" always be done, according to the conservatives or the "Traditionalists".

5. Mnemosyne - Personification of memory; also mother of the Muses.

6. Corona obsidionalis - Also corona graminea ; highest Roman decoration for valour in battle, extremely rare and thus extremely prized. Won only by 8 Ancient Romans (7 Himeans in this story) in history; Augustus Caesar's is exempted because it was not actually won but given to him instead by Senate for imperial pandering (the true corona obsidionalis has to be won in battle and granted by the army for it to mean something).

"That arrogant bitch, Fujino, is behind this. You can be sure of it!"

The contemptuous exclamation made Yukino Kikukawa pause in what she had been about to say and her steps slowed as she and her two companions turned the corner. A light frown crossed her brow and she gave the man who had spoken a slightly reproachful look.

"That could be, Akagi-san, but please don't say it like that," she murmured, voice gentle even in rebuke. "Please refrain from saying such things so loudly. We're not in a place where we can keep from being overheard."

Jin Akagi huffed heavily, lowering his voice nonetheless. "But I'm sure if it."

"All the same," said the other man with them. "It's still a little dangerous to say it like that in public, Akagi-san. Yukino-san has a point."

Yukino smiled at the speaker.

"Thank you, Kazuya-san," she said, with a slight tilt of her head towards that worthy. "To tell you the truth, I do agree with Akagi-san. I'm sure Fujino-san knows something about this that we don't. Doesn't she always? But it's a little too reckless to be passing judgment on it this early, especially when we're still in the Curia and could be overheard."

Akagi made a face, obviously not relishing having his mates put a damper on the rant he had been working up.

"This reeks of her, though," he mumbled with his usual persistence, casting furtive glances around them. There was no one else nearby save the three of them, however, so he went on with a vaguely vindicated expression. "It's a little too timely. Just when we finally manage to pull out her fangs in the House, that tribune of the plebs Izumi reaches into his toga and pulls out a motion legislating a second nomination period for the elections! Oh, too well-timed!"

"But Akagi-san," Kazuya interjected, "aren't you being a little too paranoid, maybe? I never thought-and still don't think, honestly-that Kaneda Izumi-san is Fujino-san's man. If anything, he's Himemiya-san's."

He paused to adjust a fold in his toga, and went on: "True, Himemiya-san and Fujino-san are friends, but I don't think Fujino-san actually had anything to do with this."

The other man grunted, rolling his eyes heavenward.

"I know that," he snapped. "But it's you who's being too innocent, Kazuya! Haven't you thought of the possibility that Fujino might come all the way back here just to announce her own candidacy for praetor, eh? That'd be a fine step for the woman!"

Yukino chose this point in the conversation to sigh, patting her unruly mane down with one hand. One brow lifted as she realised that it was getting too long again. How troublesome it was to have springy hair! Already she could feel it starting to frizzle this way and that, and she gave another sigh at the thought that she would have to see her hairdresser later. Too troublesome, really, but still necessary. She was a candidate, after all, and she had to keep up her best form for the public.

Besides which would be Haruka-chan, she tacked on to that thought, an image of the senior consul's irritated face coming to mind. She'd give me a good lecture if she knew I was being sloppy with my appearance.

"I think that particular action is very unlikely, Akagi-san," she ventured. "Let's give her credit where it's due. Shizuru-san would hardly abandon a venture such as the one she was given in the north. I think that it's Chikane-san who wants to take advantage of the law by running for consul. It is her man passing that bill."

She stopped to give the two men a helpless shrug before folding both arms across her waist. The three of them had ceased walking, standing in an alcove at the end of the hall and facing each other.

"That wouldn't be so surprising," she continued. "It's in suo anno, after all. So it's a logical step for her, since she's the outgoing urban praetor, although I did have my doubts about it since I thought she might consider getting a province first before running for consul. But then, well, I suppose she doesn't need to."

This last remark was received with a chuckle from Kazuya and a grunt of dry amusement from Akagi. Both of them understood what Yukino meant: most politicians strove to acquire governorship of a province after reaching praetorian office before actually running for consul, for the simple reason that governing a province offered a fantastic opportunity to make money that could be put away for the future or used as seed money for campaigning for the consulship. Since the Himemiya were ludicrously rich, however, there was no need for their most prominent member to seek a governorship.

"I concur with Yukino-san," Kazuya spoke up. "Actually, I'm pretty surprised. I thought she'd wait for Fujino-san to be eligible for candidacy as a consular nominee before being one herself. I mean, the two of them running in tandem is a sure win, and we all know how thick they are. But I guess she has her own plans that can't wait."

Yukino eyed him discreetly after his comment, smiling inwardly at his-in her opinion-rather naïve words. She did not let on about her estimation of his remark, however, and merely made a noncommittal sound. He smiled easily back at her in response, even as she continued to assess him privately.

He's nice-looking man, she thought, after scrutiny. But a little plain, to be honest. Perhaps that was even the reason for his being nice-looking: his unremarkable plainness. He was a man of regular height, with a pleasant, smooth face and a slight build. All too average, if agreeable, for him to stand out in either the crowd or on the senate floor. Even the personality was rather lacklustre: affable but uninspiring, and on the whole, much like the rest of him.

Indeed, the only thing that stood out in him was his name.

The Kurauchi were one of the oldest families in Hime, on par with the Himemiya and Fujino for sheer ancestry if not for supposed divine heritage: still, they also dated back to the days before the Republic. As such, they were among the most imposing of the Famous Families, among the noblest ones, in fact. Their name carried with it immense clout, and their family was considered one of the pillars of the Traditionalists, to which faction the members of the clan had always belonged. Kazuya being the latest scion of the broodhad, he adhered to convention by joining the conservative bloc as well, lending it as did his predecessors the grandeur of his family's prestige.

And that's all he really lends to us, Yukino thought ruefully. Oh, and money too, yes, but that's not really what we need from him. It would have been so much more helpful to their cause if he had been outspoken, productive, a true and seasoned politician as his uncle and father before him. Now there had been two stalwart pillars of the Traditionalists! Always speaking for and defending the mos maiorum ! How many times had she heard Haruka use them as exemplars for present-day statesmen? And, of course, for Kazuya too, although that bore little fruit given the man's patent difference of temperament from his antecedents.

But I guess we can't all be politicians, she thought guiltily, almost ashamed of her criticisms. He was really ever so nice, after all, and tried his best. It was not his fault he was not of the same mettle as his elders. Blood did not always determine talent, even if it did standing.

Although, her mind reminded here unpleasantly, there was Shizuru Fujino, was there not? And, yes, Chikane Himemiya, or even Sergay Wang, or Haruka herself, and of course the Princeps Senatus. What of them? But she really should not make such comparisons! More sensible to simply accept whom one had in one's ranks, and work with that. Yes, that was the proper way. Particularly for her.

Haruka-chan is the one who handles the complaints, she thought with good humour. She does that well enough for both of us. There was no need for Yukino to express regret or carp on about the weaknesses in their group when her friend did it so well for both of them-with Olympic prowess, as a matter of fact.

Yukino's task was to make do with what they had, to be the more practically-oriented one. Which suited her well, given that it meant she could be silent and be forced to offer opinions less frequently, so long as she did her part and let her friend handle the verbal matters. It did mean she was listened to less often when she spoke, but she supposed she could change that with a little work. It would have to change soon, since she was running for consul. Haruka told her as much, and she could not let Haruka down. That was something she never wanted to happen, she was sure.

Although she was still not sure yet that she really wanted to be a consul.

A question addressed to her cut off her ruminations, and she turned an apologetic smile to the inquirer, Kazuya.

"I said it looks like the bill will go through, though," he said to her softly, forgivingly. "If Himemiya-san does run, how do you feel about that, Yukino-san?"

She gave him a small grin, amused by his suddenly cautious way of asking how she felt about the indisputable fact that Chikane Himemiya would be winning the place of senior consul if that bill did indeed go through—which was, as they all knew, very likely going to be the case. This meant that their hopes for Yukino to come in as senior consul would be dashed. Furthermore, it also meant that Haruka's nemesis, Shizuru Fujino, would have an even more powerful ally in the House than any of them had been prepared for. What a situation! How would Haruka feel about it? That was easy: Haruka would definitely not be pleased.

And I? she wondered. How do I really feel about it?

"It does make me a little apprehensive about some issues," she said tentatively, choosing to be as politic as possible. "But I guess it can't be helped. And Himemiya-san is a very capable person, so it could turn out quite well, I think."

"Yes, I have to admit that," Kazuya returned. "Oh, hello there!"

Yukino turned to the newcomer already being approached by Akagi, whose arms were outstretched to welcome the man. She recognised immediately the Mentulæan prince—the one leading the deputation that had been staying in Hime ever since the departure of the Fujino Campaign. Unlike some other members of his entourage, this prince opted for Himean dress, but this did not make him any less strange a sight. In fact, his appearance often made people pause and take a second look, for he was one of those they called an albino.

She came forward and greeted the man, feeling, as she always did, a little wary in his presence. Something shifty in the pinkish eyes with their sly upturn at the corners, something untrustworthy in his smile, which had a hint of what she fancied to be malice. Oh, not that he actually had the look of a villain: his features were actually fairly handsome in their own foreign way, suitably prince-like, even—but Yukino still could not escape the nagging feeling every time they met that she was speaking to some white, overgrown weasel.

Or perhaps I'm being too insular, she thought, offering him a bright smile as if to make amends for her thoughts. He is sympathetic to our faction, anyway. But do I really trust sympathies from foreign princes whose brothers battle with our armies?

Yes, there was the matter of his brother having attacked Argentum, after all. Even if he insisted that he and his father the king had nothing to do with the "rash" actions of the defeated Prince Artaxi, it did not change the fact that Chie Harada's accounts also told of King Obsidian's having nearly opened war on Shizuru Fujino, which would have meant opening war with Hime. Oh, yes, Prince Nagi explained it away as a possible misunderstanding, laughing it off as one of his father's odd shifts of temper. But war was still the prerogative of kings in those lands and hence as subject to a king's temper as to more convoluted turns of politics.

Whatever the case, Yukino thought, looking at the man. I don't trust him.

"Prince Nagi," she said, timidly letting go of the hand he had offered to her. "How goes it with you? What brings you here, to the senate?"

He grinned and two very thin lines carved into the pale skin beside his mouth.

"I thought I would watch the comitia," he explained in his faintly nasal voice. He spoke Himean, of course: all the Mentulaeans did, even if they had perceptible differences in cant and accent. "Interesting, that new proposal-the one for a supplementary nomination period for candidates. It seems well-received."

Yukino's eyebrows lifted: so the prince was watching their politics?

"Yes," she said, barely able to suppress her suspicion. "It does."

"Unfortunately for us," Akagi commented dryly, seeming to be restraining himself from saying something more damning. He settled for adding, with a mutter: "But not for Fujino."

Kazuya and Yukino let out simultaneous sighs.

"Oh?" Nagi said, his ears almost perking up under his shaggy white hair. "You think that the General Shizuru Fujino has something to do with this?"

Yukino's warning glance to Akagi was for naught as the man nodded, launching into diatribe.

"I'd say so," Akagi muttered, half-growling with excitement as he perceived a sympathetic ear. "Himemiya'll be the one running, but it's Fujino who'll be calling the shots, I tell you. You ought to be concerned too, Prince! If those two get any say in it, you won't be getting that peace treaty you're suing for. It'll be war and campaigns up North, all the way!"

Nagi fluttered his fair lashes, putting on a look of faint and obviously theatrical dismay.

"Ah, no," he said. "That would be very disappointing."

"Don't worry, Nagi-san," Yukino said, quickly interrupting before Akagi could say anything more. "I don't think Akagi-san's fears are likely to be realised. I for one think that Fujino-san has little-if anything!-to do with this. Himemiya-san, even if she does become consul, is fair in her own right. Your desired treaty is in no danger as far as her impartiality and judgment is concerned."

Nagi looked at her appraisingly. Yukino's skin crawled in reaction, even as she nodded to reassure him. She could see his hand playing with the golden band on his wrist-a thick, intricately-worked bracelet that drew many a fortune-hungry politician's eye and which would probably see him killed in a mugging were he to set foot on the streets without the bodyguards currently standing behind him. To Yukino, the ornament was garish. She hardly spared it a second glance.

"If Yukino Kikukawa says it, then it must be so," Nagi finally said, smiling brightly at the three senators. "Now may I invite the three of you to my place for dinner? It would make me so happy to have such illustrious people-and defenders of the mos maiorum, too!-at my table."

Yukino shifted, aware that she would have to accept his offer for the sake of diplomacy though she little cared to dine with the man. "At my table" might just translate to "on my table" here, she thought, watching her companions' reactions to the invitation. She could already see that Akagi was accepting, as well as Kazuya. But what could one expect from them? One too reckless, the other too naïve. And what about her? Was she, perhaps, too wary?

"Kikukawa-san?"

They were waiting, and she knew what she had to say.

The things you have to suffer for politics!

"Of course, Prince Nagi."

The Mentulæan prince beamed, ushering his guests along the corridor with overdone happiness. They talked all the while of banal things: the weather, the present state of the economy, even of the vagaries of Himean culture. They were already out in the street and talking about culinary matters when Nagi suddenly returned to the subject of Izumi's law and Shizuru Fujino.

"I just thought of it," he said, opening his oddly-coloured eyes wide-eyes that seemed like washed-out parodies of Shizuru Fujino's, to Yukino. "If the General Fujino is actually aware of this, then is it not possible she will return to Hime to try and run in the elections?"

Akagi grinned at him.

"I thought that too, Nagi-san!" he uttered. "You see what I mean, eh?"

Yukino interjected.

"No," she said firmly, bringing the men's eyes to her. "No, I really don't think that's going to happen. For one thing, her campaign is not yet officially over, and she'd come under sanctions for abandoning it just for the elections. She wouldn't do that, I can assure you."

Kazuya nodded, looking at her.

"For what it's worth, I agree with Yukino-san," he said. "Fujino-san is definitely not the type to do such a thing. She'd never up and leave her legions for that."

Akagi scowled and looked away while Nagi seemed to ponder the matter.

"I see," he said, at length. "You would know, of course."

He tilted his head in tacit acquiescence, before going on to say: "She is considered one of your best generals, is she not? I have heard so much about her and her doings! From what I hear, she is most capable."

"That's so," Yukino said, noting Akagi's grumble to the side. "No one can deny that, Prince. So she's also one of our most trustworthy."

"I see, I see. Maybe the great General Fujino is unaware of this, as you say. I would think she has her hands full in the north, and not just in dealing with whatever troubles my fool of a renegade brother has drummed up for both our nations. She has, I suppose, much to do there still? She must be having a bit of trouble, from what I've heard from the other senators."

Yukino and Kazuya nodded, the irony not lost on them that it was a Mentulaeen speaking about the travails of the Fujino campaign. Akagi, however, simply sneered and turned a sarcastic smile to the company.

"Oh, sure!" he spat, shaking his head disgustedly. "That woman has damned good luck! I'll bet she's having the time of her life right now!"

---

Shizuru Fujino was almost delirious. Only moments ago, she had run from her own room. The flight had taken her all the way to the grounds, and it was even with some surprise that she now noted her surroundings, eyebrows lifting as she finally identified where she was.

The gardens.

The gubernatorial residence's estate was very large, and the gardens could almost be considered a maze. Had the governor not led her through them before, she might well have spent time in simply cataloguing the twists and turns of the walls of trimmed bushes and plant-boxes. Yet she had somehow reached the very centre of the gardens in her dash away from the manor. She did not even recall her progress to this point, and that made her wonder at her own state of distraction.

"How did I get here?" she murmured, gazing about confusedly. Turning her eyes forward, she saw a monstrous shadow before her and would have taken a step back in reflex had she not apprehended what the silhouette was: an enormous blackwood tree, its leafless boughs branching and reaching up towards the sky. The flaky bark sparkled with frost, catching the radiance that was coming from the blazing torches of the mansion.

Remarkable how the glow reaches all the way here, she observed, noting that the same distant illumination seemed reflected by the snow-covered surroundings. No doubt this was the reason she had been able to make it this far this late at night, even with no torches in the immediate area. She took a moment to study the scene around her, staring at the desolate and frozen place with burning eyes.

Everything was so white: so perfectly, innocently white.

Perhaps even too white, she decided. Too pure and untainted, a world complacent in its spotlessness. And this such a sharp contrast to what was suddenly rising up, churning again in her heart that it almost offended her.

Ah, no, not this again.

But it was returning: a perfectly outlined, flawlessly vivid reminiscence of what had happened in her bedroom. It lay like a mural against the cold canvas of snow, and little though she wished it, her memory invoked every detail with its usual precision: her quarrel with Takeda, the retirement to the bedroom, the persistence of her irritation, even the kiss itself.

"Not that..."

She exhaled and it steamed the air, the slow hiss like the sound of a brand on skin. She was remembering the kiss now- if such a desecration of person could be called a kiss, she added-and beat one closed fist against her thigh in sudden impulse. She noted the action dully, wondering at how even her own body had turned against her.

It was an odd thing for someone always in control of herself. Odd and traitorous.

It only feels what I feel, she explained. It feels the shame. Her body felt and knew it, and simply reacted by trying to beat the accursed thing out. Just as she knew it and felt her will double over in spastic regret.

That, too, was an odd thing: the regret .

It was not that she was completely unaccustomed to feeling it. Rather, it was because she was unaccustomed to feeling it with such-what was the word? Depth? The regret hammering at her heart now was unfamiliar to her, so strong that it seemed she had never been this grieved by anything else, had never felt such disgrace on account of her own actions. And this might well be the case, for she had never truly given herself cause to do so in the past, nor allowed herself opportunity to dwell over anything approaching a cause. But this time was different. This seemed to sear the shame into her, and she felt the dreadfulness of repentance like never before.

But she was being arrogant again, was she not, in thinking about such things? What was that they said about Shizuru Fujino never making mistakes? Whatever it was, it was certainly proven false now. Here was an utter mistake, and the shame that should come with it. For if one made mistakes-particularly ones of such a magnitude as this-then one could undoubtedly feel shame.

How awful it is, she noted dismally. Almost overpowering.

She supposed that what made it worse-what branded the mortification deeper-was the knowledge that part of her did not share in that same regret that should have overwhelmed all of her being. It should have, by rights, yet it did not. Even as that terrible regret licked at her heart, she could feel a contrary sensation in the same place, a feeling of having taken pleasure in what she had wrought. That part seemed to spite her repentance, gloating and bringing back the sweetness of the prize she had taken with her reckless act earlier. It returned to her the heady pleasure of that velvety, liquid sensation of kissing the Otomeian's lips, even as it rang hot and scandalous in her mind.

The human being is a treacherous one, she mused. For every part of us that steps forth, another moves back or goes the other way.

There was the shameful thing: the consciousness of the act's reprehensibility did not in the least dull the delight she had taken in it.

"Damn!"

She groaned and struck out with a hand, her palm meeting the scarred bark of the tree with a dull smack. She leaned on that hand and pressed her eyelids insistently together as she attempted to do away with the recollection of her actions, to do away with the spectre of memory. She nearly laughed at that thought, even in her anguish. A mere woman trying to drive away Mnemosyne?

A low mumble, half-amused and perfectly sarcastic: "Of all the idiotic things to do..."

Who would even think of driving away Mnemosyne, who was even stronger than Death? Oh, she was just full of sensibility tonight! She had to shake her head at the futility of that idea. Even Death was far stronger than her, after all, for all that she was one of that divinity's agents when on the battlefield. If even the mistress could not defeat the enemy, then surely there was no point in the servant attempting to do the same.

A weary sigh escaped her lips, condensing into sad and sluggish drops in the air.

Yes, she thought with resignation. Driving Mnemosyne away is impossible. She should have learned that by now. Besides which, what could she even gain if she succeeded in the endeavour? What would she achieve if she forgot what had happened, anyway? What happened was a fixed thing: it was done, and that was all. That was all.

"Yes, all."

She doubted she would ever be able to forget what she had done, no matter how hard she tried. Not when she felt this powerfully about it. She supposed, even, that she would never forget.

Nor, perhaps, would Natsuki.

The latter thought brought her forehead crashing to the tree as she let out another stifled groan. Not for the pain of the coarse wood digging into her brow! That thing digging into her chest was far more palpable, and it defeated the other sensation. She could not even feel the chill of the evening wearing on, for her body-as well as her mind-seemed to be burning too much to allow that balm to the flushed heat of her skin.

"Ye gods, forgive me."

Her bodyguard's face came to mind as she uttered these words, and another burst of heat snapped inside her breast.

How could I have done that to her?

She hung her head, still leaning against the tree as remorse rode her with a whip. Each lash spurred on the remembrance, each recollection like a heavy-handed blow as she spared herself no discomfort in her sorrow. She took the reminiscence and beat her breast with it, as though trying to degrade herself further in the face of her self-censure.

To think I had the temerity to be so high-handed before, she thought, returning to Takeda and their quarrel-that accursed thing, which began all of this. Even now it continued to feed the flame as she thought of their words to each other, words where she had argued for something that her actions contradicted later on. What a perfect hypocrite she was turning out to be! It drove her mad to think it, but there was an odd sort of satisfaction in hurting herself this way too.

To think I was so superior on that point, when it turns out I am no better than he!

She lifted her palm from the trunk and returned it as a fist. It made contact with a smack, sending a faint flush of warmth spreading out from her knuckles. She ignored it, still caught up in the memories as well as the self-condemnation.

A verdict: I am even worse than that man.

She repeated the action, throwing even more weight behind the blow. Bark broke off from the wood as she struck and snow powdered onto her shoulders, but all of it was lost on her. She merely redoubled her efforts at punishing the wood, imagining a face in the knots and whorls in the grain.

But she did not know whether the face she was imagining was that of the swordsman or her own.

I told him he was not worthy of her . She had been so adamant on that point, had she not? And now she was even less worthy of the girl than he. Oh, indeed, how perfect it all was! Perhaps she should appreciate the irony.

Just perhaps.

Now she could feel the faint sting where her knuckles had skinned up, but it was nothing to the sting in her chest. Again and again she punched, wounding both the wood and herself with steady, unflinching determination.

And still she could not stop repining.

I am not worthy of her after what I have done .

A sheen of red broke out on the bark, where she had been striking it. But whose blood, that of the tree or hers?

I am not worthy even to be protected by her.

Again another blow, so strong that some of the branches above her head quivered and sent a bitter rain of icicles and frost onto her head.

I am not worthy-yet I still want her!

She threw her hand at the tree with a snarl. This time her fist met a jagged scar in the trunk-no doubt the remnant of a low branch that some gardener had cut off ages ago-and blood spattered out as the abused knuckles split on the knotted bark. She hissed and uttered a short oath to the great god, eyeing the back of her hand. Two sluggish rivulets of crimson bled from it.

Looking at the blood, she felt her lips pulling into a smirk.

Serves you right, Fujino.

She shook her head, still wearing that farcical half-smile, and flung the same fist at the trunk once again. The resultant pain made her grit her teeth a little, but not enough to make the corners of her mouth drop.

Yes indeed, she told herself viciously. Serves you right.

But it was not enough, still could not divert enough of the pain hacking away at her breast. She readied herself to throw another punch, thinking that she would break the bones of her hand if she had to, just to take away even a little of the ache in her heart.

Because that latter ache was far too unbearable.

She was about to strike again when something hit the back of her head, scattering over her shoulders. She jerked in surprise, slowly realising what had hit her as a heavy clump of something cool and wet fell onto her unhurt hand, even while she whirled to face her attacker.

Snow?

Her mind made the identification just as she turned fully around and saw the last person she had expected to see. Or perhaps the first-did it really matter?

Natsuki?

She opened her mouth, suddenly stumbling over syllables that should have been easy at any other time.

"Natsu-what?"

Her mind was only a little more articulate than her tongue.

Since when did she-?

She was staring dumbly at the new arrival now, having difficulty seeing the latter's expression in the dim light. She could see, however, the puffs steaming from the younger woman's mouth, coming in harsh regularity as if the girl had just been running. Perhaps she had been running? But why would she do that; was something the matter with her? Was she all right? Oh, of course she was not all right!

Remember what you did to her!

Shizuru winced at that, groaning to herself. Here was a confrontation she did not know how to handle, for all her famed skill with defusing situations of high tension. Though words of apology were still on the tip of her tongue, the humiliation of it all was suddenly choking her throat. What to do? What to say? Better not to say anything!

Yet I have so much to tell her.

She sent the girl a beseeching look, hoping that could substitute for the words she wished so much to speak. As she could not see the girl's face, however, she had no idea how it was received. All she could hope for was a sound, so she waited-and in vain.

Natsuki was not talking to her.

And that, she told herself, trying to ignore the insistent twinge in her heart, serves you right too.

She had a sudden desire to fidget, something she hardly ever did. But that was merely because she had never felt this uncomfortable before. The silence, she felt, was too intrusive, too rudely imposing. Someone had to talk, and given that one of the two was Natsuki, it was fairly certain it would not be that one.

Besides which, Natsuki did not deserve this silence from her.

So, you talk, the older woman commanded herself. Break the silence, or suffer it.

"Ah..." Shizuru began, about to say the girl's name but faltering before she could begin to get it out. She was afraid to say it. How could she even say that name, after all, given what she had done, given the trust she had broken? But she could not simply stand there and not address the girl, not say anything. She had to talk, because that was better than the silence right now.

A dangerous thing, but one had to try it. So she tried again.

"Na-" she started, only to find that her tongue was thick and sluggish. "I am..."

Again, try again.

"Oh god, Natsu-"

She broke off as the girl suddenly started walking towards her, still panting bursts of steam into the air. The unexpected movement caught her off guard, and it was all she could do to watch and hope for a glimpse of her expression. It took only a few steps before the girl was close enough for Shizuru to finally get a view of her face.

The sight took all of the seasoned general's nerve not to step back in surprise.

She looks so threatening.

That was remarkable, since Shizuru was usually immune to postures of intimidation. Something about Natsuki now, however, seemed to break through her usual steel. What was it about the young woman? Shizuru studied her carefully, noticing that it was not precisely the thunder of Natsuki's expression that made her feel so menaced. Even that thunder was all too luminous to be considered truly frightening, she saw, for Natsuki's beauty shone through the distortions of her countenance: the dramatic green eyes, darkening with emotion; the slightly flared nostrils; the succulent mouth parted and issuing mist, white teeth visible within; the way the eyebrows slanted together into a still-girlish scowl.

All of it was too lovely to be truly frightening.

Natsuki continued to come forward, her silky strides closing the distance. And the closer she came, the better Shizuru could see and study her expression.

Another step: green eyes flashing catlike in the dim light.

There, that's it!

Shizuru watched her with fascination, coming to recognise just what it was in the girl that had given the sense of a threat. It was the poise, the predatory way in which she moved forward that menaced and intimidated, even as her face drew you in.

Now she was coming even closer, dark hair whipping behind her in a sudden gust of wind.

"Ahh."

There was something both calming and agitating about the girl's movements. Each step carries a dreadful finality to it, Shizuru thought, exhaling anxiously and still waiting for this human panther to reach her and perhaps take out its fury on her body. Yes, Natsuki seemed furious with her-as she should be-and yet, there was something in that fury that seemed a little strange. There was some other emotion in that agitated face, something Shizuru could not name. She wracked her brain for it, even as the girl came steadily closer.

What is it? Is it hurt?

Natsuki kept walking, a small twitch in her left eyebrow becoming visible at this distance.

It should be hurt.

She was only a few feet away now, and would stop her advance soon.

Yes, hurt. But what else?

Abruptly, Shizuru realised that Natsuki had continued her approach until she was standing a mere foot away, instead of the few feet the older woman had expected. The surprising proximity stole the breath from her chest as she made a meaningless sound.

"Oh."

Her body was tensing, she recognised, reacting instinctively to the provocative presence before it. The memory of her self-censure dictated that she should be repelled by this, and should back away, yet it also said that she should stay and receive her punishment, whatever it would be. She wondered, somewhat distractedly, if the girl would slap her.

She steeled herself and tried to bring her eyes to meet those brilliant green ones she had come to know so well and which were surely glaring at her. The very moment she looked up, however, Natsuki eluded her by dropping to kneel.

"Natsuki!"

The name left her mouth before she could stop it. She was about to fall to her knees as well, to see what was the matter, but then she felt a hand taking her own. The touch reminded her of the injuries she had brought upon herself earlier, but even that momentary pain was relegated to the background when the girl suddenly spoke.

The sound of her voice made Shizuru release a breath she had not been aware of holding.

"You-oh," Natsuki began, stopping to click her tongue as she studied the older woman's wounds with what seemed to be barely restrained irritation. She blew through her nose before going on to say a single word, her inflection making it clear she was thoroughly displeased:

" Silly. "

Shizuru's eyebrows shot up at this statement, which had been far from what she was expecting. Her brows climbed even higher at the sensation of something cold being pressed into her wounds: Natsuki was rubbing snow into them, doing it so gently it seemed almost like a pleasant caress.

Almost.

She had a sense of anticlimax. But she could hardly do more than watch as her wounds were cleaned by her bodyguard, who seemed hell-bent on ignoring her amazed expression. Something in Shizuru was steeped in relief at what was happening, and yet there was something in her too that cried out in shame. Hence she let this go on for a while and remained mute before the girl's attentions. But when she felt cloth wrap around her knuckles-the cloth being the bandage Natsuki had unwrapped from her own hand-she finally collected enough strength to speak, albeit rather shakily.

"Natsuki," she whispered, giving the girl a confused-and, she was aware, faintly panicked-look. Still, there was no helping it, particularly when Natsuki was not only holding her hand so gently but suddenly staring up at her with those unsettling eyes.

Shizuru took a deep breath: "What are you-"

Natsuki shook her head, cutting her off.

What are you doing?

The girl rose to her feet, took Shizuru's arm, and tugged at it gently to indicate that they should go. This was a sensible proposition, of course, since it was getting colder by the moment and Shizuru had only a tunic on, besides now having wounds that required tending. But the older woman was so staggered by everything right then that she could only give Natsuki another searching glance. It took a few more tugs before the girl finally deigned to speak and persuade her to leave.

"Cold," Natsuki said gruffly, furrowing her brow. "We will go back."

She tugged on Shizuru's arm again.

"Shizuru."

Whether either of them knew it or not, that name on her lips had been all the older woman was hoping for. Shizuru nodded at the girl, still feeling helplessly lost.

She let the Otomeian lead them away from that place. Natsuki did this quietly, saying nothing, and Shizuru followed suit. But for all that their progress was silent as that of a thief creeping into a house, the Himean's head was occupied by a cacophony of thoughts. Each step she took had her heart beating like a drum.

What is she doing, she wondered, glancing every now and then at Natsuki, who seemed to ignore her questioning looks with remarkable determination. Oh, why was Natsuki being like this? It would have been more eminently understandable if she had cursed Shizuru or something else to that effect. But this was so unexpected that it mystified the older woman completely. The girl was so difficult to read! Always had been, perhaps always would be. But that was part of what made her so interesting, after all, especially where Shizuru was concerned-that she could not read her with perfect ease. Hers was the allure of mysteries . All the same, Shizuru would have given anything to have that facility, at the moment: to know what Natsuki was thinking, to know what was going on in that lovely head of hers.

Even if what she found there might frighten her.

Do you hate me now, she thought, addressing the query silently to the girl holding her arm and walking a little ahead. Do you hate me so much that you will not even walk beside me anymore? But that did not make sense. Why would the girl even touch her, as she was doing now, if she hated her? Why would she even tend to her wounds that way?

She remembered Natsuki's face earlier: the anger in the eyes, and that other thing that she was still unsure of having identified, besides the worry, that thing so much like disappointment.

Disappointment? Ye gods, what an awful thought! Surely the anger was preferable, Shizuru decided with a grimace. To have truly disappointed someone in such a way-and to have the someone be a person for whom she felt so much-it was unbearable! Yes, anything but disappointment!

So caught up was she in her mental agony that she did not notice they had reached their room, alerted to it only by the sound of the door's bolt clicking into place. She almost started in surprise, staring at the familiar surroundings.

And remembering what had taken place there.

"Shizuru."

She turned to see Natsuki coming up to her, holding two bottles and a bundle of what seemed to be fresh white cloth in her hands. She motioned Shizuru to the bed.

Oh Jupiter, that bed.

Then Natsuki's cool voice reaching out to her again: "Sit. Please."

She obeyed meekly, trying to seat herself on the edge of the bed with as much dignity as she could muster. It was not very much at the moment, she well knew, given her sudden unease in this room, on this bed, before this girl-who was unwrapping the bandages from her hurt hand now, kneeling before her yet again.

When I should be the one kneeling before her, Shizuru thought, flushing red with chagrin.

"Natsuki."

The emerald eyes turned her way and she faltered. Natsuki chose to speak at that moment.

"It will hurt," she said, with a trace of-and this was so ironic as to be taunting-apology in the words. She lifted the wine bottle in her hand, obviously asking for permission to apply the liquor to the wounds. It was standard procedure for deep cuts so that they would not fester later on. But Shizuru had been so engrossed in her remorse that she nearly forgot about it. And now she was being reminded by none other than the one she had hurt a while ago, a criminal being looked after by her own victim. Oh, this was a day of ironies, indeed!

A small mumble interrupted this self-laceration.

"Uhhh."

She looked down to find Natsuki, cheeks suddenly a little pink, still giving her that inquiring look. She was scowling and holding a now wine-soaked piece of linen. Shizuru could do nothing but nod, all too conscious of the hand holding her own so gently.

Too kind. Why is she being too kind?

When Natsuki began working at the wound, she felt her eyes water a little from the sting of the alcohol biting into her flesh. It was not enough to make her utter a sound, but it still hurt. Even through the pain, however, she could see that the girl was trying to be as tender as possible without sacrificing thoroughness.

Somehow, that hurt even more.

Once she had finished with the wine, Natsuki proceeded to soak another piece of cloth with liquid from the other bottle-which turned out to be water, as Shizuru expected. The girl then went over the wounds with the cloth once again, eyes intent on her task even as her patient's eyes were intent on her.

It was not until she began patting the water dry that Shizuru finally gathered enough courage to speak.

"Thank you, Natsuki," the older woman started, her voice quiet. "I am..."

She paused, aware that the girl's eyes were still focused on her hand. There was something in that which deterred her, made her a little afraid.

But I have to get it out.

"I am so sorry," she finally managed, whispering the words because her throat was in danger of closing yet again. "Truly, Natsu-"

"Do not."

She stopped, mouth falling shut at this interruption. Natsuki went on, still working at her wounds with that still-too-tender touch.

"Do not..."

The words slipped from Natsuki's lips, gentle yet unyielding. The girl had to huff before she could go on, and what she said next fell more heavily on Shizuru's breast than her ears.

"Do not... do that," she said quietly. "Again."

Shizuru had to repress a wince, for all that she had been expecting this. She shut her eyes, bowing her head in apology. She was about to say something when Natsuki went on.

"Do not do that, please," Natsuki whispered. "Leave."

Shizuru's eyes snapped open, staring at her with perplexity. Natsuki paused, still not looking back, and let out a small sigh as she reached for the strips of new linen beside her.

What does she mean, Shizuru wondered, unconsciously tensing all over. Does she want me to leave now?

When Natsuki began to wrap her hand in the fresh cloth, Shizuru finally asked the question aloud, privately cringing even as she spoke.

"What do you mean?" she asked, hearing the faint shiver in her voice. "Natsuki, what do you mean?"

She did not know what she expected. Perhaps an angry glare, perhaps indignation. Perhaps nothing at all. But whatever it was, she did not expect the worried, pleading look that Natsuki suddenly turned to her.

This, beneath a suddenly insignificant veneer of the wrath that had been there before.

"You-like that," the girl admonished, meeting her eyes with reproachful, forest-green ones. "Without me."

Shizuru stared at her as the girl struggled to get the words out more clearly.

"You do not leave without me."

Having said this, scarlet immediately swept the girl's cheeks as she dropped her eyes to the injured hand once again, valiantly attempting to look stern as she did. The frown gathering at her brow trembled, however, and did not fool the other woman in the least. Shizuru finally understood why something had seemed odd about the young woman's anger earlier-and having come to understand this, grew even more bewildered by it.

That-is that why she was angry?

"Natsuki?"

Natsuki said nothing, trying to finish wrapping the bindings on her charge's injuries. Her face was so close to Shizuru's hand that the older woman could feel the caress of the girl's breath on her exposed fingers. At any other time, it would have tantalised. In her present confusion, it provoked.

Is that all, she wondered uncomprehendingly, trying not to let on her agitation by clenching her hands. Was Natsuki not angry with her for what she did earlier? Was she not offended? How could that be?

How can she not be angry with me!

"Ahh."

The exhalation had come from Natsuki, who had apparently finished wrapping the wound. Shizuru watched the girl with rising puzzlement, saying nothing as the fury tightened like a coil in her throat. Something inside her was screaming, telling her this was all wrong and she had no right to be treated so kindly by Natsuki. Not after everything.

She should not be so kind even now, she told herself, feeling the pressure build up yet again. How could the girl be so gentle? How, when Shizuru had just abused her person that way? How could anyone ignore an insult such as that Shizuru had given?

Something in Shizuru could not accept it.

She should be angry with me!

When Natsuki looked up at her, she finally snapped.

"Why are you not angry with me!" she burst out, glaring at the girl.
"Why, Natsuki?"

Think of that offence!

"Think of what I have done!" she cried out, only vaguely aware that she was pleading now for the girl to hate her where she had been asking for forgiveness before. And yet the contradiction seemed irrelevant at the moment. "You have to-you should be angry with me, Natsuki! You must be!"

Natsuki continued to look up at her, watching with a wrinkled brow that Shizuru could not decipher.

"You are no mere slave!" the older woman whispered, her words sounding more like a plea than anything else. "Natsuki, you cannot and you should never-"

She was cut off by fingers on her lips.

"Mm."

Shizuru fell silent at the touch, unable to believe the girl still trusted her enough to touch her in such an intimate way. Calming, oddly so, yet perplexing too. As ever. She watched as Natsuki shook her head slightly, still looking up at her with that unreadable frown.

Always such an enigma.

Now Natsuki was kneeling up, lifting her behind from its seat on the backs of her legs so that her face moved higher and came nearer to Shizuru's. Another blush swept over her face like sunrise, and Shizuru watched it, fascinated by the way the stain of that colour seemed to make the lustre of her skin stand out all the more. She was so close, so close once again, and so terrifically stimulating that the older woman had to remind herself not to lean forward as her body ached to do.

"Ah..."

A small sound, like a half-formed word, escaped Natsuki's lips. Shizuru could clearly see-even almost hear-the sound of the girl's throat as it flexed, swallowing convulsively all the while.

Shizuru wondered what was going on.

She would have asked had it not been for Natsuki's fingers still on her lips, which tingled at the contact. But then the fingers left and moved to her cheek, rounding the bone.

What is she doing?

She was still wondering what was going on, and perhaps she might have wondered even more had it not been for the sight of Natsuki's lips, which trembled as if the girl wished to say something but could not. And though her first thought then was of curiosity as to what Natsuki meant to say, the succeeding one was of desire for those lips she was looking at, her body starting to lean towards those lips she had already tasted once and wanted to taste again.

My god!

She jolted ever so slightly but all too visibly backwards, a little shaken by herself. Quite unthinkable for her to try that again and yet she had almost done it. Oh, how hopeless was her self-control these days? Or more precisely, how hopeless was her self-control when it came to this young woman? Who merely looked at her now with that same unreadable expression, the same painfully beautiful face.

Shizuru Fujino, you really are the damnedest creature! She growled inwardly, wanting to give herself a good slap for what had almost happened. Why was her body suddenly acting so impulsively this way? And why that awful feeling in her chest, which felt as though it were about to break open?

Then that sudden fear: what if the girl decided she could not trust her ever again?

She was about to apologise-yet again!-to Natsuki, but was halted by the sight of the girl's countenance. It seemed that her face had changed just a little. It seemed that there was a faint and evanescent sadness in her eyes that made their colour all the brighter and more yielding.

Her lip quivered again too, perpetually on the verge of speech yet never reaching it.

"Natsuki," Shizuru whispered, not knowing what to say before this. She wanted to tell her she would not do it again, that she had never meant to hurt or abuse her in such a way. She wanted to tell the girl that she need never speak to her again, if that was what it took for her to be able to stay as Shizuru's bodyguard and attendant. She would have told the girl this, perhaps even more, had it not been for Natsuki's suddenly leaning in towards her and shocking her so badly that she failed to close her eyes when their lips met.

Ecastor! Shizuru cried inwardly, absolutely dumbfounded. Natsuki is - she is - Something quivering on her lips, steady in pressure yet tremulous as well.

It cannot be.

Natsuki was kissing her. She was kissing her mouth. Just a lovely little feeling, the soft pressure of lips on her own. Chaste, and so exquisite in both sensation and surprise that it rooted Shizuru to her seat.

Dear god, she thought, still too shocked to shut her eyes. Dear god.

Who was more surprised by it was hard to tell, for the giver's lips shook far more than those of the recipient-who, for her part, was so still she would have seemed a statue, had it not been for the giddy rush of blood thundering all the way to her face. Even the clarity of thought seemed so lost to her that all she could think were three words, over and over again, like echoes:

She kissed me.

Natsuki's nerve seemed to wither suddenly before the heat of Shizuru's blush, and she was the one to pull back, gasping as if she had been in some harrowing trial. The older woman was breathing hard as well, eyes wide as she regarded the girl with brazen amazement.

They stared at each other with frightened expressions.

Natsuki.

The Otomeian flinched, suddenly looking terrified by her own actions. Shizuru watched the play of emotion on the girl's face, unaware of the same display on her own.

Do you also-?

She saw the twitch in Natsuki's muscles even before the girl began to get up, obviously intent on moving away. She was surprised to see, even, the embarrassment on the girl's face so clearly, when she had been agonising over reading Natsuki's face before. But now she could see this much, and she knew too what Natsuki's instincts were screaming at her: to run.

But Furies take me if I let her do the same thing I did, Shizuru thought, lunging into action. Again those three words rang at her, but in a tone more triumphant than before: She kissed me!

She reached and jerked the girl back before the latter could turn away, pulling at the younger woman so strongly that the Otomeian practically fell into her arms. Natsuki let out a short sound of alarm, but it was cut off by Shizuru's mouth on her own, catching her lips just as the older woman's hands caught the rest of her body. Their mouths came together for the third time in the day, but this time both of them were moving forward and pressing their lips together, which seemed to make all the difference.

Shizuru had to exercise considerable self-restraint not to let out a moan.

Do you want me too, she was asking the girl in her mind. Could you possibly feel the same?

She let herself fall backwards onto the bed, taking the girl with her. Having done this, however, she loosened her grip on Natsuki's arms, giving her opportunity to stop what was happening if she wished. But Natsuki made no attempt to free herself, nor to separate her mouth from Shizuru's.

Could it be you were simply surprised the first time?

Their lips broke apart and again they stared at each other with anxious expressions, mouths open. Their breath tickled their faces, which were both bright with heat as the excitement danced beneath the skin. There was a slight dip in the mattress when Natsuki put an arm beside Shizuru's torso and moved up a little in an attempt to support her position above the older woman.

"Ahh."

Natsuki stirred again, putting her other arm on the mattress as well. The movement made Shizuru conscious of the girl's breasts pressing against her own. It seemed suddenly to her that she was losing her mind. It seemed there had never been a more luscious, more yielding feminine body. Yet the same body seemed so firm and strong as well, and she almost kissed those lips again. But she had to make something clear first. She had to be sure.

For even if Natsuki forgave her this time, she could not forgive herself if she wronged her again.

"Natsuki," she said slowly, swallowing hard. "Natsuki, forgive me, but I..."

She was finding it increasingly difficult to talk. The awareness of Natsuki being in her arms, the sensation of the girl's weight flush against her was dizzying.

I want you .

"Stop me," she went on, trying to work around the tightness in her throat. "If you do not want to do this. Simply stop me."

Natsuki said nothing, looking at her with an expression bordering on helplessness.

"Please," Shizuru told her, voice dropping to a hoarse, throaty whisper. "You need only stop me, Natsuki, if-if it so. Only, please..."

Please want me too.

She shut her eyes, hoping that taking away the distracting sight of temptation hovering so close to her would somehow force the words out. But then she felt the shift in weight above her yet again, followed by the silky drop of Natsuki's hair rippling over the girl's shoulders and brushing her cheeks.

She opened her eyes just as Natsuki's lips brushed her mouth.

Yes.

A murmur passed between them, and she lifted her head to catch the girl's mouth again. They pressed together firmly, and she felt a bright flash explode behind now-lowered eyelids. Heat was suffusing her face, but it felt light compared to the scorching embers that were Natsuki's lips, rubbing a gentle friction against hers.

Not even when I won the corona obsidionalis, she found herself thinking. Not even then did I feel this elated. She was so ecstatic that she could not help but still be a little incredulous at what was taking place. But the timid press of Natsuki's lips on hers was all too true to be a mere fantasy-oh, it was such a tactile feeling!

She opened her mouth slightly to nip at Natsuki's lower lip, which quivered at the gesture. Her arms folded over the younger woman and this was reciprocated by another shy press of Natsuki's lips, her small nose brushing Shizuru's own.

"My Natsuki," she whispered, feeling the small tremble the verbal possession caused. She realised then how much it must have taken out of the younger woman to do this, how difficult it must have been. Even now Natsuki looked fearful, her eyes looking back at Shizuru with mute fright as they paused to stare at each other.

Poor child, she thought. And it is all my clumsy fault that I made it no easier for her. Or for myself, for that matter. But Natsuki was hers now, and that was all that was truly significant at the moment and in the world. Everything else, to Shizuru, was dust.

She leaned up to return Natsuki's kisses as tenderly as they had been given, trying to hold back her own ardour for now. This did not trouble her too much, for even this gentle contact touched her in a way she failed to grasp. Exquisite feeling, those lips against hers, that satiny quality to the girl's cheeks as they touched her face. She was so exultant over all of this, so caught up in the extraordinary sweetness of kissing Natsuki this way and this lightly, that she nearly failed to notice something important. When she did, however, she actually had to halt momentarily and give Natsuki a surprised and penetrating look.

She has never kissed anyone before, she thought, amazed by that. She does not even know how.

It would certainly explain why she had been so shocked by the first kiss Shizuru had stolen from her, when the older woman had actually gone so far as to invade her mouth. It would explain, too, why she was kissing Shizuru in such a way, giving small tentative presses of her lips that were similar to those of a cub nuzzling another. Sweet, yes, irrepressibly so, and yet they made Shizuru ache to show her another kind of sweetness.

"Natsuki," she whispered, watching the other's eyes go wide as she tumbled them over. They ended with reversed positions, Natsuki lying stretched out and stunned beneath her. Their legs rubbed against each other and Shizuru had to stop herself from pressing her thigh between the girl's.

First things first, her mind told her. If Natsuki had not even truly kissed anyone yet, there would be even less probability of her having experienced anything that blatantly sexual. Shizuru did not want to shock her into fear again so soon, for all that she was burning to simply take the girl there and then.

Not too fast, not now, she told herself, taking deep breaths that matched those coming from the body underneath her. She is yours. You have time.

She thanked the gods some of her usual sensibility was returning, at least, even if she was still being assaulted by her senses. The light puffs of warmth against her lips were sending fine shivers of need through her body again.

She said the girl's name.

"May I kiss you?" she asked huskily, almost amused by her own question. Still, after what had happened the first time, it was better to be certain. "May I do that, Natsuki?"

It made her heart falter to see the nervous reply, which was a red-faced, shy little nod.

She lowered her lips again. But this time, she opened her mouth to nudge Natsuki's lips open with her tongue. The girl granted entry unsteadily, an odd whimper rising from her throat when Shizuru's tongue passed into her mouth and began to feel hers.

"Hnn."

Shizuru was in ecstasy. She could feel Natsuki's tongue starting to move, maddeningly uncertain in its dance as she caressed its wet flesh with hers. It was unbelievably soft and Shizuru wished she could wrap her lips around it, suck at it the same way Natsuki was now sucking on hers. Hands were lacing into her hair, massaging her scalp in a way that sent thrills of pleasure rippling from her head to her stomach-and deeper still, to her very centre. Her belly felt suspended, dangling in air. Everything about her seemed fixed to the other's lips, tied to the movements of their tongues as they became bolder with each other.

The sound of Natsuki's first unrepressed moans had her clutching the girl's hips, hands massaging her through the cloth.

There was blood in her kiss. It thundered beneath it.

Natsuki's tongue slid over hers, suddenly peeking out to lick at her lips. It slipped between them and she gave a low, rumbling groan when it touched the inside of her mouth. She could still feel a little fear in its explorations, but there was fascination there too, seducing her thoroughly with its slow strokes against her tongue. She met it encouragingly, marvelling at how the seduced had become the seductress. Again she had to struggle not to bring her knee up, not to bring them closer to the conflagration that the body exploding under her hands was trying to come to.

A wisp of hot air blew against her face, coming from Natsuki's nose.

They exchanged one more lingering kiss before easing apart, panting heavily. Shizuru felt light-headed, the heat under her compelling her body to press harder into it. Her eyes were still closed and she could feel the flutter of Natsuki's lashes against her cheek.

She wondered how the younger woman felt about all this.

Her head lifted ever so slowly and she peeked out from heavy-lidded eyes to see Natsuki's face. She saw those blood-infused lips glistening beneath her, the hot colour of the girl's skin. She saw that haughty, delicate little nose rising up like a challenge. And she saw the cheeks with the wonderful hollows that could break her heart.

Perfect, she found herself thinking. This is what they mean when they say it, this is perfect. But then she saw Natsuki's eyes and even those words seemed inadequate, for the girl was looking at her with an expression of sheer adoration, the emotion suddenly lucent through the layers of enigma.

And I am still not worthy of her.

Shizuru felt her heart leap into her throat, thanking all the gods for this girl who made her feel more humbled than she had ever felt before.

Vocabulaire:

1. P ublicani - Tax-farmers who make contracts with the state (through the officials called " censors" ) to collect taxes from a province. For a more comprehensive explanation, see the 4th paragraph in the 4th part of Chapter 13 . Note that "parts" of a chapter are separated from each other by the breaks. For example, this chapter has 2 parts.

2. Contubernalis - A position in the army already discussed in Chapter 14 . To recollect: it is a cadet of the army, and here, specifically a position given to children of high-ranking families when it comes time to serve their military duties. They were often given desk-work, or any duty in the general's tent that would keep them safe and away from the actual fighting.

"Is it or is it not true? There's the question of the day for you."

Chie chuckled approvingly at the rhyme, giving a few claps for applause.

"Playing with words already," she mumbled thoughtfully. "Does that mean you're interested in the gossip too, Suou-san?"

The younger legate inclined her head.

"I can't deny I am," she admitted with her usual charming smile.
"Takeda-kun and Shizuru-san fighting." She quirked her pale brows.
"It intrigues me."

"As a warrior or as a socialite?"

Suou laughed at that, turning to the one who had spoken: "You're quick, Centurion. What about you? Does it interest you as a warrior or as a socialite?"

Nao snorted.

"Who said I was interested in it?" she said indifferently. "It doesn't concern me."

"That's a little more reserve than I'd have expected of you, I have to say," the flaxen-haired legate baited. "Even so, it's impossible not to have an opinion. You haven't said what you think about this yet."

The primipilus grinned, opening piercing green eyes widely.

"What I think doesn't count," she said, obviously directing her words more to the man sitting next to Suou than to the woman herself.
"After all, I'm just a primipilus supposed to follow legates' orders-oh, sorry, I meant opinion -right, Taro-san?"

Taro glared. She turned from him and went on to tell the company that she did not really care for idle tittle-tattle, although she did admit that the hearsay this time was somewhat out of the ordinary.

"Still, I'm not as much of a rumourmonger as Harada here," she said, prompting the senior legate to throw a small grape her way. She caught it and winked at her attacker, popping the fruit into her mouth. "I don't think much of Masashi, so I'm not even excited about a real fight happening between them."

"You think the general would win easily, don't you, Nao-san?" someone asked.

"Don't you, Kenji-san?"

"I do think she would win," he said, leaning both elbows on the table as was his wont. "But I'm not sure it's going to be an easy win. Takeda-san is a famous swordsman for a reason, you know."

"My money's still on the general."

Kenji laughed, his lean face relaxing as he opened his eyes comically at the primipilus: "I don't recall saying mine wasn't."

"She'd murder him. Suou-san?"

"I'm betting on Shizuru-san too, of course," Suou answered to the obvious question. "And it's quite certain Chie-san would do the same."

"Quite certain!" Chie grinned, saying the words so emphatically the rest had to laugh.

"Poor Takeda-kun," Suou said dolefully, a twinkle in her eye. "Given up for dead."

"Not really," Kenji followed. "Someone hasn't put a bet yet. Taro-san? Your money will be on...?"

Taro sighed, his expression indicating that he would choose the same contender as the rest of them.

"But why are we even talking about this?" he asked afterwards. "It's not like they're actually going to fight! More importantly, what would you-all of you!-bet on the rumour about the reason for the quarrel?"

"Which is?" Kenji prompted. "I don't know yet."

"They say it's about a woman," came the delighted whisper.

"Our general?" the other practically spat out, incredulity laced through every syllable. "Codswallop!"

"Just what I said!" Taro told him, still whispering for some reason. "But it's being bandied about by the slaves from the gubernatorial household, so I hear. They say some overheard them arguing-though which 'some' those would be I've yet to discover."

"Well, until then, it's just a rumour isn't it?"

"Yes. But you have to admit, it's slaves that are usually in the know about everything."

"That's true enough."

"So do you think it's true after all?"

"Those two fighting over a woman?" Suou interjected in the pair's exchange, humming to herself. "Interesting idea, really."

Kenji regarded her with amusement.

"That's an understatement, Suou-san," he said.

She looked at him good-humouredly.

"Conceded," she said with a light laugh, slanting her head. "See, I was so taken aback I suppose I lost eloquence. When I said it was interesting, I meant that it was vastly, unbearably interesting."

"Yet you seem to bear it remarkably well," Chie chuckled at her.

The fair-haired woman merely smiled.

"A woman." It was Kenji again, his lips pursed as he ruminated over it. "Do you know, Chie-san, who that would be? I didn't even know Takeda-san-much less the general, good gods!-was after anyone. Last I heard, they were still in the list of most eligible bachelors in Hime."

Chie exploded into cackles at this.

"Oh, Kenji-san!" she cried, eyes very moist. "That last bit made you sound like a gossipy young girl!"

The rest of them laughed as Kenji rubbed the back of his brightly orange hair.

"I blame Miyabi," he said gruffly, referring to his fiancée who awaited him in Hime. "The things those letters of hers have!"

Chie nodded understandingly.

"Sometimes I get the same thing with Aoi," she confided. "And much though I love to know the social news, I can't help but get a little scared when she starts rattling on about the most eligible bachelors and bachelorettes in the city. I trust her and all, that goes without saying-but Jupiter! It still doesn't help when you're an entire sea away and surrounded by mountains, knowing that your woman is surrounded by all those accursed eligibles!"

The company fell to hooting at this impassioned complaint, Nao going so far as to pat her friend's back even while laughing at her troubles. Chie shook her head with mock sadness, huffing for good effect.

"Anyway," she said, waving her hand to draw their attention. "Going back to your question, Kenji-san and the eligibles we do have in our company, I'm afraid I'm a little dry for news there. I don't know a thing. Besides, I'm not sure you should believe it, that thing about a woman being the cause."

"What do you mean?" Taro asked.

"It's just the sort of thing that folk would say," she told him. "It makes the issue sound romantic if it's about a woman, and you know how the people love romanticising things. The usual snowball, where one piece of gossip starts rolling and gets bigger and more remarkable-not to mention untrue. Hardly worth crediting."

The rest digested this.

"Now that you mention it, that sounds reasonable," Taro allowed. He reached for a roll of bread from the platter on the table. "Romance indeed. But there's still the question of whether they got into a fight or not, and the rumours about the fight are stronger than the ones about its cause, you know. Besides which, the table in that room is missing now, isn't it? They said it was wrecked. I heard, too, that the general has been going around with a bandaged hand."

"Now that is romantic," Chie could not resist remarking. "A bandaged hand."

Nao scoffed.

"I don't believe that would come from a fight," she declared authoritatively. "Especially if it's the general against only one person, even if it is Masashi. She probably injured herself in an accident or something."

"Always loyal to the general," Kenji teased, wiggling his eyebrows at her. "And said with such conviction!"

The centurion laughed a carefree, infectious sound, flicking her strawberry-coloured hair away from her face.

"You forget," she told him, tilting her chin upwards. "I'm the only one of us here who's actually sparred with her. So take my word for it: that snot-nosed bastard couldn't have touched her, all that I've seen of him. And I've seen him do his bit, all right."

Several of the legates were now leaning forward, eyes intent on the primipilus.

"Wait, Yuuki-san," Taro himself said eagerly, seeming to forget his usual reserve with the woman. "You've sparred with the general? How was it?"

Nao looked at him, a faint smirk playing on her lips.

"I would like to know too," Suou added. "Even if I have seen my sister and Shizuru-san sparring, I would still like to hear how yours went."

"You've all seen her fight," Nao said in reply. "She disarmed me and I lost. Plain and simple. I don't think I can give you a move-by-move since it's been ages ago."

She narrowed her eyes, remembering what she could of that short exercise and defeat.

"But I can say Masashi wouldn't so much as hurt her," she said decidedly. "The difference in range of weapon for one thing. Then there's the fact that she's strong, very strong. I know she doesn't look it, but the general's got the strength of an ox."

"A bit inelegant as a description, isn't it?" Taro said, grinning.

"It's strength I'm describing: no call for elegance in it," Nao snapped. "And you'd best believe I mean it. She doesn't look it only because she's so bloody long, but she's got the muscle to break the bones in your thigh, Old Boy."

"I believe you," Suou cut in. "One need only touch the naginata she uses for training. It's weighted. Heavily."

Chie nodded to confirm this, having had a near-disaster with her foot after she had picked up the polearm casually from its stand before.

"And even without that, there's her speed," Nao continued with what she was saying. "And it's insane! I was using projectiles when we fought, and even I couldn't hit her then."

"Not once?" someone asked.

"Never," she said, before amending: "Unless you count ripping her clothes and cutting off some hair. But that's piddle in a fight, doesn't count for shit. Anyway, that bandage you're talking about might not even be over a wound. The general could be wearing it for practice- the naginata gets damn tough on the palm in winter, even more than a sword."

"You met her earlier, Chie-san," Kenji said, turning to the senior legate. "How was she? Did she say anything about it?"

The senior legate leaned back into her chair, crossing her arms over her cream-coloured tunic. All of them were in tunics and robes, garments of thick and woven fabrics that kept them warm without being abrasive to their skin. Chie felt it with her fingers now, holding her sides in self-embrace.

"No, Shizuru-san didn't say anything," she told them. "She just gave out the order for us to check the troops of the provincial capital as well as ours, prepare to leave in the next few days, and so on and so forth. And she asked to speak to Toshi-san, like I told you. She didn't mention the quarrel, if there was one. Or the bandage, although I should probably tell you it's true. I did see it on her hand."

"Then I expect you asked her about it, didn't you?" Kenji persisted.
"How did she react?"

"As you should expect too, she just laughed it off," Chie answered.
"All of you should know by now how Shizuru-san can be when confronted with gossip."

"I was just wondering, Chie-san, when you saw her, were both hands bandaged?" Suou asked.

Chie turned to look at the younger woman, staring straight into the very light, very cool gaze. After a few seconds of knocking at their ice and finding no cracks, she smiled.

"No," she answered simply.

There was a knock on the door just then and they turned towards it as it opened, revealing a bowing slave carrying a folded piece of parchment.

"Please excuse my interruption," she said. "I have here a note for Suou Himemiya-san."

The legate made a sound of assent, rising from her seat to take the note. The slave bent in deference once more and left as Suou took some time to read the communication. She mumbled something after she was finished and turned to face the company.

"Well, well," she drawled, both near-invisible eyebrows lifted. "It appears there just might be more to this than we think. We have here a very interesting development, My Friends."

They looked inquiringly at her, Chie asking what the "development" was. Suou smiled and began to fold the note in her hand with theatrical care, pressing the creases into the paper lovingly.

"This is quite good parchment, don't you think?" she asked Nao, who was closest to her. "I wonder where they get it."

The primipilus started sniggering.

"Oh, put them out of their misery, Legate!" she cried. "Just say what it is."

Suou grinned unrepentantly.

"This note says that Takeda-kun is leaving," she said.

Sounds of surprise escaped the others as their voices tumbled over each other in an attempt to question her.

"You're joking!" Taro exclaimed.

"He's leaving?" Chie asked, looking just as surprised.

"Now?" Kenji gasped.

Suou winked at them.

"So it says here," she said. "Letters from the Senate have arrived and he says they're calling him back."

She paused and added slyly: "That's what he says."

"We-elll," Kenji drew out, his rusty brows beetling. "It could be true. It's understandable and likely too, since they're probably missing him as a tribune of the plebs in office. But it's going to give new strength to the rumours, you know, if he leaves now. This adds more room to speculate."

There were words of agreement from the others. Except from Suou, who shrugged and looked nonchalant as ever.

"That's true," she said. "But one cannot say he has a choice this time if such summons have indeed arrived. The Senate calls, the Senate gets. Unless, of course, you're Shizuru Fujino."

She went to fetch the cloak she had left draped on a stand.

"Anyway, I should go see him off," she told them. "If the beaten rival departs on the heels of the confrontation, someone has to see him go, even if it's only an old friend."

She gave them her lazy grin and waved goodbye, calling out something that made the senior legate laugh.

"Having no one to say goodbye to ruins the romance."

---

Shizuru studied the man before her, putting her hands together into a steeple as she explained her reasons for seeing him.

"In effect, Toshi-han, I am asking you to stay on with the garrison in Sosia," she said. "What say you to this?"

There was a short pause in the room as Toshi looked at the general thoughtfully, his mind racing as he tried to make sense of what she was proposing. She merely returned his look with an easy one, waiting quietly for him to enunciate the reserve in his gaze.

"Naturally I'll follow your orders, Fujino-san," he said at length, meeting the ruby-shaded look with equanimity. "If you want me to stay here, I will. But may I ask a question?"

"Strictly speaking, you already have," she smiled. "What is it?"

"Why me?"

That brought a grin.

"Why not you?" she asked, making an amused sound. "You sound as though you deem yourself unqualified, Toshi-han. Or perhaps you do not care to stay here after all?"

"Oh, I wouldn't mind!" he said, the corners of his eyes crinkling as he smiled back. "But you're right. I do feel a little 'unqualified' for the position you are offering, Fujino-san."

Shizuru clucked, shaking her head.

"Dear me," she sighed, bringing her hands up onto the table in order to pour him more wine. "I do wish you would not undermine yourself. You not only do a disservice to yourself, but to me as well, since it implies my judgment ill in asking you to do this thing."

He took the cup she returned to him, his expression a blend of amusement and apology.

"I didn't mean it that way, of course," he told her, lifting the cup to his lips and taking a sip of the beverage. A rumbling sound came from his throat as he swallowed. "Good wine."

"Yes."

"Anyway, that was not what I meant, Fujino-san. Forgive me."

She shook her head again.

"No, I should be the one asking for forgiveness. I was teasing you." She began to pour wine for herself, her eyes on the rosy stream flowing from the flagon to her goblet. "In any case, may I know why you feel unqualified, Toshi-han?"

Toshi set down his cup, eyes drifting from the crimson pool of his drink to those like pools that were her eyes. As if knowing someone was probing their depths, they met his stare, surfaces shimmering in concealment of what was within.

He smiled.

"It's because I'm not very experienced as a legate, General," he told her. "And Sosia is still a tactical military garrison in these territories. As you know, I haven't served anything other than regular martial duty before this, and as a contubernalis and tribune only, to boot. I just think that any of the other legates would do the job better than me since they're more... soldierly, I think, is the word."

She inclined her head, not really conceding anything.

Toshi cupped his chin and continued, a contrite expression on his face: "I can't help but think I'm just an old dog better suited to talking politics than waging war-so to speak."

A soft shuffle of cloth indicated his general had just crossed her legs under the table.

"Perhaps you are right," she admitted, bowing her head shortly. "In some ways, not all. But even were we only to consider the last thing you said, it is exactly why I need you for this task, Toshi-han. You see, I am not so worried about Sosia's military leadership." She paused meaningfully. "Would you happen to know who the gubernatorial force's captain of the guard is?"

Toshi responded in the negative, having the grace to look embarrassed.

"No, it is not surprising that you would not know," she said, putting him at ease. "He was away on furlough, you see, and it is the quaestor, Homura-han, who has been serving as the temporary captain. In any case, it is Shigeru Oni-han."

He started, straightening in his chair.

"Shigeru Oni?" he said.

She nodded complacently at his reaction.

"He just returned, apparently," she informed him. "As you well know, he is fairly soldierly."

"That he is," Toshi said, laughing at her manner of saying it. "Well then! There's less worry for us if such a military man is head of Sosia's garrison."

"Exactly," she told him. "So I daresay I already have one less concern as far as Sosia's military defence is concerned. However, there is still the matter of its overall well-being, which is to say that I have other matters I would like seen to in my stead."

Shizuru paused and leaned forward as he blinked, waiting for her to explain.

"This is why I chose you, Toshi-han," she went on. "You are more experienced than most of the other legates when it comes to strictly political matters, and those are exactly what I am concerned about. There have been significant, ah, changes, shall we say, that I have set into motion in this province and I would like to see them serve their purpose without being snuffed out beforehand."

She smiled a little mischievously, in his opinion.

"In politics, an old dog is what I need," she said. "I need someone who deals in the bark before actually dealing in the bite."

Toshi acknowledged her joke with a low chortle.

"I see it now," he told her. "And, naturally, I accept."

"Wonderful."

"But what are the changes you were speaking of, Fujino-san? I'd best know them if I'm to see to them."

She bestowed a grateful smile upon him, then went on to explain her arrest of the scheme for illegal sale of the citizenship. Having covered this and given him an injunction not to reveal any of the details of that issue to anyone else, she proceeded to tell him that she had asked the governor, Suda Yuuji, to regulate the taxes of the province to a fairer figure, as well as to forbid the extortionate interest rates presently being used by the publicani not only collecting those taxes but also lending money to those required to pay them.

"He has agreed, fortunately," she said. "Well, given how I have my hand on his throat for the citizenship scheme, he could not do otherwise. And he is going to act immediately. As you know, I have been going around for the past few days, trying to gather information in order to be able to draw up reasonable estimates for taxation. These estimates are those to be used in Sosia from now on."

"But how can that be?" gasped Toshi. "The publicani would squeal! And the same goes for the Senate, Fujino-san, once they find out. The Treasury's revenues will be affected too, after all."

He gave her a penetrating look.

"How did you manage to convince Yuuji-san, anyway? Even if you do threaten him with exposure of his citizenship scheme in Hime, I have to say that being openly counter the tax farmers' interests would not serve him better at all! The man would just be headed for more headaches that way, and probably even more powerful opposition, given how strong the publicani are."

She smiled, opening her long-lashed eyes wide.

"I can be very persuasive, Toshi-han," she said to him.

He laughed, shaking his head as it dawned on him what sort of persuasion had taken place.

"It's ironic that you're putting a stop to extortion by using it," he told her, thoroughly enjoying the conversation. "I suppose you're very persuasive indeed, Fujino-san."

"Well."

"But the publicani will still be fuming. And it's likely he'll let them know you're the one responsible, Fujino-san, if worse comes to worst." He frowned lightly, the lines on his face deepening. "I know that the taxes are terrible and plainly impossible, but they still have the legal contracts for them. They also have the right to demand whatever interest rates they want for their usury. They'll go to their allies in the House, and given how you've just put him in a bind, I very much doubt Yuuji-san will have any scruples about throwing all the blame your way. If you do go on to bring him to court after all for his citizenship sales, it's guaranteed he'll get the publicani to bring you to court for this too, in turn. Mutually-assured destruction, perhaps?"

She tilted her head in concurrence.

"I knew I picked the right person-you really do understand politics better than many of the others," she said languidly, evidently unconcerned by the threat that might be hanging over her head soon. "I know what you mean. But Sosia needs this relief right now, especially since a state of war is imminent. I had hoped to take care of it by enacting legislation upon return to Hime, but after perusal of the provincial income accounts, I am afraid we cannot wait any longer. Legislation takes years, sometimes even decades."

She shrugged and added: "Besides, the proper rates are the proper rates, contract-bound or not. Even if the publicani did try to take it into a court of law, they would lose."

He asked her how that could be possible.

"For one, because the figures they have promised the censors are patently impossible," Shizuru explained. "Anyone with rudimentary knowledge of accounting could see it from the province's books. The only way the province manages to pay the taxes now is by borrowing money from the same publicani supposed to collect those taxes for the State. If this continues, Sosia will end in a bottomless pit of debt, given how high the publicani have set the interest rate on credit. Oh, their current contract is legal, no doubt about it. But if a good advocate demonstrated in court that they have been milking a province of the Republic for their sole benefit for years-which they have, you just need to check the records-I doubt these idiots would get another contract from the censors in the future. They would not be willing to risk it. Besides, their extortionate rates of interest are in fact illegal. There is a very old statute that actually prohibits such rates. Can you imagine their horror were I to dredge it up?"

She smirked, seeming amused by something else. She explained it to him: "To say nothing of the support the Traditionalists would be forced to give me since the statute I would quote from is from Hime's ancient legal tradition. Research pays, you know, as does reading."

He looked patently impressed.

"I'd almost forgotten how good you were in the law courts," he admitted. "You didn't speak often enough for my taste, you know! You've always done as well with words as you do with war, Fujinosan."

"Please," she said, affecting polite embarrassment. "Thank you for the compliment, Toshi-han, but I might be a little rusty now. I have not played advocate for years."

"I doubt you'd lose your touch."

A faint smile played at her lips.

"If Chie-han were here, she would add 'or your tongue' to that statement," she said, causing him to laugh. At any rate, regarding the publicani's senatorial allies, it little matters to me how many of them call out for my blood."

She quirked a tawny eyebrow at him and explained: "Most of them already hate me, anyway, and have been doing their best to worsen my life for some time already-with little effect. A few more would not make a difference."

He gave her a sympathetic look, well-aware of the recent happenings in the House concerning their campaign.

"Maybe you're right," he allowed. "Anyway, Chie-san told me you were thinking of leaving for Argus soon. When, may I ask?"

"In the next week or so," she replied. "So please see me about any concerns you may have as soon as possible. I shall see you before departure, of course, to ensure that all is well. Do you have any concerns now, Toshi-han?"

"Everything's clear," he said, sensing the interview was over and rising from his seat. He bowed to her as she stood up too. "I'm honoured to be entrusted with this office by you, Fujino-san."

"I am the one honoured to have you working with me."

They parted and she shut the door to her rooms after him, bolting it with a satisfying click. Shizuru then turned to face her remaining companion, who was sitting on the bed and looking at her curiously.

"Natsuki."

They stared at each other for a long moment, which ended with green eyes being shuttered, a fall of black lashes brushing against reddening cheeks.

"Now that that is over," Shizuru said with a chuckle, moving from the door. "Shall you drink with me a little?"

She motioned to the flagon on the table.

"It is very good wine and having someone to drink it with makes it all the better."

The girl made a sound of assent. Shizuru smiled and motioned for her to stay where she was.

"I will come over," she explained, pouring more wine into the goblet she had been using. "Please wait for me there, Natsuki."

Natsuki obeyed, watching the older woman with a puzzled expression as the latter held the cup in one hand and dragged a chair over to the foot of the bed. Placing the chair so that it was directly opposite the girl, Shizuru then lowered herself onto it and pulled it to the bed until her legs were between Natsuki's, her knees touching the insides of the younger's thighs where they hung from the edge of the bed.

She was gratified to see a blush bloom on Natsuki's cheeks again.

That colour drives me to distraction, she thought, lips tingling with desire for those of the girl in front of her. She occupied her mouth instead with taking a sip from the goblet in her hand-which was a poor substitute for Natsuki's lips, she was sure. The wine splashed onto her tongue with a burst of warmth, the rich and loamy taste washing over her tongue. She smiled with the simple pleasure of one who appreciated vintage, holding out the cup to the girl.

"Here you are."

She watched the perpetually-bandaged hands take it from her fingers, and afterwards, watched the girl drink from that cup with so much unconscious intensity that the younger woman had visible difficulty swallowing, her smooth throat flexing a little more than it should.

Such a slender neck, Shizuru noted, fascinated as ever with the long, fragile looks of the girl she yet knew to be a consummate warrior. I know she is a power to be reckoned with-in more ways than one, perhaps, considering the manner in which her people are constantly treating her. There is esteem there, a considerable respect and awe. Yet she is still only a girl, her youth still so painfully visible. And her very looks have a delicacy not in keeping with her martial ability and state, have a thin and brittle look about them. Look at her neck. I could hold it in one hand. I could snap it if I am not careful.

There was the thing keeping her from reaching out and latching onto that neck right now, after all: the need to be careful. The reminder made her release a small sigh for perhaps the hundredth time in the past three days.

To be sure, the past days had been wonderful. They had been shrouded in a hazy bliss that kept her smiling, perhaps a little more openly than usual, as she went about her usual duties. Some of her time had been spent checking the province's accounts as well as its fortifications and troops, but most of it had been spent in the bedroom with her Otomeian bodyguard-or lover, as she liked to think of the girl now. Often they had merely lain upon the bed, holding each other. Sometimes they talked, and sometimes there was no talking at all.

It was a little amazing to Shizuru, the things she could do and enjoy with this young woman. Sometimes, cradling the Otomeian's head to her chest after kisses, she would marvel at how she had ever managed to live without indulging this area of her senses. It had been starving! It was such a vital part of her, she realised: this passion that had nothing to do with politics or war or even the exercise of intelligence. And yet she had almost forgotten about it. How strange that she had been able to neglect it so far! How could she have ever managed without it and how could she manage to be without it now?

All of this was as much a revelation to Natsuki as it was to her, she guessed, even if only judging from the girl's reactions to each new caress. She was pleased to note, at least, that the Otomeian was gradually becoming more comfortable with affections. The girl's kisses were becoming less shy each day, becoming bolder and more demanding each time. Unfortunately-or fortunately, as far as Shizuru was concerned-her face did not seem to lose its tendency for blushing every time the two of them did something of a similar nature, which provoked the older woman to explore their physical pleasures even more. Who knew a blush could be so damnably tempting? It signalled to Shizuru, invited her to try out further, more blush-worthy things. It was a herald from Eros itself, urging her to sample and satisfy even newer desires.

However, while the novelty of the experience was partly what made their relationship so alluring, it was also what kept Shizuru from taking the next step-and the cause of her recent sighs. While she truly enjoyed their kisses, the many touches they had already exchanged, she had to admit to herself that she was eager for more, wanted to make the girl her lover in the proper Himean sense. That is to say, she wanted to bed the younger woman. But she had not done so yet.

I wonder why, she thought to herself. Certainly not for lack of trying! She had taken them several times now to the brink of the act, somehow managing to figure out the mechanics of Natsuki's complicated attire on the first try, albeit with a few furious fumbles. Each time she began to put this practical knowledge to good use, however, someone or something would interrupt them. It did not even take a knock on the door to do this, for the mere sound of footsteps or voices hovering a-little-too-long and a-little-too-loudly nearby could make Natsuki bolt from underneath her, twitching as warily as an untamed cat. And Shizuru knew better than to try to push the girl then.

I did make a resolution never to force myself on her once more, she sighed yet again, taking the cup from the girl and drinking. But this waiting is driving me mad!

It took so much more willpower than she had ever thought to need-or, sometimes, ever thought to have. This was especially the case in the early morning, when she would silently watch as Natsuki went to bathe, her mouth going dry as she tried to resist the urge to slip out of bed and join the girl in the bathing area. Perhaps she would start by running the pumice stone over her skin for her, and eventually go on to run her hands over that bare skin as well. Perhaps she could move on to the act after that, the act every Himean was made to learn from near-birth by an environment of dirty ditties and goggle-worthy graffiti on the walls, to say nothing of the constant scandals of this affair and that being bandied about in every house. Oh yes, every Himean knew about sex and its supposed delights! And very few were able to escape it, especially for as long as Shizuru had.

Now was the price, apparently, for spurning it for so long: now that she actually wanted to pursue it, it was the one doing an escape.

Complicating the matter was that Shizuru was worried too about her conduct in her relationship with the Otomeian thus far. She had never been involved with anyone before this, and so had only vicariously-gleaned information as a basis. Was she perhaps going too fast? Should she slow the pace even more? That would be exceedingly difficult at this point, given how her body seemed to have recently decided that the girl was something it could not go without. Perhaps it made her seem too needy, in fact, the way she seemed to have a constant urge to be touching the girl. Did she seem too eager? Was she being too impatient?

And good god! she cried out in her mind, wincing as she caught herself. I sound like some adolescent agonising over her first dalliance! Am I really so pitiful as that?

"Shizuru?"

She broke off her internal ramblings, eyes snapping to the green ones before her.

"Yes?" she asked gently, putting forth her most innocent smile.
"Natsuki?"

Natsuki gave her a suspicious look.

"You are all right?" the Otomeian asked huskily.

Shizuru lifted her eyebrows, realising that she had forgotten just how perceptive her companion could be. She berated herself again, flashing a cheery expression at the younger woman.

"Of course I am, do not worry about me," she answered, taking one of the girl's hands. "I was simply thinking. I did not mean to be impolite, my dear."

Natsuki nodded, eyes dropping once again to her feet. A silky lock worked free from her tresses and fell over one eye, prompting the older woman to use her other hand and tuck it behind the girl's ear.

"Natsuki, forgive me," Shizuru told her, leaning close to place a quick kiss on the other's brow. "Is it that you are bored? Do you wish to exit the room? We can go somewhere else if you desire to take a walk or do something."

The girl looked up, shaking her head vigorously.

"No," she answered, repeating it for emphasis. "No."

She added, after a moment's pause: "I am fine."

Shizuru smiled at this. She leaned to one side and set the goblet onto the floor, then put the now-free hand on the girl's knee. Her other hand raised Natsuki's to her lips and she began kissing the fingers unprotected by the bandages, smiling when a nibble elicited a soft rasp of breath.

"Then I am glad," she murmured, in between nips. "I would hate for my presence to bore Natsuki."

Natsuki said nothing, watching with a mysterious expression in her gaze.

"We are going to Argus soon," Shizuru continued. "Have you ever been to Argus?"

Giving in to impulse, she licked one of the exposed knuckles against her lips. Natsuki gasped lightly, her face beginning to turn pink.

"Mm," she mumbled, in reply to Shizuru's query. "Yes."

Shizuru kept her eyes on the downcast ones, pressing a soft kiss to the tip of a finger.

"Shall you tell me what you thought of it?" she asked.

The glaze to Natsuki's eyes cleared at this question, to Shizuru's disappointment, as the girl considered the query seriously. Shizuru pressed another kiss onto another finger, all the same, while waiting for the girl's to speak.

"Argus, it is..." Natsuki paused to seek the word. "Busy."

Shizuru chuckled, ceasing her ministrations on Natsuki's hand.

"Busy?" she echoed.

Natsuki nodded.

"Many persons," she said, by way of explanation.

Shizuru sounded comprehension.

"Yes, there would be," she agreed, absent-mindedly running the fingers of her other hand up and down the other's thigh. It brought a delightful shiver from the girl and she did it again, unable to help smirking as she catalogued the action and response for future delights. "It is famous for its port, after all, and is the primary trading harbour in these parts, especially between our northern territories and the southern ones."

She paused in her activities and squinted, her thoughts turning to another matter that suddenly inserted itself into her mind.

"I shall leave two legions of my infantry here, for garrison," she revealed. "That will leave me with one overstrength legion to take to Argus. What do you think?"

Natsuki mumbled something that sounded like approval, before asking: "All the cavalry goes? To Argus?"

"Yes. I am quite fond of the cavalry, you know." Shizuru said this with a droll smile. "Particularly a certain dark-haired captain in it."

Natsuki actually forgot herself enough to laugh, the cool sound bringing a fond smile to Shizuru's lips. She was about to say something more when she became aware of the girl's fingers picking at the bandage on her hand, working it loose. She let this go on until the end of the linen strip fell free and Natsuki began to unwind the rest of it.

"What is it?" she asked curiously, keeping her hand lifted so that the girl could continue what she was doing. "I suppose it is time to change them?"

The younger woman nodded, making a satisfied sound as she finally bared Shizuru's knuckles. She brought them closer to her face, inspecting the now-healed wounds closely.

Shizuru waited.

"Better?" she asked.

Natsuki looked up, the corners of her mouth gradually curving into a smile.

"Better," she pronounced, strong approval in her voice. "Good healing."

The Himean laughed, feeling as though she had just been given a rare compliment. She slipped her hand from Natsuki's grasp and brought it up to hold the younger woman's face.

Such a beauty, she thought with distinct pleasure, rubbing the Otomeian's cheek. She was so arrestingly lovely, with those large green eyes and the exotic artifice of black paint rimming the lashes. And there was that sulky little mouth, with its mysterious little tilt at the corners. Shizuru marked all of this with great pleasure, something swelling in her chest as she thought of how only she was allowed to touch the girl the way she did. All of this was hers, hers for the taking! Oh, life was very good.

What made her life just a little better today, perhaps, was the news that Homura the quaestor gave her earlier: Takeda Masashi, apparently, was off to Hime. That sore little canker on her happiness was about to leave, most probably licking his wounds in defeat. How she relished the thought of his departure! She had been waiting for it a while now, half-prepared to pack him up in a litter and send him his way if he put his exit off any longer. And now he was finally leaving, absent her help.

Well, the quarrel they had had was probably help enough, she admitted. They had not seen each other save at a distance since that argument. Both of them managed to avoid another confrontation despite living in the same quarters, slipping quickly away when one saw the other nearby. They were aware of the rumours, of course, so they were careful never to chance a meeting-for the risk of letting show their animosity towards each other was more dangerous than putting down the gossip by staging a falsely amiable encounter. Or so both parties felt in the days immediately following their near-brawl. High passions did not run their course and dry out after a mere few days, particularly when pride was concerned. And with the two of them, it was concerned.

Shizuru being the victor in the conflict, one might have expected her to try to flaunt her trophy, in order to quell any remaining spirit in her opponent. Or, at the very least, to be sufficiently assured of her triumph to render her foe all but eradicated. But she had remained secretly irritated by his presence in the province. It gnawed at her, much like a rat worrying old leather. Perhaps it was partly the offence to her pride, which protested a little at how the man had once cracked her composure. Perhaps it was because he reminded her of that unsavoury moment when she acted more imprudently than she could ever have allowed, were she in her proper mindset. But a greater part of it, she admitted only to herself, had more to do with her growing, almost manic possessiveness of the girl sitting before her.

She had owned many things in her life, and even now owned a great more than most ever would. Yet this particular possession, the latest thing to have fallen into her grasp, occupied her more than all the others. She wondered if it was because it was not an "it" but a "she", another, a living thing vested with a powerful enough intellect and dignity as well as independence to actually break free of her grasp did it so desire. Did that make it worth more than all the other things that could not fight her possession, she wondered. Was it the possibility of its escape that made her so jealous over it?

She sighed yet again at her thoughts, wondering that she should turn out to be so possessive a lover. Who would have thought it?

"Do you know?" she told the Otomeian still watching her mutely, dropping her own voice to a confidential whisper. "You bring out the most unreasonable part of me."

The girl merely looked on with puzzlement, a tiny crease on her forehead. Shizuru grinned, dropping her hands from the other's face and sliding them slowly underneath the slender thighs, wedging fingers and palms between the bed and the suddenly tightening muscles of the girl's legs.

Dark brows lifted a question, only to be ignored.

"It cannot be helped," Shizuru went on, a hint of mischief glittering in her eyes. "So, I shall give in today and be unreasonable by postponing my other duties for much, much later. And in the meantime..."

A yelp escaped Natsuki's lips as she found herself lifted by the older woman, pulled straight onto Shizuru's lap. She frowned half-heartedly afterwards, trying to glower at the smirk on the other's face even as her hands settled on Shizuru's shoulders.

"Now, this," Shizuru said smugly, bringing her arms around the Otomeian's back, "is so much better. It is so nice to be unreasonable sometimes, no?"

Natsuki finally gave in to the smile tugging at her mouth, blushing as she met the lips coming towards hers.

Chapter 20

Hello and thank you all again.

Vocabulaire:

1. Dignitas - This term, not translatable to the English word "dignity", was explained in Chapter 17. To reiterate: it is a person's personal worth, his public standing, his prerogative to respect and treatment as a human being. It is the most sensitive asset a Roman/Himean can have, and should be defended with one's life.
  2. Inter nos - Literally "between ourselves" or "between (the two of us)".
  3. Princeps Senatus - The Leader of the House (of Senate).
  4. Proletarii - The "Head Count" or masses. They occupied the lowest layer of social stratification and were so poor as to not even belong to the 'actual' social classes.
  5. Scrip / scrips – Mode of payment wherein a certificate is issued by an authority (e.g. the government) to an individual for services rendered. The certificate then entitles him to land or money.
  6. "Under the cat's foot" - An idiom used to indicate that someone (the one under the cat's foot) is uxorious or henpecked.

Most campaigns were expected to be profitable ventures, save if they were civil wars, for then there would be no booty to be had from the enemy. A campaign abroad, however, was a prime chance for both Hime and the soldiers to gain wealth from the sale and acquisition of either spoils or slaves from the opposing camp. A truly successful campaign had to enrich both soldiers and state with its proceeds. The obvious key was to make it so that the costs of the campaign were outstripped by its revenues, which was chiefly achieved by a combination of two things: good pickings and good accounting.

Thus a general often travelled with a miniature army of accountants on his staff, all of whom were expected to keep on hand constantly updated ledgers of the campaign's profits and costs. Most generals left the technical aspects of finance to these "abacus-toters", any special attention they might have being directed largely towards their share of the proceeds. This left most of the resolutions on distribution of gains to the accounting body, which sometimes led to tension with other interests-such as that of the soldiers-or even plans emanating from the command tent, which sometimes produced decisions that were not in keeping with the army's state of finances. Hence many campaigns were in reality less profitable than costly, due to this common disjoin between the accountants and the officers.

Shizuru understood this difficulty plainly enough. Happily, she just so happened to understand accounting as well. As such, she deviated from the standard practice of simply leaving the accountants to handle the finances and actually worked with them, putting her own considerable fiscal skills to good use. She did this intermittently, going through the ledgers the accountants prepared for her whenever she found spare time during the campaign and planning her actions based on the resultant data.

The days preceding the march to Argus offered her an opportunity for this task, and being the conscientious worker that she was, she quickly seized it. Thus it was that four days before their planned date of departure, the Himean army's commander sat at her desk, busily running up figures on an abacus she had borrowed from the accountants.

She had worked since noon, asking for meals to be sent to her room to save her the trouble of going out. There had only been one or two interruptions to her occupation thus far: one when the senior legate had passed by to inquire about a matter regarding the fortification of the city, and the other being when the quaestor came to give her a message that the governor would be having a dinner party later and she was invited. She had entertained the first and agreed to the second, immediately returning to her task afterwards.

She had her reasons for wanting to finish the job as soon as possible.

It was already evening by the time she finally set down her quill and looked up from her notes. The first thing she sought was her bodyguard, whom she found sitting on the floor against the far wall, a small rug spread under her bottom. The younger woman was smiling, and Shizuru mirrored the expression.

"Natsuki seems to find something amusing," she noted while relaxing her posture in the chair. She lifted a hand to massage a shoulder. "What is it?"

"You," Natsuki answered. "You... work very hard."

The older woman lifted an eyebrow at this statement: "You seem surprised."

The other shrugged.

"It is funny," she told Shizuru. "That."

"Funny?" The chestnut-haired woman looked about her desk, as if searching for an answer there. "Do you mean my working hard?"

A sound of affirmation.

"May I ask why?"

Natsuki smiled.

"Because you do not need to," she explained.

That made her grin. She leaned forward and placed her elbows on the table, wagging a finger warningly at Natsuki.

"You have been listening too much to Chie-han and the others," she accused. "Well, do not always believe what other say, My Dear. That is a matter for debate. I work only insofar as I see that it would be beneficial for me to work. Which means I generally do not work more than I need to."

She paused and pretended to consider something.

"Although," she went on contemplatively, "if none other than Natsuki of the Otomeians says that I do not need to, then I am not about to contradict her. Hence, I shall cease now, in hopes of pleasing this esteemed personage."

This was received with a snort.

"That is not a pleased sound," Shizuru said with a quizzical frown. "I am stopping because of your opinion, you know."

Natsuki rolled her eyes, which gesture brought a small smile to the Shizuru's lips.

"No," Natsuki said. "You stopped because... because you are finished."

The smile on the Himean's face transmuted into a grin.

"You are too observant for your own good," she said with a giggle. "You have been watching me all this time, I see. I am flattered by such fervent attention. Gods know what I could have done to deserve it."

Laughter bubbled up from her throat when the girl turned red, looking away with an almost injured air.

"Do you deny it?" Shizuru baited. "You are right, you know. I am finished. I do not see how you could say it with such certainty unless you have been watching me. How nice to know that you do that."

Particularly since I do that to you too, she did not add. She did it now, finding endearing the sight of the other struggling awkwardly to say something. She was about to tease her a little more when Natsuki opened her mouth to speak.

"Because, it," the girl said. "It is muh-muh-my work."

There was a cluck from the older woman.

"Ah," she said. "Then you work harder than you need to."

There was an instant of silence where the girl looked up at her blankly, but it soon gave way to their simultaneous chuckles. Shizuru beckoned her closer afterwards, telling the younger woman to sit by her. When the Otomeian had lowered herself into the chair Shizuru had drawn up, they resumed talking. Or rather, Shizuru resumed talking, with Natsuki nodding and making sounds of comprehension, agreement, or reserved enquiry.

"These are actually the figures for the shares of booty thus far," the general of the northern expedition explained to her companion, whose hand she held on her lap. Her other hand was on the table, pointing out the notes on the papers she had been using. "We divide them according to set rates-the higher the rank, the larger the share of booty. Awards and notable valour in battle also merit higher shares, although cowardice-should there be an allegation of it-does not lower one's share of the spoils, for all that it does prevent it from becoming any larger. But the point is that this ensures all the legionaries have a fine reward for their work, separate from their actual pay."

She looked at the girl, who had her eyes on the parchment.

"I am uncertain as to whether or not you are familiar with this concept, Natsuki, of dividing the war spoils thus," she went on. "It escapes me, since you come from a different system of administration. Do you do the same?"

Natsuki nodded.

"I see."

"But."

"But?"

"We do this... um, a little different."

"Different?" Shizuru echoed. "How so?"

The other made another humming noise in the back of her throat, looking up to meet the crimson gaze of her commander.

"They can loot if permitted," she explained. "And their loot is theirs. They are permitted often."

"But?" Shizuru said again, smiling.

"Only officers get a share from the collected booty of-of the army. And the ones who fought well."

Shizuru considered this for a moment. One brow went up as a question came to her mind.

"And how do you determine who fought well?" she asked her companion. "Or, rather, who determines it?"

A slight tilt came to the girl's lips.

"We do," was her answer.

"By that, you mean the officers, I suppose? Or the nobility in the army?"

A positive sound.

"How interesting. I suppose, then, that everything else goes to the royal coffers?" the older woman inquired, to which Natsuki answered affirmatively again. She sighed. "Somewhat standard for monarchies, perhaps. Still, I hope that the set pay for your rankers is sufficient to make up for it."

She tapped a finger on the table.

"In any case, I am doing this now for several reasons. First, to make sure that the numbers are correct. Second, and more importantly, to be prepared to give the soldiers their scrips immediately if the situation should ever necessitate it. The numbers on the scrips have to be accurate, and so I revise the ledgers each time we come into more booty."

She paused to look at the girl, who nodded to show that she understood. Shizuru continued.

"You see, Natsuki, I do not know if this is the case for you as well, but a fair number of Himean soldiers rely primarily on their shares in war to get them through the rest of their lives," she said. "Their career is not a constant, after all, as war is largely an unpredictable variable. Thus they spend most of their years on the battlefield, hoping for a rich campaign to join. Most of them enter the army as members of the lower classes, if not the proletarii. If they make it through, all they have to fall back on when they are too old to fight will be their wages and proceeds from the battles they have fought, which they can use as seed money for small businesses. And if it is a long campaign they have fought, well, they can count on some kind of land grant later if they are lucky and their commander is conscientious."

The general took a deep breath, her expression suddenly turning dark.

"I want to be ready to give each one a scrip for his earnings at any time," she went on. "The standard practice for most campaigns is to wait for the army to return to Hime before distributing the scrips and dividing the wealth accordingly. The trouble with such a procedure is that the Treasury and the bureaucrats in government often step in and take over the accounting-with the result that the soldiers get much smaller shares due to the 'tax cuts'. Atrocious, really. The taxes do not go to the actual Treasury so much as to the officials concerned. Formalised gluttony at its best."

Having sneered at the faraway bureaucrats of her homeland's government, Shizuru suddenly brightened up. She turned a satisfied eye towards the ledger on the table, putting a hand on it.

"So what I shall do this time is what I did in my last campaign: distribute the scrips before the Treasury officials get here, to guarantee the soldiers' shares," she said. "Oh, yes, I daresay those money-hungry ineptes in the Senate shall cry foul again, but it shall matter little once I have done it. As for the Treasury, they shall not be able to complain. I have always given Hime her due, and am not about to cheat her now. I am going to be accused for 'cheating' due to it, can you believe that? Yet this is the only way I can be sure no cheating takes place. It is appalling for the government to swindle its people out of just compensation when they have bled for it," she said with a touch of anger, which vanished as quickly as it had appeared. She seemed to ponder for a moment, her eyes focusing on some distant point. There was a squeeze on her hand and she looked sideways, tumbling into depths of endless green.

"I seem to have gone on about it a little more than I intended," she said. "Forgive me, Natsuki."

She received a sombre look in response.

"You," Natsuki began, her tone soft but earnest. "You are a good person."

Shizuru actually stiffened at the compliment, a slight but all-too-warm flush rushing into her cheeks. She cleared her throat before letting out a half-mocking laugh.

"I am honoured that you think so," she told the other woman, who was wearing her usual serious countenance-or so Shizuru thought, until she saw a glint of amusement in the forest-cool eyes. "But I might be simply be doing this to protect my share of the booty as well, you know. It would be the largest, after all. Wealth is an excellent motivational force, often more so than good intentions. You should not rule out the possibility of my own selfish interests coming into play."

The girl shook her head with a shut-eyed, sage-like expression that amused Shizuru. The Himean asked the younger woman what made her so sure, and received an answer that amused her even more.

"You are rich."

Trying her hardest not to smile, Shizuru cast a grimace towards her companion.

"Am I?" she asked. "Who said so?"

Natsuki made a vague gesture, still as serious as before.

"Everyone," she answered.

"Ah." Shizuru made a droll look. "Everyone can be wrong, you know. What did I say about not always listening to everyone?"

Exhaling contentedly, she turned her companion's hand over in her lap. She tickled the bandaged palm and smiled when she felt the girl's fingers twitch before catching her hand.

"Rich..." she mumbled, leaning back into her chair and turning her head towards the ceiling. "Yes. Yes, I am, actually. It is no secret."

She peeked at her bodyguard from the corner of one eye.

"Do you find that interesting?" she asked.

Natsuki shrugged, a noncommittal response. Shizuru asked her to elaborate.

"I think," the girl replied, "you do not have to be rich to be interesting."

"And vice versa, I suppose," the older woman said with a tiny smile. "Somehow, I expected that answer from you."

Suddenly remembering something, she released the girl's hand and stood up, stalking over to the closet.

"It nearly slipped my mind," she said, opening the closet and reaching inside. "Do you recall when we went to pick up my naginata the other day? There was a dagger Usui-han showed us that you agreed with me was quite handsome-a very fine example of craftsmanship, in fact."

She returned to her seat, laying the object she had retrieved upon the table. It was a bundle wrapped in cloth and it made a dull but solid sound as she laid it on the wood. Natsuki spared the object a curious glance before looking at her charge once again.

"I liked it as well," Shizuru went on, while reaching out to unfold the package before her. "However, I did think its beauty would be supplemented by a few alterations, so I hesitated to take it then and there. You were occupied by one of the members of your division when I was giving Usui-han the instructions, so I suppose you did not hear them."

Her hands finally bared the object nestled within the white cloth, revealing the very dagger she had been speaking of. It was very slim, about a hand in length, and sheathed in a beautifully-worked scabbard of lustrous silver. The hilt, in contrast to the white metal of the sheath, was of ebony. Shizuru picked it up with a pleased sigh.

"This arrived yesterday, remember? I forgot to open it because we were going out just then," she said to the girl while inspecting the weapon in her hands. "Oh, he did it well! Lovely!"

She turned in her seat to face Natsuki, who was looking at her with a smile that seemed to say that she enjoyed Shizuru's pleasure. Shizuru tilted her head inquiringly at the younger woman.

"What do you think?" she asked. "Is it not a beautiful piece of weaponry?"

Natsuki nodded, then put on a bemused expression.

"But..." she said curiously, "what changed?"

It was Shizuru's turn to smile.

"Ah, yes. What changed?" she said mysteriously. "You cannot see it from that side, the way I am holding it. Here, take a look."

She handed the blade to her bodyguard, watching the younger woman carefully as the latter proceeded to study the weapon. Thus she saw the startled expression that came over Natsuki's face when she finally discovered the "alterations" Shizuru had ordered. To be precise, she saw their names together, carved into the black wood of the handle.

"I fancy it a definite improvement," Shizuru said casually, enjoying her companion's stunned face. "I shall have to remember to commend Usui-han for such fine work. Don't think so?"

She choked back a laugh when the girl looked up, a flabbergasted expression on her face. Shizuru enjoyed this bewilderment for a little longer before Natsuki finally spoke.

"This-our-" she started, obviously confused. She paused then and appeared to gather her wits, her brow furrowed with bewilderment. The older woman waited.

"Um, Shizuru," Natsuki finally said. "Why?"

Shizuru smiled easily.

"It is for you," she said, by way of explanation. "I got that for you, Natsuki."

She nearly drew blood from biting her tongue when she witnessed the other's reaction: a wide-eyed, open-mouthed expression like that of a shocked child. Adorable!

"I already purchased it so please do not refuse to take it," the older woman went on. "And I do not intend for it to pass into anyone else's hand."

She peered at the Otomeian woman, whose face was suffused with colour.

"Do you like it?" she asked.

This question seemed to rouse the other from her stupor. She turned another floored look towards the dagger before shooting up from her seat as Shizuru watched, surprised by the sight of Natsuki bowing deeply to her.

"Natsuki?"

"Thuh-thank you," Natsuki said, still keeping her head lowered. Her locks hid her face from view, but Shizuru had a feeling she had the countenance of someone lost for words. This feeling was validated when the Otomeian looked up, opening her mouth soundlessly. She settled for simply bowing from her waist again.

"It is-I-" she mumbled awkwardly. "Thank you."

What is she doing? Shizuru wondered, amused and amazed. It was so abrupt, the way Natsuki had just reverted to formality in order to express-albeit nervously-her gratitude. What did that mean? And that look on her face! It was almost as though she had never received a present before.

The notion made her start. Could that be possible? Had Natsuki never received a gift before? That was difficult to believe, particularly with her charms. But then again, it was entirely possible too that her demeanour would prevent anyone from getting near enough to give her a present. Still and all, this was unorthodox.

"Natsuki," she said quietly, reaching out to pull the girl back into the chair beside her. "It's all right. You do not need to... bow to me."

Having guided her bodyguard back to the seat, she took the dagger from the girl's grasp and laid it on the table. She then turned back and framed the younger woman's face with her hands, fascinated by the almost tangible feeling of emotion coursing underneath the skin.

"I am very happy you like it," she said. "And though that was a very fine show of gratitude, I must admit I would prefer it if you were not so formal. You do not need to be formal with me, remember?"

Natsuki nodded, still a little lost. Shizuru chafed the girl's cheeks with her thumbs. She was about to say more when she chanced to look into the green eyes, which were turned towards her with a moist expression that seemed to go all the way to the core of her Self.

She held her breath. How strange, she thought. She felt as though she was the one who should be grateful.

"Oh, yes," she said, her smile a little shaky in development. "I did promise to attend the dinner party so we should be getting ready."

She placed a gentle kiss on the girl's lips before releasing her face.

"You do not need to thank me any more, Natsuki. That will suffice."

She stood up and made as if to move away, but paused and turned back to look at the girl instead. She reached out and lifted Natsuki's chin with her fingers.

"When your king does something for you," she said, meeting the other woman's eyes. "Is that how you are expected to react, by any chance? The bow you made earlier?"

Natsuki blinked, her cheeks still somewhat pink.

"Mm," she answered, before saying: "His Majesty taught-taught me to-to do that."

"It is proper with one's, um, superiors. It is-is courtesy," she added a little later.

Shizuru nodded.

"I see," she said. "That is nice. It is good to be observant of the courtesies."

The younger woman smiled back, looking up at her with another nakedly adoring expression. Shizuru caught her breath again, stunned by how strangely this girl could make her feel and how honest the face she had once thought mysterious could become.

And I, with all my reservations and courtesies, she thought, am humbled by it.

She bent to bring her face closer to Natsuki's, suddenly wanting to feel the girl's breath on her skin. She needed, suddenly and for no apparent reason, to see the fine cracks in the roseate marble of Natsuki's lips, and to feel the familiar heat from Natsuki's blush.

"To tell you the truth, however," she whispered, once she was close enough to do all these things, "I do not really think there is a need to stand on either courtesy or ceremony. Let us dispense with them, shall we? We might have that between us, something that belongs only to us and which the world cannot moderate, out of propriety or modesty or whatever all these damnable authorities see fit to interject between our relation. We can have that to ourselves-it shall be for us alone. What do you say?"

"You want... no courtesy or ceremony?" the girl echoed, seeming intrigued by the idea.

"None."

"Buh-between us?"

"Exactly," Shizuru grinned. "It will be inter nos."

---

The Princeps Senatus of Hime was a very busy man. In the absence of both consuls and with no consuls-elect due to the postponement of elections, he was the one left to hold the dangling reins of the Senate: a considerable task given the tumultuous trend of political discourse recently. The absence of consuls was always a trying time for Hime, as the members of the upper class-most of them senators and politicians in office-were given to petty feuds within their ranks. Besides which, there was also an inclination for the more brash officials to attempt and arrogate more power to themselves given half a chance. Added to this was the standard fare for any official in government: a usually complaining public, senatorial fellows up to their elbows in all sorts of iniquities and illegalities, sticky legislation, and so on.

With such concerns hanging over his head, one might have thought that Reito Kanzaki would have little time for social engagements. But tonight he was at a social engagement and an informal one at that. It was a simple invitation to dinner that he had accepted from a friend. Or, at least, that was how he phrased it to anyone who happened to ask him earlier in the day. Had these people known who the invitation was from, they might have disagreed with his terming it "a simple dinner with a friend" and perceived shades of complication in it. For this friend-and his hostess for the night-just so happened to be Hime's urban praetor and the city's most senior magistrate at the moment.

"It's all so bothersome," he complained to her. "I was actually tempted to make my way over here by slinking along the shadows of the streets and just climbing over your wall in order to avoid being seen. Why is it that public grievances seem to coincide? I can hardly go anywhere without being followed by either clients seeking to air more of their petty concerns, or by some senator who wants my support for some asinine thing or other, dearest Chikane. And here you drag me out of my comfy hole!"

Chikane Himemiya let out a soft laugh.

"One would think the Princes of Hime would know the law of politics," she observed, "that one small stone dislodging itself from the rest soon sends more rolling downhill."

"That's true-and he does. He just wants to curse at it in his free time." He lifted an eyebrow at her, a teasing look on his handsome face. "And in your case? I hear the courts are a veritable hive of people these days, so I would think you suffering from a landslide yourself. Why, in fact, you've precipitated one!"

A look came to her face that seemed to indicate she was proud of that particular achievement. She said nothing, however, and merely tipped her head at him.

They were sitting in her study, having finished dinner a while earlier. The two of them reclined on cushioned chairs across each other, before a table set with wine. The wine was in a cut-glass decanter within which the ruddy-hued beverage shimmered, and Reito took a moment to admire the carafe, quite pleased by its clear and crystalline appearance. Glass absent blemishes was most valuable, and the carafe had none that he could detect. It made him want to turn it over in his hands to see what hidden distortions he could find.

"The bill for a second nomination period has set the House abuzz," he murmured, his voice having a complimentary tone. "As has your baffling silence on the subject of whether or not you shall avail of it once it passes, to run for consul. I'm actually excited to see what you'll be doing next, Chikane-chan. I'm sure you'll have me buzzing in no time too."

She regarded him with her usual languid, secretly humorous gaze.

"I wonder," she said. "Is that a good thing or not?"

"I meant it to be a good thing."

"Then I shall take your meaning, Reito-kun."

He smiled cheerfully, studying the woman before him. Having just admired her cut-glass carafe, he now went on to admiring her looks.

Reito had a particular appreciation for the urban praetor's style, which he secretly referred to as "a classic reinvented". Being a Himemiya, she had the naturally lofty air of that clan, as well as the long-limbed grace that manifested in her relatives' frames. But for all that the Himemiya were a beautiful people, she contrived to stand out even in their midst. Some thought it was the dark hair and eyes that she had taken from her mother, which set her apart from the classical blondes of her clan's crowd. The Princeps disagreed.

Rather, he thought, it was something else that she had most likely inherited from her mother too: an unconscious tragedy in her eyes, even in her usually-smiling mouth. There was something dramatic and dark beneath that calmness, something the numerous artists attempting to capture her visage in either sculpture or paint despaired of. Was it to be called "passion", perhaps? Was there even a precise word for it?

Whatever it is, it certainly makes her look terrifically decorative, he decided. Even the way she was sitting on the chair across him now seemed artistic, the drape of her long and very white hands over the arms of the seat almost too graceful. Yet it was wholly casual too, and he understood the thing that made her most appealing: that her drama was not manufactured, but real.

A deep woman.

His appraisal was interrupted by a knock on the door, which opened after a soft prompt from her.

"Chikane-chan."

Two blonde heads poked through.

"Himeko. What is it?" Chikane asked, getting up to meet her wife. She cast a teasing glance at the other fair-haired woman who had come in with her spouse. "Has Urumi been mean to you?"

The paler of the two blondes feigned a wounded air.

"I resent that, Cousin," she said. "I happen to have been behaving admirably ever since I returned, as you said so yourself earlier."

"All the more reason for us to be wary, Urumi-chan," Reito called from his seat. "It's rather like waiting for a rumbling volcano to erupt."

"Oh, not your volcano metaphor again!"

The company fell to laughter, which ebbed when Urumi opened her eyes innocently at Chikane. Among her most distinctive features-for one eye was a brown whereas the other was blue-they succeeded in fixing the older woman's gaze.

"I happen to like Himeko-chan," she stated openly. "So I you may rest easy there, Chikane. I wouldn't dream of playing any games with her."

Chikane smiled, whereas the Princeps snorted.

"That," he noted with a grin, "would have had so much more credibility were it not you speaking."

Urumi sniffed, looking at him from the corner of her blue eye.

"I am most honoured by your faith in me," she drawled solemnly, looking so very Himemiya that the rest smiled again.

"You remind me so much of Suou-chan when you do that," spoke up Chikane's wife, who was of warmer colouring than Urumi. She now looked up at her consort. "Doesn't she, Chikane-chan?"

"Yes, actually," the raven-haired woman replied. "So much so that they might as well have been sisters instead of cousins. They look more alike on occasion than Suou and I do."

She stopped and gazed affectionately at her wife.

"What was it you wanted, Darling?" she asked.

"Oh," Himeko said, smiling sweetly. "We were just wondering if we could go ahead to the festival, Chikane-chan. Urumi-chan says she wants to see this play and it could be starting soon." She stopped and cast a glance at her wife's guest, suddenly flushing. "I mean, if you don't mind, of course. If you want us to-"

"It's fine, Himeko," Chikane said, catching the smaller woman's fluttering hands. "Although we could go with you now if you wish. I am sure Reito-kun would not mind."

Reito nodded: "Of course, dear ladies."

"Oh, no!" Himeko protested, her pretty face suddenly set into determined lines. "You said you had something important to talk about with him, Chikane-chan."

She snapped her mouth shut after seeing the amused expressions surrounding her. She flushed hotly again.

"And I shouldn't have said that, should I?" she said timidly, looking mortified. Chuckles broke out from both Urumi and Reito at this, while Chikane smiled indulgently at her wife.

"No fear," she said, patting Himeko's cheek. "I was just about to bring it up, so you saved me the trouble, Dear. I should be thanking you for doing it for me."

Having reassured her wife, she turned to her cousin-who was also Reito's cousin, on the young woman's paternal side.

"If you are going now, I think you should take a carriage there," Chikane instructed. "Please avoid the crowds, if you can, Cousin. Try to get seats in front as well, for the play. You would enjoy it much better."

And though it was unspoken, there was also the other, perhaps most important message: Please look after my wife.

Urumi nodded, her heterochromic eyes showing that she understood.

"We shall follow you after a bit, all right?" Chikane said gently, addressing her wife once again. "I promise we shall not be long."

Her wife nodded, giving her a bright smile that seemed to almost tangibly warm up the room. The two blondes left shortly, with Chikane's injunction to "take four men along".

"Four men..." Reito was saying thoughtfully. "Rather extravagant for the occasion, Chikane-chan. Or are you expecting something?"

She shook her head.

"Not at all," she replied. "But I find nothing extravagant where my wife's safety is concerned. It actually reassures me somewhat that Urumi is with her, truth be told. They are fond of each other, and Urumi is particularly protective of those of whom she is fond. I can take comfort in the knowledge that any possible threats would be immediately perceived by our mutual cousin."

"Urumi is rather astute, after all," he said, drawing a chuckle from her. To say that their cousin was "rather astute" actually seemed an understatement, in light of the young woman's status as an intellectual prodigy. Urumi was said to be one of Hime's most promising citizens, and very well known among the intelligentsia. Then again, she was even more well-known among the social elite: being born of a union between a Kanzaki and a Himemiya, she held two of the most illustrious ancestries in her veins. That alone was enough to get you invited to every party worth visiting, in the young woman's own words to Chikane.

"She's mellowed out considerably, don't you think?" he went on. "Urumi, I mean. I suppose the trip to Egypt has done her good."

Chikane hummed noncommittally.

"Perhaps," she answered. "All the same, I would adjure you not to let your guard down."

"And let that little prankster trick me into something? Never again!"

"You say that each time you meet her," she cautioned. "And she tricks you each time, too."

He winced, wrinkling his brow.

"Unfortunately enough, that's true. Oh, the little wench," he said, giving in to a smile. "She's a terror, but I find it hard to stay mad at her, you know. I wonder why."

"Perhaps because it is difficult to consistently hate that which is similar to oneself?"

He chuckled.

"I'm hardly as much of a troublemaker as she is," he protested.

"I beg to differ: you may well be, in your own way."

"And you are not?"

Her lips twitched.

"Compared to the two of you," she told him. "I am nothing but a dull dog."

"I always thought," Reito rejoined with a speaking look, "that eagles suit you better."

"That is very kind of you."

"In any case, dull dogs do not really have such lovely wives as yours."

A soft gleam of pleasure showed in her eyes for his praise of her wife, as she had always been able to read him very well and could read now that he had said the compliment with perfect sincerity. She inclined her head.

"That is kind of you as well, for all that it is the truth," she replied, a touch of gravity suddenly coming to her voice. "Particularly as most of our fellow aristocrats seem to think my wife no better than a dog, dull or otherwise."

He scoffed quietly.

"Such people as those, on the other hand," he said with feeling, "are more suited to maggots. What a sorry way of thinking, if it's thinking at all!"

"As you say." The azure eyes sharpened and narrowed, suddenly flashing with a light less akin to sapphires than to the blue steel of a blade. "Sometimes, I admit I am sorely tempted to make them sorry."

His brow furrowed: "Then what prevents you from doing it, Chikane?"

Chikane grinned suddenly, looking sheepish. It was a rare expression for the eternally-assured woman.

"She does," she confessed, eliciting a laugh from the Princeps. "She says it little matters anymore, as we are already married anyway. I would object, were it not that she is more properly the injured party in this case, and hence has the prerogative to stay my hand on the matter of reprisal."

She shut her eyes contemplatively, exhaling a rueful breath.

"Himeko," she told him, "is altogether too sweet a creature when it comes to such things. It is just as well that the fact that she now bears my name prevents those curs from casting aspersions on her as directly as before, or as publicly as before. Were it up to me, they would no longer be able to do so in private either."

"So in effect," Reito said. "The choice lies with Himeko-chan?"

She nodded. He took a moment to look at her, seeming thoroughly entertained.

"You, My Dear Eagle," he said after a while, "are firmly under the cat's foot."

Chikane smiled her slow and languid smile.

"So I am," she allowed, tucking her hair daintily behind an ear. "Cats' feet are comfortable to be lying under, Reito-kun. You would do well to get a feline companion, yourself."

He started laughing again: "I'm allergic to cats, remember?"

"But not to red-haired ones," came the reply. He stopped laughing and looked at her. "How goes it with Mai-san?"

A telling flick of the eyes upwards and to one side.

"It goes," he said. "And then again, it might be gone."

Her eyes twinkled: "I see."

He made an attempt at a pitiful look, eliciting a giggle.

"I suppose you are feeling sorry for me?" he asked with a touch of humour. "I am being overtaken by my own-for lack of a better word-apprentice."

She made a sound in the back of her throat before picking up her goblet. She swirled the liquid inside when she held it, but did not take a sip.

"It is indeed unfortunate that it would be Tate-kun vying against you," she replied with a sympathetic smile. "But though I do feel for you, Reito-kun, I confess I see no reason to offer you pity. Not when you have so many of Hime's maidens battering on your doors to announce their availability."

He chortled at the slanted compliment.

"However," he said, "that makes me sound so capricious. As though I could leap so easily from one 'maiden' to the next."

Her winged eyebrows lifted now: "My apologies. But I admit to having seen no indication that you were so much in earnest with Mai-san."

"And now you wound me," he said jokingly, putting on a hurt expression. "I do have rather deep feelings for Mai Tokiha, you know."

"Then, shall I be indelicate?"

He smiled affably and held out his hands.

"What is indelicate among others is not so with friends," he said.

"Nor with family."

"Indeed," she said, nodding her head to acknowledge his acquiescence. "Would you perhaps submit that your affections are earnest enough to be love?"

"Perhaps."

"I see."

He nodded, folding both well-muscled arms across his equally well-muscled chest.

"Hence my, hmm, consternation at the likelihood of her favouring Tate more," he said with a wry smile. "Ah, for a mentor to be rejected in favour of the mentored... My dignitas is smarting terribly."

"So I imagine," Chikane replied. "But if I may point it out: your dignitas should be a trifling thing in this situation, were you really in earnest."

Reito chuckled good-naturedly.

"This coming from one who, at the age of eight, claimed dignitas to be paramount to everything else," he taunted.

"You mentioned it yourself: I was only eight," she answered. "What does an eight-year-old know of the world?"

"You were terrifically knowledgeable even then," he told her. "But, yes, I suppose I shouldn't oppose your words on solemnity in love at this point. I have little leverage, whereas you have the benefit of a certain starry-eyed young lady who gazes upon you as the moon."

"My dear Reito-kun-poetry!" She flashed impeccably white teeth. "I'm beginning to think you are earnest, after all."

"Why, thank you-though it doesn't alleviate my difficulty, does it?" he sighed with conscious drama. "You would think having what people deem a silver tongue would be of help in these situations, but no. All my 'sweet nothings' are nothing indeed. They don't get me anywhere."

She nodded, sipping noiselessly from her drink.

"If it is true that it does not get you anywhere with matters of the heart, at the very least it has served you well in matters of state," she said afterwards. "But then again, the latter category has always been less complicated than the former."

He smiled at her, perceiving her words for what they were: a prompt to begin their true discussion.

"Then we would do better to abandon this topic momentarily-delightful as it is," he returned. "It's high time we moved on to the matters of state, as you suggest." He paused for an instant to give her allowance to protest, though it was given that she would not. "May I ask how your bid for the consul's chair is going?"

She made a vague motion with her head: "It goes well, I am happy to say."

"So well, in fact, that your election may be taken as inevitable," he said complacently. "I suppose you already have plans for what to do once you actually get to the consular chair?"

She smiled: an affirmation.

"May I hear some of them?" he asked, knowing this to be her intention in inviting him.

She lifted her cup to her lips, saying before she drank: "I have so many things in mind. Like, for instance, a land bill."

"A land bill?"

"Yes." She set the chalice back onto the table, playing with its stem while throwing Reito the swift, subtle grin of a conspirator. "I wish to requisition land sometime, for eventual distribution to retiring soldiers, as compensation for their services to the State."

He returned the smile: "I understand."

"How fortunate."

"May I also understand that this is for a certain red-eyed friend?"

"You may do so."

He made a thoughtful sound.

"Did she ask you for this?" he queried.

"No," came the answer. "Or to be exact, not yet."

"But she will, eventually." He thought it over for a few moments, nodding all the while. "Yes, you're right in telling me this, Chikane. Best to begin canvassing for support now. These land bills are thorny things. The senators usually become tetchy come time to discuss them."

"That is what I thought."

He looked up at her: "You have my support, of course."

She bowed her head slightly and said, "Then you have my gratitude."

The Princeps grinned, a lock of hair falling over his brow making him seem boyish as he lifted an eyebrow at her.

"Was that all?" he asked. "It wasn't, was it?"

She shook her head, giving him that dreamily enigmatic smile that had been the cause of many a politician's frustration and many a racing heart. Even he, who had practically grown up with her and her sister, could not help but feel ensnared by the expression. It only added to her sheen, he thought, that beneath the silky exterior was layer after layer of tempered steel. She really was a formidable woman. Why did it seem like he was always surrounded by formidable women?

Or could it simply be that all women are formidable?

He sighed inwardly at the notion.

"Please go on," he told her.

"I would like to push a resolution."

"A resolution?"

"To annex the lands of the Mentulaeans."

That actually shocked him, and before he knew it, he was leaning forward in his chair.

" Edepol! " he exclaimed. "That's daring! "

Chikane said nothing, merely inclining her head as though to thank him for a compliment. Her eyes were fixed on his stunned face, a twinkle in them indicating her enjoyment of having surprised him.

"War?" he said in a low tone. "A full-scale invasive war with the Mentulaean Empire?"

She nodded. There was a short silence, then, as he took some time to come to grips with what she had just affirmed. She watched in silence all the while, occupying herself with sipping from her cup every now and then.

At length, he ceased his private deliberations and met her gaze with a serious one.

"It shall be extremely difficult," he said slowly. "Very, very hard, if not impossible, to convince the House."

She smiled genially at him, not at all troubled.

"Then I am indeed fortunate that I have its Princeps before me now," she said. "Would you not say so?"

He could not suppress a smile.

"All right then," he said, settling back into his chair in surrender.

"Let's have it! But first of all, from whom does the idea originate?"

"As a pious Himean," she replied, "I should say it arises from the gods."

Reito had the grace to laugh.

"And," he said with a smirk, "as a very shrewd politician with an unfortunate tendency to prevaricate?"

She lifted her eyebrows.

"You misunderstand me," she said. "When I said it originated from the gods, I meant that it was they who put it into my mind. As I can speak for my own consciousness alone and that of no one else, you may well infer my answer."

"Then allow me to put the question directly: Shizuru-san wouldn't happen to agree with this course?"

"I am fairly certain she would." She paused meaningfully. "Or rather, she shall."

"I see," he replied, nodding several times. "So you put the proposition to her but her answer is yet forthcoming?"

Her smile widened.

"I submit it shall be a yes," she stated with certainty.

He was the one lifting eyebrows this time.

"I thought you could not speak of anyone else's consciousness but your own?" he teased.

"We speak now of probabilities," she rejoined. "Not of certainties of consciousness, which is the far more abstract subject of the two, for all that probability is something of a floating concept as well."

"And now I'm being defeated at my own game," he said, giving her a comically overwhelmed expression. "Perhaps you should have been the Princeps, my dear Chikane. You confuse even me with your verbal play, on occasion."

"I thank you for the compliment, dubious as it is."

They laughed easily before going back to the topic at hand.

"This is a great undertaking," he told her, narrowing his eyes at the table as though the issue were to be seen there. "And a very controversial one."

"All great undertakings are controversial," she replied equably. "And most controversies, Reito-kun, are also inevitable."

She fixed him abruptly with an intense gaze, which would have startled him had he not witnessed it several times before.

"You are the Princeps and have to deal with foreign relations more often than the rest of the House," she stated. "You know this as well as I do, having been witness to the trouble the Mentulaeans have been giving us thus far."

"Yes, yes," he said, with a conceding tone. He twisted his lips, looking conflicted about the matter. "But still, even when I was thinking of ways to settle them, I had not thought to go as far as annexing all their lands, Chikane."

"Then perhaps you are losing your balance and teetering into the conservative, Reito-kun."

He made as if to draw back, hands raised in surrender.

"Now, now," he told her jokingly. "I'm not about to join the Traditionalists yet! I am merely thinking it over. I grant that the Mentulae are becoming tiresome, but do you really think such a grand measure necessary? We shall be taking on an empire, Chikane."

She inhaled, sliding suddenly back into her usual lazy demeanour as she gave him an assured smile.

"There, in fact, is the argument," she told him. "I adjure you to think on your own words then: the foe is an empire. Have not the greatest threats to Hime in the past come from united peoples and nations abutting our territories? From what were, for most purposes, empires?"

"Yes. But why provoke a threat any more than we need to?"

She shook her head slowly.

"Certainly a full-scale and invasive war seems an overdone measure," she allowed. "But only if you think in terms of the immediate. Think, old friend, of the future . Can you honestly tell me that you cannot imagine the Mentulaeans trying to spill over our borders in the north within a decade? Remember your own words, Princeps: the fires of Vesuvius may reach even our shores then. And Shizuru-ah, she may beat them back for now and purchase valuable time for us by crippling them for the moment. But the instant they heal, they shall focus their energies upon doing the same or worse to us. Does that sound like something we should chance?"

She halted to allow her words to sink in.

"We cannot afford to give the Mentulaeen hound time to lick its wounds in retreat," she continued, eyes flashing once more. "The more time we give them, the more time they have to grow and gather strength for their assault. The only recourse is to defeat them decisively, completely, so that they never pose a threat again. We know they are an enemy: we knew it the moment they tripped over the border and invested Argentum. So the enemy has been identified, and it has even struck. We have wounded it in turn. But one does not wound an enemy one cannot kill. Hence we must kill ." She glanced feelingly at him. "Would you gainsay this?"

He took his time answering, still caught up in debating with himself.

"And suppose," he said finally, "that I did gainsay it? What would you do then, Chikane? What if I refused to give you any aid in this?"

She smiled.

"I submit I would seek other allies," she told him.

"Supposing you have difficulty there as well? Would you still pursue this course?"

"I submit I would."

"Even if, say, I and the rest oppose you?"

"I submit not you nor the rest of the House would stop me."

He began laughing heartily, her soft chuckles joining him.

"Jupiter, but you submit with such confidence!" he told her, tears in his eyes. "Yes, of course I agree with you, Chikane. There's great justice in what you say, and there's sense in it. I'll lend what support I can give."

"I am most grateful," she told him. "It is always good to have you on our side."

"Likewise," he said, dabbing at the corners of his eyes. "Shizuru-san is to be given command in the 'Great Northern War' or whatever you plan to call this, I take it?"

"Of course."

"Are you sure you do not want it yourself? You are going to be the consul, after all, and have even more right to it."

"No, Shizuru may have it," she said positively.

"I see. Your aim is to take command of the war in the Senate?"

"Would you prefer to do so yourself?" she asked, eyes twinkling.

He pretended to be daunted by the prospect.

"Certainly not," he answered humorously. "I know enough by now to let formidable women have their will when it comes to such sensitive enterprise-the fairer sex has the better touch, as the poet says, and this is doubly true come the two of you, whether in the subtleties of politics or the brutalities of war."

He reached for his cup, lifting it in salute.

"No, you and Shizuru-san are most welcome to be the ringleaders, My Dear. Anyway, it would be ungentlemanly of me to even try to usurp the seats of command from the two of you."

She laughed when he added: "It would be ungentlemanly of me too if I did not at least pull out the chairs."

Chapter 21

Vocabulaire:

1. Adoption (rules of) and families - Romans belonged to both the families of their mothers and fathers, but their names often meant that they were officially listed as members of one gens (family). For example, Gaius Julius Caesar was related to the Aurelii through his mother, but his name meant that he was primarily a member of the gens Julii Caesares (through his father). Hence his paterfamilias (s.v.) was the head of the Julii Caesares, and not that of the Aurelii.

As Hime is not a patriarchal society, this custom has been altered. Here, a character may take as his or her primary family that of either the mother or the father. The main gens to which one belongs is important, since it determines one's status (Patrician/Plebeian), among other things.

If a person were adopted into another family, he would gain a new name and be listed/recognised officially as a member of the adopting family instead. So if a Gaius Julius Caesar were adopted by a Cornelius, he would become a Gaius Cornelius Caesar (or something to that effect). Do not be misled by the retention of "Caesar" in the name, by the way: it is merely a cognomen, not a family name.

2. "Argos with Io" - A reference to the myth of Argos or Argos Hundred-eyes, a creature said to have eyes all over his body. He was tasked by the goddess Juno to watch over a woman named Io. He was a near-perfect watchman because of his many eyes: he had eyes even in the back of his head, and was able to keep some eyes open even as some of them closed in rest. Near-perfect because the god Hermes/Mercury was still able to steal Io away from him by lulling all of his eyes to sleep. Hence the other name the Greeks have for Hermes/Mercury, by the way: Argeiphontes.

3. College of Pontifices - The official association of pontifices (s.v.); a state body. It had power over several very important things, such as the task of ensuring that the calendar would coincide with the seasons, the proclamation of holidays, the approval of lex curiata (s.v.), and so on.

4. Crossroads college ( s ) - Gathering places for the associations of men/women who were tasked with protecting crossroads (i.e. intersections) of Rome's roads. The crossroads were held to be a sacred place, and frequented by supernatural energies such as that of the goddess Hecate, so the Romans paid great attention to their care. The members of crossroads colleges were from the lower classes, and often formed (fairly violent) gangs or fraternities.

5. Cunni, cunnus - A slang term for the female genitals; profanity/insult.

6. Demagogues and their relation to the office of the tribune-of-the-plebs - Most effective tribunes-of-the-plebs were outright demagogues, since plebeian tribunate meetings were usually determined by the support of the people attending-who had an overwhelming number of the lower classes.

7. Epicure - A term that originally stood for someone adhering to the Epicurean theory of pleasure, the meaning soon became perverted into something equivalent to a sybarite. The Epicureans were not as simplistic in their treatment of pleasure as the later, perverted sense of the word suggests. In this chapter, the meaning used is the second one, more common to that which we have today: someone who simply lives for and with pleasure, without the exquisitely refined approach that the original Epicureans actually prescribed.

8. Lex curiata - A law or resolution carried through the curiate assembly that could make adoption legal.

9. Paterfamilias/Materfamilias - The actual Latin term is paterfamilias, which means "head of the family", who should be consulted for all major decisions made by other family members. Materfamilias is added here to adjust it to the setting, since Hime is not a patriarchal society.

10. Pontifex Maximus - Head of the College of Pontifices; high-priest of Rome.

11. Pontifices (pl.), p ontifex (s.) - An official priest of Rome. They were generally members of the senatorial families and members of Senate themselves. The priesthood was usually passed down through the family line, though there were some periods where it was acquired through election.

12. Stoic – Term generally understood in those times as referring to those adhering to the philosophical school that prescribed indifference to sorrows as well as discomfort, thus explaining why most of the Stoics preferred to live in a "simple" (as opposed to extravagant) fashion.

Inter Nos

The Fujino army spent eight more days in Sosia, finishing preparations for the march to Argus and putting the local garrison in order. By evening of the last day, everything had been settled, every order acknowledged, and every legionary's gear and provisions accounted for. All that remained was to verify the movements of their foes, which the commander had seen to with her scouts. These scouts returned early morning of the eighth day. It was the result of their reconnaissance that Shizuru, her senior legate, and the Ninth's primipilus now discussed as they relaxed after their dinner.

"The reports all say the same thing, Shizuru-san," the senior legate said. "The Mentulaeans have retreated completely to their more western territories on their side of the border. With good reason. Some of their regions are having a whiter winter than we are. I'd say there's little to no chance of them coming out for a while."

"So I think," Shizuru said.

"They'll probably stay within their borders until the thaw."

"Our march to Argus should be straightforward then." Shizuru tapped a finger on the table. "Truth be told, I was expecting as much."

"It's better to be safe," Chie agreed before sighing deeply. "We can go through as planned. But, you know, I'm pretty tempted to go and lead an expedition into their territories right now. What with them being all bundled and cosy for the winter, this would be a perfect time to spank these fat hounds in the rear."

"I seem to recall an aphorism," Shizuru said, "saying that one should let sleeping dogs lie."

"You wouldn't like to do it, then?"

"I did not say that," came the reply. "After all, the aphorism does not apply to rabid dogs, in my point of view. In such cases, needs must strike them dead where they sleep."

"Now I like the sound of that," their other companion cheered suddenly, her acid eyes flashing. "The general tells it like it is, eh, Chie?"

Chie and Shizuru smiled at the primipilus.

"Happy as I am to receive your approval, I fear I shall disappoint you, Nao-han," Shizuru cautioned. "Much though I would like to carry out such an expedition, I have no intent of doing so. Just yet, anyway."

She held back a chuckle at the suddenly intense attention she received.

"Wait, wait, wait," Chie chanted, holding a finger up as though to make a point. " Just yet? You just said that, didn't you? Tell the truth, now."

Shizuru was tickled: "I was not about to deny it."

"What you said is just tantamount to intent of invasion."

"Why, so it is."

"Well, I'll be damned!"

Having exclaimed this, Chie turned to Nao.

"You heard her, right?" she asked with droll excitement, soft brown eyes dancing. "She just sat there and said it. I wasn't imagining that."

Nao pointed her feral grin at them.

"This is the first time I've heard you say that," Chie said to Shizuru. "You're usually so cautious about it, Shizuru-san. All this time you've been saying we don't have any intention of going into their lands. I was beginning to wonder if you'd truly be content to play a defensive the game the whole time, especially when we'd just been condemned to stay in the north indefinitely by the Senate."

She spoke quickly to forestall protest when she saw her general's lips part.

"Yes, I know you're going to say that all you said just now was that you would like to do it-and barring the 'just yet', actual intention and desire are different. But you've never even spoken of this desire," she told the younger woman. "I've been waiting all this time for you to talk about the possibility of a foray into Mentulae territory, and here, when I finally don't expect it-bam!"

She snapped her fingers.

"That's a surprise bombardment, I daresay!" she concluded. "Just when I thought your ambitions were fading away, they hit me like a boulder from our catapultae. Consider me broken, bamboozled and blasted."

Shizuru regarded her laughingly.

"All right," she said. "I suppose I was trying to be politic, Chie-han. After all, our expedition's tasks did not include a description of going into enemy territory. Even if I have been entertaining the idea in my mind for a while now, it seemed better to keep it to myself."

She smirked and finished: "Particularly for the sake of my ambitions, as you put it. Surely you know why."

"Because it might rankle some people," Chie responded, with a long-suffering smile. "The Traditionalists might not have minded it before if you did try it at the start, though, I think. That was when they were still giddy about having undermanned you."

"Ah," Shizuru said. "You mean because they would have been counting on my defeat then?"

"More or less, though we both know the chances of that would have been slim. Still, after all you've achieved on this campaign, they won't be keen to cut you any more slack."

"Oh, I get it," Nao cut in. "It's even more dangerous for the general to talk about trying it now because our campaign's been going well."

"Exactly. She's shown what she can do even when grossly undermanned."

"The malicious cunni are afraid of being overshadowed by another 'impossible achievement' from her, right?"

"That's the gist of it. So she can't even make a reckless comment in front of someone about considering the matter, or the conservatives back home could get wind of it. They'd be on her like dogs on the chase."

"Jealous fu-

Shizuru coughed, interrupting the vulgarity on Nao's tongue as well as the pair's conversation.

"All that you have mentioned considered," she began, "nothing in our situation has changed beyond the fact that you have actually heard me make such a comment-which is not a reckless one, I hope, in view of the fact that we are in a closed room and close company. My saying it does not mean anything great. We are still not going to invade the Mentulaeans, unless the House gives us sanction to do so."

"And a lot more troops, General."

"And a lot more troops, Yuuki-han."

Chie smiled wryly and finished the thought for them all: "Which they haven't and don't seem about to do anytime soon."

"Indeed."

"It's too bad!" the legate uttered, shaking her head vigorously. "Don't get me wrong: I agree taking on an empire their size is a bit daunting. But now that I've seen the quality of their commanders and armies, I daresay I don't feel as daunted as before. And this would be such a perfect time to strike too, when the scouts tell us the Mentulae are lazy with hibernation."

"They're probably snowed in, though," Nao warned. "So it could be a hard hike for us, too, say, if we were going and invading them now. Anyway, it's a good thing it's stopped coming down where we are. I've had about all I can take of the white stuff."

"Ah, the famously hardy Centurion Yuuki," Chie crooned maliciously, attention quickly switching to her friend's complaint. "Bothered by a little white stuff. So much for being hardy, eh?"

"Oh, go pluck feathers from some bird's arse."

"Quills, for the hundredth time."

"Whatever you call it, you still pluck it from a bird's arse." Having delivered this retort, the redhead wiggled her eyebrows at the other two women. "But I'll follow your lead just this once, Harada. I think I will go and pluck feathers from some bird's arse, later."

The legate stared incredulously at her.

"Whatever for?" she cried. "I've never seen you write anything other than your name on a scrip!"

"What do you think I am, illiterate?" Nao said dryly.

Chie repressed a smile, knowing very well that Nao was not only literate but also literate in the language of the educated: Greek.

"I do not think," Shizuru offered, "that you truly took her meaning, Chie-han."

A few seconds passed, after which Chie burst out into an explosive guffaw.

"Oh, that's what you meant? Heavens, Yuuki," she said, between chortles. "It's the day before we leave Sosia and you think of that ? You're a classic, if ever there was one."

The primipilus grinned shamelessly and propped her chin up with one hand.

"Why not?" she said. "Like you said, Chie, I've got a name for being hardy. Playing around with a little bird tonight isn't going to make me so tired I can't march tomorrow."

"Oho! You do have your eye on someone in particular?"

"Just one a friend told me about. One of Makaku's." She turned to Shizuru then and explained succinctly: "Whorehouse in the city, General."

"I see," Shizuru replied, not at all fazed. "How interesting. It stands to reason that Nao-han would prefer a professional."

"Oh, yes . And this professional's said to be amazing-especially with women," Nao went on candidly. "I thought I could give it a try, since we'll be going tomorrow. Might as well have some fun on the last night."

"A reasonable proposition."

"Very reasonable, is what I think," Nao leered. "I hope she finds my demands reasonable too, later."

"I wish you well in the enterprise."

"I thank you kindly for the good wishes."

Chie sniggered at the exchange.

"I'm almost frightened for the woman, you lecher," she teased the primipilus. "It's just like you to do this at such a time, though."

Nao rolled her eyes.

"Stop playing at abstinence-it don't work that well, Harada. You can come along if you want, you know," she shot back. "But I already booked that girl for tonight so you'll have to find some other little bird to satisfy your needs. Or you can ask around with the farmers here if they have a spare duck they can lend you. I'm sure you'll have fun plucking it clean."

"Not only a lecher but a pervert," Chie answered sardonically, ignoring their general's muffled laughter. "I don't know why you even bother asking me, really. You already know that I can't. Besides which, I wouldn't."

She paused and added quickly, to their amusement: "And to be clear, I'm not only talking about being unfaithful to Aoi when I say that. That crack about a duck was just nasty."

"Suit yourself," Nao replied,. "It's your loss if you don't want to have a little enjoyment before the march. I'd ask the general if she wants to come along too, but..."

She trailed off here, bringing a smile to Shizuru's lips and a frown to Chie's.

"Don't infect her with your lechery," the latter pretended to scold Nao. "Shizuru-san's above that."

The general smirked at her officers.

"Am I?" she said.

"Are you going to protest, Shizuru-san?" Chie asked provocatively. "It would make my day if you did."

"It is eminently difficult to do so, given that you gave your earlier statement in what I take to be a defence of my virtue."

"Partly, though I'm also just saying what most people think, or think they see," Chie replied. She looked pointedly at the primipilus. "Nao would agree with me."

"We-ell, since you bring it up," Nao said in answer, before turning to smile at their commander. "It is pretty strange how you manage to stay out of it, General. Fact, it's godlike. I avoid relationships too, but I still need to get this sort of thing every now and then, else my bones start rattling something awful. But you don't even seem to need this much, at least."

Shizuru chuckled.

"I wonder now," she said with typical lack of commitment. "Do you think I really seem like that?"

"Why?" Chie asked once again. "Were you about to deny it?"

"Would it be of such moment if I did?"

"To someone like Chie, anything that's fodder for tittle-tattle is of 'such moment'," Nao said. "So you'd better watch it, General."

"I think I resent that," Chie said, seeing the opportunity for probing further into the mystery that was her young friend. "But Nao brings up a good point, Shizuru-san. You're definitely no Stoic-though I'll grant you aren't exactly an Epicure, either-yet you manage to resist what those philosophers call 'the urges of the flesh'. Or is 'resist' even the right word? You seem almost immune to it. I don't think I've ever heard you talk about such things, after all, let alone give any indication of being interested in them."

She opened her eyes wide and continued: "Even if Nao says it's a godlike quality, I actually think it's beyond godlike. Why, some have it that even the gods give in to the demands of their flesh, divine though it is!"

"The Greek Zeus being a particularly good case in point, I suppose," Shizuru answered drolly. "But even if we pretend that my situation is as you make it, I confess I see no reason for such an immunity to be laudable. The realm of Eros is not always opposed to virtue, and may well supplement it on many occasions."

"You speak with such authority," Chie teased. "Does it actually come from experience, then?"

"Not necessarily. It is entirely possible I have abstracted what I said from something I read before. If so, I cannot remember who said it originally. How silly of me. To quote or paraphrase an author without giving him credit is terrible, after all, even in casual conversation."

She put on an apologetic expression.

"Mayhap it is little suited to me to speak of this," she ventured. "Given that the general impression of me-as you say-is that I am isolated from the present subject, I fear that my words shall carry no authority with them if I do pass comment. As such, I might have to resort to using the authority of another yet again, and even if I do quote them correctly this time, it still seems highly improper."

Chie suppressed the exasperated smile threatening to break out on her face, conscious of Nao reining back a snigger. She and the primipilus were both after the same suspicion, of course, but it was beginning to be abundantly clear that neither of them would obtain something close to confession from their commander. How could one get anything even credibly suggestive from Shizuru Fujino that she would not offer herself? The only possible way-and one not likely to receive a proper answer, even-would be to ask her frankly about it, and that would be too crude. Not even Nao would ask such a thing of their general, and when even Nao refrained from doing something, that was sufficient to argue against the attempt of it. Oh, what to do, what to do! She would have trouble sleeping out of sheer curiosity!

Though if not from her, then perhaps...

She cast a furtive glance at the young woman sitting next to Shizuru. That character's beautiful but impassive face was devoid of interest in their talk, however. Her attention was directed to the open window, and though Chie looked the same way, she could not see what was so interesting about the plain view of dark sky.

Seeing the girl like this made Chie see the folly of her idea. Sphinxes put riddles to you, not the other way around!

Her shoulders relaxed as she decided to abandon her quarry for the moment. If Shizuru was set on skirting around it, then there would be no use in trying to force the topic. Chie would only get her answer when her friend was ready to give it-as always.

She looked said friend in the eye.

"I meant to talk about this earlier," she said. "We're going to be wintering in Argus, no? What are your plans for after that, Shizuru-san?"

Shizuru turned to the other Himean with them and asked what she thought the plan would be, if nothing at all changed with their present situation where Senate was concerned.

"Set up in Argus," came the centurion's reply. "Rest during the winter. Wait for the Mentulae to attack one of our garrisoned points."

"Correct thus far. And then?"

"Then it's anybody's guess," Nao said, throwing her hands up in surrender. "I'm not sure what you want to do after that, General. If I had to say, though, I'd say you'll use the smallest tiptoe they make on our side of the borders to convince the Senate to finally give us permission to run the bastards to the ground on their own turf. And to give us more funds and soldiers, while they're at it."

Shizuru's face lit up.

"You have a better head for politics than you yourself admit, Yuukihan," she said.

"Thank you, General, though it's not the sort of thing I'd enjoy."

"The trouble with that scenario Nao's just described," Shizuru's fellow senator interjected, "is that even if the House is eventually persuaded, their deliberations before that may take so long we'll be in a tight spot before it's over. And even the mere fact that we'll have to wait for the enemy to make the first move means that we're already in a tight spot to begin with."

She eyed Shizuru suspiciously.

"Knowing you, Shizuru-san," she said, "you've already thought of that far ahead of me. That means there's something you know that we don't."

Shizuru smiled.

"Possibly," she said. "Were the latest news from Hime here, you would no doubt get a hint of it. But as the mail has yet to arrive and may take a while longer, I suppose it is best for me to tell you already. You see, Chikane Himemiya has decided to run for consul."

After the initial bewilderment had given way, a flurry of questions was shot at her by the senior legate.

"What made her decide? Were you involved? And how is that even possible?" Chie asked. "The nominations are way past. Even if the elections are postponed, it's not acceptable to put yourself up for candidacy after the stipulated period is over."

"Not any longer, I expect," Shizuru said. "Her tribune-of-the-plebs shall make it possible by legislating a second nomination period. I am uncertain as to what justifications Chikane has instructed Kaneda Izumi to use for his argument, but knowing Chikane, it should come through."

"She told you this in the letter we received last time," Chie guessed.

"Correct."

Chie shook her head in disbelief.

"Jupiter, she'll destroy some people's plans this year," she said. "I thought she'd go take a province first before going after the consul's chair, so this is really unexpected-but what a development! If she does run, she'll carry all the votes with her! The other candidates will be gnashing their teeth!"

"She'd make a better consul than all the other candidates put together."

The centurion concurred.

"Don't know her the way you do, of course," she said, "but I know about her. Good general, clean politician. And my friends at the crossroads colleges talked about her, since she was urban praetor when we left. They like her, and that's rare."

"Of course they would like her," Shizuru replied warmly, being very fond of this particular friend.

"Then it's good she's on our side, General," Nao answered. "Don't know her, so can't say more."

"Given that I do know her, allow me to say this much then: there can be no question of my faith in Chikane," Shizuru responded. "She told me she shall do all she can to acquire what we need for a proper campaign. Beyond or within the House, she is one of the few people of whom I can always be certain."

"You've been friends since childhood, after all," Chie noted, before saying teasingly: "Since nearly the same can be said for us, dare I hope your statement applies to me as well?"

"Naturally, you are another of those whom I trust in the same way."

"I'm glad to hear that. I suppose Reito-san is one of the others in House?"

Shizuru looked genuinely surprised.

"Why, no, not really," she replied, to Chie's astonishment. "Not to say that I distrust him. I simply do not trust him as much as I do you or Chikane, for example."

"Why's that?"

Shizuru thought it over.

"It is not due to any concrete experiences or suspicions, of course," she explained to them. "Nor do I think Reito-han an untrustworthy man, or anything of the sort. It is rather that he is a too much of a true politician. Do they not say that one should never turn one's back on a true politician?" she asked with humour.

"I don't see," Chie said. "How does Himemiya, for instance, compare? I always thought her a true politician too, you know."

"Oh, yes," Shizuru said. "But I am afraid I was not speaking of their skill in the political sphere and its games, or at least, not exclusively that. I meant, rather, their natural dispositions, among other things. At any rate, the resultant difference lies in the fact that where I would always easily entrust my life to Chikane, I would not have such consistency with Reito-han. To expand my earlier phrase, I have no trouble having my back to her, whereas I would follow the example of Argos with Io if it comes to him. To be honest, I would actually rest easier with Kazuya Kurauchi-han behind me-even if he is from the opposite camp."

Chie took a moment to respond.

"I'm not sure I understand," she said. "But my feeling goes with your opinion, I think."

Nao snorted, drawing their attention.

"I can put it plainly for you, Harada," she said. "What she means is that this Reito Kanzaki's a slick bastard. Knowing where you stand with him is just as dependable as knowing where you stand on marble slathered with oil."

The other two laughed.

"No steady footing, eh?" Chie said between sniggers. "Oh, that was good, Yuuki!"

"The simile is amusing," Shizuru agreed. "I do feel a little sorry for Reito-han, though. Marble slathered with oil, indeed."

"I was going to say 'slippery ice' instead of that at first, General," Nao said, before suddenly flicking a meaningful look at the general's bodyguard-who happened to miss the gesture. "But then I thought someone here might be insulted, you know."

The other two Himeans stifled chuckles.

"Careful, Yuuki," Chie warned. "You're treading on thin ice."

"Oh? Based on the lack of reaction, I'd say it's pretty thick."

"So the fisherman said, right before a wrong step found at him at the bottom of the lake," the other woman returned, setting off another round of laughter. She let them chuckle first before going on.

"Anyway, going back to our topic, I'm glad to know what you just told us, Shizuru-san. About Chikane-san's running for consul, I mean, and her dedication to our cause. It's reassuring stuff."

Shizuru nodded.

"Our reservations about the Princeps aside, he is going to be part of our camp, right?"

"I believe so, but I have no word on that yet. At any rate, I am certain Chikane-han shall see to him."

"Oh, excellent," Chie nearly purred with contentment. "Well, this means I have more to look forward to after the winter. Having the head of the Himemiya pulling the strings-as consul, too!-is going to be perfect. It definitely makes life easier for us."

The primipilus suddenly grinned at this remark.

"With the people she has to deal with, though," she told them shrewdly. "I don't think you can say it makes life any easier for her."

---

In Hime, the subject of Nao's dry note was regarding her cousin with a blank expression. Her hand was hovering above a scroll on her desk, having frozen halfway in picking it up. She held this pose a little while longer before finally letting her palm rest on the rolled-up parchment.

"Forgive me, but just to be sure I heard you correctly," she said at length. "You are asking me to procure permission from the College of Pontifices allowing you to be adopted?"

The young woman seated across from her nodded. Chikane's eyes narrowed in response.

"Adoption is a serious thing, Cousin," she went on to say. "And not something to be played with. I sincerely hope this is not another of your games, Urumi?"

The other feigned hurt.

"No, it's not," she assured the raven-haired woman.

"Then forgive me for asking this again, but I wish it to be clear: you aspire to be adopted formally by another family?"

"Mm-hm, yes, that is the general idea. Does this conclude the interrogation?"

"Hardly! What imp put this into your mind?" Chikane asked, losing a laugh. She shook her head with wonder. "Your idiosyncrasies do fascinate me, Urumi. Kanzaki is not really a family name most people would want to be rid of."

Urumi shut her eyes at this comment and smiled, more to herself than the woman before her.

"Not to mention Himemiya, hmm?" she said cannily, peering at Chikane from her blue eye while keeping the brown one shut. "But it's not like I am actually ridding myself of either name, you know. I will still be known as Urumi Himemiya Kanzaki, with only another surname added. Of course you're right-I will still be giving up my status as belonging primarily to the Kanzaki family. But that is hardly a great sacrifice for me. I need to do this if I am to get where I want to be, right now. It's nonnegotiable, unfortunately."

"That must be a remarkable place you wish to reach indeed, if even the combined weight of the Kanzaki and Himemiya names cannot get you there."

"Something like that."

"Do tell me whose name you intend to take."

"My friend Tomoko's. You remember her, don't you?"

"Nemura-san?" Chikane said, her mind recalling an extraordinarily lovely, if rather foolish face. "An old and very respectable family, I see. Old plebeian stock, I believe?"

"Yes."

"Your peer in age."

"Yes, though not in ability. She's awfully dull, to be honest." A faint smirk. "But Tomoko has her own talents."

"Ah." Chikane eyed her thoughtfully, guessing that she was talking about the girl's considerable physical assets. "Correct me if I am wrong, but is she not...?"

"An orphan like me, yes," Urumi continued, with a complacent smile. "That simplifies things, don't you think? Since she has no paterfamilias or materfamilias to hamper her, it should be a simple process for her to adopt me. She's already agreed to do it, in case you're wondering."

"And agreed to have you, her friend and peer in years, calling her 'mama'?" the elder woman remarked, with a trace of amusement. "Curious girl, to actually consent to such a queer thing."

Urumi held out her hands over the desk and stretched lazily.

"Tomoko," she said, with confidence. "Will do whatever I want her to do. It's been that way ever since we were kids."

"It seems more like you should be adopting her, then."

"I would rather keep her as a pet-though she is already that, in a way," came the retort. "But I shan't actually be calling her 'mother' to her face, of course. Only in public, and even then, that should be a pretty lark. Oh, I can't wait!"

"A lark," Chikane echoed dryly. "You said this was not lark, Urumi."

"It isn't," her cousin protested. "But there's no rule against me having a little laugh over it, even if the general intent is an earnest one."

The older woman looked up and released a sigh to the ceiling. After a moment, she turned back at Urumi with an enquiring expression.

"Well then, Urumi," she said. "Please tell me why you want to do this."

"Election as a tribune-of-the-plebs."

The languid smile vanished, was replaced by one of controlled surprise.

"I beg your pardon?" said Chikane.

"Election as a tribune-of-the-plebs."

"Why in the world would you want that?" Chikane demanded gently, once her astonishment had passed. "Is this what you meant by your words the other night?"

Urumi giggled as she recalled that evening, when she had announced to Chikane that she would be entering their-Chikane's and Reito's-arena soon. Though, she had qualified mysteriously, not strictly the same arena. It had left her elder cousin wondering what she meant when she went on to say that she would ascend a political office no Himemiya or Kanzaki had ever occupied.

"Yes," Urumi now said. "And just think of it: after Tomoko adopts me and I become an official member of the Nemura, I may be the first Himean citizen to run legally for the plebeian tribunate even with perfectly patrician blood in my veins."

She grinned, her expression like that of a child acquiring a new toy.

"That's an accomplishment in itself. Suou will positively flip when she hears about it-she might say I'm trying to match her feat of getting appointed a legate without being in Senate yet. Won't it be hilarious?"

"Facetious even now." Chikane smiled wryly. "This is the Kanzaki in you coming out, I think."

"But you always accuse Suou of levity, and she doesn't have a drop of Kanzaki in her."

"Actually, I was referring more to this scheme of yours."

"Oh, that. I still have a rebuttal: more of the Himemiya have broken traditions than the Kanzaki."

"I have to admit that is probably true. Certainly my own case provides base for rebuttal." The urban praetor tilted her head, her attitude that of someone having just apprehended something. "So this is why you've been frequenting the crossroads colleges. Drumming up support among the lower classes, Urumi?"

Urumi grinned an affirmation.

"Here I was, worried for you and thinking you were keeping dangerous company when in fact you were the most dangerous one there," Chikane said in a low voice. "I do not know why I was even worried. You have always had a talent for putting people of all walks under thrall."

"You have the same talent, Chikane, so I don't see why it should be remarkable."

"In varying aspects. Suffice it to say that you have even more of the makings of a demagogue than I." She smiled, suddenly intrigued. "A perfectly aristocratic demagogue. You would be a dangerous tribune-of-the-plebs, Cousin."

"No more dangerous than you as the senior consul."

Chikane looked tickled.

"And that," she said, "is exactly the point. I would be very dangerous as the senior consul."

She inhaled luxuriously.

"In any case, is this truly what you want, Urumi? To enter politics through the tribunate of the plebs instead of, say, the quaestorship?"

A determined stare: "I'm positive."

"Then I shall endorse your adoption to the pontifices," came the answer, bringing a wide grin to Urumi's face. "They will wonder at and oppose it, methinks, but I am fairly certain I shall convince them to pass a lex curiata. Our present Pontifex Maximus owes me a few favours, so I shall exhaust one or two for you."

Urumi bowed with her head, those distinctive eyes peeking out of her curtain of silvery-blond hair.

"I'm so grateful I can hardly put it into words, so I shan't-or not so much," she said impishly. "Shall we say I will pay you back in action instead? I'm sure it hasn't escaped you that by doing this, you will have another tame tribune-of-the-plebs for next year."

"How good to know you have such confidence about winning the elections," the other replied. "Do not tell me you plan to ensure your win by bribery?"

"I don't think I have to, but it's possible to do that, too."

"Then do not let me catch you-or not in public."

"I'll be sure to remember."

"I have a feeling too that you shall not need to resort to that, anyhow," Chikane said to her. "And before I forget, Urumi: I hardly think the description 'tame' could ever be made to apply to you, whether as a tribune-of-the-plebs or not. Even so, it is true that it would benefit me to have you as a tribune-of-the-plebs. My tribune for next year is rather less inspiring-though still capable, of course."

She smiled at Urumi with humour.

"I am afraid to say that you shall have to do me a lot of favours in return for this one," she warned.

Urumi shrugged and said she would welcome the work as long as it was interesting.

"I believe I can satisfy that condition."

"And I'd love to ruffle a few Traditionalist feathers as I go," came the second qualifier.

"You shall ruffle more than a few, if the next year turns out as I expect," Chikane said. "You shall also have a lot of work for Shizuru's campaign, though I'm sure you already know that."

"Ahh." Urumi looked a little regretful. "I expected it. But, you know, it's something of a pity."

"What is?"

"Not being able to go up against her. It would be so interesting, you see."

The deep blue eyes were amused: "And in doing so, go against me as well?"

"Simply a thought," the blonde replied mischievously. "I wasn't even serious, Chikane. Rather, it's just that..."

"That what?"

The corners of Urumi's mouth turned downwards.

"It would be so much more challenging than going up against the Traditionalists," she explained. "They're all so dull! Unless it's Kikukawa-san or Wang-san, maybe. But one lacks style and the other lacks substance. Anyway, they don't interest me as much."

She cast a pouting look at Chikane, her fine, attractive features turning slightly childish.

"I would honestly prefer to set my wits against someone who actually has wits to speak of," she said. "And Shizuru-san definitely has that. Of course you do too-but you're family, and I can't go against you. The same with cousin Reito since he's my paterfamilias at the moment."

Chikane nodded.

"Though I must say that I disagree with your having dismissed our Traditionalist friends so easily, I still understand your point," she told the blonde. "One needs a sharp mind against which to whet one's own, to restate your argument. It may add to the appeal that you are not so familiar with Shizuru yet, for you've had few occasions to meet. But that can be amended in the future."

She smiled, met the blue and brown gaze.

"All the same, Urumi," she concluded, "do try to avoid going against her. I would much rather you sharpened yourself against me, come to that."

"Is that an invitation?"

" No. "

They laughed.

"All's well," Urumi said evenly, later. "It's merely a stimulating idea-pitting myself against her-but that's all it is. For one thing, I happen to like her."

A lifted eyebrow and a smirk was the reply.

"Not that way," Urumi went on, faking a scandalised expression.

"I see."

"Mm-hm. I know we only met in passing before, and it was a long time ago, but I remembered her. And I've been hearing of her regularly for the past few years, so I feel as though I know her already, going from the genius of the things she's done. She's rather an admirable sort, is she not?"

"Yes, she is, though some people would disagree."

"Some people are just stupid," Urumi declared, while Chikane chuckled at the sight of her cousin's most disdainful expression-which was reserved for what the young woman called 'the mentally challenged'. Since Urumi had the lofty standpoint of a born genius, this meant that she doomed over three-fourths of the people she met into this category. Such was the haughtiness of great intelligence!

"Anyway, I've no problems with helping the two of you along," Urumi went on. "We should be able to give the archconservatives a good run for their money, Chikane."

"Then I shall get started on your adoption tomorrow. Is Nemura-san ready?"

"Yes, but don't call her that. It doesn't fit well."

A smile. "What, then?"

"Tomoko. You may add chan, I guess."

"As you wish. I amend my earlier words. Is Tomoko-chan ready?"

"Anytime."

"Good. Have her prepare a formal statement with her signature and seal tomorrow."

"Will do. And thank you again." Urumi sat back with satisfaction, inspecting her fingernails dreamily. "Isn't that typical, though?"

"What is?"

"That on the year you become consul, all sorts of interesting things start to happen. I can see them coming, even now." She smiled, cat-like and derisive. "Your consulship just might turn Hime upside-down."

"Even the hourglass must be turned on its head in order to usher in a new hour."

"Or a new era. It's going to be such an entertaining year."

Chikane made a suggestion: "I believe you mean ' controversial.' "

"Mm, but that is what makes it entertaining. It should be so much fun!"

"Yours is a fine approach," the other replied. "But I think some people would actually see it the other way around."

"Some people are just stupid," Urumi repeated, to her cousin's laughter.

---

Urumi's words, curiously enough, were being echoed leagues away.

"Some people are just foolish."

It was Shizuru who said this, talking to her bodyguard as she undressed. She was getting ready for her bath and the present conversation was an expansion of the one that had taken place a short while before, with Nao and Chie.

"This is one of the reasons for which I distrust people," she was explaining. "Foolish persons tend to act without proper regard for consequences. Strangely enough, they often pose more of a danger to those of intelligence compared to others who are less foolish. The unpredictability of a fool has foiled many a brilliant plan."

"Given their irregularity, I find them highly suspect," she said. "It is difficult to trust someone like that-though there are always exceptions. Still, I actually prefer to deal more with intelligent, dangerous people than with fools."

She stopped unwrapping her toga from her body and peered at Natsuki.

"I suppose that is why most of the people I trust tend to be dangerous ones."

The younger woman was sitting cross-legged on the tiled floor and she now looked up at Shizuru.

"Am I," she began to ask, lips slowly curving into a playful smile. "Shizuru, am I a dangerous one?"

"You most certainly are," Shizuru said with indulgence.

An amused sound.

"Besides being one of those I trust the most, of course," came the addition.

Natsuki smiled again, a little shyly this time. Shizuru returned to her task. She draped the sheet-like toga over her shoulders once she had finished removing it.

"At any rate, let us return to why I trust Chikane more than Reito-han," she went on. "But first, let me ask you something. Why do you think I trust you, Natsuki? You are avowedly one of the most dangerous people I have ever met. There is no doubt in my mind that you would pose a definite threat to my life were we ever to meet as enemies in battle-and I can say that of few people, believe me. Yet I have grown to trust you to the extent that I actually sleep defencelessly with you armed and ready in the same room. Why, then?"

The girl frowned thoughtfully. After letting her ponder it for a little while, Shizuru answered the question herself.

"There are several reasons for this, of course. Particularly in the past, when you were just beginning as my bodyguard," she told her. "Back then, one of the reasons was that I felt you were not foolish, nor was the king who assigned you to ensure my care. But the most important reason I have at this juncture is this: that I may dare to say you actually hold affection for me."

She tried very hard not to smile at Natsuki's blush.

"I hope I have not been wrong in saying that?" she teased. "At least I did not say something so daring as you actually being in love with me, you know. Unless you would actually agree?"

The smile she had repressed was forced out at the vicious colour swarming over the girl's face.

"It is your regard for me that allows me to trust you," she said, returning to their theme. "The same applies to Chikane's case. Her affection for me prevents her from considering a course of action that would be detrimental to my interests, even if said course would also be beneficial to her. The same applies to me, since my affection for her is a predetermined, invariable factor in any action. Her well-being, as far as I am concerned, is not a mere variable in calculation. It is a part of my life. Just as she has almost always been."

Natsuki nodded.

"She is a great friend?" she asked.

"Oh, yes. My very best."

"And the man?" she asked Shizuru. "This, um, Reito Kanzaki?"

The Himean began slipping her tunic from her shoulders, keeping the toga draped around her neck.

"His case is different," she said. "Among the reasons why I can rely on him is that he is not a foolish man. He acts with consequences in mind. He is a fairly dependable person, in that sense."

She let the tunic fall to the floor and kicked it lightly aside. She now began to remove her undergarments.

"However, I still do not trust him unreservedly in the same way I do Chikane-or the way I trust you, for that matter," she continued. "While I am on good terms with Reito-han, I still know enough to see that his regard for me is not of the kind that would make my wellbeing a preset concern for him."

She dropped her undergarments on top of the tunic pooled on the floor.

"Our relations are good enough to incline him generally towards consideration for me if I am involved, but they are not good enough for him to consistently reject a measure that would benefit him considerably while disadvantaging me," she stated. "His fondness for me is rather too light for that constancy, you see, as is mine for him."

Natsuki nodded again.

"And the other man?" she asked, at length.

Shizuru frowned at her.

"What other man?" she replied. "Aside from Reito-han?"

"Mm."

It took a while before she remembered: "Ah! Kazuya Kurauchi."

"Mm."

"Kurauchi-han. Well, it is actually different for him too," Shizuru admitted. "I said I would trust him a little more in the hypothesised situation because of his character. He is a naturally nice man, you see, and one who generally observes the dictates of popular morality as his personal creed. He is quite predictable, that way. Kurauchi-han would not stab a person in the back, insofar as he can actually help it."

Having finished her explanation, she turned to face Natsuki again. The toga covering her shoulders swayed as she moved, touching the floor.

"Well then, now that we have explained that," she said. "Would you please bathe with me tonight?"

She saw the change in her bodyguard's face, the younger woman's wide eyes conveying her surprise at the suddenness of the question. Shizuru smiled back. It had been a surprise battery since a while had passed since she last asked the young woman to share their bath.

All the better, she told herself. I just might be able to press that advantage.

"This must be the hundredth time I have asked you, but I actually have reasons this time-better ones than those I have already given," she told the girl. "We march just after dawn tomorrow. It is common sense to bathe before doing so, is it not? Particularly since we are in winter and fetching and heating water on the march is a greater challenge this season. Argus is a way off from here, and it may well be a while before we find a chance to indulge again in a proper bath. Hence we must bathe tonight-and if we do bathe tonight the way we usually do, one after the other, it shall take too long. That would mean that one of us-you, as a matter of fact-shall be losing time for sleep that is badly needed."

It seemed that Natsuki's surprise wavered a little here, although it was replaced by anxiety moments later when she dropped her eyes to the floor. Shizuru offered another justification, knowing the girl could sense what she was really after but was now only waiting for her to justify the leap, to provide the excuse the younger, far-more-fearful-of-sex Otomeian needed to willingly enter the trap.

"Furthermore, do you not feel the cold?" she pursued. "Even one used to the cold as you are would have to be mad to bathe in cool water. For the water shall have cooled by the time I finish, you know that. I would hate to have you develop an illness as we march or even before we set out. Far more efficient for us to use the same hot water together, while it is yet hot."

Still no response. The older woman resorted to her best cat-coaxing voice, feeling the wavering in the girl and pushing it further.

"Oh, come and bathe with me, Natsuki," she said. "I am speaking sense, for god's sake! Bathe with me already, else I will begin to think you really are afraid of me, under it all."

The girl looked up to scoff.

Oh, that pride!

"No?" she teased. "Then come here. There is no need to be shy. No one is or shall be here other than the two of us. You are making me feel bad with all this reserve. Do you not trust me, Child, even now?"

She felt a little bad for using their earlier conversation as an excuse. Still, she was convinced that Natsuki was not fool enough to fail to understand that all of these were merely excuses delivered for her sake. She wanted her to understand that.

"Tell you what, I shall not do anything you do not want me to do," Shizuru promised, trying to edge closer to victory by negotiation. "I promise that if I make you uncomfortable, you only have to say so and I shall remedy that."

Natsuki looked up again, eyes cautious but not intractable. She was almost in the trap.

"So shall you come over here now or ought I give you more reasons why you should? It is unlikely for me to run out of them-I am rather good at finding reasons for things I have set my mind on," Shizuru jested. "You should know that by now."

She was pleased to see the younger woman's lips twitch slightly at this, much like those of a person trying to hold back a smile. She hoped that meant she would not have to flog the argument to death, even though she was willing to do so if it meant a victory. She tried to tamp down her excitement as she held out a hand in the girl's direction, wagering everything on the moment being the right one.

"Come here, would you?" she beckoned again, smiling easily and invitingly. "I think we trust each other enough by now to at least be able to bathe together, Natsuki."

There was an instant where she was afraid that the other would refuse once more, but it vanished when the younger woman met her gaze. There was surrender there: an acquiescing nervousness in those bright green eyes. For her part, Shizuru kept her hand outstretched, focusing herself on ensuring it would not shake. She was soon rewarded when Natsuki rose stiffly from the floor and came towards her.

"Thank you," Shizuru said, smiling brightly at the young woman who had taken her hand. It was through this contact that she felt the extent of the other's anxiety, for the hand holding hers was deathly cold. It was an odd contrast to the heat rising from the water behind her, in the tub.

She pressed the icy fingers in an effort to warm them.

I hope my hands do not feel the same way, she thought with a bit of humour. An idea came to her mind and she bit back a grin at it.

I very much hope too that she is not thinking about Nao-han's frightening remarks earlier on plucking posteriors.

She looked up at the girl, whose eyes were twitching from one direction to another. She could almost imagine little animal ears coming out of the silky hair and flicking with nervousness. The girl could look so much like a cornered beast when it came to things that frightened her. Yet they obviously intrigued as well, else she would never have approached. Shizuru was convinced of that: of course Natsuki knew where they were headed! Shizuru would never have forced it had she not sensed the curiosity and willing acquiescence in her young woman.

Natsuki can always escape, was her determination. But only if she really wants to.

"I shall help you take these off," she said, looking pointedly at the bandages on Natsuki's hand. "Is that all right?"

Gaining permission, Shizuru began to loosen and unwind the linen strips. She willed her own fingers to be steady and not betray the excitement over what was to come. She finished her task quickly and let the linen bandages fall to the floor, not willing to bother with rolling them up properly just yet. Not when she had so much else to do.

"I shall help you undress," she told her bodyguard, keeping her voice as even as possible. "May I do that?"

She felt the younger woman stiffen. There was something pleasantly unsettling about that. It seemed to change the mood, and the change teased out a little of the anxiety in her too.

"Well, Natsuki?"

The girl met her eyes and a tingle came to her lips, which she realised were a little dry. Had she been breathing through her mouth the whole time? That was rather unsubtle. She licked her lips and Natsuki looked away, but not before giving assent.

"All right, then. I shall take this off first."

She reached up for the interlaced leather belts encircling the younger woman's torso, undoing their clasps as carefully as one performing a sacred ritual. Once the final belt was undone, she reached out, startling Natsuki a little when she slipped a hand around her to loosen the entire piece and slide it off her torso. The device dropped to the floor with a slapping, strap-like sound.

After that, it seemed oddly quiet in the room.

"I shall take this off now," Shizuru said to break the silence, her hands settling on the sash around her companion's hips. Natsuki swayed a little at the touch.

Shizuru's fingers ran lovingly over the sash as she searched for its ends. She found what she was looking for after a few seconds, and pulled them out from the tuck so that she could undo the knot. It was a little to the left side of Natsuki's back, so Shizuru had to reach behind her. The action drew them against each other.

"Umm."

Shizuru stopped at the sound and looked enquiringly at her companion. She forgot some of her own anxiety at the sight of scarlet cheeks, and paused what she was doing. Natsuki dropped her gaze in response and shifted her arms uncomfortably, trying to keep them from brushing the older woman's.

"Put your arms around me," Shizuru told her, understanding. "Rest them on my shoulders."

Natsuki complied, still resolutely avoiding her stare. Shizuru moved forward when she felt the clothed arms finally circle her neck, tentative even then. Their cheeks touched as she bent down a little more, and she continued what she was doing. It took a while for her to finish because the sound of the other's breathing was so close to her ear.

Letting the sash fall to their feet as all the other articles, she moved her fingers next to the trousers. Her hands skimmed the back before moving front, where she found the knotted ends of the drawstring cord. She undid the knot. When this was done, she slid her thumbs underneath the hem of the garment, feeling the arms around her neck tighten in response.

"Natsuki." She drew her head back a little, enough to see that the girl's eyes were closed. "I will take this off now."

Resting her cheek against the burning one again, she slowly began to pull on the garment. When she had widened the waist enough, she pulled it halfway down Natsuki's hips, after which the piece of clothing slid down of its own accord.

It was the furthest she had ever gone in undressing her .

She drew back from the embrace another time-though not enough to fully remove the arms around her neck-and stole a glance downwards. Her eyes greedily skimmed ivory-coloured flesh, trying to take in all they could.

Gorgeous legs, she marked, loving the sculptured, trimly muscled look of the slim calves and long thighs. Her view ended where a garment covered the pelvis, a sort of loincloth. She would have that white cloth off, too, sooner or later. But first she wanted to pay homage to those breathtaking limbs brushing her own. How could the girl have hidden them from her for so long? They were breathtaking!

Touching a light kiss to Natsuki's temple, she gently disengaged herself from the embrace, lifting the arms around her neck and placing the palms on her shoulders. Natsuki took the opportunity to open her eyes and looked up at Shizuru with a questioning expression.

Why did she look so frightened?

"I am just going to unlace your boots," Shizuru explained, trailing her fingers over the girl's cheek. "So that you may step out of them, all right?"

Natsuki assented. Shizuru pressed another kiss to the girl's brow, then knelt. The girl's hands stayed on her shoulders, their squeeze trembling and inconstant.

"Would you please step out of the trousers, Natsuki?" she asked, unable to resist curving her palm around one calf. It tensed beneath her touch, right before the younger woman complied with the request.

"Thank you."

She began unlacing the Otomeian's low boots afterwards. Once she had finished, she looked up again.

"Step out of the boots, please."

She assisted her by holding the boots while the girl lifted her feet from them. After setting the footwear aside, Shizuru eyed the dark socks protecting the Otomeian's feet. They were a contrast to Natsuki's pale skin and she found that fetching. She was almost tempted to leave them on.

Maybe next time, she thought, consoling herself by placing a quick kiss on the girl's knee as she peeled off one sock. Natsuki responded with a slightly stronger squeeze on her shoulders, although the sudden tightness of her calves betrayed her growing agitation even more than that act. The older woman smiled, coaxing her to lift her foot so that she could take the sock off.

When Shizuru worked on the other sock, a strange impulse ran through her and she gave in to it unthinkingly. Leaning forward until her head was on the outer side of the girl's leg, she angled her face and kissed the back of Natsuki's knee on its corner. It elicited a sharp gasp as well as a wild clutch of her hair from the younger woman's hands.

I see, she marvelled, placing a few more kisses there while ignoring the light tugs on her tresses. So this is a sensitive spot. How interesting. Her fingers had already succeeded in rolling the sock to the ankle, and Natsuki only had to lift her foot so that she could slide it off. But she wanted to try something first.

Keeping one hand wrapped around Natsuki's ankle, she braced herself by placing her other hand securely on top of the girl's thigh. She felt it flex in response, and smiled to herself. Then she leaned forward again and, turning her head to the side, licked the back of the girl's knee.

"Nn-!"

She grinned at the cut-off sound, feeling Natsuki's fingers pulling on her hair. She ignored them and pressed forward again, determined to hear that sound one more time. Her tongue flicked quickly against the same spot as before. This time, Natsuki did not cry out again but made up for it by giving several sharp gasps, her legs trembling violently with each stroke. Shizuru was delighted, although she had to admit she sorely wanted to hear a cry instead of just a gasp.

I will hear it, she decided. At least once more, before I stand up again.

"Natsuki," she said. "Could you lift your foot just a little for me, please?"

When the younger woman complied, she slipped off the remaining sock and tossed it away. As soon as Natsuki returned her foot to the ground, Shizuru began her assault and gripped the girl's thighs with her hands. She then turned her head to the side, latching her mouth onto the place she had been teasing. Sucking on it voluptuously, she was surprised by the sudden jerk of Natsuki's hand on her hair as well as the spasm that seemed to pass through the girl's limbs. But most of all, it was the sound: a whining, stifled whimper that left Natsuki's throat before the girl could stop it.

What a sound, she thought, her breath catching. She deepened her suction on the white flesh and was rewarded with another strained moan. It trailed off unevenly as she alternated sucking with nips of her teeth. The younger woman's legs started to shake with restrained violence. It seemed to Shizuru that the girl was trying to stop both her moans and her shudders but could not-and for some reason, she found that she very much enjoyed that.

She lapped again at the back of the other's knee, savouring the whimpers this provoked.

"Nnh-"

Oh god, that sound.

"Nuh-nnh-Shizuru, wuh-wait-"

Her mouth broke away at this broken plea, and she abruptly remembered what she was supposed to be doing.

So much for finally undressing her completely.

She sighed mockingly at herself and pressed one last kiss to the young woman's leg before returning to her feet. Her fingers dragged up Natsuki's thighs as she rose, eventually resting on the remaining garment on the Otomeian's hips.

"Forgive me for that digression. I shall continue helping you undress now."

There was no reply. Natsuki's head was bowed as she panted quietly and tried to recover from what had just happened, her eyes shut yet again. Shizuru raised one hand to lift her chin, seeing the true difference in their heights for the first time. It had long been obvious that she was taller, but the varying thicknesses in the soles of the footwear she had been wearing, added to her uncertainty as to the height of Natsuki's boot-heels, had also kept her ignorant as to how much taller she truly was. Now she realised she had about two more inches added to her already significant advantage, and discovered that she liked it-for it meant Natsuki had to tilt her face further back to meet her lips, and it not only exposed the younger woman's wonderful neck but also made her seem more vulnerable. As she seemed to be now, for instance, with Shizuru holding her chin up while kissing her thoroughly.

Sweet, the older woman was thinking as their tongues tangled. Natsuki was always sweet on her mouth. Her other hand was loosening the cloth around the girl's hips already, working it free of its tucks until she felt she could drag it down. They broke their kiss and Natsuki opened her eyes.

She looks like someone in a trance, Shizuru noted affectionately, drinking in the sight of the girl's burning face and hazed eyes. The younger woman was still panting, her hands still laced into soft waves of blonde hair. Shizuru watched the green eyes suddenly regain focus when her hand began to pull down the loincloth, a shot of panic streaking through them.

"Trust me, Natsuki."

Natsuki bit her lip and tried to turn her head away. Shizuru, in a fit of cruelty, refused to let her. The girl winced, the hand under her chin turning her face insistently towards a stare that was the colour of thickening blood.

"You are so beautiful."

Shizuru lifted one of her feet and used it to finish pulling the cloth down the girl's legs. Once this was done, she released Natsuki's chin. Natsuki did the same with the older woman's hair, dropping her hands to her sides as she struggled with a spasm of embarrassment that had her shaking and her legs drawing instinctively together. The Himean watched this for a few seconds, feeling unspeakably moved by the simple sight of the other's defencelessness.

"Natsuki," she said softly, using both hands to hold the younger woman's face. "It's all right, Natsuki. Please look at me."

Taking a step closer so that their near-naked bodies met, she moved one hand to Natsuki's back and began playing with the silky mane of hair, the other hand stroking the girl's sleek head as it buried into the crook of her neck.

I think I understand, Shizuru ruminated. This is a little disquieting for me too. It is also my first time to be so with another, after all. But she seems to find it so much more frightening. And she seems-no, she really is so young.

She crooned the younger woman's name, over and over. She could feel the nervous flutter of lips on her neck, hot and pleasant against her skin. And she could feel the rush of Natsuki's bare thighs on hers, which were only partially covered by the toga cloaking her shoulders. She could even feel Natsuki's breasts through the two layers of cloth separating them.

She pulled back. Natsuki was holding on to her, hands clutching at the toga just barely covering her body. She dropped a lingering kiss on the girl's lips.

"May I take off your shirt?" she asked. "It is the only thing left on you."

There was a pause.

"Natsuki?"

She almost sighed in happiness when Natsuki finally answered with a slow nod.

Her hands went to the front of the younger woman's shirt, skimming lightly over the peaks of the breasts underneath and outlined against the cloth. The hint of what lay taut and waiting under the shirt was incredibly provocative, and she began undoing the fastenings of the garment with painful deliberation, her hands now starting to shake a little from the effort of keeping her excitement under control. Already she could feel that wicked heat and slickness below, at the apex of her legs, where the desire seemed to form a knot twinning the one in her chest.

"There."

She finally unfastened the shirt, releasing it so that it dangled freely on the younger woman's frame. The open front revealed a pale strip of white skin from the collar downwards. She inhaled loudly when she tracked the strip all the way down, past the hips and to the shadowy, mystery-laden place between the girl's legs.

Then her hands were under the shirt, sliding the cloth from Natsuki's shoulders until it fell to the floor. The younger woman's eyes were lidded, her nostrils flaring. Shizuru could see the fine quiver of her lips and even hear the staggered breaths from between them. She studied the girl's face, noting all the indications of fear.

Natsuki looked so undone by her state of defencelessness. And yet she was making no move to cover herself either. Shizuru's eyes slowly dropped, lingering on the slim neck before moving down and taking in the rest of the body she had unwrapped. She felt her breath catch yet again, so overwhelmed by what was happening that she felt lightheaded. All she could have said, had anyone asked her how Natsuki appeared at the moment, was that the girl was smooth, hairless, and as handsomely put-together as a god. And even those words were inadequate.

I have marvelled at her face all this time, Shizuru thought, so blasted by the girl's beauty that she actually forgot to bring her slack jaw up . But ye gods, how could I have missed the rest of her for so long? I must marvel all over again!

After a while of staring, Shizuru finally saw she had let it go on long enough when she glanced at Natsuki's face. The poor girl seemed about ready to burst into flame, judging by the colour of her countenance down to her neck.

"Ah, Natsuki."

Cursing herself for her thoughtlessness, she drew Natsuki into embrace. The toga around her shoulders finally slid to the floor and their breasts slid against each other with a silky feeling that nearly made her reel. Something deep inside her was wrenching, and she inhaled sharply to alleviate it. Trying to ignore the feeling so that they could actually reach the bath, she murmured softly to the woman in her arms and urged her into their tub. Somehow, between her soothing words and caresses, she managed to get them both into the water.

The liquid lapped at their heated flesh without cooling it. Shizuru found herself sitting with her back against one of the short sides, making it possible for her head to rest on the edge. It was the position she favoured most when she bathed. However, for all her words earlier, bathing was far from her mind. Natsuki was straddling her hips, leaning forward with Shizuru's mouth on her neck and pulling at a pulsing vein beneath the skin.

She was making the sounds more and more loudly now.

Shizuru sat up, her hands cupping the other's rear underwater. Her fingers dug into the round flesh, pulling the girl closer until the white breasts were within reach of her mouth. She then abandoned Natsuki's neck and closed her lips over one breast, her tongue rasping slowly over the hard, honest little peak while her hands continued to massage the girl's behind.

She parted from the girl's breast after a while, giving it one last lick as if trying to imprint its taste on her tongue. Her hands came up from the water and she used one to play with the other breast, drawing lazy arcs around its needy little centre. The other hand began to scan the younger woman's body, slipping up to hold the curve of the waist before coming back down to knead a slender thigh.

"Natsuki, dear Natsuki."

She watched the girl's face, transfixed by its expression. Natsuki's eyelids were pressed tight, the dark brows above them furrowed together as if in pain. Natsuki's mouth hung open too, and sharp pants came through it in puffing, laboured bursts. A quick glance showed that the younger woman's arms were hanging at her sides, the hands clenching and unclenching in the water like those of someone drowning. Shizuru said her name again.

"Touch me," she instructed, smiling hazily at the other's glazed-over expression. "I told you before. You may hold on to me."

She smiled wider when one of the girl's hands came up to her shoulder. The other hand, however, held the side of her face. It left a wet trail on her cheek as it moved further back, the fingers digging into her hair. Shizuru's next words died in her throat as she caught sight of Natsuki's eyes, so intensely fixed upon her that it seemed they were incapable of seeing anything or anyone else.

Natsuki was leaning towards her.

"Natsu..." she began, halting the girl's lips a few inches from her own.

They looked at each other.

"Natsuki, kiss me," she said.

Their lips met so forcefully she tasted blood, but she did not mind. She felt the younger woman's arms circle her neck and replied by moving one of her own around Natsuki's waist. Her free hand went deeper into the water, landing on a quivering leg. It ran up slowly, and when she found the dark trench that she was looking for, she used one finger to tentatively explore it.

"Uhhnn..."

She smiled when Natsuki broke the kiss to moan, and studied the pained look on the girl's face as she continued the caresses under the water. It seemed to her that the hidden place between Natsuki's legs was even slicker and hotter than the water around them; how curious was that? She stroked that soft flesh again to test it out, and was gratified to hear another sharp sound break free from her girl's mouth.

How wonderful are the sounds this girl pipes, she thought, staring at Natsuki with unabashed desire. I could listen to them all day. And her face-oh, I could look at her face like this forever.

She continued her ministrations, enjoying the reactions they provoked from her lover. It was curious, she mused idly, that such tiny movements against that part of the younger woman's sex could cause her to lose all composure this way, her dark hair falling in damp tendrils over her face, and her expression beyond her control. It was curious as well that her hips seemed to be moving of their own accord, dancing lithely each time Shizuru's teasing finger reached a soft little nub within her wetness.

It was curious, too, that for every gasp the girl let out, a dull throb seemed to radiate from between Shizuru's own legs.

Paying careful attention to the young woman straddling her hips, Shizuru used her thumb to begin circling the tiny nub between Natsuki's legs, seeing that it gave the girl pleasure to be touched there. She was delighted by the reaction she got, which was a wild bout of shivers from the girl's body and a thick flurry of pleading moans. She watched with rapt fascination, unable to resist letting out a low groan as well.

Wicked love! she thought to herself, panting too. Is this what it means to be with a woman? To feel as though you could eat her alive or kill either she or yourself in the attempt? I want her to cry out again and I want to make her cry-I want almost to hurt her, though I want to soothe her at the same time. I am become a bundle of Want, of only Desire. I want nothing but her, and I want everything of her. And I am very much afraid that I am beginning to care less and less whether or not she will yield it.

She gave the nub under her thumb, so alike to a tiny and pulsing heart, a deliberate pinch. A cry rushed past Natsuki's clenched teeth.

My god, how can anyone ever get enough of this?

Her free hand came up from Natsuki's waist and clutched at the raven-coloured tresses, yanking them so that the younger woman's head was thrown back to reveal her neck. She closed her mouth over it in a rush, licking and sucking in a frenzy as she felt the girl's shivers grow more violent, her moans even less restrained. Hands tangled in Shizuru's hair.

"Nnn," came the whine, vibrating to Shizuru's lips. "Shizuru, please..."

This was followed by several brokenly whispered words in her language, which Shizuru did not understand. Nevertheless, the Himean understood the desperation in those mumbles enough to know that Natsuki was asking for something more. She knew just what it was.

A flash of alarm entered her mind at the thought, momentarily shunting away the white-hot fog obscuring it. How could she have forgotten about this? She knew that what she was supposed to do next would truly hurt the girl in her arms. That much she had learned from her perusal of erotic texts and from the stories of her friends. What she did not know was how to go about it to minimise the pain. Was there even a way to do that? She should have asked- whom? Ye gods, how did one even go about asking that?

Another needy groan jolted her from her deliberations. She looked up at Natsuki, who had somehow taken to pressing short, frantic kisses on her brow.

"Shi-Shizuru," she gasped, obviously reacting to the movements of Shizuru's thumb as it played with her harder. "Ah-ah-I"

Her next moans fell into Shizuru's mouth: the older woman kissed her so slowly, so languorously, that it confused her body for a moment. She strove to match her tongue with the pace of that probing her mouth, striving hard to ignore the faster pace of the finger between her legs that was driving her mad. When she finally fell into the rhythm, Shizuru pulled back from the kiss and essayed a weak smile.

"Natsuki," she said huskily. "It may hurt a little."

A shimmer of confusion showed in the younger woman's eyes, bringing focus to them once again.

"Huh-hurt?" she asked.

Shizuru faltered.

She does not know, she thought, before answering herself: Of course she does not know! She did not even know how to kiss, and their culture is clearly different in treatment of this matter. Even if she pleaded earlier, it does not mean she knows what shall happen next.

The Otomeian had probably only been pleading on impulse, not even knowing what it was that she asked for. Shizuru took a deep breath, gathering her wits at this realisation.

Yet I have gone too far to stop now.

"If it hurts, hold onto me," she managed to get out, meeting the dusky green eyes. "Do not worry about hurting me. Or tell me if-if you wish me to stop. But I am warning you that it may hurt, so I shall attempt to be gentle."

Natsuki was panting even harder now, her hips still moving seductively against the stroking hand. She did not understand: all she understood was what her body was telling her, in a language it had never spoken before. Shizuru could see in her eyes that she had given over to this language's demands, could no more form the words to refuse than Shizuru herself could gather strength to resist. The culmination was coming, and it would not be stopped by either of them.

"Is that all right?" the older woman asked nonetheless, moving a finger carefully along the girl's flesh in search of the entrance. When she found it, she rested her finger just outside and asked again, though it was more of a warning. "Natsuki? May I go on?"

Natsuki looked at her distractedly, then moved forward until she had both arms firmly wrapped around the Himean's neck. Her open mouth sucked at an ear, causing the latter to shudder with pleasure.

"I take it that is a Yes," Shizuru sighed, ceasing the motions of her thumb and slowly pushing her finger inside. The lips sucking on her earlobe stopped, and she heard a gasp.

Hot, was her first thought, as she entered the girl cautiously. And like drenched silk. But then she felt around and came upon the obstruction she had been expecting, and she paused against its tangibility. She would have hesitated longer had she not felt Natsuki's hips move against her, seemingly willing her to finish it. She pulled her finger out, taking a deep breath herself.

Water splashed tauntingly against her chest, and she exhaled.

She put two fingers inside the younger woman, feeling the bit of membrane tear at the same time that Natsuki jerked and let out a choked cry. That cry soon turned into a whimper when Shizuru held her close with one arm, murmuring soft endearments into one blood-flushed ear.

"Shh," she whispered soothingly, feeling the slow protests of the younger woman's muscles both inside and out. "Shh, Natsuki, I'm here. It's all right."

She held her for some time, soothing her as she waited. When she finally felt the muscles constricting on her fingers relax, she kissed Natsuki's ear and slowly began to pull out. It still hurt the girl, she discovered. Even so, Natsuki's complaints were voiced without words, and the girl never once tried to pull away despite her shudders. It was with a relieved sigh that Shizuru greeted the time when Natsuki finally moaned in a way that indicated she had not made that sound solely out of pain. It prompted her to return her thumb to the tiny nub while thrusting in and out, mindful of the stuttered gasps coming her way. Natsuki's hands clutched at her, however, telling her the hurt had left or would soon be gone.

Before long, she felt the girl rock her hips again, now in time with her slow penetrations. The soft gasps in her ear turned fascinatingly moist. And the flesh around her fingers-the flesh around her fingers was sheer heat, she thought: velvety and tight and clamping on her invasion. She wondered for a moment if she could possibly fit another finger inside the girl. It seemed hardly possible, and yet she wanted to try it, in order to be able to feel more of that warm velvet around her.

"How soft you are inside, Natsuki," she mumbled approvingly, just as she slipped another finger inside; it went in almost of its own accord, she was surprised to see. "How delectably soft."

Natsuki reacted by moaning pathetically, rocking her hips faster against Shizuru's hand as the water lapped agitatedly against the edges of the tub. Shizuru smiled to herself, exploring with her fingers and paying attention to the younger woman's reactions in order to ascertain what gave her the greatest pleasure. After she found out the actions that seemed to do this, she finally began a steady rhythm with her thrusts, pulling and angling her hand up so that she could crush the little nub of flesh with her palm too, since it seemed to please the girl for her to do that. She pulled back a little from the arms around her neck, wanting to see the other woman's face as it contorted with ecstasy.

"Ahh!" Natsuki panted. "Hah-uhn!"

The younger woman bit her lip suddenly, in an effort to stop the sounds from issuing from her mouth. Shizuru saw it and quickly curled her fingers, delighting in the surprised gasp that provoked.

"Let me hear it," she demanded fiercely, her own breathing laboured. "I want to hear it."

Natsuki groaned in response, still attempting to cut off the sounds. Her face was suffused with colour as she bit back another groan, unconsciously shaking her head with embarrassment. Shizuru would have been amused were she not so firmly in the grip of lust by this time, a thwarted auditor and spectator determined to gain access to the full production.

"Let me hear you," she said again, actually a little angry. "Do not keep it from me."

She broke the rhythm once more, this time to add another finger and press against the narrow walls as they spasmed with shock. Natsuki's face twisted, a weak scream coming from her open mouth.

"Yes," Shizuru said with pleasure, staring adoringly at the girl's face. "Like that."

Natsuki kept a steady stream of moans and whimpers coming out now, her body flexing all over in a way that seemed almost as though she were in the death throes. Shizuru steadily heightened the pace. She felt a seeming increase in the wetness around her fingers. Everything, in fact, seemed more deliciously wet than ever before. Their skin, the warm water around them, Natsuki's sex against her hand, and even the place between her legs-all so intoxicatingly slick with heat.

Natsuki's moans were becoming more urgent. Occasionally, they were interrupted by feeble groans said in the girl's native tongue. Shizuru found the groans seductive. She laid a soft kiss on the parted lips near hers, tasting a hint of iron and recognising it as the result of the other's attempts to forestall her cries earlier. With each new sound, she thrust faster and harder, plunging so strongly into the other woman that the water around them seemed to be stirred up by an oceanic current.

"Shi-Shizu-"

She pressed the heel of her palm against the nub she had been rubbing earlier, desperate to hear her name on the girl's lips. The resultant thrash of Natsuki's head after her action whipped a few dark strands of hair onto her face. They stayed to caress her skin, stuck with mingled water and sweat.

"Would you say my name, Natsuki?" she asked, repeating the motion. Her tongue came out to lick at lips plump from bites and blood. "Say it. Now."

Natsuki gasped before submitting.

"Shizuru," she groaned, lapsing again into incoherent moans and mumbles afterwards. Shizuru could not respond this time, could only watch with the sensation of something burning thick and hot in the centre of her breast. Her entire consciousness was captured by the girl writhing on her lap, her ears tuned only to the sound of her name being adored by a voice squeezed from an instrument she had never played before. This was song, she decided, feeling as though it was not her fingers being pulled deeper into the girl. It was more than that, more than the fact that she was not the one being impaled or driven into a sightless rapture. It was herself being pulled in, sinking deeper and deeper into the blind warmth her fingers were torturing and beyond it.

"Shizuru-"

This again, followed by several beseeching words, exotic and heady to the older woman's ear.

"Oh-nnh-Shizuru-!"

Her movements getting even faster, more deliberate, as she willed herself to give the younger woman what had been requested.

"Ahh-ahh-hnn!"

How intoxicating, she thought, feeling the insides of the girl getting tighter yet again. It was as though the flesh was eager for her, urging her to take her fingers even further. She complied with its silent request, reaching in and beckoning to Natsuki from within. She heard Natsuki cry.

Then all she knew was the sudden contraction, the tightening walls of flesh and heat- oh god, what heat -which was like having one's hand in a furnace without being burned. She groaned as she felt Natsuki release, face red and hips rocking frenziedly against her hand. The girl was completely undone in that moment, weeping with pleasure, the cries jerked out of her. Shizuru watched as this happened, keeping her hand where it was driven into and against the girl's centre, the fingers still buried inside and resisting the walls trying to collapse inwards.

"My Natsuki," she whispered, entranced by what she could feel happening in the girl. "My dear, beautiful girl. You are mine now."

Then there were no longer cries. Only shaky gasps that trailed off into whimpers. Shizuru, for her part, continued to hold her lover close when it was finished. She drew out of the girl only when she felt the contractions on her fingers dwindle away slowly, the soft flesh still pulsing lightly from its ordeal. She saw some of the blood still streaked over her fingernails when she brought her hand out of the water and washed it off. Then she stroked Natsuki's head and waited for her to recover, murmuring praise and encouragement.

"You were wonderful," she whispered. "You were magnificent, Natsuki."

When the younger woman replied by murmuring her name again, she sighed with sheer pleasure. Her hands moved to encircle the lithe, trembling body, drawing the other so close it seemed she was trying to seal their flesh further than it had already been sealed. She kissed the gleaming black hair several times, disturbed by something ticklish in her throat.

It is true: she is my Natsuki now.

The girl shifted, still mumbling into the older woman's moist tresses. One of her hands came up to hold Shizuru's cheek, her mouth burning kisses through Shizuru's hair and into her scalp. She continued to whisper unintelligible words afterwards, the only lucid sound in her mumbles being the older woman's name, said again and again with reverence that could be accorded a god.

And Shizuru, receiving this, felt the lump rise again in her throat as she smiled.

Vocabulaire

1. Circenses - Also known as the games or circuses of Rome, these were given in celebration for particular holidays or in honour of a famous or noble person's achievements or life. They were popular diversions, and were free in that one could attend them without needing to pay entrance fees or anything of the sort, for the games' sponsor (usually some aspiring or known politician) would be the one to foot the bills. Note too that the description of gladiatorial and circus combat here is accurate for the time period: many misunderstand the Romans of the Republic to have enjoyed death in the arena or watching gladiators die, but it would in fact have horrified most of them enough to vomit. The the taste for gore and death in the games was one that arose in the Empire (which is definitely not like Republican Rome).

2. Cohort - A military unit equal to six centuries.

Inter Nos

The march to Argus was marked by general monotony, with the legions going at an efficient pace through level, snow-covered land. The only stops at the outset were those made to set up camp, and it seemed, for a while, that they would reach their destination without incident. On the twelfth day of their progress, however, they came upon a confrontation that necessitated delay.

They were traversing the more rugged section of the road to Argus, and had reached a part that skirted round a high, treacherously stony peak. Here the path was edged on one side by a wall of rock and on the other side by the woods. Prior to this, the road curved around a thick growth of forest that shielded the path up ahead from view, hence the surprise of the marching army at the sight that eventually greeted it.

The advance scouts, of course, were the ones to see it first. Riding back to the army behind them, they relayed their reconnaissance to the Himean commander. Since Shizuru was marching just then with the century immediately after the vanguard, the information did not take long to reach her.

"What do you mean by 'beasts'?" she asked with confusion, blinking at the scout addressing her. "Wild animals, you mean?"

"More like animals that've been captured and got loose, General," the man said, clucking to his nervy horse. It was pawing impatiently at the ground, its sides damp with sweat from the run. "A whole caravan of them. They're the sort you see at the games. Those big cats?"

"Oh! Of course. Those beasts. I see now."

"Merchant party?" the chief primipilus guessed, at her side. "Bet they were on their way to Argus. Where're they from, I wonder? I didn't think this part of the world to have those animals."

"They might have come in from adjoining regions, or perhaps even come through Argus's ports long past only to be returned now. What were you saying about them?" Shizuru prompted the scout.

He made a grimace.

"Seems they ran into bad luck, General," he told them. "There was a landslide just as they were passing the cliff, and they were too close, much closer to the cliff-side than the wooded end. Some of the wagons turned over and it looks like the cages broke open in the accident." Seeing the change in his superiors' expressions, his frown deepened. "The brutes turned on their keepers-it's a real slaughter down there."

"How bad?" the commander asked.

"All we saw were about five, six people left," was the answer. "Might not last long, that. Badly wounded, all of them, General. Probably a dozen of those big cats free and still going around, chewing on the people down and dead. Hard to tell, though, since some of them keep jumping about and trying to kill the people that're still alive."

He shuddered and appended: "It's a nightmare!"

Shizuru frowned, a faint line appearing between her eyebrows. She paused to look at her bodyguard, mounted on a horse beside her.

"Natsuki," she said. "Do you think your division can handle rounding up those beasts? I shall be sending in some of the legionaries too, but we might need some daos-handlers with us as a precaution. Only a hundred, to be on the safe side. No need to bring all of them."

Natsuki nodded before tilting her head back to the column to ask if she should fetch her subordinates. Shizuru gave her permission.

"Get them ready now and pick those with the most nerve in front of beasts," she instructed. "No horses, though-they might quail. And ask a few of your people to switch to archery duty this time too, as further precaution. I would prefer to get this done with as few casualties as possible."

As an afterthought, she added: "Please tell Hasumi-han or any of the other non-combatants in my staff to bring my naginata to me post-haste. A weapon with more range might serve me better in this case."

Natsuki galloped off just as Kenji Nakamura came up, his long legs eating up the ground easily as he hurried towards the general. He had been walking with the second cohort in the column, so he was the first of the other legates to reach Shizuru.

"What's going on, General?" he asked, gravelly voice a little rough from the cold. "Why the halt?"

It was Nao who answered. "We've ourselves a rebel menagerie."

"Excuse me?"

They explained the situation to him in terse sentences. He grunted and put a long hand on the hilt of his sword afterwards, lean face grim.

"I wondered why the horses and mules were being edgy," he said to the two women. "They were probably smelling the brutes up ahead."

"We're downwind," Nao noted. "So it's to be expected."

"Ah here it is," Shizuru mumbled, seeing one of the servants coming forward with her favoured weapon. She shot a quick glance to the tall, sinewy legate with her. "At any rate, Kenji-han, send word to the other legates to stay put but alert for the time being."

"I'll send word to Chie-san, first of all."

"Please do. I think she is with the Third Cohort, with Suou-han," she informed him.

"You're going ahead, General? How many legionaries shall you be taking?"

"No more than two centuries," she answered, before looking at the chief primipilus. "Nao-han, I am taking you and your century with me. Kunio-han's as well."

"Prime veterans," Kenji noted, waving over a soldier.

Shizuru met his eyes.

"They shall have to be," she said. "Even I admit this is dangerous work."

He nodded. Meanwhile, she took her polearm from the man who had brought it for her and thanked him. Nao called her attention again as Kenji gave orders to the soldier he had just called over.

"You don't want to kill them, do you?" the primipilus asked, a knowing glint in her eye. "The beasts, I mean."

"If possible," Shizuru replied, driving the end of her naginata into the ground with one blow. It broke the frozen soil, the sheer power of the arm behind it burying a hand's length of the pole. She flung the thick folds of her cape back and turned a thoughtful look to her chief centurion. "Well, you know what I am thinking. Do you think it possible?"

Nao was a trifle smug: "One of my men used to be in that business. He'd know how to do it."

"Perfect!"

"I'll get him," the other offered, before going off into the ranks and shouting out a name. As this was going on, the requested cavalry from the Lupine Division arrived on their horses and began dismounting a few meters away, leaving their chargers in the care of their fellows who were to be left behind. Shizuru saw them and called out to Natsuki. The girl came riding back upon the summons.

"Natsuki," Shizuru said, coming closer and laying a hand on neck of the Otomeian's forbiddingly black horse. "I am going to brief the members of the party as to my instructions in a moment, but please make something clear to your soldiers as of now: we do not aim to slay the rampant animals, unless absolutely necessary."

The younger woman's confusion was patent. It was obvious she had thought they were venturing out to kill them.

"I shall explain later," Shizuru said. "But for the time being, just tell them to remember that, all right? It would be best to have their captain give the order explicitly herself."

Natsuki nodded, a little hesitation still lingering in her eyes. Shizuru squeezed the girl's thigh affectionately, which action did not go unnoticed by Kenji and the scout with them. Neither dared to comment on it, however, and Shizuru removed her hand when she saw the chief primipilus returning with one of the soldiers in tow.

"Go on, then," she said to the Otomeian. "Bring them over here, but first, tell them what I told you. I know your troopers, and if we left even just a few of you unchecked, the poor felines will probably be dead in a minute, given how efficiently you dispatch foes. That is not our objective and the animals are not our enemies today."

Natsuki rode off again just as Nao arrived bringing another soldier. The man saluted Shizuru.

"So, just what is the objective, General?" Nao said with a knowing smirk. "You want to capture them, right?"

"Yes," Shizuru replied. She bestowed a smile upon the ranker standing next to Nao. "It is for this purpose that we brought you here, Tenma-han. I did not know you used to be in this business, though."

He acknowledged her with a broad grin, pleased that she remembered his name. Well, she remembered nearly everyone's name among her old soldiers. Still, it was nice to count among those.

"Did work for my father when I was young, I did, General," he said readily. "He worked for some traders in the business. Good, clean work, it was."

"I see. Are you knowledgeable enough to help us round these stray ones up without too much difficulty?"

"I believe so, General."

"Then please lend us your assistance. We shall need all the help we can get."

"Any way I can help, General."

"In that case, please confer with us a moment." She looked up and saw the soldiers from the centuries she had requested already gathering nearby. Well then, let us begin by speaking amongst ourselves, after which we shall give orders to the legionaries. And let us make it quick, if you please. I wish to get there as soon as possible."

After all the necessary details had been worked out, they immediately set out at a march that might have qualified for a half-run, their boots pushing heedlessly through powdery snow that seemed to melt from the heat of their haste. To be sure, part of the value in acting with such speed was accorded to the element of surprise it lent them in most engagements. Once they reached sight of the location this time, however, they found themselves on the receiving end of surprise as well.

It was not that they were unprepared, but rather that they had still been a little unsure of what to expect. Whether it was that the scouts' reports had been understated, or the situation had simply gotten worse during the time they were getting ready, the scene they came upon was still startling: the wrecks of wagons and open cages amidst the landslide's debris, the savaged bodies of oxen and people both, the bright splashes of crimson on strangely pinkish snow. All of this was disturbing enough, certainly, even without those apparitions of Discord and Panic that seemed to lurk amidst the chaos: a medley of gigantic, demon-eyed cats free of leash and collar.

It was a sight that would unnerve any ordinary man. Even these ones-seasoned soldiers all-had to swallow back a good deal of bile at the prospect of what they were about to do. A fair number of them had seen cats of this kind before from the games that were regularly held in Hime, but that seemed somehow distant from this. These animals in the arena, enclosed in a space where one was certain of seeing them but not being reached by their paws, was a far-removed thing from the same beasts in the wild. Strange how their claws suddenly looked a hundred times bigger. And ye gods, those teeth!

If these soldiers had not been among the saltiest in Shizuru's army, they might well have recoiled at this point. It was one thing to face down an army of men that outnumbered you three-to-one; it was quite another to face down creatures not at all of your ken. These things belonged to Dis and Diana! As the soldiers Shizuru had were not only veterans, though, but also some of her best, they simply steeled themselves after a moment and fixed their minds on their commander's instructions. It would be no lie to say that some of them fixed their eyes on the sight of the general's calm face as well, which helped their humming nerves. The commander's countenance, after all, seemed to hardly change even as she looked upon the scene. In fact, her smile even seemed to widen. Now there was a cheering sight! Many a legionary clung to it and endeavoured to imitate it as well, finding the thought of failing her more distasteful than potential disembowelling by a wild animal.

Shizuru knew this, of course. These were things one had to be conscious of if one was a leader. If her soldiers were disturbed, then it was up to her to be at ease-on the outside, anyway. On the inside, nothing prevented her from actually being disturbed as well. But she knew that she could not very well show it. She simply followed the dictum: grimace within and smile without. At the moment, she was doing just that while surveying the field.

What a fine mess we have here, she thought, eyeing the pouncing beasts with a fair bit of reluctance. Thank goodness we have seen those before, even if only in the arena and exhibitions. Otherwise, it would be so much easier to fall prey to the fear. All the same, there was still something about the animals that was terribly intimidating in their freedom. There was something nightmarish in their yellow eyes and coats. And good god-was that a perfectly black one over there, jumping atop that cage?

A hand brushed softly against her arm, and she caught a flash of blue-black at the corner of her eye. It was Natsuki, quirking an eyebrow at her with such perfect nonchalance it was ridiculous. Shizuru had to smirk at the younger woman's unfazed attitude, perceiving that unlike her, the girl truly was not frightened of the cats. Standing next to that, she could hardly show hesitation herself now, could she?

She signalled for the soldiers to assume formation and they moved up. Her jaw clenched when the first cat to notice them roared, its blood-stained maw a gory promise. She saw the shields before her go up. Her own fingers tightened around the naginata on instinct and she realised she had forgotten to bandage her hands against the roughness of her pole-arm in winter.

Not that it matters, she thought dryly, shaking her head at herself. Bandage my hands indeed!

That really was such a trivial thing. Amazing how this always happened to her: she would pick up on the most trivial things when about to enter battle. Like the scent in the air, for instance. She sniffed now and found the odour she had come to know so well in combat, the one that left a metallic taste on the back of one's tongue. It seemed different today, though. Why was that?

The formation began to spread, the soldiers orienting themselves in relation to the targets. Shizuru watched silently and nodded at those who shot glances at the rear towards her. She shouldered her naginata momentarily, affecting a relaxed pose to show them that there was no need to worry. Her lips turned up into a faint smile once again.

Really not the same, she was telling herself, scenting the air again. What is it? It does not smell as it usually does, like the other battles.

She caught herself as a notion occurred to her. Yes, that was it, was it not? That was why it smelled different, she thought. What she was smelling was not the scent of battle at all.

It was the scent of predation .

It was a fearsome scent, a different one. The sort that could bring a hard-bitten veteran of the battlefield scurrying behind the lines. But she did not let it trouble her more than a moment after recognising it, if indeed she let it trouble her at all. For one thing, she had no time to be troubled. Besides which, it simply ill befitted her to let such a thing put her off-balance.

It should not trouble me, she told herself, with that bone-hard determination that she employed when facing an opponent, whether on the battlefield or in Senate. It cannot trouble me. I am a predator too.

She looked up to find that the cat nearest to them-some kind of leopard, she guessed-had begun to approach, jaw dripping blood. The soldiers before her tensed yet again, their stances becoming more definite now. Shizuru could practically taste the anticipation coming from both them and the animal.

And now she could taste her own, too.

My apologies to you, Fellow Predator, she said silently to the enormous feline, with an almost giddy smirk playing on her mouth. But I intend to catch you in my coils.

There was a bloodcurdling roar and the beast charged.

---

The rounding up of the errant animals took time but was largely successful, with no significant casualties among the soldiers and only two of the escaped cats slain in the process. These were killed only because they had been too belligerent to subdue and return to their cages or put on leashes-which was done to the others, after all the necessary repairs had been carried out. While this was being done, the rest of the legionaries tended to other concerns, among them the setting aside of the dead. In their short-lived rampage, the beasts had slain perhaps two dozen of their keepers, and left none alive on the field.

"I don't think it's just these, though," the primipilus ventured to Shizuru later, as the two of them oversaw their subordinates tidying up and pushing the last beasts into the repaired cages. "The other people probably ran off into the forest as soon as those things got out. The ones who didn't get caught in the landslide themselves, I mean."

"Yes, I suppose so. There should be more persons here, I think."

"Should we send someone to look for the poor bastards?"

A soft cough interrupted them. It was from the general's bodyguard.

"Yes, Natsuki?" Shizuru said, inviting her to speak. "Is there something you would like to tell us?"

Natsuki nodded slowly, the short flick of her eyes in Nao's direction showing her reluctance to say something before the primipilus. All the same, she went on to answer her general.

"Futile," she said quietly to the two women looking at her. "To look for them."

"Why? What do you mean it's futile?" Nao asked, her eyebrows knotting lightly into a grimace. She did this not out of irritation for the girl's speaking against her idea but in order to beat back the grin that was threatening to break out on her face. It was entertaining to finally have the Sphinx talk to her, after all.

"If the lookouts have not seen them now, it is futile," Natsuki went on, her face impassive. "All you find will be blood tracks."

She tilted her head towards the trees and added, by way of explanation: "Smell. Listen."

The two Himeans exchanged glances, baffled.

"I am not entirely sure what we should be sensing, I fear," Shizuru confessed.

"The smell of blood," the girl explained. "The sound of wolves."

Again two Himeans looked at each other, this time in comprehension.

"Good point," Nao said. "Damned near forgot about that. They're probably circling round as we speak. You say you heard them, Girl? I didn't hear any howls."

"No howls," Natsuki returned. "But the barks."

She clarified, after a few seconds: "Of the hunt."

Shizuru smiled wryly.

"I see," she said. "It is strange, though, that we have not seen any come out of the trees and join in this skirmish. None were here even before we arrived. You would think that they would at least dare to approach once the cats were subdued. I have seen wolves be daring enough to approach a band of men and try to tear off scraps from men's kills."

Natsuki shook her head.

"Some of my men... they are in the woods," she told them. "They circle us."

Both Himeans looked faintly surprised.

"You mean that aside from the lookouts we posted, we actually have a circumference of the Lupine Division's members around us now?" Shizuru asked. "In the forest?"

The dark-haired woman nodded.

"I thought-" she began, before seeming to change what she was about to say. "I ordered. As a, an, umm."

Here she paused and appeared to search for a word. It took a few seconds before she was able to produce it, but both her listeners waited patiently for her to do so, understanding the difficulties of the language barrier.

"As a precaution," she finally continued. "Because there are many wolves. Interruptions, I thought."

She bowed her head slightly afterwards, as if apologising for having given such a command without informing the commander of it first. For all that though, Shizuru looked far from delivering a reprimand.

"Indeed," she said, smiling at the young woman.

The primipilus glanced at both of them and grinned. She flicked out her cloak from where it was thrown over her shoulder and it fell like a red banner behind her, flapping against her legs. Sharp green eyes met limpid ones as she spared Natsuki another look.

"It was good thinking, Girl," she said crisply to the Otomeian. "I'm going over there to speed them up, General. Best get this over with as soon as possible."

"Of course," Shizuru replied. "I leave it to you, Nao-han."

"All right."

She left and Shizuru watched her trudge away before returning her own attention to Natsuki.

"She meant it, you know. It was very well done."

The girl turned her head a little to the side and peeked at the fair-haired woman from the corner of an eye. The sound she made was noncommittal.

"If you are worried about not having awaited my order, let it not trouble you," Shizuru went on. "Any general would only be too happy to have officers in her army that know well enough what command to give to the rankers without having to be told. It is commendable."

Another soft mumble, a shy drop of black lashes. Shizuru tried to suppress her amusement at her companion's continuing diffidence.

"Just so it is clear, Natsuki, since it seems not to be," she said with a smirk, "I am actually praising you."

This failed to produce a mumble, though it did elicit a blush-a reaction perfectly satisfactory to the older woman. She put a hand on the girl's shoulder and looked pointedly at the remains of the hapless convoy that had been carrying the beasts. There were some soldiers going through the clutter and trying to see what could be looted from it, or perhaps repaired for reuse.

"Now then, come," Shizuru invited, tilting her head to that direction. "Walk with me."

The younger woman assented. Then they set off at a slow pace, their bodies close to each other and occasionally brushing.

"Such an unfortunate accident," Shizuru told her. "So many dead. Look at this."

She frowned slightly at the mangled remains of two of the merchant party's oxen.

"And the people, too. No survivors found yet, yes?"

The girl shook her head.

"A pity. All the same, perhaps I am not in the best position to complain," Shizuru continued. "All the pity in the world does not change the fact that this is a stroke of good fortune for us."

Her boot crunched on a piece of debris as she gave a dry smile.

"I wonder if I should feel guilty about that," she told her companion.

"Good fortune?" Natsuki echoed. "For us?"

"Yes." They picked their way carefully over a tangle of ruined tents. "Because of the booty this has yielded. Do you realise it now? It is not just those little trinkets and provisions the soldiers were able to salvage, you know. There is something more valuable than that here."

"Is it," Natsuki said uncertainly, "the animals?"

"Yes, the animals. Hence our going through so much trouble simply to capture them and return them to their cages. You wondered about it earlier, did you not?"

"Yes."

"It is for their value, you see," Shizuru explained. "This trading party, from what we can make of it, seems to have been headed for Argus. Well, I would not be surprised, as I said earlier, if the beasts or their forebears had originally entered this land by way of Argus. They might have been reared here for some noble's or showman's purposes before being sent south again to be sold. Those things are actually worth quite a lot of money, Natsuki."

She nodded at Natsuki's expression.

"They would probably have sold the animals to some contractor headed towards Hime," she continued. "Where the creatures would then be used for the games. Are you familiar with our games? Some call them the circenses."

The dark-haired woman shook her head.

"We hold the games for entertainment," Shizuru told her. "They are free and usually given by the State or some member of the First Class. Their purpose is to entertain the populace on holidays or festivals, or perhaps to commemorate a certain event or person. The greatest games are often held in the larger arenas, such is their popularity."

She paused to walk around one of the corpses that had yet to be set aside. Natsuki did the same.

"During the games, there are staged events such as chariot races and fights," Shizuru resumed. "The fights are often between professional warriors whom we call gladiators. Sometimes, however, there is something more spectacular: fights between warriors and beasts."

She quirked an eyebrow at her companion.

"That is where the animals we have captured come in," she went on. "They are introduced into fights or other spectacles. I have even seen one ridiculous game where they once tried to have them pull chariots. All the chariots with lions lost."

Natsuki seemed astonished: "I thought lions were fast."

Shizuru burst into laughter: "They are, but only when it suits them. Imposing-looking animals, but apparently terrifically lazy ones too. Either that or it simply did not sit well with them to do something as lacking in dignity as wearing yoke. They just plopped down on the sand and sat out the race."

The girl was intrigued.

"They do not kill them?" she asked. "The animals?"

Shizuru frowned at the thought.

"Ye gods, no!" she answered. "That would be the height of stupidity, Child. Just as the gladiators in our games do not actually kill each other in their fights, the animals are not killed and are typically not permitted to kill either. It is a show, a game, a spectacle of theatre. Not a publicly attended bloodbath. There may be exceptions, but those are not popular."

"Besides," she added after that, "you need only think about it in terms of economic investment, Natsuki. Gladiators cost money to train, and a great deal of effort. The same goes for beasts, which may cost even more when they are more exotic. Would you really waste everything you have spent into producing such a creature by killing it for a single event? Perhaps if the event were well-attended enough, significant enough, and actually made enough to cover the capital-but our games are not ones that charge attendance. People do not pay to watch them: they are invited to it. Besides which, I assure you that nearly all the spectators would flee and retch their bellies out if they were treated to some gory fight where both men and beasts were free to truly rip into and kill each other. Himean civilians do not enjoy that sort of grisly fare for their entertainments. Death in the circus arena would disgust them."

Natsuki's lips parted slightly in comprehension. She turned her eyes away and Shizuru followed her gaze to the body of one of the cats that had been slain. It was the one that had caught her eye earlier: a most unusual specimen of feline with a coat of pure blue-black. It was impossible not to admire, the older woman thought, the way its Stygian-hued fur shimmered in the light. A magnificent creature. Or it had been once.

Something came to mind and she recited it in a whisper.

"Death can find nothing to expose in he who is not beautiful."

She smiled shortly at the girl beside her, halting her steps and peering at the black beast's body more closely. Surely there was something blasphemous in having slain such a noble creature? It could not be helped, of course, since it had been so violent earlier. It was still a shame. It was a little like shooting down an eagle-which one simply did not do.

Then again, perhaps it is better for it to die here, she reasoned out to herself. Otherwise, it would have had to suffer the disgrace of being paraded before hundreds of jeering people in an arena. Something worse in that. Something terribly insulting...

"Ah!"

She snapped out of her reverie at Natsuki's exclamation and watched the girl run over to the cat's corpse. Natsuki stopped a few feet away from it and Shizuru wondered what she had found.

"Natsuki," she called, taking a few steps closer. "What is it? Did you find something?"

The girl nodded curtly, not even bothering to spare her a glance. Her attention seemed to be focused on something on the ground, behind the fallen beast's corpse, and Shizuru followed her gaze to it.

She gasped too.

Natsuki bent her knees to squat. Her hands were held open, arms outstretched before her invitingly. Shizuru fell silent, watching as the younger woman began to make soft cooing sounds in her native tongue.

Strange that we did notice this until now, Shizuru was thinking, staring at the object of her bodyguard's attention. Typical of Natsuki too, to be the one to find it.

"It" was crouching next to the panther's body: a small cub, which the general took to be the offspring of the dead cat since it was of the same midnight colouring. It was wedged against its parent's flank-perhaps in search of warmth, she thought-and was now regarding the Otomeian woman beckoning to it with faint reserve, its furry head tilting this way and that. The smaller version of the big animal, she decided, was absolutely delightful. She wanted to go coo to it herself.

I wonder that she does not just go ahead and pick it up, she thought, returning her fond attention to her bodyguard. I certainly would be tempted to, were I the one there. But I suppose that would be too forward-she probably does not wish to rush it. How like her that is as well! And is there not something amusing in this, perhaps, in the fact that I am watching my personal panther coax another her arms? Yet they are still both cubs.

Natsuki looked like a child to her, squatting that way. The younger woman's face was also loosened into a rare display of delight, which strengthened the impression; even her cheeks seemed to have the rosy blush of a child's pleasure. She must like animals, thought Shizuru. Perhaps the girl wanted a pet? Most children wanted that, did they not? If so, why not get her one? It could amuse her a little, at the very least, and perhaps keep her from getting lonely-though only when Shizuru herself was not there to fulfil that function. Yes, it seemed a good idea. Children should have pets. She could get her Natsuki a pet.

Shizuru caught herself and sighed. She was beginning to sound like the girl's mother.

Not that that's such a horrid thing, a voice in her head told her. You can be her mother too, since she was hardly able to have one. And her sister. And her lover.

That succession of ideas sent a light flush of warmth through her. Why did that sound as though she was thinking of starting a family? The same answer from before came to mind, and instead of letting the voice in her head speak it, she murmured it herself.

"Not that that would be such a horrid thing, either," she whispered, misting the air.

"Shizuru. Shizuru."

The calls brought her out of her thoughts and returned her attention to the present scene: the cub had gone out of hiding and was now in her companion's arms. The younger woman's face was a study of glee, and Shizuru herself let out an involuntary laugh at the sight. To be sure, one reason for her laugh was her sympathy with Natsuki's pleasure-but another reason was her amusement at the picture the two dark-haired creatures before her presented.

It looks like a reunion between lost kin.

She chuckled again as Natsuki came nearer with the animal still in her arms, cradling it protectively to her chest. Shizuru looked curiously at the feline her bodyguard was holding, noting that it was actually a little larger than she had thought, though still small when compared to its parent. It was roughly the same size as a large house cat, though its paws were promisingly bigger.

"Poor little thing," she murmured with a click of her tongue. "Orphaned already at this age. And this would be partly my fault, too."

"No," Natsuki said.

"No?"

The girl nodded absentmindedly, still engrossed in the cub. She tickled one of its ears and it snorted, purring lightly while nuzzling into her chest. The young woman all but chortled.

"Quite a charming critter, it seems," Shizuru remarked, entertained by the animal as well. She reached out to pet the furry head and laughed when it mewled at her attentions. A soft black paw, claws sheathed, played with her hand.

Natsuki giggled.

"Yes, quite charming indeed," the general said after a while, her eyes on the other woman. "Would you like to keep it, Natsuki?"

Natsuki turned a startled look towards her.

"Its mother is dead," Shizuru went on, stroking the creature's head again. "It may be a little difficult to find a surrogate among the remaining animals, you know, particularly since I cannot recall seeing another of its kind among them. If you wish to keep it, I do not see a reason for you not to. Otherwise, it would be sold with the others when we get to Argus, and it may simply end up being used for Hime's games."

She met the intelligent green eyes, seeing the revulsion at the idea already there.

"Chained and collared. Would that not be a worse end for it, after all?" she concluded.

Anticipation flashed in the girl's expression before being overtaken by a slight hesitance.

"But," she mumbled, brows slanting. "But, um."

"But what?"

"It..." The younger woman paused, looking crestfallen all of a sudden. "I do not know how."

Shizuru shrugged that away.

"If you are not sure how to take care of it, we can ask someone else how to do so." She paused, recalling the soldier from Nao's century who had instructed them as to how to round up the beasts. "Tenma-han might know. It is no matter if we have to ask for a little help. I shall do it for you if you like. He has surely taken care of dozens of these creatures in his youth. One lost little animal would be easy."

Natsuki cocked her head to the side in a manner that made her look much like a lost little animal herself. The general bit back a chuckle.

"But, Shizuru," Natsuki said again, with a hint of an unconscious plea in her voice. "A pet is work too. I have my work...?"

"If you are concerned about having to take care of it while watching over me, let it not trouble you," the older woman said to this objection, knowing the other was about to give in. "I am also going to have some of my servants help you. It would make it easier for all of us."

The girl was really far too shy, even when she had no need to be. Reluctant even when wanting something. It was a curious attitude, if somewhat endearing. It made one wonder how they had raised her at that cold-if-beautiful mountain citadel. What kind of childhood must she have had, to make her like this? Shizuru wished she could have been there to see it, so that she could have showered her with gifts and accustomed her to the simple happiness of receiving favours, at least. Surely her Natsuki deserved to be spoiled.

"It is no matter if we ask some of my servants to watch over it when you are busy," she told the girl. "Or we could put it in a cage when necessary."

Reluctance crossed Natsuki's face, her eyes darkening.

"A cage," she murmured, obviously disliking the idea. Shizuru hastened to explain, realising belatedly that it was in the younger woman's character to bridle at such a notion.

"Only for its safety and only when no one can monitor it," she said. "We do not want it to stray too far, after all, lest it befall some misfortune. It is only when you are busy with other things. Otherwise, you may keep it with you. Perhaps you might even keep it in your knapsack as we march, you know, though it shall probably not fit there any more once a month goes by. These things actually grow fast, do they not?"

"I... I think so."

"At any rate, think of it as an overgrown kitten or something."

The other smirked.

"It is actually an entertaining idea, so I daresay I would like you to say yes," Shizuru admitted, cocking an eyebrow. "To have such a creature for a pet is novel, to put it mildly. Why not do it? I shall help you, I promise."

Natsuki nodded slowly, looking down at the ball of dark fluff in her arms. It chose that moment to yawn, showing a handsome set of fangs and a curling, pink tongue. The two women laughed, giving it a mild start.

"Keep it," Shizuru said again, adding a second later: "If you do not, I certainly shall. Would you rather not own it yourself, though?"

The girl nodded once more.

"So you shall keep it after all?"

She received a faintly timid but expectant look in reply. Hiding her smile, she waited for Natsuki to talk.

"I may," Natsuki finally said, in her low voice. "Really?"

"Have I not been saying so all this time?" Shizuru told her, amused. "Yes, of course."

"Ah."

"So once again: are you keeping it?"

A determined nod: "Mm-hm!"

The general's hand came out, but instead of reaching for the cub's head, it went towards Natsuki's and petted hers instead.

"There's a good girl," she said.

Later, they found out that the cub was female and named it accordingly. Their dialogue about the determination of its sex was immensely entertaining to Shizuru as well, as she used that opportunity to tease the girl a little. When Natsuki stated conclusively that she had known it was female before Tenma confirmed it, Shizuru asked her how she knew it was so.

"I looked," was the glib answer.

"Where?"

A pause.

"Between the legs," said the girl.

"Ah. And what did you look at?"

A longer pause.

"Um," was the answer.

"Um?"

"That."

"That?"

Here Natsuki nodded so earnestly that the Himean nearly gave herself away with a giggle. Instead, she feigned curiosity.

"So by looking at 'that', you can actually tell?" she asked with mock seriousness.

"Yes."

"How interesting! And if it were male, what would you see there?"

There followed an extremely long pause, which ended only when Natsuki took Shizuru's hand, led the older woman to her stallion, and pointed out the animal's genitals. Shizuru burst out laughing.

---

"Suou-san."

Suou turned her head to see the praefectus coming towards her, his frail body swaddled in a cloak so large he seemed in danger of drowning in it. She waved him over to the boulder she had chosen as her perch, smiling a welcome that she hoped could warm the poor man even just a little.

"Taking a moonlight stroll, Takumi-san?" she asked, making a show of glancing surreptitiously at the shadowy foliage behind him. "I don't see Akira-san but I suppose that's regular, hm?"

He grinned, huffing dense clouds into the air as he finally reached her.

"Not really," he said, chattering. "Although some people seem to think it, she doesn't actually make a point of sneaking around in the dark."

"Ah, indeed, she doesn't seem the type to do that," Suou replied with a light smirk, guessing that the praefectus had missed the implication in the phrase he had employed. "But why are you here? It's rather too cold for people to be out. I myself am only out here since I wanted a breath of fresh air and my tent was getting stuffy."

"I was looking for Akira, actually," he confessed. "But now that you mention it, it's too cold. It might have been better for me to wait inside the tent, but..." He stopped here and looked up at the dark sky. "I have to admit I was getting bored in there too."

Suou smiled and shifted her seat, making space on the boulder.

"You are welcome to join me," she said. "Maybe you will see her when she passes by, or vice versa."

He smiled in return and took up the offered seat, leaving a polite but friendly arm's width between them. His hands tugged at his wrap, and he pulled it more securely about him. He was a little startled when he found a brass cup suddenly before his face, the smell of liquor rising heavily from it.

"Please have some," she said genially. "It is the best remedy for frigid nights such as these."

"Ah, thank you." He took the offered object and drank from it. His eyes widened after he swallowed, a trail of liquid fire searing all the way from his throat to his gut. " Edepol, that's strong!"

Suou took back the cup, and he fancied he heard her chuckle as if to herself.

"Do forgive me," she apologised. "I forgot that this was taken from the centurion's decanter and not mine. Otherwise, it would have been watered."

"No, it's fine," he said, with a laugh. "It's to be expected of Yuukisan, I guess. I was a little surprised to think it would be from you."

"Oh?"

"You didn't strike me as the hard liquor type."

"Ah." She took a drink from the cup. "I don't really mind it, though."

There was a rumble a little way off from them and they both turned to look in that direction: it was coming from one of the heavily covered cages in the wagons, which were sitting next to fires being tended by the rankers.

"It seems one of our furry friends is grumbling about the cold as well," Suou noted. "I wonder if I should go over there and offer him wine too."

Takumi chuckled. "Maybe it would be better to offer milk."

"So they say-for small cats. I wonder if it applies to big ones as well." She looked, from what he could make out of her face in the dimness, very thoughtful. "This is a nice little windfall we have here, mm?"

"Do you mean our 'furry friends', Suou-san?"

"Yes," she replied. "Granted, it's also a bit more trouble, but well worth it, I think."

"Oh, of course. I can't argue with your perception of it as being troublesome too, what with having to redistribute the oxen and horses among the added wagons and weight and all that-but I assure you it's truly worth more than the trouble it gives us," he said with certainty. A smile came to his face as the now-caged felines turned into numbers in his head, their bright yellow coats falling away in a shower of gold coins. "They'll fetch a pretty price, each one of them."

"Especially with the new year coming on," she answered, thinking of the festivals that were approaching in their homeland. More festivals meant more games, and naturally, higher going rates for the animals they were carrying. "Pity I shan't be there to see all the events. They're always good fun."

"A little homesick?" he asked pleasantly.

"Not really. It's entertaining here as well. You?"

"The same. With everything that's happened and is happening to us well, let's just say I can't help but think that Chie-san is having the time of her life setting it all down."

"Ah yes, we do have it all," she said with a hint of mischief. "The enigmatic main character, the dashing cast, the heart-stopping battles, the threat of politics from faraway lands nipping at our jaunty tails."

She added as he laughed: "And leave us not forget the not-so-illicit romance, of course."

"Romance between?" he asked, for all that he already knew the answer.

She merely gave him a slow, rather sly smile in reply. He lifted his eyebrows and looked away, perhaps a little sheepishly.

"Oh, I just recalled," she said suddenly. "You do know that Shizuru-san has decided to keep one of the felines, yes?"

"Oh, yes, I know," he said, fully aware that they had not so much changed the subject as begun to work around it. "The black cub, was it? Unusual animal."

"Yes. The pet gets a pet."

"I'm sorry?"

"You do know she gave the creature to Natsuki-san."

He nodded, then let loose a chuckle.

"I see," he said. "Oh, that's good, Suou-san."

"Thank you," she said, before drawling: "Shizuru-san is fond of taking in exotic creatures, methinks."

"Well, I suppose. You have seen it, by the way?" he asked. "The cub?"

"Yes. Pretty little critter, I thought, though it will probably turn out to be frightening when it grows," she replied, with a twinkle of her arctic eyes. "For now, though, it's adorable. As is the name."

"So it has a name already? What is it?"

"Shizuki."

"Oh- oh ." His eyebrows went up to his hairline, and she knew it was not wasted on him that the name she had supplied was a contraction of two others. "That's a fine name."

"I think so," she grinned. "Shizuru-san is the one who named it. Or so I gathered."

"Well, she has good naming sense, then."

She looked at him, amused by the care he took with his reactions. A different kind of care from the one that her sister or Shizuru took, of course-the kind of care that was perfectly obvious as care. It was so typical of the Tokiha, she thought, and she liked that.

When it became apparent that he was not going to say any more, she set the cup they had been drinking from onto the ground, then lifted her arms to stretch. It was with a little surprise that she halted upon hearing Takumi address a question to her that she had not really expected from him.

"Could you be worried about it too, Suou-san?"

The fair brows lifted elegantly, a perfect imitation of her older sister.

"Worried?" she echoed. "About our general, Takumi-san?"

He nodded, his usually open expression suddenly shading over with something that bordered on concern. She took a moment to consider him, and then turned her eyes forward once again.

"I'm hardly worried," she said expressionlessly. "As is obvious from this recent engagement, it has not dulled her abilities in any way whatsoever. Or so I think, from what I've seen of her skills thus far. I am a first-timer under her command, after all."

"Me too," he said quietly, smiling. "But that wasn't exactly what I meant by being worried."

Suou returned his smile with her own; of course she knew what he meant.

"It's rather too early to think of that yet," she said to him. "We have not even started our real campaign yet, Takumi-san. All of us, I daresay, will be staying here for quite a while longer. Time enough, would you not say so?"

"Yes, that's so," he replied, looking embarrassed. "Still, I can't help but think about it."

He chuckled self-effacingly and admitted: "Akira says I'm such a worrywart, Suou-san. I guess she's right after all."

"Which is hardly a bad thing. It's in your character to be concerned for others, and often within reason." She took a long, slow breath. "So if I may judge correctly from your concerns, you actually are of the opinion that it has progressed far enough to be of moment that way, Takumi-san?"

He sounded assent: "Or am I wrong, Suou-san?"

She said nothing and shrugged. He looked away just as she spoke up again.

"Others have been talking about it too, to be sure," she told him.

"Others... oh. You mean the legionaries?"

"Yes. This is really too choice a titbit to restrict to the officers, after all."

"That's true, though I thought it would stay a rumour among the rankers for a little longer." He peered at her. "You do mean they're talking about it with-with certainty, don't you?"

She smirked and drawled in reply: "All the certainty they needed was to pass near the general's tent at night and strain their ears a little, my good man."

"O-oh." He coloured in a way that was visible even in the weak light. "I see."

"As does everyone else, no doubt," she said. "The rumours of the fight between her and Takeda in Sosia, the gossip about that dagger she gave to the girl, and now the cub's name-add to all that the interaction between them, and it's all rather too glaring to miss. And I'm sure you're not the only one worried about this, Takumi-san, though I myself see little to be concerned about. Do you really think it would still be a problem, when the time for us to return to Hime arrives?"

"Do you mean, perhaps: 'many things can happen along the way'?"

"No, not really. Rather, let us simply say that Shizuru-san hardly seems the type to waver once she's made up her mind about something... and she seems to have made up her mind about that girl, if I'm any judge."

He took a while to reply, and she felt her lips pull up into a smile upon his retort.

"But we're not exactly talking about the mind, are we, Suou-san?"

She let out an appreciative giggle and he went on.

"The truth of it is that I agree with you when you say Shizuru-san isn't the kind to waver once she's made up her mind," he explained. "And that's what makes me concerned. I'm sure you probably know her better than I do, Suou-san, so perhaps you'll tell me if I'm right or wrong... but my impression is that Shizuru-san has, well, great ambitions. Whether it's simply the consulship she wishes to achieve or more than that, I can't tell, but either way she's still the sort of woman who has many desires her mind has long been made up on. Wouldn't you agree?"

The chilly eyes were fixed upon him with interest, and she nodded to show she agreed with him. He turned his gaze to the darkness before them and continued.

"Assuming, then, that she has made up her mind about-about Natsuki-san as well, I can't help but worry about which of these decisions will lose." He sounded a little sad now, and Suou noted the lack of effort put into masking the emotion. "I'm sure you see it, Suou-san-they're contradictory. If your sister went through so much difficulty just by being with someone of a remote social class, imagine what Shizuru-san would go through if she did decide to keep carrying on with Natsuki-san this way. Or even once this is all over."

"Still, perhaps my sister's relative success in her case might be cause for optimism?" Suou ventured, thoroughly enjoying his well-meaning candour.

He twisted his mouth into a doubtful smile in reply, and she grinned back.

"But it's a very different set of circumstances, if you'll forgive me for saying so," he rebutted. "The reason Himemiya-san was able to go on with her career was due to sheer clout and because Himeko-san is still, no matter the baseness of her social status, if you'll please excuse me for putting it that way, a Himean. But even if Shizuru-san has clout as well, she has many more enemies, I think, than your sister. Added to which is the inescapable fact that Natsuki-san is an Otomeian, a foreigner. And to most Himeans..."

She continued what he would not say.

"Even a foreign king, so they say," she said, "is less than even the lowest Himean."

He sighed deeply.

"Don't get me wrong, please," he told her. "I'm glad that Shizuru-san met her. She seems so much more animated, much happier now than ever before! I've never seen Shizuru-san like this. I think I'd prefer her to be this way from now on."

"As would I," Suou said.

"But I wonder, can having this mark on her record really serve her considering what she wants and where she has the potential to go? It can't do much good for her ambitions, even if it seems to do good for her spirit."

"What you've said is all true and reasonable," Suou said quietly. "It's true that whatever happens from now on, Shizuru-san will be going through a good deal of trouble over and as a result of this matter. Yet, Takumi-san, perhaps you'll allow me to say that you've misjudged something by a small, but still relevant margin."

"What is it, Suou-san?"

"Shizuru-san is a far more ambitious woman than you think."

He turned towards her, confused. She merely smiled at him and picked up the cup they had been using from the ground, getting to her feet and dusting off the seat of her tunic.

"It's getting too chilly," she said cheerfully. "Don't you want to go in now and cut this conversation short for the moment? I'm sure Akira-san would be displeased if she found out you spent the night out in the cold, just waiting for her. She might find it rather imprudent,."

He got up gingerly, nodding.

"Yes," he said. "That's true."

"Well then, shall we be off?"

"Yes, of course."

They had taken no more than three steps when he looked at her again, a question in his eyes.

"When you say 'ambitious', Suou-san," he prompted, looking consumed by interest. "What is it that you mean?"

She grinned and kept walking but slowed her pace so that he could keep up with her longer strides.

"Suffice it to say that I think that true ambition, Takumi-san," she told him, "doesn't feel compelled to choose between alternatives. Perhaps it might not even recognise the word 'alternative'."

"Then," he said curiously, "do you think she would-"

"I think she would do as she wishes," was Suou's answer, cutting him off. "Because she is a truly ambitious creature, after all."

Takumi squinted and looked thoughtful, but said no more. She did the same, though her expression was considerably more difficult to read than his, as her languid mask was on yet again. It was in this way that they left for their respective tents, walking silently in the snow. Even with their silence, though, the two still failed to hear the rustle from behind them, where a darkly clad figure emerged from behind the shadows they had just left.

Chapter 23

Vocabulaire:

1. Address in the Senate - In the Himean (as in the Roman) Senate, the proper form of address during a meeting is either by using a person's full name or his last (family name), regardless of personal familiarity. For a person to address another by his first (given) name during a House meeting would be a discourtesy.
2. Auctoritas - A concept related to, but different from "dignitas". It is another untranslatable term, but if one had to explain, one would say that it is something like the degree of clout and public importance a person carries. It would also be, to some extent, his/her ability to influence events through the strength of his/her reputation.
3. Consular - One who has been or has occupied the position of "consul".
4. Domine - "Master" in Latin. Also "dominus".
5. Forum eavesdroppers - These were the people who frequented the area/courtyard where nearly all the political buildings of Rome were, also known as the Forum. They were people who liked to follow, for various reasons, the political happenings of the city.
6. Lictor - A specific type of public servant. In the original context, lictors accompanied all public officials with "imperium" (the authority of a magistrate to chastise in the name of his/her office-there are actually officials who do not have this authority). They might be understood as an escort upon whom an official could call for assistance in certain matters, e.g. to chastise a public offender. Unlike the Roman case, this story has it that the lictors only accompany certain officials during certain times. The example given in this chapter is when the bureaucrat concerned is officiating a meeting of the Senate.
7. Military man - Vir militaris (L.); one whose career revolves around the army. He enters the political arena by relying on the reputation forged by his exploits in the military field.

8. Triumph (L.) – A special parade held in Rome/Hime to celebrate the victory of one of its generals. It was given only after the general's soldiers hailed him/her with the accolade of "imperator" on the field, and after the permission of Senate.

Inter Nos

---

Takeda Masashi arrived at the Himean ports a full day before Shizuru's army reached Argus, his joints aching from the rigours of passage and his lips cracked by the salt air of the sea. His crossing had been swift-largely due to the winds blowing in from the lands he had just left-but it was not swift enough for a born and bred Himean. A true Himean, so the joke went, could only be comfortable on terra firma. Takeda had been so uncomfortable during the voyage that even his usual remedy, meditation, brought little solace. Thus discomfited, he came ashore in the coastal port territories of Fuuka in a sour mood, knowing he had to endure another bout of being tossed and turned when he hired a carriage to take him to Hime itself.

He entered the city in the evening, haggard and too tired to do any more than go to his house, order a bath, and fall asleep straight afterwards. Aristion, his Greek steward, understood that his master was not in the mood to be bothered, so he deferred all the clients who came to greet the swordsman that day. He instructed them not to return on the following day, however, but two days after. Takeda was pleased to learn of this in the morning, and praised Aristion duly over breakfast.

"I don't know what I'd do without you," he said to the man, munching on a loaf of bread. "Having someone take care of troublesome things for me is a blessing. It's these little things I missed in those barbarian lands."

Aristion inclined his hoary head: "I am only doing what I should, Domine."

Takeda mumbled something around a mouthful of the pastry he was eating, then drank from his glass. He held the water in his mouth for a second, letting it swish against his teeth.

"I'll have to make social calls today," he said grumpily, heavy brows drawing close together. "Just to show I'm back."

Aristion came up to refill his cup.

"The easiest way would be to go to the House, perhaps, Domine," he suggested.

"They have a meeting today?" Takeda asked him.

"Yes, Domine. Shall you go?"

"Yes, I'm going." He reached for a dish of eggs, then paused halfway through to look at his steward. "And the Plebs? Does the tribunate have a meeting?"

"No, Domine. Not today."

"Ahh." Takeda exhaled with relief, not looking forward to so many duties after having just returned from what he considered a gruelling journey. He brought the dish of eggs before him. "That's good. Anything interesting happen while I was away?"

"All is well with the household, Domine."

"Good. I mean with the city too, though."

He had broken the yolk on one of the eggs and was happily dipping bread into it when Aristion produced something he thought of note.

"The tribunate just finished deliberations on that controversial bill a few days ago, Domine. I think it is why they would be too tired to have another meeting so soon."

A few seconds of munching: "Which bill?"

"The one from the tribune Kaneda Izumi, Domine."

Takeda's brows lifted.

"The one Himemiya-san put him up to?" he said.

"Everyone says so, but yes, that's it."

"I'll be damned!" He frowned, took another swig of water before popping the last morsel of yolk-coated bread into his mouth. "A few days ago, you said? Has she declared candidacy yet?"

When Aristion responded negatively, he mopped his mouth with a cloth napkin and stood up. His chair scraped loudly against the floor.

"Get my toga and have someone call a carriage," he ordered. "Fast, Aristion. I want to get to the Curia Hostilia before the House starts its session."

"Right away," said the servant, already walking out of the room.

"And get me a better tunic than this."

"Yes, Domine."

"Hurry!"

And hurry he did. It was only a few minutes later that Takeda found himself in a hired carriage and properly dressed for his return to the Senate. Wearing his newest toga, his chosen cloak was of a deep brown that emphasised his naturally olive skin and brought out its sheen. He was of sufficient vanity to appreciate that his attire flattered him, so when he finally stepped out of the carriage at the Forum, he took good care not to walk too fast... in order that the people already waiting outside the Curia Hostilia could appreciate the flattery of his attire too.

"Welcome back, Masashi-san," someone said.

"Glad to be back, Tanaka-san."

"Hey Takeda! Growing your hair a little long, eh?"

"I'll cut it tonight, Ochiai."

"Let it grow-so it can cover that scar on your face! Got in a new fight, eh?"

"Nothing to worry over, Old Man!"

"Good morning, Takeda-san."

And so it went, with him walking to the steps of the Curia while greeting the faces actually familiar to him. After a while, he saw a particular familiar face peering at him from halfway up the steps. He smiled and waved to her.

"Takeda-san," she said, smiling back. She came down the steps to meet him. "Welcome back to Hime."

"Tomoe-chan," he said pleasantly to his old friend. "It's been a while."

"I should say so," returned the woman as she brushed away her dark hair from her eyes. "We'd been wondering when you would return, Takeda-kun. It's a real pleasure to have one of our celebrities back in the House."

"Now, I'm sure you've been doing well by yourselves."

"Fairly so, fairly... but it doesn't change the fact that we've been missing many of our esteemed senators." She sighed and shot him a rueful smile. "Why does it seem like all of our bright lights are being drawn to that cold North Star? Between you and my cousin-"

"Just a coincidence," he said abruptly, cutting her off. He had no desire to hear of her cousin at the moment: the bitterness was still too fresh on his tongue for that. "Anyway, what's the news? Are we expecting anything interesting today?"

"What do you mean?"

He lowered his next words to a mutter, conscious of the people nearby.

"I came today because I wanted to be here if Himemiya-san announces candidacy."

Her eyes widened a little, though more from polite than real surprise.

"Some expect it could be today, in fact," she told him. "Even so, I don't see why you would want to witness it, unless you're counting on something exciting happening once she does. But I don't think people would actually contest her at this point. Himemiya-san has already won in a sense, you know-and I don't mean with just Izumi-san's bill."

He shrugged: "You can't be too sure."

She looked doubtful.

"Ye-es," she said slowly. "I suppose."

Suddenly brightening up, she held his shoulder and began to move him away from the crowd near them, which was made up of clients and the Forum eavesdroppers. He looked at her curiously but allowed himself to be steered inside the Senate's main building.

"I wanted to ask if you were free after this," she began, having removed her hand from him. "If you're not busy, would you come and dine at my place? I'm sure you're eager to catch up with all the local news and whatnot."

"Well..."

"Come, do!" she persisted. "I can tell you everything that's been happening here. In exchange, you can tell me what's going on in those parts you just came from." She paused meaningfully and added: "Besides, there is something I would like to talk to you about as well, later."

"Can't you talk now?"

"Not really," she said, giving him a cunning smile. "The walls of the Curia Hostilia have ears. Whereas those of Tomoe Marguerite's house are mostly inanimate."

He allowed a snigger: "Fine, I'll go with you later."

"Fantastic. Shall we end this conversation for now and move to the hall proper? I think the meeting's about to start."

He agreed with this course and they went inside, the two of them taking seats near the rear, next to each other. They were both among the more recent entries into the senatorial ranks and just a little above the "backbenchers". This referred to those not accorded the right to speak yet, unless called upon.

On their way to their seats, several senators called to or greeted Takeda, welcoming him from his sojourn in the North. He nodded or returned the greetings as he went, shaking hands with some of the senators he knew well before settling into his chair. The same actions were going on all about the hall, with senators greeting each other before the proceedings began. A few minutes later, the great doors were pulled shut, shutting out the Forum observers and other Himeans at the doors. It was also the token signal for the closed meeting to begin.

Normally, the consuls would be the ones to open the discussion. As neither consul was present, it was the urban praetor who commenced. Her long raven hair hung loose as usual, falling in an immaculately tidy stream behind her as she strode to the fore of the curule magistrates' platform. She stopped there, just at the step, and swept the senatorial tiers with a cool blue gaze.

"Princeps Senatus, Pontifex Maximus, fellow magistrates, and all members of this august body," her silky voice intoned. "We are convened today for several reasons. First is the matter of the senior consul's petition for a triumph, with reference to the events described to this House in her last missive-which was read in our meeting three days past. Most of us were in attendance that day, so there is no need, I trust, to reread the entire account. I shall summarise its contents instead. Are there any objections?"

It appeared there were none, so she proceeded to relate the salient points of Haruka Armitage's battle accounts to the House. As this was going on, Takeda was whispering to Tomoe.

"Armitage-san is asking for a triumph?" he asked. "Does that mean she's coming back soon, then? What happened in Africa?"

Tomoe leaned slightly towards him, refraining from pointing out that if he would only listen to the urban praetor his questions would be answered.

"The rebellion's more or less over," she explained in a hushed voice, so as to avoid being overheard. "So she sent a letter about what happened and how she helped put it down. I believe she's on her way here now."

"That was quick. Thought she'd try to make a grand campaign out of it."

"I doubt she could've. Besides, the Senate has been sending her letters all this time, asking her to come back. Hime still needs a consul, even if the urban praetor-" A flick of her eyes to the woman who was still addressing the House. "-is someone as competent as Chikane Himemiya-san."

In front, the urban praetor had finished recounting the missive from Africa, and was now inviting any would-be-speakers to rise.

"In light of what has been stated," she said. "Does anyone wish to speak on the matter before we put it to vote? I extend the invitation first of all to our Princeps Senatus, censors, and all the other consulars."

Someone stood up, which raised a few eyebrows. The expectation had been for a quick vote of approval; Haruka Armitage's allies had been counting on it.

"I would like to talk, Himemiya-san."

Chikane turned to the consular who had uttered these words, nodding when she saw who it was.

"Then I give you the floor, Hajime-san," she said, returning to her seat facing the ranks. The present orator had no intention of walking the floor, however, and simply remained beside his seat. He began to speak in a dry voice.

"Let me begin by saying that I'm a Military Man," he stated. "I'm more military man than politician, in fact, which many of you know. As a vir militaris, I have respect for any good soldier's martial abilities. The share of respect rises, naturally, with the degree of difficulty in the profession... which means if I respect a good soldier, I respect a good general even more. Why am I saying this? Because the senior consul, I believe, is essentially a good general. So we can say that's how I regard her insofar as these things are concerned."

Takeda was no longer whispering to Tomoe at this point, but listening to the speaker. The man happened to have been one of his idols when he was younger, a famous expert with the sword. He also rarely attended, much less spoke in the House meetings, so this was a rare occurrence that merited attention-and not merely from Takeda. Everyone was listening.

"Anyway, I've seen a lot of Himean generals in my time, few of them good," Hajime went on with a sardonic smile. "And those good ones, usually, have been recognised in one way or another. But not all of them received the kind of recognition they deserve."

"Let's take an example," he said, lids coming down momentarily as he thought of a name. When he opened his eyes again, his gaze fell on the urban praetor. Hajime grinned like a wolf that had picked up a scent.

"We don't have to go too far," he said. "Let's take our urban praetor. I'm sure you all remember her recent exploits, so there's no need for me to prove Chikane Himemiya-san is a good general. Unfortunately, she also happens to be one of those generals who haven't received the recognition they deserve."

A scoffing voice came from the middle rows: "Himemiya-san was awarded a triumph for her last campaign, Hajime-san. Could it be you were absent as usual that day, and missed it?"

"Actually, I was there to see it," Hajime replied, with a malicious sneer. "Although I didn't see you there, Jousuke-san. I didn't even smell you-which is strange, since I can usually tell your presence a mile away from the stink of liquor in your breath. Care to comment? Oh, no, actually, don't bother. I'd have to cover my nose again."

The other senator said nothing-for it was true that he had been absent that day due to a night's worth of heavy drinking-and flushed red.

"As I was saying, Himemiya-san is one of the unfortunate ones," Hajime continued. "I say she didn't get the recognition she deserved because she had to share her triumph with another worthy general, namely Urusawa-san, who was commander of the other theatre of engagement during that war."

He paused to snort.

"We like to say 'that war' but it should be 'those wars', shouldn't it? The fact is that both these generals waged practically separate, full-scale wars in their respective theatres, and won them. But when they returned to Hime, they were only given one triumph and told-in a good example of the House's joked-about cheapness-to share it."

There were mutterings now, but all of them too low to interrupt Hajime. Takeda was frowning with confusion, and he spared a glance for the urban praetor. Her face was expressionless as that of a statue. Takeda looked at Hajime again.

"What in the world is he getting at?" he murmured.

A lot of others were asking the same thing.

"Still, I know the argument that it's not our policy," Hajime was saying. "We don't award two separate triumphs to commanders in what's considered to be one blanket war, no matter how good the commanders are or how obvious it is that what's one war is actually two. It's cheap, but anything else would be considered flamboyant. A triumph is still a triumph. Isn't that right?"

He drew himself up to his full, imposing height and narrowed his eyes.

"Now I'm going back to the topic," he told them. "And this is what I wanted to say: I want to know just what the senior consul is thinking, petitioning a triumph for that tiny two-month campaign she's just finished. Does she really think that going to hole up in a city and entering the fray only when the spears cross the line marking their camp is deserving of a triumph? Does she think that cheap little venture deserves recognition as good generaling? Because I don't!"

Fresh rumblings broke out at this, louder than before. Hajime went on unfazed.

"I don't see how the House can possibly award commanders of Chikane Himemiya and Urusawa Jinto's calibre a shared triumph," he sneered contemptuously at the senators bristling at his speech, "and then suddenly go and give an unshared one to Armitage-san for standing guard-or is it standing by?-in some well-fortified provincial city in case an insignificant rebellion in a neighbouring country gets a little out of hand. You can't even consider that a proper battle! A good general our senior consul may be, but that's not something that was really shown in this campaign. I'm sure she knows that too. But then, how can she ask for a triumph? Does she think just being a good general is enough to get that?"

"We don't give triumphs just for being a good general, unless that general actually does something good," he went on with another awful smirk. "In fact, sometimes we still don't give them a triumph even if they do something good. In this case, though, it's all pretty clear to me. The senior consul didn't do anything good enough for a triumph, so the senior consul should not get a triumph. It's plain folly not to mention cockiness on her part to have even petitioned for one when the only battle she fought was a skirmish. Someone needs to tell the senior consul that she shouldn't be wasting her time on unjustifiable petitions like this and come home instead. Let her return sensibly to her real duties, like a truly good general would... rather than crowing about like some young cock who's only beaten back a sparrow!"

The biting words sparked an uproar as senators jumped up and began yelling, some asking for the urban praetor's permission to speak, and some simply dispensing their retorts directly to Hajime-who stood with unconcern, leering at the commotion. Chikane was on her feet, calling for order.

"Now he's done it!" Tomoe said to Takeda, her face painted with unease as she regarded the tumult below them. "They're dying to rip into him."

"But he has a point," Takeda whispered loudly, scanning the crowd for the Princeps Senatus. He expected the older man to be doing something to calm the rioters. To his surprise, the Princeps was still on his seat and grinning broadly at the turmoil. Meanwhile, the senator who had interrupted Hajime's speech earlier was making his way through the ranks. He was headed for Hajime and his intent showed clearly on his grim face. One of the other senators, perceiving him, attempted to restrain Jousuke from getting closer to his target, but the enraged man wheeled and cuffed that intercepting man in the jaw. The other senator staggered backwards and Jousuke leapt a few chairs nearer the waiting Hajime.

"Edepol!" Takeda said to Tomoe, half-rising from his seat. "This is going to turn really ugly if someone doesn't do something."

Just as the words were out of his mouth, the urban praetor's voice soared out, suddenly calling for a division. While her voice was bereft of any real urgency, the astonishing call still managed to cause an abrupt lull in the outcries. The House never held a vote on an issue after the first speaker to orate gave a speech opposing it—allowance was always given for speeches of rebuttal from the other side. In this instance, though, it seemed that custom would be broken. Everyone whipped about to look at the urban praetor.

They found her just before the curule platform, surrounded by lictors. She had apparently summoned them during the confusion. Before anyone could fully appreciate the meaning of the lictors' presence, the urban praetor suddenly strode forward to the senatorial rows, actually getting close enough to the centre of the developing mob to fling her toga in their faces if she were to take it off. She looked the portrait of stately disgust.

"I should hardly have to say this," she said tersely, her words coming out at the crack of a whip. "But as the one officiating this meeting, I would like to remind you that you are all supposedly adult men and women. Supposedly!"

There were a few flinches as she snapped the last word, glaring at them with such scorn that no one had the gall to either retort to or ignore her. The woman was usually so easygoing that when the cold fire banked in her eyes leapt up, something seemed to shock the very air into freezing.

"Those who have something to say shall say it in the proper manner," she was saying. "And that is to state the words in an orderly fashion, not to scream them out at a pitch more proper to a nursery of brats. If you persist in the latter style, I shall not hesitate to either call a division on the matter right now, or put it off by adjourning this meeting at once! Anyone transgressing our rules of conduct shall be thrown out by my lictors. If need be, I shall throw all of you out, and I am sorely tempted to join the lictors in applying a hand myself! Which means, Jousuke-san, that you had better return to your seat. I advise you not to wait for my and the lictors' assistance, which you shall be certain not to appreciate!"

She stopped to rake the rows with another frigid stare, letting them know she meant the threat. A few of the would-be rioters suddenly found good reasons for looking down at the floor, to the ceiling, anywhere away from her. The senator she had named turned red and inched to his place, grumbling.

"Since both our consuls are not in attendance, I am the one tasked with preserving the order and honour of our august body," she declared, with less violence though not less gravity. "As such, it is my duty to safeguard both. Members of the House, take my warning: I shall see no dishonour coming to our Senate from your infantile behaviour. Having said that, I now invite the embarrassing lot of you to sit down."

Her tone made clear that it was not in fact an invitation. Although still muttering (very quietly), all dissenters returned to their seats. Hajime eased into his seat as well, still looking as though he could not care less about the people snapping at him.

Meanwhile, Chikane was scanning the seats with a glittering eye.

"Once again," she said, after a tense moment. "I address the consulars first. Does anyone have anything to say?"

She looked at the Princeps Senatus.

"Kanzaki-san," she said. "Have you anything to say?"

Reito held up his hands, still looking very tickled. "Only that I have to admit to agreeing with Hajime-san's stance on this point, and that I hope this admission will not birth another-oh-'screaming nursery'."

Chikane's mouth twitched at the paraphrase.

"Given your famous care in these matters I am certain there will be no such unwanted pregnancies, Princeps," she drawled, drawing a good deal of laughter from the rows as well as from the Princeps himself. "We thank you for your comment and the orderly fashion in which it was delivered. Anyone else?"

"I would like to express my disagreement with Hajime-san's position, Himemiya-san."

"Then I give you the floor, Wang-san."

After thanking her, Sergay Wang stood up. Unlike his usual custom, however, he did not go to walk the floor but spoke while standing next to his seat as Hajime had done. His arguments also were less inspiring than normal. In fact, each person who spoke after him in support for the senior consul's petition for a triumph delivered a pale speech, a fact noted by everyone.

Whether it was simply that this was not the senior consul's day or that Hajime's speech had made a heavy impression on the House, the meeting eventually concluded with a division that showed over two-thirds standing on the majority side: denial of Haruka Armitage's petition for a triumph. It was a distressing turn of affairs for the senior consul's allies, as they had expected the petition to be summarily approved. Several shot dark looks at the author of this upset, who ignored them with his usual nonchalance.

"That issue is now closed," Chikane announced. She took a moment to glare at the rows again, quelling possible protests before they arose. "The other matters on our agenda are trifling and can wait. It seems we have spent too much time on this subject and it would be better if we stopped here for now. We may resume deliberations on the rest another day. Does everyone find this agreeable?"

Everyone found it agreeable.

"Then we are adjourned. Good day, fellow Members of the House."

---

"It turns out I was wrong about one thing: something exciting did happen," Tomoe declared. "But dear me, I didn't expect that at all!"

Takeda looked up at her across the table, his mouth full of honey-glazed sausage. The two of them were at Tomoe's villa and having a light repast after the momentous meeting.

"It was a surprise," he said at length. "I didn't think Hajime-san would say such a thing. But he made good sense, even if he said it a little bluntly."

"He was marvellously dry, wasn't he?" Tomoe replied. "But Himemiya-san was something too. I'd nearly forgotten she can have a fearsome temper when she's poked."

The swordsman's eyebrows lifted: "I thought she was still pretty calm. She didn't go off into a rant."

Tomoe waved that away while reaching for a napkin.

"She's not the type to rant when she's angry, I think," she said. "People who rant usually don't mean to do what they say they will. But Himemiya-san meant everything she threatened to do-and more."

She daubed at her mouth.

"They say," she said, "that the more blue-blooded aristocrats really show their haughtiness when cross. After what I've seen today, I'm beginning to think it must be true. I don't think I've ever seen her so... supercilious."

"She's a Himemiya. They're all supercilious."

She giggled.

"Now that's a truth, even if no one has the courage to say it to their faces. Still, they're not bad. I somewhat like them, or most of them, anyway," she admitted.

He nodded agreement, then stretched his hand to reach for his own napkin. It was to his right and he turned his head as he took it, giving her a fine view of the scar on his left cheek. She eyed it curiously.

"Takeda-kun," she said, making him face her again. "I noticed it earlier but hesitated to say anything, in case you thought it impolite of me..."

"What is it?" he asked.

"The scar on your cheek."

One of his hands came up on reflex to touch the mark. His lips thinned before he could remember to stop himself.

"Oh, this? It's nothing," he said airily, trying not to think about the incident that had brought this to him. "Just an accident."

She nodded sympathetically.

"It doesn't ruin my face too much, does it?" he asked jokingly.

"No. I find it gives you a very rugged appeal," she said.

They chuckled at that and she pushed one of the dishes in the middle of the table towards him.

"Oh, yes," she said. "Do try this one. It's made with licker-fish."

He reached for the plate she had indicated. It was a delicacy of Hime, made with a fish that could only be found in one part of the river outside the city. His mouth watered as he looked at it.

"Licker-fish? Oh, how I missed it! I'll help myself, then..."

"Please do. I had them cooked for you since I thought you'd be missing proper Himean cuisine after all that time up north." She slanted her head in an inquiring way. "What did they feed you over there, anyway? I'm curious."

"Mostly meat," he replied. "Goat, oxen, sheep. Lots of boar, too."

He sighed after taking a bite of the lick-fish.

"They'd cook that one-the boar-on a spit, usually," he said. "Awful deal of roasting."

Again, another sympathetic nod: "Just as I imagined."

"It wasn't that bad. There was more fish in Argus, at least. But I spent most of my time in Sosia, so it was meat."

"I can't imagine how you got by," she sighed, looking concerned. "Or my cousin. I can only hope she's able to find proper food wherever she is now. She's slender enough as she is."

Takeda stop chewing and grasped abruptly for his glass. He took a long drink.

"You did run into her, didn't you?" she asked, eyes eager and expectant. "I couldn't imagine you two missing each other there, since there are only so many Himean provinces in the north. Surely you saw her at least once."

He set down his glass. Tomoe, seeing it was empty, reached for and refilled it. She kept her eyes on him all the while.

"Well, yes," he said with a hint of unwillingness that his eager auditor managed to ignore. "I did."

She leaned forward, her face suddenly more alive than he had ever seen it. The change was so startling he nearly forgot about his reluctance to speak and simply answered her swift queries.

"How was she? Did she look all right? I hope she hasn't grown any thinner from all that barbarian food."

"She looked fine."

"Was she in good spirits?"

"Seemed so."

"Did you talk?"

That brought him out of his daze. He stiffened, trying to hide his apprehension by pretending to wipe his mouth again with the napkin.

"A little," he said shortly, a touch of bile leaking into his voice. "She was too busy to be social."

"Ah. Yes, that sounds like her." She leaned back into her seat, looking wistful. "She's always too busy. I hope she hasn't been overworking herself too much over there, though. Did it seem like she was?"

"No. Although she might be getting a little more attached over there than is proper," he muttered sulkily, before he could stop himself.

"Excuse me?"

He blinked and frowned at his blunder, the image of a dark-haired temptress with wicked green eyes slipping away from his mind.

"Committed," he corrected, meeting Tomoe's gaze. "I meant that she was getting a little too committed over there."

He paused and added: "To the campaign, I mean. Maybe she shouldn't be."

"I agree."

He blinked again, not sure he had heard aright.

"Sorry?" he said.

"I agree with you," Tomoe said smoothly, her greyish eyes so intent that it made him uneasy. "My dear cousin is becoming too heavily embroiled in that venture to the North, too much for her own good. I'm worried, you know."

His brows drew together as he asked why.

"Oh, many reasons," she sighed out. "She could be here instead and steadily furthering her career as is her due. But, no. Instead, she's victim to yet another scheme to keep her from her goals by banishing her to a command in a godforsaken place. Not even a campaign, but a measly expedition of fortification miles away from home. Isn't it so?"

He started at the question, giving her another long look. Something was odd about her today, he thought, but he could not place what it was. Something too eager in her eyes, perhaps. Something weird and wily.

Best agree with her.

"Maybe you're right," he settled for saying. "The North is ill-suited for her."

He sneered inwardly as a thought came to mind.

"She'd surely do more good here than with keeping company with those northerners," he remarked. "She'd be better off staying close to Himeans than getting cosy with them."

She nodded briskly.

"I'm glad to hear you say so!" she said. "That's what I brought you over here to talk about, Takeda-kun."

His eyes widened a fraction: "I don't see why I'd be someone you'd talk to about it, though, Tomoe-chan."

"Didn't you say you agreed with me about my cousin's plight?"

It took a second, but he nodded. She lifted an eyebrow at him afterwards.

"Then what say you help me relieve her of that godforsaken command and bring her back here, where she rightfully belongs?" she asked, in a theatrically hushed tone.

Takeda's eyes widened further.

"What do you mean?" he demanded. "Why me?"

"Because you're the only one I can trust among the outgoing tribunes of the plebs, and one of the few with a big enough following-and auctoritas -to make it happen."

He exhaled, wondering what he could possibly say to that. After a while, he frowned and addressed her.

"Still, Tomoe-chan, I only have limited powers," he pleaded. "I'm just a tribune of the plebs! Even if I did agree, well, what then? Wouldn't it be better to go to the urban praetor? Himemiya-san's her friend, as I remember, and has far more clout than I do. It's the whole conservative faction that's responsible for your cousin being stuck where she is, and I doubt one tribune of the plebs could change their minds. What could I possibly do?"

She smiled a wide smile that told him she was not to be deterred.

"Well, Takeda-kun," she said. "You could hear me out, for one thing."

---

As these developments were taking place in their homeland, the Himean deputation to the North reached the territories of Argus. They entered the district amidst great hubbub, people clustering about the road to gape at the army trudging in. They looked so impressive, with their red cloaks and polished cuirasses! Why, even their baggage train was worthy of attention, having as it did a pack of giant cats!

While the populace goggled, the army's commander was walking close to the head of the column, her bodyguard at her side. The chief primipilus of the Ninth Legion and some other officers were walking behind them, but stood a few paces away. Not that the army's general minded: she was preoccupied with speaking to the Otomeian.

"It is just as you said, Natsuki," Shizuru was saying to her companion. "There are indeed 'many people'. It is interesting to find so many out and doing business in this season. Although I suppose it is always so in big port cities such as this."

She cast a glance at the woman next to her.

"That said, you really do not have to be so wary of them," she went on.

This was because the younger woman had been on a heightened alert ever since they entered the province. She seemed distrustful of having such a crowd around them, Shizuru noted, and kept her hand vigilantly on the daos tucked into her belt. Shizuru had hoped that talking to her would get her to relax, but she saw now that there were some gaps in her remedy. As the girl was standing right beside her, in such a visible position in the marching column, she was now also doubly exposed. Natsuki also happened to be a person of considerable physical charms, so now more and more people pointed and stared their way, which made her more and more uncomfortable.

"I imagine it has been a while since a Himean cohort-much less a full army-passed through here," Shizuru went on, essaying a smile. "The last time was with us as well, and we hardly spent more than a day here before going to Otomeia. You must credit that our appearance is somewhat irregular to the inhabitants. It is natural that they would treat us as a parade. So be of good cheer, do, and enjoy it! This is a fine welcome all things considered."

Natsuki nodded and went so far as to show a tiny smile to please her commander. She kept her hand on her daos, however.

"Here, enjoy the sights," the older woman advised. "Have you ever been here, in this part of Argus? The public markets, I mean?"

At this point, their entourage was passing through a wide, cobblestone road lined with stalls and booths at the sides, already inside the city walls. Only the first cohort, the general's guard, was coming in with them, the rest of the soldiers already starting to park and set up outside the provincial capital.

What Shizuru now regarded were the markets that adjoined the main square of Argus, where it was possible to find almost anything to suit one's fancy. Hawkers could be seen calling out and displaying their wares, which ranged from fanciful trinkets imported from god-knew-what-shores to unusual pastries shaped and twisted to look like animals. There were stalls selling bolts of fantastically patterned cloth, and some selling delicate statuettes of the gods. There were even some selling cages woven of reeds, each with a chirping bird inside.

"Um, I-no," Natsuki answered, finally having noticed the displays. She regarded the stalls with the sort of excited panic that told Shizuru she did not know what to look at first, and then said, after a while: "No, I have not seen these."

"I see. Then I shall accompany you here one of these days," Shizuru told her, entertained by the wonder in the girl's eyes. "We can look at all the shops. We shall go through all of them and you can even point out whatever catches your fancy so that we can acquire it. It shall be great fun."

She gave the girl an inquiring look.

"It would be a fine way to pass the time while we winter here," she added. "Would you like that, Natsuki?"

Natsuki seemed a little surprised, then embarrassed.

"Umm, if-if you like," she mumbled, and in such a low voice that the older woman had to lean closer.

"I do like. So we shall do that," Shizuru replied, pleased by the little spots of colour on the girl's cheeks. "For now, though, it should be amusing enough to just look at the goods as we walk. What do you think? See anything you want?"

Natsuki let her gaze wander to some of the booths.

"Ahh," was all she said, still trying to take in too much and thus unable to properly take in any of them.

"Are they not amazing?" Shizuru prompted. "This is the sort of variety that you only get in port-provinces because of the continuous exit and entry of people and trade. You may find people from all sorts of places here, and it produces quite an interesting blend of cultures. I daresay we might even run into some Mentulaeans here. If we do, Natsuki..."

Natsuki looked questioningly at her as she trailed off.

"Try not to drag them behind your stallion."

The Otomeian was unable to hold back a laugh, unknowingly startling the Himean officers marching nearby. They had been watching the commander and her bodyguard ever since the two began whispering to each other, and had in fact increased the space the general's long strides had made between their parties themselves. They were sensitive to the rumours that the Otomeian was already their commander's lover.

"On another note, where is Shizuki?" Shizuru was asking. "Did you leave her with one of the servants, Natsuki?"

Natsuki nodded: "Baggage train."

"I see. That is good," Shizuru said. "It is better to leave her there for now, since she might be unsettled by all the noise and people."

Despite her words to Natsuki, though, she actually missed having the animal nearby. She had grown fond of seeing its furry head sticking out of Natsuki's knapsack-which was tied to the Otomeian's saddle-as had been the case during the past week, its black and snuffling nose often within reach of her fingers. It had been proving immensely docile, and more than a few of the other officers had already taken a liking to the animal, often trying to sneak scraps of meat to it when they got near enough.

That may well change soon, Shizuru thought level-headedly. She knew most of the people fascinated with her bodyguard's pet were only so because it was still small, novel and young, still much like a housecat in looks and size. Once it got bigger, these same people would probably be avoiding it out of fear. Wild animals were always so: they were easier to love when young only because the threat they posed was young as well. Once the animal matured, it was far easier to remember that it was still an animal .

She turned again to her dark-haired escort, only to perceive the girl staring intently at one of the booths. She grinned when she saw what was displayed there.

"Natsuki," she said suddenly. "Have you ever seen those? The metal-wrapped eggs?"

Natsuki shook her head before turning to look again at the trinkets in question. Shizuru understood why the girl would be fascinated-she herself had been as well, when she had first come across them years ago. They were eggs of different kinds, colours, and sizes, all encased in a skilfully-done binding of silver or brass chains whose links were so fine they looked like thick threads of wool. Others were encased not in chains but in strips of worked metal, which was just as attractive. These were just ornaments, of course, but very handsome baubles indeed.

"Very pretty, don't you think so?"

Natsuki nodded.

"Only, it does seem a little cruel to think of the poor birds inside them. "

The girl whipped her head towards the older woman, who feigned a sad expression.

"Birds?" she echoed curiously.

"Yes." Shizuru reigned in her chuckle and kept her brow dark. "Tell me, Natsuki, have you ever seen a bird being born? When the chick hatches from the egg?"

Natsuki nodded. Her face started to show signs of apprehension.

"Did you not think it a beautiful, perhaps even moving sight?"

The younger woman nodded again.

"Well, so it is," Shizuru sighed heavily. "Many people think the same, and they even go to the lengths of seeing it as a little form of entertainment. So they put the eggs-like those over there-in those, ah, egg cages. People buy them only to watch the poor little chicks being born inside those chains."

She watched Natsuki's expression morph into horror at this fabrication, her own jaw aching with the effort of keeping her pretend-gravity. She shook her head and looked away momentarily, taking that opportunity to bite her lip

"Awful, is it not?" she said, facing the girl again with a solemn countenance. Natsuki nodded vigorously, her face showing that she was moved to great indignation by this act of meanness.

"Oh, the awful things that people do for a bit of amusement! Yet, as you can see, they turn a decent trade in this commercialised cruelty. See, there is one woman buying one of those vicious cages now."

Natsuki looked as though her heart had been encased in those 'egg cages' as well. Suddenly, she gave a mild start.

"Shizuru," she said quietly, her voice a troubled whisper. "But-but when they grow..."

Shizuru nodded sadly, her jaw so tense she was afraid it would cramp.

"Yes," she answered. "Do you know what happens to them?"

Natsuki answered negatively, looking even more agitated now.

The older woman dropped her voice even further, her words strained with the laughter trying to make its way out.

"When the birds get older and start growing..." she said slowly.

Natsuki waited, horror creeping into her face with every second of suspension.

"... they turn out shaped like eggs," Shizuru concluded, saying it in a tone of chilling horror.

She burst into laughter when she saw the girl's mouth fall open, her face showing comprehension of having been deceived. The soldiers and officers nearby watched curiously as their commander doubled over in mirth, her step almost staggered with the force of her hilarity. They watched even more curiously when they saw her seize the Otomeian's arm, in an apparent attempt to prevent the girl from fleeing her side.

"Say, what do you think's going on there, Nao?" one of the centurions asked the chief primipilus. "I can't hear them with this racket."

"I think... I think Natsuki-san looks like she's mad," another officer elbowed in with them, a tribune of the soldiers, answered. "Is she mad at the general? But why's the general laughing, then?"

"They're just playing around," Nao said, looking amused herself. "General's probably teasing her again."

"Ohh. Yes, I get it."

"Hey-look! Look!" another soldier hissed urgently, pushing in between them. The two turned to see what had him so excited. "The general's holding her hand!"

The general was indeed holding her bodyguard's hand. Furthermore, she seemed to be making a point to lean closer to the young woman, as though trying to speak directly to her ear. Yet the tilt of her head, the look on her face-her whole attitude, in fact, could not be mistaken for that of someone telling another a secret. Unless the secret was a romantic one.

"Ha! Told you it's just as everyone says," one man said triumphantly. "See? You can't get more obvious than that!"

Nao rolled her eyes, though she was actually surprised by the display as well.

"You can, actually, and I'm sure they'll be doing that soon enough too," she said, bringing the others' eyes back to her. "Better get used to it. If each little thing between those two makes you this excited, I'd say you'd have a better career dishing out gossip to old women than fighting in the army."

The tribune of the soldiers grinned unashamedly.

"It's just so strange, Yuuki-san," he said, still wiggling his eyebrows giddily. "I've never seen the general like this."

"Me too, and this's my second campaign with her!" one centurion said. "But say, Nao, you're awful calm about it. You seen her like this before?"

"Just keep marching, you old gossips!" Nao said with a laugh.

As for their general, she was still too occupied with trying to coax her lover into forgiving her to notice the excitement she had stirred up in the ranks. She held onto the girl's hand tightly, cooing apologies and promising to make up for her joke.

"Do forgive me, Natsuki," she was saying to the girl. "Please? I shall not do that again if you forgive me now."

Natsuki said nothing, her face between a scowl and a pout. The older woman pulled her own lips in to hold back the smile trying to get out.

"I shall do anything," she went on cajolingly. "I shall make it up to you tomorrow, when we visit these stalls again. You may have and do anything you want; I shall not complain one jot. You may even ask me to buy you all of those silver-wrapped eggs-I would buy them for you."

Natsuki cast another dark look her way at that reminder of the joke. She parted her lips and for a moment, deluded the general into thinking she would say something. Instead, she exhaled a long cloud of grievance into the air.

"Please Natsuki?" Shizuru tried again. "I am truly sorry. Please forgive me?"

It took a few more moments of sulking before the girl finally deigned to look her way. Shizuru attempted a pleading gaze. Natsuki's face blanked at the sight. She looked away again.

"Natsuki?"

The scowl was now fully overtaken by the pout. Shizuru pressed on, sensing victory.

"Do you forgive me, Natsuki?"

Natsuki huffed and finally nodded acceptance.

"But," she said, quickly, as Shizuru smiled. "You do not have to."

The older woman quirked an eyebrow at her.

"I don't have to...? What don't I have to?" she asked, still not letting go of Natsuki's hand.

"You do not have to get me... anything," the girl muttered, attempting to quell her own blush with a weak frown.

Shizuru grinned at that, and pressed her hand. She would have kissed her too, had it not been for all the people around them.

"My dear little Natsuki. Perhaps I don't," she said, saying the words so sweetly anyone who heard them might have thought they were being given in between kisses after all. "And perhaps I do. But regardless of that, I shall because I want to."

Natsuki said nothing and still refused to look at her, but squeezed her hand back.

Suddenly someone came up behind them and greeted her. Shizuru returned the greeting, while Natsuki simply nodded, fidgeting a little with the hand the commander held captive.

"Well, Shizuru-san," said the new arrival, with only a second's glance at the linked hands. "This is a fine bustle we have here, isn't it? Typical of our friend's province, I guess."

"True, Chie-han. Though the bustle suits the place in this case."

"That's a nice rhyme," Chie pointed out. "Anyway, I wonder if she'll be here to greet us today. Given how busy Argus is, though, I doubt it."

As it turned out, the ones to greet them were two other officials: the quaestor of the province, and one of the primipilus centurions of the local garrison. They explained that the governor was having a meeting with some foreign plutocrats and would be glad to meet them as soon as she was finished. She might even be finishing now, they said, so they would be pleased to provide an escort to the gubernatorial palace if the Himean commander wished to meet her right away.

Deciding to do just that, Shizuru gave orders to the officers to see to the army. Some local officials joined her officers to provide assistance and whatever might be required. This taken care of quickly, they then gave her a guide to conduct her to the governor. Only the senior legate and her Otomeian companion went with her to the governor's mansion, her marching household staff having gone to the baggage train to collect her effects and bring them to the mansion as well, given that it was where she would be staying.

"The city looks well-kept," the general remarked to their guide as they walked. "We did pass through it before, when we had just come from Hime, but I am afraid we did not really get much of a chance to sightsee."

"I remember, Fujino-san," the man answered deferentially. "I did see you when you disembarked. I was one of the authorities on the ports that day."

"I see. Yet surely we have not met before...?"

"No, I did not have the pleasure, as something interrupted," he replied. "My full name is Takeshi Ogawa, Fujino-san."

"I am pleased to meet you, Ogawa-han." She turned to indicate the other women. "By the way, this is my senior legate, Chie Harada, and my ever-present companion, Natsuki of the Otomeians."

Chie giggled at the unorthodox introduction her friend had used for the Otomeian, who did not even bat an eyelash. She was sure the girl would have shown more emotion, though, if her fingers had still been linked with the general's: at the moment, they were no longer holding hands.

"Good to meet you too, Ogawa-san," said the legate, returning the man's pleasantries. "Have you been stationed long in Argus?"

"Oh, yes. Two years now, in fact. Always under the governor," he said, as though there were no other possible governor for the province. "I wasn't quaestor the first year, though. Truth be told, I find it exciting work."

"I'm sure it would be, with her at the helm," Chie replied, eliciting a laugh. She turned to the Otomeian and explained: "You'll understand when you meet her, Natsuki-san. Shizuru-san and I know her from a long time ago, so you don't have to be alarmed if she gets pretty familiar when greeting your general. She can be a little... hmm... effusive."

Natsuki digested that.

"Anyway, I'm excited to see her," Chie went on, this time to Shizuru and Ogawa. "It's been forever!"

"You were not able to see her either when you passed through here a few months ago, yes?" Ogawa noted. "I think she was not in residence at that time."

"She was somewhere on business," Chie said, looking around as they passed through the portals of the governor's residence. "Ah, we're here!"

They were standing in the main hall of the mansion now, and servants approached them, ready to take their cloaks. The local official made to ask where the governor was, but was interrupted by a loud cry.

"Look at what the wind brought in!"

The group turned towards the source of the exclamation and had only time to see a blur of red descend upon the senior legate and sweep her into an embrace. Chie returned the hug, laughing gustily all the while.

The pair parted a little, allowing the other woman to get a good look at Chie.

"You're so tall!" she exclaimed.

The senior legate laughed again: "That's what you said the last time you saw me, and we're only about the same height!"

"Yes, so we are. But it's nice to be told you're tall, isn't it?"

"Childish as ever, I see," Chie joked, earning herself a knock on the temple. The two of them relinquished their holds and the other went towards Shizuru, who came forward.

"It's 'childlike', Chie, not 'childish'," she said, clasping Shizuru's offered hands. Her eyes studied Shizuru's form intently. "And you, Shizuru-chan-well, you've always been taller than everyone, so there's no need to even say it! And you look even more beautiful each time I see you! Like your parents, certainly, though even more like yourself. Quite an original you are, but still classic."

"I am gratified by that description, I think," Shizuru said, suppressing a chuckle. "You look good as well, Midori-sensei."

"San, not sensei," the governor of Argus replied with a wink. "The latter makes me feel old, and that's something no one is permitted to feel in my province."

The woman supposed to be greatly occupied with the tasks of a controversial expedition was able to find quite a lot of idyllic time in it. Lounging on a couch in the room prepared for her in the Argus governor's estate one evening, she exhaled contentedly while watching her two personal entertainers-who were on the rug beside her couch-play with each other, seemingly caught up in their own world. While there was a sort of charm to watching this scene, she decided that it was high time for her to be included in the game. After a few more moments of observation, she opened her mouth to speak.

"She looks so clean, Natsuki. You bathed her?"

Her bodyguard looked up and nodded.

"I hope she did not struggle much."

The girl denied it.

"That's well." Shizuru smirked and mumbled: "I can see which feline has already asserted its dominance in this household, then."

"Huh?" the other said, seeming confused by her statement.
"Shizuru?"

Shizuru showed her a smile: "I was simply talking to myself, Natsuki."

Natsuki snorted sharply, drawing the attention of both the older woman and the happily snorting cub she had in her arms. Shizuru lifted an eyebrow.

"Why that reaction?" she asked. "Is talking to myself irregular for me?"

It was the younger woman's turn to smirk.

"Oh no," she said. "No."

"Then may I know why my Natsuki seems so amused?"

The younger woman coloured a little at her use of the possessive, she was pleased to note, before replying.

"Because when you do that-you talk to yourself-you talk to me," Natsuki explained, eliciting laughter from the other woman.

"That was a frighteningly perceptive remark," Shizuru murmured when she could speak again. "I fear it may be a token of the days when you had yet to speak to me, if I indeed do that. I am so sorry for that discourtesy, Natsuki."

Natsuki shook her head.

"No," she said. "I do not... No. It is all right."

"I shall try not to do it so much."

"No. Keep on." The girl shrugged. "Um, doing that. It is not trouble and... and I am glad to listen."

The rusty eyes softened, one of the Himean's hands coming out to pat her head.

"You really are too kind to me," Shizuru said, while running her fingers through fine threads of midnight-shaded hair. "Why is that, I wonder. And here I seem to be talking to myself again-tsk, I am hopeless, am I not?"

They chuckled. She continued to stroke the girl's scalp, having observed before this that the Otomeian seemed to enjoy this sort of caress. The tranquillity of the moment was disturbed when the third occupant of the room leapt out of the Otomeian's hands and at a cushion fallen from the couch. Both women regarded the animal.

"She's quite energetic today," Shizuru observed, extending an arm to pull the cushion from the cub's grasp and dangle it before the animal. "Here, Shizuki. Come on, come here and take the pillow. Do you suppose we should take her for a walk, Natsuki?"

"Um, it is late." Green eyes turned her way. "Maybe tomorrow?"

"Very well. Tomorrow it is." She relinquished the cushion to a delightedly snuffling cub and returned to her reclined position on the couch. She peeked out of the half-shuttered window beside her and eyed the lightless sky outside. "It is quite late, as you say."

Turning back to the girl, she added: "And if we did hazard to go out tonight, I am certain Midori-han would attempt to collar us into drinking with her."

"Ahhh." Natsuki turned her luminous gaze to Shizuru. "Interesting. Her."

"What makes you say so?"

Natsuki shrugged and returned her attention to the cub promptly. She left Shizuru mulling over her description. The younger woman rarely used the word "interesting" to speak of people, and the last time she had used it, it had been to describe Shizuru herself. Was that an indication of a positive assessment, then? And how had Midori Sugiura merited it?

Should I be jealous?

She grinned to herself at that thought. As today was only their second day in Argus, the only basis Natsuki could have for her statement would be their first meeting with the governor, which had only been yesterday. Shizuru smiled to herself as she recalled the events of the past day. Perhaps Natsuki did have good reason to call the governor interesting, given what she had seen.

Midori had brought Shizuru and her companions to her private study upon their arrival, pushing them into seats in the affable and almost-discourteous way she had long made her own. After having dispensed with the prerequisites, the governor had then pressed her guests to take some food and drink-insisting, when they declined the former, that they take the latter at least. Shizuru chuckled reflectively to herself as she recalled the manner in which the governor had done this.

"No buts! You'll have a drink if there's anything I can do about it," were the governor's minatory words, snapping her fingers to send a slave scurrying for some goblets. She even pretended to glare at her guests and warned: "None of that abstinence stuff I've been hearing about from the Stoics! I've always trusted the two of you to have more good taste than that."

It was the senior legate who retorted before Shizuru could.

"Try telling that to Armitage, not us. I won't say no to a cup of good Falernian if it's offered me, really. Shizuru-san?"

"I shall be happy to drink with you as well," Shizuru replied.

The governor beamed.

"Good, good!" she exclaimed, looking around to give her slave an urging glance. She added conversationally: "So Haruka Armitage's still doing that abstention nonsense, is she?"

"Last we saw her, yes," Chie answered. "I don't think she'd give it up, that, er, nonsense."

"It's that fool Epixander who put her up to it-can't imagine why the Armitages ever allowed a malnourished old nut like him to prate of his philosophy to their daughter. Even Haruka was an impressionable girl at that age, like all children are." She rattled on, watching the slave set the cups and wine onto the table. "See what comes of not choosing your tutors wisely! Corrupting a girl's mind against wine, of all things. Why, it goes against all common sense!"

"I daresay Haruka-han would deliver a fine lecture to us on the superfluous nature of wine, were she here," Shizuru ventured with a smile. "As she has done on more than one occasion to me."

"Has she, now?"

"Yes. She derives it from what she calls 'the value of living with simplicity'."

"That's simplicity, all right," Midori snorted, throwing an unconvinced look across the table. She started, suddenly, and leaned forward with a displeased look on her face.

"I say! There are only three cups here-go get another," she said to the slave, who was pouring the wine. She looked directly at the other dark-haired woman who had been standing beside Shizuru until the general beckoned her to sit. "You'll take a cup too, Natsuki-chan?"

Chie and Shizuru coughed at this, both thinking the same thing: that only Midori Sugiura could have had the daring to address the Otomeian warrior with such familiarity after having only been introduced moments ago. Natsuki seemed just as startled, but eventually managed to shake her head to decline. The Argus governor frowned good-naturedly at her.

"Are you sure?" she asked, just as her slave placed another cup on the table. "It's really good wine, you know-not that there's ever been anything but good wine on my table. You're not another of those Stoics, I hope?"

Shizuru stepped in to save the girl, who was embarrassed by the attention.

"No, she is not," said the general, secretly taking her bodyguard's hand under the table. "And she does actually drink wine, Midori-han, but quite moderately. Perhaps it is only that she is feeling some of the effects of our march. I believe Natsuki is not as used to imbibing wine as we are, and it would not be best for her to drink it when she might prefer water at the moment, the toll of our journey considered."

"Oh, of course-right silly of me!" Midori cried, ordering the slave to fill the girl's cup with water instead. "You'll forgive me for that, now. I tend to forget not all people are as used to the liquor as Himeans."

She tilted her head inquiringly, though the knowing glint in her eyes showed that her next question was asked simply out of politeness and not ignorance.

"Natsuki-chan isn't Himean, of course?" she asked.

"She is Otomeian, Midori-han."

"I thought so! It was the hair that threw me, but now I see the Otomeians must still have a few darkheads among them. Charming people-some pass by Argus occasionally for trade, though not enough. Fine old history they have, probably as long as ours, if not longer. I hear their king keeps a wonderful library as well, stuffed to the rafters with books from all parts of the world, from chronicles written in Egypt all the way to ones from us. Gorgeous piles of books, they say!"

She took a deep breath after this flurry and peered inquisitively at the girl.

"Well, well. An Otomeian at my table. And what are you sniggering about over there, Chie, you scoundrel?"

The senior legate chuckled loudly.

"I was just thinking how it's so like you, to think immediately of things like libraries and such," she explained, drawing smiles from the other two Himeans. "It makes me a little nostalgic to hear you talk of history."

Midori chuckled while Shizuru grinned.

"It is my first love," the redheaded woman remarked. "But I'd expect you to understand, Chie-chan. We're both chroniclers, in our own way. Speaking of chronicling, I trust you've had a grand time taking down Shizuru-chan's latest exploits? Where's my copy of your accounts thus far?"

Chie took a swallow of wine.

"Sadly enough, that slipped my mind," she said. "I'm so sorry. I don't have one ready for you."

"Really now," Midori said. "Stop holding out on me. Where is it?"

"Really," Chie insisted. "I forgot to make one."

"You forgot?" came the sceptical answer. "You forgot?"

"I forget a lot of things these days. I think it's the cold-addles my mind."

"Then let me chuck you into that nice warm hearth over there, to help you remember."

"Peace, peace, I didn't forget!" Chie cried, laughing as Midori pretended to rise from her seat. Shizuru laughed at the two of them. "There's no need to get violent!"

The elder woman sat back down with a wide grin.

"Where is it, eh?" she asked.

"With my things," Chie replied. "I'll have it sent to you the moment the servants fix our rooms."

"Oh no you won't. I'll come get it with you later, to make sure you don't do any forgetting again," Midori retorted, mock-scowling. "They're probably moving your things in now-I already had rooms set aside for the lot of you. I expect we can house a good number of your officers here, Shizuru."

"I am grateful," the woman being addressed replied. "Though I do think some of them may choose to stay closer to the barracks, to be sure. Well, they should be dealing with all the arrangements now."

"That's all fine, I believe," the governor returned. "But just so it's clear, I don't mind taking in as many of your officers as this place can house. It's a little empty these days, you'll find, what with most of the Himean officials who were here having gone back home for the winter and no new ones coming in."

"Except for us, of course," Shizuru smiled. "I suppose that the reason for this would be the north winds?"

Midori emptied her glass before replying, waiting for her slave to refill it.

"That's the cause," she said. "As you know, they're set to last until the end of winter, which means we'll be getting fewer ships from Hime and most other parts south of our ports since they'll be fighting against that breeze. I'm a little sad about it, actually, because it makes for a pretty unfair situation. We can send news to them regular as always but they'll take twice the time to send back to us."

Chie said, "We've been waiting for the return mail for a while now. I'm just about dying for news from home!"

"Last I heard, Hime was bereft of both consuls and elections." The older woman frowned. "Anarchy in the wind, it seems!"

"They do have a troubling set of deficiencies, I agree, but I doubt it would be as chaotic as some would have it," Shizuru put in, just as a knock sounded on the door. All the occupants of the room turned at the sound while the governor's slave admitted a person in Himean tunic and cloak. It was one of the general's non-combatants, come to request the presence of the cavalry captain on behalf of her Otomeian subordinates.

"Of course. Go ahead, Natsuki," Shizuru said to the girl, who cast an enquiring glance her way. "It would be best to get the cavalry settled into a proper camp as soon as possible."

Natsuki nodded and rose to her feet, bowing prior to her exit. Once she was gone, the governor of Argus wagged her eyebrows foolishly at the two Himeans with her.

"I've been dying to ask a while now-but who's the pretty young thing, really?" she demanded. "I know, I know! Her name's Natsuki and she's an Otomeian captain, but have you seen the face on her and what's she doing with the two of you?"

Shizuru laughed and offered: "For lack of a better title, one might call her my guardian."

Midori was incredulous.

"You never take bodyguards, Shizuru-chan, assuming that's what you meant." She shook her head disbelievingly. "Why the sudden whim, then, and is it related to the question I asked that you haven't answered? Besides, you haven't been treating her as a bodyguard from what I've seen. No, none of that dissimulation. What or who is she, really?"

Chie was unable to repress a grin as she looked sideways at her friend, who could practically hear the senior legate's thought: Now how are you going to get out of this?

"Aside from that, one might call her my companion," Shizuru stated simply.

"Companion?"

"Yes."

This time, Midori gave her a lop-sided smile.

"Companion?" she repeated, wetting her lips with a gulp of wine. "That's a fine, ambiguous term, isn't it, Shizuru-chan? I could ask, for example, what kind of companionship you mean by that. Now I'm starting to really get curious."

She threw a sharp glance at Shizuru, her olive-green eyes suddenly twinkling and as young as she liked to claim herself.

"Is your diction in this case more a feature of your usual style of talking or is it a result of the nature of the relationship itself?" she asked.

Oh, the frozen Chie thought, Midori-san really does have such daring!

"You almost make me sound duplicitous, Midori-han," Shizuru said jokingly to the governor. "Are my words always so twin-sided?"

Her former tutor chuckled. "I've always been tempted to argue you're descended from Janus instead of Venus, in that sense."

"Then might we argue that you draw your ancestry from divine Dionysus?"

All three laughed at this remark: it was no secret that the governor was a prodigious imbibor.

"Oh, I missed you two!" Midori exclaimed, permitting herself to be sidetracked. "I hardly get to see any of my old students or friends these days. Besides, this place keeps me busy enough as it is, so I can't even go visit Hime or anything, for all that I have access to the ports!"

"I was actually surprised the level of activity here," Shizuru admitted. "Even for a port province, I had the impression things would quiet down a little since it is winter. Is that not so, Chie-han?"

"Yes," the legate answered. "And besides, I also noticed something interesting while we were passing through the city: you have a lot of dark-skinned visitors here. Arabs, I'm guessing?"

The governor sighed deeply.

"You noticed, hm?" she asked. "Yes, they're Arabs. Some Jews too, and lots of Greeks. We've a lot of foreigners here."

"It's natural for a port city."

Midori acknowledged that with another sigh, though one of more irritation than the first.

"Yes, true, natural... but it gives me a headache!" she cried. "I'm the one who has to mediate between their petty squabbles over territory, you know. Can't get by a day without having this or that deputation from one of them come by and ask me to tell the others to stay put. Sons of Dis, they're annoying!"

"Why, what is this?" Shizuru asked with standard concern. "Over sectors?"

"Yes," Midori replied, taking a gulp of wine before continuing. "Most of the trouble is over in the western parts, since that's where the Arab quarters of the city are. Just so happens that a lot of Greeks are right next to that. You know how these people can get, between them."

"I see. Boundaries being pushed between the two?"

"That's it. So I'm the one bombarded with the requests and complaints and whatever-they-call-them delegations from both sides, left to hear all the squalling." She frowned deeply, lines suddenly carving around her mouth. "I don't grudge that, mind you. I just wish they'd be less fickle about their demands. Why, every time I start to get somewhere with them, some damned fool does something stupid and kills some Arab or Greek on the streets at night-and we get another ruckus again! Can't the ineptes handle their own people? I have to think of the Himeans living here too, you know, and they're getting worried, even if they've been pretty much unaffected until now."

"Understandable," Shizuru responded. "I suppose you are restricting the inflow of new foreign applicants for residency, then?"

"Of course." A snort. "Though a fat lot of good that'll do-they're like weeds."

The two younger women grinned.

"Weeds?" both echoed.

"Sprout up mysteriously," Midori explained with a smirk. "Walls and guards don't stop their kind. It's like they're borne on the wind. You can't pull them out just like that, either. Got wide, thick roots, especially since a lot of them have been here about as long as us. They've long been part of the commerce, besides that. Weeds, yes, but useful-even necessary-ones."

"Ah," Shizuru said with a small smile. "That restricts the options for gardening, then."

Chie sniggered: "I suppose we can't do any real weeding-out, either."

"Oh, believe me, 'real weeding-out' is just my problem right now!"

The two questioned her with their glances. The governor's face suddenly turned grim, prompting them to give her their full attention.

When even Midori-han turns serious, Shizuru thought with a touch of dark humour, matters must truly be grave.

"It's to do with the Mentulaeans," the eldest of the three Himeans explained. She shook her head at her younger companion's expressions. "No, not what you think. We don't have any of them trying to invade us or anything of that kind. Otherwise, you'd have heard about it before now. Besides which, we could handle ourselves well enough if it were just that." She lifted an eyebrow. "My garden's got a great guard dog, after all, so they wouldn't be able to tear down the fence that easily, come to that."

Both younger women squinted for a moment.

"Oh!" Shizuru said an instant later, shaking her head in self-derision. "Of course, I nearly forgot. Your garrison commander is Sakaki-han, is it not?"

Midori confirmed it. Chie leaned back in her seat and whistled.

"A damned good guard dog, all right," she said, imagining the renowned military woman in her mind. "Little bark, I'll grant, but definitely a lot of bite!"

"Right, so you see what I mean," the governor replied. "No, my problem with the Mentulaeans isn't actually due to any aggression from their side. It's the other way around-or should I say, it's due to aggression against them."

That got them to stare at her.

"This is actually connected to you," she told them. "Or what you're doing here. You know that we aren't actually at war with the Mentulae yet. Not outright, Hime-versus-the-Mentulaean-Empire war. The only battle that's passed between us to date is the Battle of Argentum, where you and your army fought on behalf of an ally."

"Just so," Shizuru said. "It is as you say."

"So we don't have a state of war yet, but rather a state of wariness," Midori said. "I know, probably more than anyone else, that Obsidian is raring to have a go at a campaign of expansion-which will probably lead to war with us. But as things stand, we only have 'probably'. So all we can do is operate with caution."

"As you say," the younger woman repeated.

"Since this is a port city, a commercial province, I had to consider this," the governor continued. "The flow of people, of merchants, through this place is what keeps it running. Having foreigners coming and going regularly is a staple feature. Provinces like this always have lighter and fewer restrictions when it comes to exit and entry of non-citizens. The only time when port provinces actually close down or start truly regulating who gets in and out is during war. Not before."

She peered meaningfully at Shizuru.

"I understand," the young general said, with a thoughtful furrow of her brow. "Because if you did choose to be overly cautious in advance and put a ban on Mentulae entering Argus at this time, it might actually bring about the war."

Chie's lips parted slightly in comprehension. Midori nodded.

"I can't risk instigating something that's still just a probability by acting on it before it even becomes real," the older woman told them. "So as wary as I am of the Mentulaean king and his kin, I chose not to ban his people from entering Argus, even if I'm regulating their entry heavily. The most I could do-which I did-was to have the border guards thoroughly check that the Mentulaeans coming in are actually merchants here for trade and ensure that only people who've been here in the past for the same reasons get in here again. No grand entourages allowed. Regulations for weapons are also enforced. But this is also applied to every other foreign party that comes in, so they can't find offence there. Touchy."

"Of course."

"They're allowed to stay in the province and even the city while their commerce is being done, naturally. Besides them, there are also Mentulae that have been living in Argus for a while," the governor said. "Some residing in the city itself, though most of them are outside, in the other parts of Argus Province. The ones in the city, though, are mostly respectable immigrants. Relocated here a long time ago, probably two generations or more."

She reached for her cup.

"Anyway, you can say there are a good number of Mentulae here right now," she said. "Permanent residents and travellers both. Not a lot, but a decent number."

The other two nodded to show they understood the background she had just provided.

"Here's the problem," she said, with a deep scowl. "Someone's been killing them. Killing the Mentulae. I'm not sure who, but I'm having two or so Mentulaean corpses turning up every week. We find them stabbed, beaten to death, sometimes even drowned by the docks, and no one-no bloody one-is willing to talk."

She took a long gulp of wine.

"The locals are getting jittery over the killings, but they're jittery over the possibility of Mentulae trying to invade too. So it's hard to drum up sympathy for the victims." She made a sound of discontent. "And they are victims! I'll admit there's a possibility some of those Mentulae 'merchants' coming in aren't just here for trade, but what about the Mentulae who've been living here all their lives? The worst part is that most of the people getting murdered are in the city-and most of the Mentulaeans in the city are those who've been here for years, decades, goddamned generations already! I can't have innocent people getting killed in my province, just because of an impending war that doesn't really have anything to do with them!"

And with that, Shizuru thought in ending her recollections, I have to agree. Aside from that ethical concern, too, was the question of the political result such killings might have-in the province or beyond it. The killings had to stop. Or be stopped, more likely.

The problem would be finding the culprits. From what Midori had told them yesterday, it seemed highly likely that the murders were being carried out by several people, perhaps in a concerted effort. If Shizuru had to guess, she would say they were a highly organised group, most likely composed of a bunch of bully boys being funded and directed to do the work by some influential and paranoid members of the city's inhabitants. Most likely a faction that had always been suspicious of Mentulaeans or simply of non-Himeans in the city-there were always a number of these-and who now saw in the threatening war the justification they needed to take to such measures.

"Poor Midori-han has her hands full on this one," she said aloud.

"Shizuru?"

She turned to look at her companion.

"Ah, nothing, Natsuki. I was merely thinking aloud," she answered.

"Talking to yourself?" came the reply, delivered with a cheeky smirk.

"Come here," she pretended to growl, swinging her legs over the edge of the couch and pulling the girl up onto her lap. The latter giggled uncharacteristically as Shizuru smothered her in a playful embrace, the younger woman's normally cold façade absent in the privacy of their bedroom. Shizuru wondered what the Otomeian's fellow warriors would say if they saw her like this, so little like her usual forbidding self. They would probably fall over from an apoplexy.

All the more reason to keep this side of her mine, she mused, diverted from all thoughts of the Mentulaeen killings. All the more reason to keep my Natsuki all to myself.

She nuzzled the younger woman's neck, eventually bringing her lips up to one small, prettily-formed ear and nibbling it. Natsuki let her make love to that ear for a while, and Shizuru busied herself with licking at the shell and taking the lobe between her teeth before the girl finally turned her face properly towards her. The Himean welcomed the kiss eagerly.

It was Natsuki who broke the kiss, staring dazedly into red eyes.

"Shizuru," she whispered. She sighed the name again, sweetly and with quiet longing. "Shizuru."

Shizuru slanted her head and captured the pink lips once more, pushing her tongue furiously into the girl's mouth. Natsuki let her, clutching her hair with bandaged fingers and squirming deeper into the embrace. Enjoying the younger woman's wriggles, Shizuru began mimicking the act of intercourse with her tongue, thrusting it in and out of her companion's mouth in a rhythmic and stabbing motion. The girl gasped, trying to keep Shizuru's tongue from slipping from her lips. But it continued to slide between them, in and out, teasing and taunting.

Why, this feels almost as good as actually doing it, Shizuru thought light-headedly. Her rhythm faltered a little when she felt the familiar tightening between her legs wrenching at her. I need to have her now.

She removed her arms from around the younger woman, intending to use her hands to disrobe the girl. Before she could do that, however, she felt Natsuki's hands pulling up her tunic and sliding it up until the bottom hem folded atop her thighs.

She stopped what she was doing and drew back a little. To her surprise, the girl's hands continued underneath the folds of her tunic, reaching her undergarment and tugging at it urgently. Natsuki's eyes narrowed as she found removing that article difficult, its wearer being seated on the couch, after all. She gave Shizuru a pleading, desperate look that had the older woman grinning.

"What is it, Natsuki?" she jested. "Do you want something?"

A tide of mingled anger and embarrassment swept over the girl's skin. It brightened the wild green of her eyes in contrast.

"Now you see how hard it is for me to control myself while trying to figure out how to undress you quickly," Shizuru whispered. She gave the girl's ear a lick before moving back. She almost regretted her tease, however, when she saw the beseeching expression on her companion's face afterwards.

"Ah, now, do not look at me so," she murmured, swiftly cupping the girl's cheeks. "I am only teasing you, Natsuki. Forgive me?"

The girl responded with a slow, still red-faced nod. Shizuru was about to resume kissing her when she felt the weight on her lap shift, sliding down and pushing her legs apart.

"Natsuki?"

The younger woman knelt between her legs. Shizuru could feel the girl's hands, which had been on her thighs, moving up again and onto her undergarment. They tugged on it insistently.

"Shizuru," the Otomeian said.

She pretended to sigh, amused by the girl's pleas, and finally relented. Natsuki wasted no time in pulling down the undergarment when the Himean lifted her hips. A moment later, the white cloth was discarded on the couch, beside her. The older woman flicked a glance at it, feeling a twinge in her belly when caught her own scent in the air. Her eyes snapped back to the girl, however, when she felt lips pressed to her knee.

She can be so sweet, she thought silently, while watching Natsuki continue pressing kisses around both knees. Not to mention sensual. For with each soft caress, the younger woman's hands seemed to push up Shizuru's tunic, exposing more and more of the strong thighs that had been shaped by years and years of marching. When the cloth had gone halfway up these tapering columns, the girl suddenly ceased pressing kisses to the white skin and opened her mouth to suck on it. The older woman flinched from the wet touch.

" Ecastor !" she hissed quietly, trying to keep her hips still. Natsuki simply cast a short glance at her, however, before choosing another spot to latch onto and continue what she was doing. Her suction was slow, her teeth rasping over the skin she caught and attempted to pull between her lips. Sometimes she would catch the skin with a fleeting nip-strong enough to have a slight sting, but light enough to make Shizuru wish for more. It seemed almost as though an echo of the pleasure travelled upwards, stroking the older woman between her legs in a ghosting caress.

Now where did she learn to do this, the elder woman found herself thinking distractedly. Not from anyone else, I hope! I swear to Sol Indiges, Tellus and Liber Pater I would kill-

Natsuki moved up her thigh and nipped again, drawing a curt groan.

Shizuru let her head rest against the edge of the window on the wall behind her, watching the girl continue to make love to her thighs as more flesh was exposed. Natsuki put down hot, open-mouthed kisses on her legs with maddening sloth, every now and then stopping to suck a crimson spot onto the skin. Midway through, however, she suddenly stopped. Shizuru looked at her with mild enquiry instead of voicing a question. She was still too dazed to talk; her body felt hot, weakness having infected every muscle.

Natsuki's eyes hooded. She inhaled, and it was long and deep.

Oh Natsuki, Shizuru groaned inwardly, feeling her cheeks flame at the thought of what the younger woman was scenting. What are you doing now?

Natsuki seemed to be enjoying the scent she had caught, however. She closed her eyes and rubbed her cheek against the older woman's thigh like a satisfied cat. A low purr came from her mouth, setting Shizuru's thighs atremble. Then her eyes opened, and the older woman found herself consumed by those glassy green eyes, sucked in by the hunger in them.

She will devour me, she thought with a shiver.

No sooner had this passed through her mind than she felt Natsuki slide forward. The tunic was at Shizuru's waist now, her lower body fully exposed. She shut her eyes, feeling a shrill sensation from the puffs of breath she could feel between her legs and where Natsuki faced all her secrets. Then she felt those probing fingers finally touch her sex, pulling its lips apart with timid care. She looked up, trembling with pleasure.

Immediately the delicate tongue licked up at her. She gasped at the sensation, eyes going wide as her body jumped. She could feel the girl's nose nuzzling, burrowing deeper, and stuttered out her breaths in time to the movements. Her hands came down of their own will and cradled that dark head between her legs while she opened further. It was all too rich, too much, she thought.

Her flashing gaze fell on another dark head nearby, not the one attached to her flesh. It was the panther cub, reclined on the floor and observing them with curiosity in its golden eyes. The sight of another creature watching her body writhing indecently heightened Shizuru's excitement. It also brought a tinge of shame to her cheeks.

Should Shizuki really be seeing this, she wondered, a whisper of her modesty suddenly returning even if her reason knew it was wasted on the cub. This is not exactly pa-

A jolt of her body stopped that thought. The nub between her legs had been caught up by small but strong teeth. Natsuki nibbled, held her in a vise, then sucked her into the space between the edges with a feverishness that left her groping for vision. She felt the younger woman's tongue stabbing into her vengefully the way she had stabbed her tongue into Natsuki's mouth earlier. It was filling her now, trying to feel everything inside of her, and she abandoned herself to the pleasure of its inspection. Her head fell against the window sill as she shuddered, trying to choke her moans. Even the faint, faraway sounds from outdoors were caught in the dance, rising and falling in violent crests.

"Natsuki," she moaned from between clenched teeth. "I can take no more..."

Then that tongue flushed her and she broke, groaning aloud as the rapture seared through her in bright waves. Natsuki continued to score her harshly, rasping over the swollen flesh with such determination that the older woman's body snapped over and over again even after the first cataclysm had struck. The release rocked her so hard she broke into a sweat, droplets running down her brow.

"Hahh!"

There was the sloppy sound of Natsuki's mouth detaching from her. Shizuru breathed in deeply, too exhausted to speak right after that. She was conscious of the girl pulling back from between her legs, the soft brush of Natsuki's hair against her thighs bringing back a murmur of the pleasure. Eventually she sat up and opened her eyes. Natsuki was still on her knees.

The girl was licking her lips, a rapt expression on her face. She did this several times before Shizuru finally called to her.

"Natsuki."

The call was uncharacteristically shaky, a little breathless even, and it brought Natsuki's eyes to the older woman in an instant. Shizuru smiled weakly at her and the girl mirrored the expression. She then knelt up, one of her hands wiping the remaining wetness around her mouth. She froze, however, when the Himean seized her wrist.

She stared questioningly into the wine-coloured eyes, which were coming nearer.

"No," Shizuru said, leaning so far forward in her seat that her nose was nearly touching that of the girl. "Allow me."

Having said that, she opened her mouth and dipped out her tongue. The first lick sent a fine shudder through the younger woman's frame. She swept her wet tongue around the Otomeian's mouth to clean it thoroughly of her own juices, painting glistening strokes from the hollows of the other's cheeks to the point of her chin. Natsuki stilled like a statue, her wide eyes showing her astonishment at what her lover was doing. Little did she know it, but the latter was just as surprised as she-indeed, perhaps even more so.

I cannot believe I am doing this, Shizuru was thinking to herself. For me to have her on my tongue is natural, I think, but this scent, this flavour, is my own.

Another long lick ended at the corner of Natsuki's lips before delivering the flavour into her mouth.

It was herself she was tasting now, so why was she enjoying it?

But her misgivings were soon overwhelmed, for each new lick seemed to numb her mind to any qualms. After some time passed, she realised that she could not taste herself on the girl's skin any longer. She ceased her ministrations and looked at Natsuki.

The younger woman's eyes were half-shut, what little that showed of them being glazed over.

"My beautiful girl. That was wonderful. Thank you for it."

Perhaps I should exact some revenge.

She acted swiftly, practically leaping out of her seat and pushing the girl to fall onto her bottom in an awkward sprawl. Her laugh came out at Natsuki's startled yelp.

"Be still," she commanded, pinning the squirming hips against her own. She had come down from the couch, and was sitting on the floor in front of Natsuki, legs interlocking with the girl's. "Methinks it is my turn."

She spread Natsuki's legs even further by pushing them apart with hers. Their fronts were flush against each other, and the younger woman's arms had gone around her in an embrace. Her free hand swiftly began to loosen the girl's trousers. Natsuki tried to pull her down so that they could lie on the floor, but she resisted.

A look passed between them.

"I want to take you this way," she explained throatily, delighted by the look that got from the younger woman. The body against her suddenly came alive, quivering and flushing red with heat. That pleased her almost as much as the shock on Natsuki's face when she slid the hand that had been working their way into the girl's trousers further, slipping eager fingers into a wet chasm without hesitation.

"I want to do it like this," she murmured, in time with the younger woman's gasp. At once she was driving inside of her, filling her so completely she was crushing the little bead of flesh above her opening. The dark-haired girl cried out in response, her body jerking so hard she nearly dislodged her assaulter. Still Shizuru pumped into her relentlessly, and soon the girl's body recognised its pleasure, making it easier for both of them by throwing arms around Shizuru's neck. Hips rocked against Shizuru's hand, grinding more thoroughly into the pleasure that seemed to have skewered the girl into her surrender. Their heads pushed against each other and a rivulet of sweat ran down Shizuru's face, migrating there from the other's brow.

She looks so beautiful like this, Shizuru thought, studying her lover's face. The young woman's eyes were narrowed and wet, and her mouth hung open, her lips a beautifully carnal red. The nostrils of her small nose too flared delicately outwards, struggling for what seemed to be suddenly rare air.

Then there came an intrusive rapping sound that broke upon their world. Shizuru's hand faltered a little before continuing the rhythm, her eyes casting a dark look at the door.

"Shizu-nngh," Natsuki groaned quietly, her face indicating she wanted to disentangle herself from the older woman while her body said otherwise. "There is-mnh!"

Shizuru shook her head and called out in the door's direction: "Yes? Who is it?"

There was a muffled sound, then a similar call from the other side.

"Shizuru-san?" It was the smooth voice of the senior legate. "I'm sorry, it's me. I didn't wake you, did I?"

Shizuru flicked a glance at the girl wincing in her arms, still being lifted and brought down by her thrusts. Natsuki was biting her lip, giving small gasps every now and then as Shizuru continued to work her.

"Not at all, Chie-han," Shizuru called out. "Can you give me a moment to dress, though?"

"Go right ahead," came the answer. "I'll be in my room. You know where it is."

There was the sound of footsteps moving away from the door and down the corridor. Shizuru smiled at Natsuki as the latter gasped at her. There was a fine trail of moisture running down the Otomeian's face and coming from the corner of her eye; she was ready to come, and Shizuru could feel it.

"We really should not keep Chie-han waiting," she said. "Come now, Natsuki."

As if eager to obey her, the girl's sex convulsed at these words and Natsuki's face buried into her shoulder. She felt the younger woman crying, muffling the sound by screaming into her tunic. She practically felt the girl's ecstasy as well, the jarring explosions of pleasure wracking the body in her arms and vibrating around her fingers. She held the girl close in response and let her ride out the pleasure for as long as possible.

Afterwards, when Natsuki's body finally stopped quivering, she extricated herself from the younger woman and slowly disentangled their bodies. She smiled fondly at the girl and dropped a kiss onto her burning cheek, pulling her carefully to her feet.

"Let us wash," she said to her. "So that we can find out what it is that Chie-han wants this late at night."

After having cleansed and arranged themselves, they were soon walking in a corridor of the mansion doing just that. The senior legate was explaining to them that something had just transpired in the gubernatorial courtyard that merited the commotion coming from that area at the moment—a commotion Shizuru had managed to ignore completely, in fact, though she pretended to have noticed it.

"Ah, yes, I was actually wondering about it," she lied, hiding her smile. "Such noisy activity at this time of night is unusual, eh?"

She glanced to her side and saw her bodyguard's pink face. Meanwhile, Chie answered her.

"Yes, so I went off to see what was the matter," the legate was saying. "And I think you'd better see it for yourself. It's a perfect scandal, I tell you. Oh, here we are."

They made their way to the main doors of the gubernatorial residence. The hulking, iron-enforced doors were thrown open and people scurried in and out of them. Just outside, Shizuru could make out a nearby group clustered. Torches blazed at that spot, the constant flicker of shadows and light lending the scene a sense of sinister urgency. She quickened her pace, intrigued.

"Fujino-san! Fujino-san!"

They searched among the bustle to see one of the local officials they had recently met waving at them. He was at the foot of the steps outside, and they made their way down to meet him.

"Good evening, Ogawa-han," Shizuru greeted the official upon reaching the foot of the stairs. She continued walking towards the group of people near them, though a little more slowly. "Whatever is going on?"

"It's another dead Mentulaean," he explained, drawing a curious look. "This time, though, the cunni left it at the governor's doorstep-oh, please pardon my language, Fujino-san."

"What you just said is light compared to the things I regularly hear in the army," she said. "Ah, Midori-han!"

They made their way to the governor, who waved them over and into the centre of the cluster. She was standing by a wagon with the corpse of a man stretched atop it. His flesh had acquired the slate-like tinge of someone drained of blood and his mouth was strangely twisted. It seemed set into a rictus of agony.

"Appalling, is what it is!" Midori scowled, waving a hand at the body.

"It was bad enough that they were doing it on my watch before, but now they're spitting in my face! To bring a dead Mentulae here and leave it at my doorstep, the cunni ! I'll string them up by their balls for this, the cock-sucking bastards!"

Shizuru peered at the older woman surreptitiously, noting that her cheeks seemed tainted with a red that was surely not all due to indignation. She supposed the governor had been drinking before, which explained in part the unusual salt of her words.

Although it was obvious to see it was also that she was very, very angry.

"How did they manage to leave it here?" Shizuru asked the older woman.

"Not actually here," Midori replied, frowning at the corpse again. It seemed to return her scowl with the expression frozen onto its mouth. "Left it over there, just inside the gates. I had it brought here because I didn't want any people gawking over it-though I see that's happening now, anyway. Damn gossips, the lot of them."

She called to someone in the crowd.

"I thought I told you to cover this poor sod up?" she said irritably. "We've identified him already, so have the decency to put a blanket over his face!"

Several people bowed in apology and rushed off in different directions, perhaps to find a cloth for that purpose. Midori rolled her eyes in exasperation.

"Oh, for Juno's sake," she grumbled. "Never mind!"

She slung off her cloak and threw it over the corpse, shielding the dead man's body from the stares. She turned back to Shizuru and clicked her tongue with annoyance.

"I'm just hoping someone saw something," she huffed. "And that they're willing to talk. I'll have to put out an edict on Mentulaeans going about unaccompanied at night. Can't have them bibble about when these bastards are still hunting them down."

She turned her head to someone calling her.

"Excuse me," she snapped, running to that other person.

Chie and Shizuru watched the governor stalk off, her long hair streaming behind her like a banner of rage. Chie turned back to the wagon with the corpse and lifted a sooty eyebrow. She ran her hand through her own hair, which was being whipped about frantically by the wind.

"Poor Midori-san," she sighed, her eyes on the greyish white arm protruding from under the governor's cloak. "What do you think of this, Shizuru-san?"

She looked at Shizuru in time to see the smoky sigh leave the other senator's mouth.

"I think," Shizuru said, "that I should talk to Nao-han in the morning."

Chapter 25

Vocabulaire:

1. Crossroads college ( s ) - Gathering places for the associations of men/women who are tasked with protecting crossroads or intersections of Rome's avenues. The crossroads were held to be a sacred place, and frequented by supernatural energies such as that of the goddess Hecate, so the Romans paid great attention to their care. The members of crossroads colleges were from the lower classes, and often formed (fairly violent) gangs or fraternities.

2. In absentia (concerning election ) - Literally "in one's absence". It was sometimes allowed by Roman law for a politician to be a candidate for the curule elections without being present in the city itself to file nomination personally, which was the norm.

"Did you get taller overnight, or is it my imagination?"

Nao's companion smiled, saying nothing to the grudgingly-delivered compliment. The redhead pressed a temple with her fingers and winced.

"On second thought, I think it's just my hangover," she said, straightening her posture with a groan. "Cack! My head feels like it's got something banging inside it. Shouldn't have drunk so much last night."

The woman walking beside her held out a skin of water. She took it gratefully.

"Thanks, Sakaki," she said, after downing a swig of the beverage. "Do you have a handy hammer for my noggin too?"

Argus's captain of the guard smiled at her jest, taking back the water-skin.

"Do you want to sit down?" the tall woman asked, slowing her steps to look at Nao with concern. "We can stop here."

Nao waved her hand dismissively.

"No, it's fine," she insisted, peering up to look at the soft, dark eyes focused on her. She grit her teeth and continued speaking, trying to ignore the fact that her tongue felt as though it were made of lead. "Best we get there before they start cleaning it up."

Sakaki nodded, her tail of dark hair rippling. They wrapped their cloaks more firmly about them and continued.

The two were on their way to the site of the latest Mentulaeen murder, which had just been reported that morning. The actual crime seemed to have taken place the previous night. Having given instructions to be alerted instantly in such an event, Nao had been dragged out of a very comfy bed by a relentless Erstin, who had then presented the groggy primipilus to Argus's embarrassed garrison commander. After a quick recapitulation of the situation, the two officers found themselves as they were now: passing through the city's streets in general silence.

To be sure, it was not that either woman was uncomfortable with the other. They had actually known each other for a while, owing to their connections in the military. The silence was caused, rather, by two things: first, by the red-headed centurion's monumental headache, and second, by the other soldier's legendary tendency to silence—one which, in Nao's opinion, rivalled that of Shizuru Fujino's bodyguard. Who would have known that there were two Sphinxes to be found in the North? And as luck would have it, she got to meet both of them!

She smiled sarcastically. At least the Sphinx she had with her now was a little better in that respect than the general's, as far as she was concerned. After all, Sakaki always did reply if someone asked her a question, whereas her Otomeian equivalent usually manoeuvred to give an answer without even having to open her mouth. Nao supposed that might count as a talent in itself. Still, it never ceased to astound her how the general had ever managed to put up with that overdone closemouthedness. She supposed that kind of patience was a talent as well.

And speaking of the talented general.. .

She slowed her steps when she saw the very woman in the distance, walking as usual beside her Sphinx. They were ambling along slowly and, Nao guessed, were headed to the barracks. She called Sakaki to a stop.

"Sakaki, you mind if we take a detour?" she asked. "I want to introduce you to Shizuru-san and her pup."

She looked up to find the other woman's face lit up with a curious expression. Sakaki looked oddly enthusiastic.

"The general has a puppy too?" the taller woman suddenly asked, with excitement trembling in her voice. "I heard she keeps a panther. That's nice. It's unusual, isn't it?"

She smiled eagerly, like a child looking forward to being given a treat.

"So where are they?" she asked.

Nao slapped her head inwardly as she realised what had set the quiet woman rambling. She had almost forgotten about Sakaki's curious weakness for-what was the word? Oh, yes: small things.

I better tell her now before she becomes too giddy, she sighed, flapping her cloak loose from the tangle around her legs into which the wind had blown it. I don't think I can handle seeing that sort of let-down face in someone this grown.

"No, it's not a dog," she explained, hitting one aching shoulder with a fisted hand. "Though you can still call it a pet, I think." She smirked at her companion. "And it's the one who owns the panther."

Sakaki looked, she was entertained to see, extremely confused.

"Let's go. I'll introduce you."

She led the way and began pushing through denizens of Argus already milling about the street. As they made their way through, she found herself recalling Shizuru's instructions to her four days ago, when they had last seen each other. That was the time Nao's commander had asked her to inquire into the source of the Mentulaean killings in the province, for the sake of preventing any more.

"I want you to look into it for me, Nao-han," the fair-haired woman had instructed, not at all uncomfortable with engaging her primipilus for work outside of the army. She had met Nao this way, after all, while using Nao in the latter's original occupation as an intelligencer. "Try to find out who it is that can be considered the mastermind, or masterminds, as I expect. This is more the work of an organised group rather than one person."

"What am I allowed to do?"

"I should say the usual," came the answer. "Do what is necessary but handle it with the customary delicacy. You understand."

"Yes, I do."

"Then I shall leave this to you," Shizuru had smiled. "We would be better able to put a stop to these murders if you get information."

"I'll see to it right away," Nao had answered, before giving her meaningful look. "But say, I didn't expect you to worry your golden head about this, General."

It did not matter that they were acting technically outside of their military offices at the moment. She almost always called Shizuru "General", it being that she viewed her as the last commander she would ever take.

"Oh, why is that?" Shizuru had asked cheerfully. "Does that mean you think me generally unconcerned about lives being taken off the field, Nao-han? I would hate for you to see me as such an apathetic person."

The redhead had raised an eyebrow.

"Course not," had been her reply. "What I mean is that even if it does lead to what the others are afraid of, it wouldn't be the end of the world for us, would it?"

The general's smile had widened. "It might even be the genesis, you mean?"

"That, yes."

"Well, that may be so," Shizuru had replied. "If the situation does end with that particular conclusion, it might even be to our advantage. But that is only as far as the conclusion is concerned. Stripped of its ramifications, it would be quite beneficial to us. But nothing is ever so straightforward."

Nao had cocked her head at this, putting the query to her general by non-vocal means. Shizuru had then folded her hands together above the table as she answered.

"Setting aside the moral question of whether or not it is proper to let possible innocents be killed, there are other things to consider," she had told Nao. "Such as the probability of similar things happening in the other provinces or allied towns in this area. Something this high-profile is bound to be sensationalised, and given the tension in the region at the moment, there is a danger that groups or people nearby shall emulate the measures our assassins have been taking towards preventing 'foreign spies'. We might have similar killings breaking out in Sosia, for example, and other places. Which would gravely escalate the situation with the Mentulae."

The centurion had flicked a glance towards Shizuru's bodyguard-standing at the other end of the room by the window-before replying.

"That's the point, I thought. For our campaign, anyway."

Shizuru had given her a nod.

"It is, yes," had been the answer. "But this particular route towards that point has attendant and unnecessary risks. Why hazard them when we shall soon arrive at our destination through a much better path, as our guides back in Hime shall be ensuring?"

"Please speak plain to me, General. I'm sorry, but you know I'm not good at this sort of talk."

"All right then," the younger woman had acquiesced, with a slight chuckle. "Allow me to state one of my reservations clearly: I do not want the murders to continue because Hime cannot lose the high ground in any respect when it comes to dealings with foreign nations. If an epidemic of Mentulaeen deaths takes place in Himean provinces with Himeans being the prime suspects, that suspicion casts an ill light on Hime in any war that might result from the epidemic. And more fool us if a war does result from this pitiful display of fearfulness by our citizens!"

"When the war does come-and it shall come, civilian killings or not," she had continued. "It will not be said that Hime brought it upon herself by condoning such atrocities by her citizens. It will not be said that Hime allowed people to be executed merely on grounds of paranoid distrust. That would make us appear such a lawless nation, with authorities seemingly willing to look away and pandering to common opinion." She had held out her hands. "It would tarnish the name of Hime."

"Hang the tarnish," Nao had replied. "That doesn't matter a fig when the war's come, I'd think."

"I beg to differ, Nao-han," Shizuru had replied. "It matters a great deal. One might even say it is everything that matters. It, Nao-han, is Hime."

She stopped then and had cast Nao a brief, but intense look.

"We would do well not to forget that," she had concluded.

And that, Nao thought, means that no-one else will be forgetting it either. Once Shizuru Fujino made up her mind about something, Nao had learned, it was usually decided. There was nothing left for her but to follow orders. Besides, while she was not sure she understood her general's argument about Hime's honour, she did understand the other reason the younger woman had given, which was to protect the Argus governor's reputation. If the killings eventually led to race wars in the city, as was possible, then it was likely that the outcome would be blamed largely on Governor Midori, who would then be accused of having "let" the situation go unheeded.

"And she would then be another innocent victim," Shizuru had told her, before flashing a humorous grin and saying: "Besides which, that would steal my thunder. If war against the Mentulae is blamed on Midori-han, what about poor, answerable me? I would hate to be cheated of my credit where it is due."

Typical crazy patrician, Nao thought now, sniggering at the recollection of those words. Were she to be honest, she sometimes felt this way about more than a few of Shizuru's actions. True, they often produced excellent results, but they also managed to baffle her greatly before that. And given the general's typical manner of delivery, you never knew whether she was serious or not. One did not have a bastard clue what the woman would do next, and Nao always felt that serving her was like riding a cyclone out at sea.

She grinned when she saw the force of nature herself pause at a shop display and lift an elaborate dress from the pile to hold up to her bodyguard. The latter blushed so wildly it was perceptible even from the distance.

I'll be damned if it isn't an interesting ride, though, she thought, waving a hand.

"Hey there, General! Good day, good day!"

The two women looked her way, Shizuru breaking out into a wide smile. A few moments later, both pairs of women were close enough to exchange greetings.

"Good morning, Nao-han," Shizuru said, still holding the garment she had picked up. She folded it over one arm. "And to you, Sakaki-han. We have yet to be introduced properly, I believe."

"That's why we came here," Nao said. "This is General Shizuru Fujino, Sakaki. And the one I was telling you about is this other one over here. Natsuki's her name and she's a cavalry captain. Otomeian stock."

Sakaki gave the standard expression of pleasure at the introductions, whereas Shizuru smiled broadly yet again.

"I am honoured to meet you as well, Sakaki-han," she said. "I have heard of you, after all, from your old commanders." Up came the light eyebrows, wiggling curiously. "Now if I may ask, what has Nao-han been saying about Natsuki?"

Nao answered before the other woman could. She highly doubted Sakaki would have answered coherently enough, anyway.

"Just saying that she's the one who actually owns that black cat you have, General," she said. "Sakaki likes animals, especially cats."

"Oh, is that so?"

Sakaki nodded.

"Then perhaps you would like to see little Shizuki one of these days. She may do that, right, Natsuki?"

Natsuki nodded.

"There," Shizuru said warmly. "Come and see us sometime, Sakaki-han. Natsuki may even let you play with Shizuki, I am certain."

This time, both Sakaki and Natsuki nodded.

"Jupiter," Nao muttered under her breath. "Talk of the Sphinxes riddling."

Sakaki foiled the effect the next second, however, by speaking to Shizuru.

"Thank you," she said, in an absurdly soft voice. "I'd like that."

"Think nothing of it," Shizuru replied, before slanting her head slightly at the two primipilii. "May I inquire where you are headed today? Could it have to do with the Mentulaean killed last night?"

"Right you are, General," Nao answered. "Off to see if I can pick up any clues there before they sweep it away." She sniffed the air, the smell of salt tickling her nostrils. It was not a scent she disliked. "I'm hoping our men got careless this time around."

"If that is your objective you might do well to hurry." Shizuru squinted at the sky. "Given the time the murder happened, the 'sweeping' might be underway already."

"Which is why we'll be going now," the red-headed centurion answered with a jaunty grin, already beginning to move off. "You'd better get a move on too, General, before the crowds come into the streets. Going to the barracks later to check their drilling again?"

"Yes," Shizuru said. "Happy hunting, Nao-han."

She looked at Sakaki, who was following Nao.

"You too, Sakaki-han," she said. "It was good to meet you."

Both primipilii saluted, then walked off into the crowd. Shizuru watched their backs until her view of them was obscured by a passing wagon. She then turned again to her bodyguard.

"Now one more time," she said with comic abruptness. "Are you sure you would not like something like it?"

She held up the dress that had been folded on her arm, amused by the backwards jerk that brought from her startled companion. Natsuki shook her head vigorously, which she had expected from the time she had first come up with the idea to tease the girl with the overly flamboyant, fabric-flower-bedecked garment in her hands. She pretended disappointment.

"I see," she said, returning the dress to its place and thanking the merchant with a nod before starting off again. The other followed her with an awkward start. "Well, I confess I did not care that much for the design. But still a pity! The colour itself was perfect. It was a perfect match for your blush."

She slid her gaze sideways, chuckling at the girl's pout.

"Now that I think on it, Natsuki, perhaps we should have some breakfast first," she said, a hand reaching to enclose the one swaying nearby. "It was silly of us to leave without having any. Shame on me if I let my dearest girl starve! No, do not worry, we can afford to stop a while-my business with the officers can wait, and they know what to do even without me overseeing them." She felt a slight pressure against her hand. "Shall we get some food here? I rather like seeing what markets have in the way of food sometimes."

Natsuki nodded.

"If you want," the girl said.

"I do, actually." Shizuru placed a hand on the cloth above her stomach. "I am very hungry, to tell you the truth. Let this be a reminder to me never to break my mother's rule."

"Rule?"

"Never to miss breakfast," she explained. "She would have scolded me, had she been here today. I fear to say she was rather a terror, Mater was."

Natsuki looked entertained by that. Meanwhile, the older woman looked around and searched for possible places from which to get them some nourishment. She then saw something a little along the path: a small, roadside cart like the ones in Hime, where grilled meats and warm wine could be bought. Smoke was rising invitingly from the charcoal fire beside it, and the familiar sight brought a rumble to her belly.

"Would you like to try that?" she asked, pointing to it. "I remember we used to stop by those in Hime and eat the fare in the open air afterwards. My friends and I used to do it all the time, when we were doing our apprenticeships at the law courts. Oh, unless you feel too cold-"

"No," Natsuki said, cutting her off. "Let us try. That."

They made their way over. After a purchase of two cups of warmed and spiced wine and four sticks heavy with hot chunks of skewered meat and vegetables, the pair went to sit at a bench beside a tree, off the road. The bench was adjacent to a stone wall, and they leaned their backs against this wall as they ate.

"I missed this," Shizuru said, after taking a bite of the savoury meat. "Do you like it, Natsuki?"

She turned her head to see the girl chewing. Natsuki nodded.

"I am glad," she said, bringing the skewer of food to her mouth for another bite. She paused, however, when she saw the younger woman do the same. The sight of Natsuki's mouth as it opened, the strong white teeth coming out to snag a piece of mushroom, reminded her suddenly of the time those same teeth had nipped at her in their quarters. Her cheeks warmed.

"Shizuru?"

That call snapped her back to the present, where Natsuki was studying her face with concern. She drew a sudden breath, realising that she had also frozen while holding the skewer of meat in the air. Her hand came down slowly.

"Something is wrong?" Natsuki asked. "Shizuru?"

"Oh, nothing, Natsuki," she answered quickly, giving the young woman a settling smile. "I was just thinking of something."

The emerald eyes continued to search her.

"Really," she insisted, reaching for the cup beside her. "Nothing to be concerned about."

She took a sip from the cup and smiled down at its contents.

"I fear the vintage is not as good as the venison, though," she remarked idly, eliciting a smile from the other woman. "Ah well. To be expected."

Having been reassured that her charge was well, Natsuki returned to her own food. Meanwhile, Shizuru regarded the waking city. It was a grey morning they faced, especially since the sun was hidden by great feathered clouds the colour of smoke. Even the cobblestones of the pavement were dark with moisture.

The mornings here must be damp regularly, Shizuru reflected, watching the people passing by. Most of them were garbed in thick, heavy cloaks and trousers. Some of them were even wearing cloaks similar to the Himean military's sagum, a waterproof, durable, and often somewhat smelly cloak worn by soldiers during rainy season. For all that this was a Himean city, she could hardly see anyone wearing the toga.

Well, I do not really expect anyone to, she thought. Having that big bolt of cloth festooned around you in this sort of weather can be taxing. And with the way the winds are blowing now, you would be fortunate if you do not find yourself blown all the way to Hime, with your toga for a sail.

Her lip twitched at that ridiculous image.

"Shizuru?"

She regarded her companion, abandoning her outrageous fantasies of people being buffeted about in undone togas.

"Yes, Natsuki?"

"Are you..."

"Am I what?"

The wide green eyes looked at her: "Are you thinking of the, um, the deaths?"

"Deaths?" she echoed quietly, before realising what the girl meant. "Oh. The murdered Mentulae?"

"Mmm."

"No, not really," she said, letting the now-bare stick in her hand fall onto the ground to join its fellow. "Is that what you thought?"

Natsuki shrugged. Shizuru picked up her cup again and cradled it in her hands, enjoying the warmth.

"What about you?" she asked. "Were you thinking about it, Natsuki?"

There was a short silence before the girl finally nodded.

"Ah. And what, precisely, were you thinking about it?"

Natsuki hesitated.

"I would like to know."

"I, umm..."

"Go on, I shall not bite," Shizuru prodded her, amused. "Unless you want me to."

The girl scowled at the taunt, her blush lending more colour to Shizuru's day.

"About that," the girl said. "Why do you want to stop it? Or them?"

The older woman's eyes widened a fraction.

"Well, for one thing," she said, "because they are killing innocent people."

Natsuki knitted her brow.

"No," was her answer. "Yes, but, um... Ah, like the primipilus said. What she said."

And a second later, she added: "Last time you talked."

Shizuru peered at her.

"Oh, that," she said. "So you remember what we talked about, Nao-han and I?"

A nod.

"So you should have heard my reasons for that, already."

A slower nod.

"But," the girl said quietly. "That. Is that all?"

The general could not suppress her smile.

"Is Natsuki accusing me of withholding information from my trusted subordinate?" she asked with false sternness. She immediately dropped her act, however, when her bodyguard reacted by dropping her head and stuttering out apologies.

"No, not that. I do not-I-I beg pardon, Shizuru."

"Oh, it's all right, Natsuki," the Himean said, cutting her off with a smile. "It's all right, really. I was merely jesting. I should be the one apologising to you for teasing so. And yes, you are correct. I did not explain myself fully last time, I think. Would you like me to?"

From the corner of her eye, she perceived the other woman nodding demurely.

"Only if you want," Natsuki told her. "I do not mind to listen. If you do not mind to talk?"

"I do not mind," Shizuru answered, looking out at the street again to avoid looking at the temptation next to her. Argus was now a little busier, with more market-goers and carts clacking over the cobbles. She could see the gateposts marking the beginning of the market proper ahead, just a few metres away.

"Now then, let me see," she began. "You already heard most of my arguments to Nao-han, correct? That it would reflect badly upon Hime, for instance?"

Natsuki nodded.

"But I did not explain the more practical side of the problem, did I?"

The younger woman hesitated.

"Practical?" she said. "For the governor, is it?"

"Oh, no, not that-though that is a practical matter, as you say," Shizuru answered. "I meant, rather, the concrete tactical disadvantage it might bring about in the coming war."

"Oh," Natsuki replied, perking up with curiosity. "No."

"Then let us take that up," Shizuru told her. "I would say preventing the killings and continuing to admit eligible Mentulae into the territories is a tactical move at this point. In other words, I am against undue aggression to them."

"Even if they could be spies?"

"Even then," Shizuru affirmed quietly. "It is a gamble for us, yes, as we may stand to harbour a few spies within our provinces this way, but Hime's military is hardly so pitiful an organisation that it cannot weather the effect of such infiltration. There are structures and defences within the system that provide for this possibility, as should be expected from a nation that has schools famous for producing intelligencers. Knowing best how to carry out such reconnaissance, it only follows that we also know best how to defend ourselves against it, don't you think so?"

The green eyes were focused sharply on her now, shining with acute interest.

"Now this is what I meant by it being a tactical matter," she continued, pleased with the attention. "There are many Mentulaeans already scattered around the northern territories. Some of them are mere travellers, some are immigrants. Some are even no longer legally Mentulaean, having gained the Himean rights one way or another. Whatever the case, it is a fact that we cannot simply exile them from our provinces or those of our allies in some haphazard expulsion. This goes, particularly, for those who have already settled down in these territories. In other words, it is impossible to grant what the ones ordering the killings are demanding: a total ban on those of Mentulaean origin or blood."

Natsuki made a slight movement with her head.

"But," she said, "only so far as war is not yet."

The older woman nodded.

"Yes, that is so-as far as the non-immigrant Mentulae are concerned," she said. "But if they are immigrants, or ones who have the necessary papers and settlement records already, then they shall not be subject to the prohibition in the event of war. That is only fair and reasonable, yes?"

Natsuki made a sound of agreement.

"This is where my concern enters," Shizuru continued. "You see, I fear that allowing the murders to continue would create potential spies or even outright enemies where there had been none before. I fear that the killings shall estrange the Mentulaeans living here, including those who never had any thoughts of actually supporting their nation of origin if war did happen. Why would they have such ideas, after all, when most of them have resettled here in order to escape the troubles they experienced under the aegis of their notoriously unstable king? Why would they betray the hand that has sheltered them thus far from that old horror?"

She lifted one hand then, and curled her fingers inward to make a fist.

"But if this very hand allows them to be slain like this-or, some might think, slays them itself," she went on, "it would be all too easy for them to consider actual defection. Why should they pledge loyalty to a nation that executes them simply due to suspicion? Why should they consider themselves part of our people when every 'true' Himean they pass on the street eyes them with clear distrust? It is difficult to feel loyalty for a nation that treats you so. It would not be long before they think to themselves: If you kill us due to this false suspicion anyway, we might as well live up to it."

Natsuki regarded her with firm attention, head nodding lightly.

"Do you see now, Natsuki?" Shizuru asked. "If these people-the Mentulaeans who have been living among us for a long time now-were actually made to feel alienated enough to become spies, they would be even more dangerous than any 'real spies' sent by the Mentulae at this moment."

Natsuki nodded again, but more briskly this time.

"Because..." she ventured. "Because they already know much."

"Exactly. And they already have connections, which would only be natural since they have lived in our midst for so long." She settled her cup on the bench, beside her. "It is not too difficult to imagine one of them using his or her knowledge of our cities to foment unrest among the populace, so as to give us internal problems during the war. And that would be much easier for them to do than for some Mentulaean newcomer sent recently for the purpose. Do you agree with me?"

"Mmm!"

Shizuru took up her cup again, studying the liquid within it as she spoke.

"Some might think the best way to prevent this is to simply do away with them all now, regardless of proof or actual evidence to justify it," she said. "But that is something only a reckless fool would do."

She looked Natsuki in the eyes and quirked a brow.

"I am not a fool, Natsuki," she said.

The girl grinned suddenly, surprising her a little.

"Are you reckless?"

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow at the question, trying not to smile.

---

Chikane Himemiya was late. She was on her way now to observe the Plebeian Tribune's meeting from the Curia's steps along with the other patrician senators, but she knew that the said meeting should by now be nearly finished. The awareness of that probability did not spur her to walk any faster, however. She was not a woman who ever gave the appearance of rushing, even when by herself.

I do not expect anything much to happen today, at any rate, she consoled herself, smoothing down the front of her gold-embroidered toga. Her hand went further up by habit, fingers reaching for the shell pendant on her necklace. Almost immediately, her thoughts strayed to her wife, who was waiting for her at their villa.

Perhaps I should have stayed at home instead, if I was to be late anyway.

"Chikane-chan! Wait for me!"

The raven-haired woman stopped, swivelling on one heel to turn and look around. Her expression relaxed into a smile when she saw the man approaching, striding towards her in the corridor. She stood her ground and awaited him.

"Reito-kun, good day to you," she said while offering her hand in salute. "I should have known it was no other."

"Oh?" he replied upon reaching her. They clasped hands in a quick greeting. "Why is that, may I ask?"

"I can think of no-else in the Senate who would address me so loudly with so casual an honorific."

The Princeps Senatus grinned, his beautiful amber eyes twinkling: "And here I thought it was my inimitably manly voice that tipped you off, my dear."

"That was another indication, to be sure."

"Going to observe the meeting of the Plebeian Tribune too?" he enquired. "You're quite late, Chikane."

"But still ahead of you, Princeps. By a few steps, to be precise," she rejoined. "Since it appears we have the same destination, shall we?"

He acquiesced with a gesture of his open hand and they set off again. She soon noticed that he was slowing his steps, however, and thus matched her stride with his. It was apparent that he wished to talk as they went along, and desired to do so in the privacy of the passageway where they now were.

"This is a providential encounter," he commenced, in earnest tones. "I've wanted to ask you something these past few days now, Chikane-chan, something that I'm sure a good many others would like to ask you as well."

"Oh dear," she said, lips twitching. "I fear I am already married, Reito-kun."

That caught him unawares. He dissolved into guffaws, clutching his mid-section.

"Heartbreaking as that is, I know where I have a chance and where I do not," he said later on. "Scarcely your type, am I?"

"I have heard it said that Reito Kanzaki is every woman's type."

"But it is also said that Chikane Himemiya is not every woman." He chuckled out the last dredges of laughter before dropping his voice again. "No, I meant to ask, actually, about your intended candidature... and why you have yet to announce it."

"Ah, that." A sigh escaped her lips. "Yes, it has seemed to slip my mind. So many things going on in the city these days, you see, that keep me occupied."

There was the slightest quirk of a brow as she added: "It makes me a little forgetful."

"Ah, so that's it," he said cheerfully. "May I ask what has caused this temporary amnesia? It is temporary, I hope?"

"Of course." She gave him her slow smile. "The physicians assure me it shall be gone in two weeks' time."

His eyes narrowed slightly at this response.

"Which would put your recovery right before election week, when Haruka-san should have returned," he noted quietly, before going on to cast a sharp glance at her. "Oh. I see."

He concluded: "You are sly, Chikane."

The indigo eyes opened wide for a moment, feigning an innocence that vanished swiftly as the urban praetor's lashes fluttered down in a smirk.

"Is that how you perceive me?" she asked with a touch of humour.

"Now, now, I do approve," he said. "It's a fine tactic-to make everyone expect it but to also continuously put off realising their expectations until the last minute. This should wear down any opposition you might still have to your candidature by the time your nomination does become official. That is the idea, isn't it?"

Her head tilted to one side before returning to its usual high carriage.

"It saves me a bit of trouble," she said gently. "This way, I do not have to constantly fend off any attempts to reverse the decision on Izumi-san's bill, which procured the opportunity for me to enter the elections so late in the game. Of course I could deal with any such attempt, but it would be wearisome."

"Yes, I see what you mean," he replied. "And you're correct, keeping them on edge for so long will sap their strength for the future. Even Haruka-san would be forced to meet the general resignation of the House to your candidature, if she does have any qualms about it. You save yourself a great deal of effort this way."

"That is my hope."

"A question, however."

"Yes?"

"I know almost every one of our peers is expecting you to run, even with your postponement of the official nomination," he started. "But what of the lower classes, Chikane-chan? Not all of them follow the games those in our strata engage in. Some, perhaps even most of them shall not be aware of the tenterhooks you have our fellow politicians hanging on. Granted, they don't and can't contribute votes. But I would have thought someone of your ilk would prefer to be a consul known and loved by the populace too, as such would certainly round out any truly good consulship nicely-despite and against the general disregard for the masses among our ranks. Having the people's support can be useful, demagogic though it sounds. Well, we see it in your best friend's case, do we not?"

"Oh, you have my agreement. Popular approbation can be a tool."

"Then is not waiting until your actual consulship to foster it a little bit of a gamble?"

"Princeps, have you ever known me to gamble?"

"No, but if you ever do I am certain you would play with something up your sleeve."

She laughed softly.

"You make me sound like an unsporting player," she said. "In any event, rest assured that there is no need to harbour anxiety over the lower classes. They are going to be very well-tended indeed."

"Now I see. Sending your agents among them already?"

"In a manner of speaking. You might say someone has been seeing to the roots of the popular grapevine for me, and quite skilfully too, I daresay. A person who promises to be a veritable master of managing the masses." Her lips turned up with feline satisfaction. "One may rest easy with such an ally."

"A fine resource to have, then," he said, intrigued. "May I be introduced to this potential demagogue, that I can have someone to turn to for similar matters should the need arise?"

She turned a highly amused face to him.

"My dear man, you have already been 'introduced to this potential demagogue'," she said. At his baffled expression, she hinted: "Who better to act as a liaison between the upper and lower classes than one with an eye the colour of the sky and another the colour of the earth?"

He stared at her.

" Edepol! " he exclaimed. "Urumi? You mean Urumi?"

She nodded in affirmation as they paused at the corner, the hallway leading to their destination just ahead. He shook his head in disbelief, still assimilating what she had just told him. Chikane made no secret of her amusement at his incredulity.

"I see this took you by surprise," she said equably. "Though I did not expect it to do so. One might have said it would be a natural inference given her actions of late, as well as her intentions for the future."

"Her intentions?"

"Has she not told you she plans to run for the Plebeian Tribune, hence her request for a change of family and name? I thought she would have."

"Yes, actually. So she did," he said, giving her a helpless grin. "But I thought she was joking. She looked like she was joking. Another of her jokes, I thought!"

"In my experience, Urumi jests when she looks at her most serious."

"Agreed. But my, my!" He took a deep breath while reconciling himself to the notion. "So our little cousin is aiming to become a tribune-of-the-plebs, eh? And when does she plan to make this announcement?"

"I know not."

"Ah."

He shook his head in a final expression of disbelief and after having done so, resumed walking. She did the same.

"Still, Urumi getting involved with the lower classes..." He shot her a quick look. "Then, the rumours-has she really been dabbling with the crossroad colleges too?"

Chikane nodded. "She has a talent for dealing with them. Methinks she already has all the major ones under her direction, the scamp."

"Quite an achievement!" His forehead creased suddenly. "But isn't it dangerous? These mobs are made up of ruffians who deem themselves petty consuls of their territories, Chikane. Our cousin may be playing with fire. Remember what happened to Terauchi, the last man who thought the gangs under his control. Not a pretty end the man had."

"Terauchi, my dear man, was a consummate idiot," she retorted in her usual easy manner. "And whatever you may think of our cousin, she is most assuredly not that."

"It's hard to disagree when you put it that way."

"I put it simply, Reito-kun. No more than that."

They had almost reached the Curia's steps. Already he could see some senators there, observing the Plebeian Tribune's meeting below them, and among those senators watching was a certain red-headed woman with whom he wished to speak.

"I think I had better save my reservations for another time," he ventured to his present companion. "We have reached our destination, and from what I can hear, they seem to be abuzz."

The two of them joined the others, who welcomed and made space for the new arrivals. Reito found himself standing beside the woman he had been looking at earlier-none other than the senator Mai Tokiha, who greeted him in an attitude as warm as her bright hair.

"I hoped you would come, Reito-san," she said, bestowing upon him a smile he found so dazzling that he was nearly blinded. "But you took a while, so I thought we wouldn't be seeing you today."

"Had I known you would be here, I might've come sooner," he replied, bringing an embarrassed blush to her cheeks. He enjoyed the moment, thoroughly pleased with what he had wrought. But then he remembered something-or rather, someone. "And Tate? Is he here?"

She shook her head, setting shoulder-length, carrot-coloured locks astir: "No. He said he wouldn't be in today."

"I see." He smiled sincerely at her as a thought occurred. "Dare I hope you chose to watch the Plebeian Tribune's meeting from here instead of down in the Well of the Comitia specifically so we could run into each other? You usually attend the meetings there, Mai-san."

"Actually, yes," she answered. Her mauve-shaded eyes met his. "I ran into your sister today."

"My sister."

I should have known it would be that, he thought. His half-sister, the product of his mother's latter marriage, had a great fondness for Mai-who seemed, happily, to reciprocate the girl's affection. The girl was forever at the Tokiha household, going so far as to develop a habit of staying over there instead of in her room in Reito's own house. Running into Mai, it seemed, was another habit she had just developed. He was almost jealous.

"Somehow, Mai-san, I have a feeling that it would be more accurate to say she ran into you." He pretended concern. "She didn't do anything silly, I hope? My little sister can be rambunctious, though I assure you she means well when she, er, rampages."

"I know," she replied, giggling at the word he chose. "No, she just wanted to talk to me. She asked if she could visit me tonight."

"In Mikoto's language: gorge herself at your table."

She tilted her head to one side, looking embarrassed again.

"Mikoto can be taxing to handle, Mai-san. If it's an imposition-

"Oh, no, no!" she said, shaking her head forcefully she cut him short. "I don't mind at all. To be honest, I was going to tell you that you could come along for dinner too, if you want. I was pretty sure that she wouldn't remember to invite you, after all." She gave him another of her faintly embarrassed, wonderfully likeable smiles. "You know how Mikoto can be."

His teeth flashed as he grinned broadly, pleased by this turn of events.

"I would love to come, Mai-san, if you would have me," he said.
"That's very kind of you to ask."

"Oh, really, Reito-san. It's only polite."

"Does that mean you asked me only out of politeness, then? Ah now, I am saddened."

"No, ah, that's not what I meant."

As this banter between the Princeps and Senator Tokiha continued, the urban praetor carefully made her way to the fore of the group. The others let her pass while nodding their greetings and salutes. After a few moments, she finally reached the very front, her view of the meeting below them unimpeded.

Much better .

There was a rustle of cloth beside her.

"Himemiya?"

She turned her gaze to her side, only to meet startled dark eyes looking at her.

Or worse.

To Chikane's surprise-and secretly, her discomfort as well-she was standing beside a certain well-known senator, who now looked at her with a hint of the same unease she was currently concealing. She had not expected to see him here because he was a member of one of the old plebeian families, which meant he could observe the meeting from the Well of the Comitia itself instead of from their current perch. But she supposed he had come here to avoid the crowd down in the meeting itself, or perhaps to accompany some patrician friends.

The two of them were not exactly friends themselves, although they were old acquaintances. The reason for their present unease was a past rivalry that had happened not too long ago: an unexpected but fairly strong competition over none other than Chikane's wife, who had proven her guileless self somehow able to attract two of the most sought-out, eminent senators despite her unspeakable social class. Since that matter had been settled with Chikane's marriage, there was no longer any reason for the two senators who had once competed for one woman to now avoid each other-which, had they been honest, both of them had been doing thus far.

Until now, due to Chikane's little error.

Ah well-I suppose we had to meet sometime, she thought, even as her lips pulled up slightly into her standard faint smile. It was inevitable, for he was another senator and went about much the same circles she did. The Himean senator's world was very small.

She greeted him politely and watched the startled look in his eyes turn into one of slight discomfiture. He returned her greeting awkwardly, though with absolutely no malice as far as she could read. And eagle-eyed as Chikane was, her readings were often accurate. If so, that was good. It recalled to her the words of her wife, who had once defended the man in an argument.

"He's a good man," the other woman had stated in what now seemed a long time ago to Chikane. "He wouldn't do that, what you said. He wouldn't bear a grudge."

Chikane had suppressed a sigh at her wife's stubbornness.

"He is a man who has just been scorned, Himeko. I am aware you think him a man of good moral character, and truly he seems so. But how can you be sure he would not do something out of anguish? People are reckless when they are in pain."

"I know that, Chikane-chan," her wife had responded, with a feeling look that made Chikane's head drop. After a few seconds of silence, she went on to say: "I know you're just worrying for my sake. But he's my friend too. I want him to stay and keep being my friend."

"That may be asking for too much from him at this moment," Chikane had answered. "Seeing you-seeing us like this would only wound him further. Even if he does not harbour a grudge, as you say, then he would most likely keep his distance for a while."

The golden-haired woman had considered it.

"I know," she eventually said sadly. "But that doesn't mean I'm going to stop being his friend."

Then, fixing Chikane with a determined eye: "And that doesn't mean he's going to stop being mine."

They saw later that Chikane had been right when she said that he would keep his distance from them, that much was made clear in the man's actions afterwards. Now, however, Chikane could see that Himeko had been right as well. The man was actually asking about her wife in a way that was obviously well-meaning, though only after having stumbled a fair bit over the words.

"Will you send my regards to your wife, Himemiya?" he was saying to her, scratching the back of his head. "It's been some time since I saw her. Is she well?"

"She is doing admirably, thank you," Chikane replied smoothly, turning something over in her mind. "I shall convey your greetings to her, rest assured. Himeko will be overjoyed to receive them."

"That's good," he said, running a hand through his thick but short mane. "I haven't greeted her in a while. I sent a letter congratulating her on your marriage, but... Well, it was feeble of me not to have given them in person, I think, especially as I meant them. I hope she's not mad about that."

"Oh, Himeko could not be mad at you for such a thing."

"I hope so," he replied. "Anyway, thanks for telling her that and 'sorry' for me, then."

Chikane paused before giving her reply.

"Perhaps you might even come sometime and deliver your apology to her yourself?" she suggested.

He looked a little stunned by that, she thought, his handsome, almost pretty face open and unguarded for a few seconds. He recovered swiftly though and seemed to search her countenance for a hint of mockery in the instant afterwards. As he found nothing but polite expectation there, however, his expression eased once again.

"I think I could do that," he said slowly. "Maybe someday, if it won't be imposing on you."

"Not at all. Consider it done at my express invitation."

She turned her gaze to the podium before them.

"In any case, did I miss anything, Oogami-san?" she asked. "I was regrettably late coming here, so I have no idea what has transpired."

He inhaled audibly, relief coming to his face as they moved to less personal subjects.

"Something has happened, though I don't understand what it's about," he replied, falling into his proper 'politic' manner. "Maybe you can be the judge of it for me, Himemiya. It's a little odd."

She nodded to indicate that she was listening.

"One of the tribunes-of-the-plebs just proposed a strange bill," he explained. "It's to allow curule candidature in absentia for politicians abroad in the coming elections. So long as their official nomination is filed here by a legitimate executor of will on their behalf, that is."

Chikane lifted her eyebrow: "Odd indeed."

"Tell me about it." He shrugged disparagingly. "Even if that bill is passed, most of the officials abroad still wouldn't get the news in time to send back instructions for someone to file nomination for them. The elections are happening in just a few weeks from now. Unless our senior consul is late in coming, and I don't think she will be, this time."

"That is true," Chikane said. "The bill, it would seem, is generally useless for most of the people who might be interested."

"That's what I think."

"Ah." She took a moment to reflect on it, turning over the idea in her head. As the other senator said, it made little sense to her. "You are right. It does seem odd."

He looked at the crowd below.

"The only reason I can think of," he told her, "is that the tribune-of-the-plebs who proposed it is either in league with or being paid by an official outside Hime. Someone who's already prepared to file a formal announcement of candidature and is just waiting for the bill to pass so that his man can file the nomination immediately, even before the news of the bill's passage reaches him in his post abroad. Someone pretty close, as it'd have to be fast-travelling news for him to have gotten word of the opportunities presented by your man's legislation of a second nomination period."

She nearly broke into a smile at his blatantly casual-and slightly impolitic, but he had never been a perfect politician-reference to the tribune of the plebs passing said nomination period bill as 'her man'. Most people knew the man worked for her, of course; still, most people refrained from saying it in casual conversation, unless they were actually close to her or on her side as well.

"That is the only thing I can think of at this moment too," she said. "Though it seems such a desperate action. As though the person decided only recently on candidature." A faint gleam came to her eyes. "Perhaps it may even be an authority abroad who expects to have charges filed against him once his tenure is over?"

The other senator nodded. "Yes, that could be. He'd be safe from arrest so long as he still has a suitable position."

He started as though something had just occurred to him, and frowned.

"But even if he does manage to file nomination, what good would that do?" he asked. "He'd have had to go through a proper campaign to get enough voters, or no one would even recognise his name on the ballot. Especially since he's spent the past year or longer abroad. It would be futile."

"Indeed."

"Unless he bribes or gets backing powerful enough to see him the post at the last moment, I guess. Weirder and weirder." His frown turned into one of bafflement. "I just don't understand it."

She settled for sighing in response.

Privately, she was marvelling at how many "odd" bills were being passed that would influence this year's elections. First had been the one of her making, officially proposed by 'her man'. And now there was this, whose beneficiary was most likely some desperate official abroad trembling in his shoes at the prospect of being called to account for his crimes.

"It seems this is a year of political irregularities, Oogami-kun," she said at length. "I do not understand some things of late as well."

"Hearing that coming from you, Himemiya, makes me feel a little less like an idiot."

She smiled at the implied compliment: "Who proposed the bill, by the way?"

Oogami Souma shrugged carelessly, then gave her a name.

"Takeda Masashi."

Chapter 26

Vocabulaire:

1. Aeolus - Keeper of the winds in the Odyssey. He was able to tie them into a bag, as he did for the hero Odysseus/Ulysses.
2. Calends - The first of the three fixed points of a Roman (Himean) month. The days of the month were not named or given numbers, save for these three points. The Calends is always the first day of each month (e.g. the Calends of January would be January 1). Along with the other two fixed points (the Nones and the Ides ), it was considered a sacred day. Note that dates were always reckoned backwards from the three fixed points. Note too that this story uses the modern months to spare readers the extra trouble of consulting the ancient calendar.
3. Clivus - A street on an incline. Rome had a great many of these as it was a hilly city. The word following it is the name of the street, e.g. clivus Argentarius, which is Argentarius Street .
4. Domina - Feminine of the Latin word "domine" or "dominus", i.e. "master ".
5. First Citizen - A more gender-inclusive term I have used in place of the Roman designation First Man . The First Man of Rome was primus inter pares (first among his equals), the man possessing the most clout, auctoritas, and dignitas of all men in Rome. Several famous examples of people who have been First Man of Rome at some point or other are Gaius Marius, Lucius Cornelius Sulla Felix, Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (a bit contentious, since some might argue that he accorded himself the designation instead of being granted it by his peers, which was the accepted way), and Gaius Julius Caesar Dictator, all of whom were military legends.
6. Ides - See note above, for Calends . Unlike the Calends, the Ides varies. It is the 15th day of all "long months" and the 13th of the others. For example, the Ides of February would be February 13 in this story, since February is not a "long month", whereas the Ides of March is March 15, as March is a "long month".

7. Minim - A scarlet paint worn on their faces by triumphators (generals holding a triumph or victory procession) on the day of their parade. Not all triumphators chose to wear it.

8. Polyphemus - The Cyclops blinded by Ulysses/Odysseus in Homer's "The Odyssey." He swore to devour Ulysses but was eventually outsmarted by the latter before he could deliver on that promise. Ulysses blinded him.

9. Porticus - A large building with a very spacious, shared central courtyard, e.g. the Porticus Margaritaria of Rome, which was a famous commercial centre.

10. Rostra - Comes from the Latin word rostrum (singular form of 'rostra'), which was originally the reinforced beak of a war galley used to ram other ships. The Roman consul Gaius Maenius started a tradition when, after going to war with the Volsci, he removed the beaks/rostra of Volscian ships he had defeated and fixed them to the wall of the speaker's platform in the Well of the Comitia (see par. 3 of the actual text for a definition of this term) . It was meant to mark the end of the Volsci as a rival power to Rome, and afterwards, other victorious admirals did the same, fixing so many rostra to the wall of the platform that it was literally crowded with them. The adornments prompted them to refer to the speaker's platform as the "rostra", i.e. "ships' beaks". This is from where we get the tradition of calling speaking podiums/platforms " rostra" .

Tomoe Marguerite sighed contentedly as she popped a date into her mouth. After swallowing the fruit, she brought a hand up to cover a weakly-stifled yawn. The light swaying motion of the palanquin was making her drowsy, and that would not do. She still had another matter to deal with, long as her day had been.

The senator had just come from a meeting with her banker, and was presently being borne out of the clivus Argentarius -or the street of finances, as it was sometimes called-by her slaves. Drawing the drapes of her palanquin aside, she settled a bored gaze on the buildings of Hime's most prominent brokers and financiers. Idly noting a dishevelled man being thrown bodily from an office by two others, she continued to look over the sights with an uninterested expression until a familiar, somewhat distant sound caught her notice. Leaning to one side, she peered ahead and saw what she had expected.

The Well of the Comitia. The site of all Plebeian and Popular Assemblies, with one of the former being held there at the very moment. Tomoe settled back in the lavish cushions of her seat as she thought of what was happening in that meeting. She placed another date in her mouth.

He should be convincing them by now, she assured herself, sucking on the fruit. I'm sure he will get approval soon. He has to, the elections are almost here.

A small stab of anxiety came to her mind at that, and she frowned at it.

We don't have any more time.

"Minë," she called, snapping her fingers outside the palanquin. "Tell them to go faster."

A dark face came into view. "But you could be jostled, Domina."

She sighed and pretended to explain as one would to a child: "Then go as fast as possible without jostling me."

"Yes, Domina."

Upon feeling the subsequent change in pace from her bearers, Tomoe fell back to meditating on the issue on her mind and being discussed in the Well of the Comitia at present-namely, Takeda Masashi's draft bill. Today would make it exactly one week since the tribune-of-the-plebs had first proposed it to the assembly, she realised. Seven days of discussion; seven days of delay. Not that the wait had been entirely unexpected.

The Senate is usually wary of bills like this, she reflected, the 'Traditionalists' coming to mind. Thus far, most of the hesitation over Takeda's proposal-which would permit curule candidature in absentia for all politicians outside of the city, as long as they fulfilled certain requirements-had been from the tribunes of the plebs known to be in the pay of the most conservative faction in Senate. It was argued by these that such a licence as the bill granted would give officials finishing their terms abroad an opportunity to evade the claws of the Bribery and Extortion Courts by being elected into high office, rendering them ineligible for arrest for yet another year. Given how many officials might well be facing arrest after their terms were over, such an evasion might prove significant.

Still, they should realise it's unlikely to work that way, Tomoe sighed to herself. If ever, few overseas officials would be able to avail of the opportunity, given how late it was in presenting itself. And even fewer of those overseas officials would manage to be elected, even if they were able to file for candidature. Takeda himself had been arguing this to those opposing his proposition. Of course, the inevitable result to that was the question: What then is the point of this bill?

It was a good thing Tomoe saw that one coming beforehand. Being the true originator of this bill, she had quickly foreseen that some people might question its purpose early on, given the strange circumstances surrounding its foreseeable utility. Thus, she had spread gossip about one of Takeda's long-time friends-a prefect in Sardinia, rather nearby-deciding belatedly to run for the praetorship. This friend, so the rumours now went, had someone ready to file his candidature as soon as Takeda's bill passed. That took care of the alleged motive very nicely indeed.

Now all she had to do was take care of the means. Aware that bribes would also be needed to convince the other tribunes of the plebs-and the senators from whom they took their cues-to allow the bill's passage, she had been soliciting funds for that purpose from a very generous source. Thus far, a good deal of money had changed hands already, but she wanted to be certain of their victory. Hence she was going to meet this source today, in case more gold would be needed.

It was a strange thing, though, being able to do so much without being noticed. Thus far, no one had linked her to the bill yet-and that was exactly how it should be. The only one actually aware of her involvement was Takeda, who met her every now and then to consult over their next actions or to pick up the bribe money. Which money he thought was from Tomoe, not from some other fount of funding.

"I wonder what he would say if he knew, though," she mumbled to herself with a sneer. Perhaps the other senator would object if that were the case. Yes, he would likely object. Takeda would have scruples if he knew where the money actually came from, and Tomoe did not care to deal with an episode of belatedly manifesting conscience. It was best to simply let him think the money they had been using was from her coffers. Money was always good money, no matter from where it came.

Looking out of the palanquin again, she saw that they were now passing the yawning Well. Just next to it she could see the looming edifice known as the Curia Hostilia, with several distant figures on its high steps probably observing the assembly below. They were too far away for her to make out any faces, but she cared little about that. The only face she cared to see there was absent, an sea away and stranded in a foreign land.

She recalled the last time they had seen each other, which had been just before the other woman left for the North. Tomoe had burst into her cousin's study, only to be dismayed by the sight of the fair-haired woman packing her things. She had demanded to know if the other woman was truly leaving.

"Of course," had been the matter-of-fact answer. "I must."

"But you can't!" she had pleaded. "You know what they're doing, Shizuru. This is-"

"Something I am duty-bound to do," Shizuru had interrupted. "So I shall."

"What if something happens to you?"

"Then I should consider myself grateful-the only people to whom something does not happen are the dead," the tall, achingly beautiful woman had smiled. "I am going. Everything is arranged and I have decided to go tomorrow."

Then, shutting one of the drawers of her desk with a firm knock:
"That is final."

Tomoe, seeing that the other would not be swayed, had collapsed tiredly into one of the couches.

"You're really leaving," she said. " Again ."

"I'm afraid so."

"To fight those-those hordes in the North. With that small army."

"Most likely, yes."

She had grimaced in exasperation: "This is too big an opponent to go against with only what you have. They'll swallow you up!"

Shizuru had chuckled at that.

"So Polyphemus promised to do with Ulysses, and he ended up blind and sore," she had replied. "Have you so little faith in me, Cousin?"

"It's not that..."

"Then let this be the end of the discussion," Shizuru had smiled. "Do not worry so much-you always tell me I have the fabled luck of Ulysses, after all. I shall be fine. Now please excuse me, I need to settle some other things by tonight."

Giving her a far-too-quick farewell kiss on the cheek, the other woman had then walked out of the room, thus unable to hear Tomoe's final words.

"Shizuru, it took Ulysses two decades to come back home."

Well, she had no intention of waiting two decades as well. She rubbed the cheek on which her cousin had kissed her that day long past, trying to bring back the feeling of those soft lips brushing her skin. Until now, she could still recall the warmth she had felt. Shizuru always did such things so kindly. Though sometimes her kindness had a distance to it as well.

Never mind that for now, she berated herself, shaking away that niggling feeling of sadness. You have to take care of one distance first before you can bridge the other .

Returning her focus to her surroundings, she apprehended that they had long passed the Well of the Comitia, and were now approaching her destination: the Porticus Margaritaria. An enormous rectangular building, it housed many of Hime's most expensive shops. Most of the wares to be found there were affordable only to the upper classes, which patronised the shops of the Porticus Margaritaria almost exclusively in certain cases. Given the social status of its clientele, it was natural for people shopping there to know each other either personally or by sheer repute. This was why Tomoe had decided to meet her funding source there, where they could pretend to have simply run into each other while actually conducting their business.

I'm glad he hasn't complained yet, she mused, mind producing an image of her source. No matter how much I've asked to have. He simply gives it without any qualms. Clearly the man was very rich, which she had known even before their acquaintance, but he was generous with his money as well, which she had not known until they began their talks. That was providential. He was a godsend, as far as that matter was concerned.

But it only made sense that he would be so helpful. He had an interest in the matter too.

As her palanquin neared the Porticus, Tomoe caught a flash of very fair hair exiting a carriage ahead of her. Perfect timing, she thought, recognising the person she was going to meet. She stuck her head out of the palanquin and called to him, feigning surprise.

"I say, Prince Nagi, what a surprise!"

The governor of Argus's private reception room was unusual in Hime, but perhaps not for the architectural styles favoured in the northern lands. It was a room on the first storey of her mansion, overlooking the western gardens of the estate. Shuttered doors opening to a wide, well-kept balcony kept it airy and fresh. There could be found trimmed box bushes and flowers, some vines poking out of the pots and weaving into the latticed railings to dangle above the heads of those passing beneath, on the ground floor. The doorway leading to the balcony had white drapes often left to hang loose, but such was not the case today. Due to the wild flapping caused by the winds, the governor had asked for the drapes to be drawn and tied.

"I'd ask for the winds to be drawn and tied into a bag, if I could," she remarked to Shizuru, whom she had invited to her reception room for lunch. They had just finished eating and were now reclined on lushly padded couches. "But I'm no Aeolus. Can't stop which way the wind's blowing."

"That could be a proverb in itself," the young general replied, washing her hands in a basin. She motioned to her bodyguard, who was sitting beside her, to do the same. "As Fate or the winds would have it, we are all stranded here momentarily, bereft of knowledge as to what is happening in more southern parts of Our Sea."

"It makes me anxious, I tell you," the governor returned. "Do you really have nothing else to tell me about Hime? I know you've been away from there for about four months now, but I've been away for years! I'd like to know if there's anything else I should know about that my letters from home don't tell."

"It seems to me you know just about everything pertinent," Shizuru replied, following with a courteously inquisitive look. "If I may be so bold as to ask, Midori-han, do any of your former pupils write to you? The ones residing in Hime, that is."

"Some. Chie-chan does often, but she can't now seeing as she's right here."

"I see," Shizuru murmured. She paused to dry her hands on a piece of cloth, which she then passed to the girl beside her. When she looked back up at the older woman, there was an apologetic smile on her lips. "Please forgive me for having neglected to do-

"Oh, don't be ridiculous!" the redhead interrupted good-naturedly. "I know you've been busy ever since your first run in the legions, Shizuru-chan. Besides, you're not the type to write long letters about the latest scandal and chit-chat, so you probably wouldn't have been able to satisfy my hunger for that sort of thing."

She made a face.

"No, you can keep your meticulously politic, discreetly worded letters. Chie sends entire memoirs, anyway, and there are some things in them that would be enough to light a fire under each Himean senator's arse. Juicy and with a hefty sprinkling of spice!"

The younger woman let slip a giggle.

"There are some others too. The more regular ones would be-let me see now," She pondered it for a second. "Mai-chan writes to me and so does Akane. How is she doing, by the way?"

"The last I heard while leaving the city was that Kurauchi-han's suit had been accepted by her family."

"So you don't know any more than I do." Midori snapped her fingers. "Right! One of my old friends last wrote that she was staying in Hime for a while. Still there, I should think. Athenian, but half-Himean by parentage. Smart and snappy. Her name's Youko. You know her?"

The younger woman lifted her eyebrows: "Why, yes, I do. She was the most esteemed practitioner of medicine in the city when I left."

"That's the one-and she should be!" the governor declared, following with a quaff of her wine. "Great at what she does, Youko. A regular Hippocrates. I met her in Egypt, actually."

" Egypt? "

"I was there to see the inscriptions on their pyramids. She was there to learn more about their medicine." She pretended a childish moue of distaste. "It made me shiver, at first, what with the things those physician-priests she studied under had in their kits. Scorpions, spiders, all sorts of crawlies! It looked to me like they were trying to kill their patients, not keep them alive."

Shizuru laughed.

"But they're actually pretty good at what they do," Midori continued. "To be fair."

"Egypt is quite an advanced nation. Perhaps not so much in society or politics now, but they are when it comes to technology and learning."

"In some ways, more so than we are," was the reply. "But you'd like to change that, hm, Shizuru-chan?"

The rusty eyes peeking at her from above the rim of a goblet smiled.

"I hope that does not mean you think I would like to retrograde Egypt," Shizuru said after a sip.

Midori scoffed.

"Oh, you know what it means," she said, feigning a very slight glower. "And you know that fickle lot of people pulling the pharaohs' tails in Alexandria can do all the retrograding all by themselves! This is why it's always been hard to talk to you, Shizuru. You have an awful habit of putting words into other people's mouths. You do agree, Natsuki-chan?"

Natsuki gave the query a moment's thought and ended with a conciliatory nod. Shizuru lifted an eyebrow pointedly at the youngest woman in the room, trying to keep her lips from betraying her amusement at this answer. The girl pretended to ignore her. Shizuru saw the now-familiar sparkle of mischief in those green eyes, however.

"Now even my faithful bodyguard has mutinied," she frowned to the governor. "Shame on you for inciting this defection, Midori-han."

"Shame on you for teasing all of us too much," the governor retorted. "I was only asking about your plans for Hime's advancement when you brought up talk about possibly impoverishing Egypt. A grand task that would be! Well? Are you going to answer me or shall I try to wrangle it out of you?"

Shizuru leaned back into the couch, folding her hands over crossed legs.

"Well now," she began. "I cannot do much yet, to be honest. I am only a senator at present."

The olivine eyes were focused on her: "But that will change soon, yes?"

"Eventually."

"You've served as a quaestor already, as well as an aedile," Midori stated, tapping a finger on her own leg. "So the next office will be praetor. When do you intend to run?"

"When possible."

"Vague, but fine." The older woman shifted in her seat. "And after, you'll be going on to the consulship. Promise me you'll remember me when you get there and let me have access to all those dusty storerooms those stodgy Traditionalists won't let me into."

"Gladly. Though you make my success sound a foregone conclusion, Midori-han."

"Isn't it?"

Shizuru said nothing, merely smiling at her.

"You'll get to the top," the governor said. "You've always been sure of it yourself, so don't pretend to be unsure now. Isn't that your goal, after all? To become First Citizen of Hime, as your father would have been had the gods only granted him longer life?"

The smile changed, a touch of solemnity in it now.

"You still recall that, Midori-sensei," came the lilting words, their speaker seemingly unmindful of having slipped into that old honorific for her tutor instead of that for a peer. "But then, you remember past history best of all."

The redheaded woman nodded, sitting up to look her squarely in the eye: "To be First Citizen of Hime, clout personified. If they don't want to listen to you now, they will have to listen to you after that."

"And resent me for it."

"Every athlete resents the one who beats him to the finish line."

Shizuru let loose a short laugh: "I remember from whom that metaphor comes."

The older woman nodded, setting long red tresses waving over her back.

"I still remember the way you said it that day," she recounted, mindful of the dark-haired girl listening quietly to them but trying not to let on that she was listening. "It was a few days before you had to leave for your first campaign. Anyone else might have thought you were calm, but you weren't calm, Shizuru. You were intense."

Shizuru listened as the other woman went on with the reminiscence.

"I told you-I remember this clearly-not to go leaping into the field and to keep yourself safe," Midori went on. "And you looked at me with that face that practically said you were going to, regardless, and said..."

"That some other sprinter would beat me to First Citizen if I took no leaps along the track," Shizuru finished with a smile. "Yes, I remember."

"You should." Midori propped an elbow on her thigh, letting her chin rest on one hand as she bent forward. "You said it with such conviction."

"Something easy to do. Every politician aspires to become First Citizen."

"Not true. They dream about it, not aspire for it. And only a few of those who do aspire for it have what it takes to make the title," Midori replied positively. "You, on the other hand, have what it takes-the ancestors, the wealth, the talent. Don't you dare forget that. I'm waiting for the day you reach that goal. Unless you've already changed your mind?"

A sharp glint came to Shizuru's eyes.

"I should think not," was the firm response.

Midori smiled.

"Good," she replied, falling back into the cushions of her seat. "I'd hate to think they've been giving you all that trouble back home for nothing."

At Shizuru's glance, she went on: "Hah! I've heard all about it. The Traditionalists have been rounding on you like dogs at a fresh piece of meat."

Shizuru smirked and answered, mockingly, "And with so many other pieces of meat lying out there, why is it always / that they must single out, one wonders?"

Midori snorted at the complaint.

"Because you're too tall, too beautiful, and too successful for your own good," she declared, drawing the other's laughter. Casting a glance at the mirthful young woman, she added something else to her evaluation: "And you're too arrogant."

"It is to be expected, if people praise me to my face as much as you just have," Shizuru managed in between chuckles. She turned a smile to the governor. "Do you really think me arrogant, Midori-han?"

"No?" was the grinning rejoinder. "So you deny it?"

"Would it be safer to do so than otherwise?"

The older woman laughed: "I got you, didn't I?"

"I can only surrender."

"Well, you can't be too arrogant, anyway, if you can still admit defeat," the other observed. "And I'll tell you what it is that makes you arrogant. It's your deuced self-assurance and how it shows all the time."

"In that case, might I plead that assurance is not equal to arrogance?"

"Of course it isn't, but that's not what most people think." Midori smiled. "Do you remember? When I was mentoring you in your history studies, you would take your lessons at my house sometimes. I'd wait in the study, and when you'd come into the room, you looked like you should be the one to own it. I say it and I'm the one who actually owns that room. No, no..." She shook her head before Shizuru could get out a word of protest. "You did. You didn't walk in looking like you owned the room, but like you deserved to."

A meaningful pause.

"Sometimes you even look like you deserve to own Hime."

Quirking her brows at the younger woman, she lifted her cup from the table and pretended to toast to her, still talking.

"Too much poise, Shizuru-chan, and too effortless by half," she said cheerfully. Her pleasant, still-youthful features crinkled into a smile. "Too much assurance. People see it as arrogance because they don't think you have the right to arrogate such confidence to yourself. Well, our people have always been wary of fellows who look like they deserve to be king or queen, ever since the founding of our Republic. That self-important bearing all aristocrats have rankles them."

Shizuru conceded with a bow of her head.

"And you?" she asked.

"Oh, I love it!" Midori grinned widely. "Fact, I can't wait for you to rankle them even more when you get to where you're heading."

A laugh.

"I suppose that might be something to look forward to, wherever that would be," Shizuru said.

The governor made a sound of amusement, stopping to empty her goblet yet again. The servant waiting at her back rushed forward to refill it and Shizuru found herself noting that this was the fourth time the other woman had drained her cup. The wine was watered, but even so, the amount of liquor the woman could consume easily always amazed her.

"Speaking of things to look forward to, Shizuru-chan," the older woman said suddenly. "Your birthday is coming up. Since you're actually not going to be right smack in the middle of a war or big mission during it for once, I assume you'll take time to give us some proper festivities. What have you planned?"

There were a few moments of silence as the governor took another sip of her newly-poured wine. After time passed and she had still received no answer, Midori turned her head to Shizuru's direction-only to find a pair of crimson eyes opened widely her way. After taking a moment to ascertain the wonder in their depths, she erupted with a loud guffaw.

"Ecator!" she hooted, slapping a thigh. "You, Shizuru-chan? The girl who committed the Founding History to memory in record time? You forgot your own birthday?"

"I had grown so used to being too busy to celebrate it."

"So much for being said to have a prodigious memory!"

Shizuru waved a hand as if to bat away Midori's jabs. Her other hand covered her eyes in a gesture of shame.

"It simply slipped my mind," she said, laughing along with the other woman. "Good heavens, how could I have forgotten it so completely? No doubt the army is expecting me to put on something more flamboyant than the usual dinner feast I give them."

Turning to her bodyguard, who had been looking at her with shining eyes ever since Midori asked the query, she provided an explanation.

"My birthday is thirteen days before the Calends of January, Natsuki," she said, before suddenly halting to give the Otomeian a sharp glance. "Oh! When is yours, by the way? You never told me."

Natsuki paused at that question, seeming to be working out something. Both Himeans realised she had been converting her birth date into the Himean calendar when she answered, very quietly, that hers was on the Ides of August. Midori and Shizuru made small exclamations of surprise.

"That's a good day," Midori informed the girl. "The Ides are sacred to Jupiter Optimus Maximus, the great god himself."

"That is true, Natsuki," Shizuru said. "Did you know that?"

Natsuki shook her head, intrigued.

"Well, there you have it," the governor said benevolently, with a swig of her liquor. "You were born on a good day, Dear Girl."

"Perhaps it was a good day because she was born on it," Shizuru ventured, bringing a smile to Midori's countenance and a blush to Natsuki's.

"Couldn't have put it better myself," the governor followed, after a while of joining her former pupil in silently enjoying their other companion's embarrassment. "So I'm guessing you two hadn't met yet, last birthday you had, Natsuki-chan?"

It was Shizuru who answered, and regret tainted her voice.

"Actually, we should have by that time," she admitted, casting an apologetic glance at the girl. "Forgive me, Natsuki. I had no idea-

The girl had a hand up, shaking her head as if to say that it was of little consequence.

"But I was not able to give you a present, or greet you, at the very least," Shizuru said. "I do wish you had told me."

The girl only shrugged again. The governor looked at both of them, from one to the other.

"Here's an idea," she proposed, drawing their attention to her. "Get her a gift later, Shizuru-chan. What else is my province famous for if not for what you can buy in it? You'll find things here that you're not likely to see elsewhere."

"You are right, of course," Shizuru replied thoughtfully. She turned a bright smile to the Otomeian. "Let us do that later, Natsuki. And we can celebrate today, too, to make up for it if you wish. Any way you would like. Well?"

"Capital idea! Would you like a party, Natsuki-chan? I throw smashing parties, I tell you. How about it?" Midori said to the girl, who looked a little startled by the abrupt offers thrown to her. After a few seconds of staring at them, she made as if to speak. No sound came out, however, and she snapped her mouth shut again, staring resolutely at the floor with cheeks aflame.

The older women laughed at the curious reaction.

"I wish it was my birthday coming up-I'd ask you for her!" Midori sniggered, winking at Shizuru. "But she's too adorable to give up, eh?"

Shizuru grinned, knowing she was only being teased.

"I admit I would not be inclined to entertaining the notion," she answered.

"That's too bad. But yes, I do see why you'd not give up Natsuki-chan to me. She's like a sweet little cub you want to keep to yourself, clawed but cute," she finished, drawing out the last word with particular emphasis. She paused immediately after it, however, with an odd expression crossing her face. "Oh Juno, that's... a new shade of red."

Turning to look at what seemed to be amusing Midori, Shizuru found she had to pull her lips in to stay the laugh. Natsuki's colour had gone so high that she looked like a Himean triumphator, face painted with the scarlet-coloured minim parading generals wore. Sending the choked governor a similarly choked glance, she quickly brought up another subject. She was afraid Natsuki would burst a major blood vessel if she let this continue.

"On the subject of cubs," she said, clearing her throat with a feeble cough, "you mentioned earlier that you would like to see our panther cub more closely, Midori-han, did you not?"

Midori nodded, the muscles of her cheeks still quivering perilously.

"Yes," she got out. "That I did."

"We had intended to show you to her, but we ended up leaving her with one of my servants before coming here. She had to be fed, you see."

"Oh, of course." The governor's face changed, the mirth wiped away by something else. She met Shizuru's eyes, her own conveying a silent message. "Say, it's been some time since you got here, so she'd be done eating, don't you think? Would you mind asking Natsuki-chan if she could fetch the animal now? I'd really love to see it."

The tawny-haired woman did not even take a moment to think about it. She turned to her bodyguard, who was eyeing the two of them carefully. The girl was not blind and definitely no fool.

"Natsuki," Shizuru said to the girl anyway. "Would you please go and get Shizuki? I shall be here with Midori-han, so there is no need to fear for my safety. Besides, I would not like Shizuki to be too lonely without us."

The girl blinked once, the curling dark lashes meeting over her eyes. Presently, she nodded and rose to her feet.

"Don't worry, Natsuki-chan," the governor of Argus said. "Shizuru here is safe with me. What you should worry about is yourself, walking out on those streets unaccompanied. You're liable to have half the men of my city trailing after you, to say nothing of the women."

The Otomeian blushed furiously again, looking away stiffly and beginning to walk to the door. Shizuru stopped her with a call just as she reached it, however.

"If that happens, Natsuki," Shizuru said, "you have my permission to use your weapon."

Thus the girl left to the sound of a cackling Midori, who sent her own servant away as well. The redheaded woman peered at her only remaining companion, who sat smiling at the floor.

"That was excellent, Shizuru-chan," she remarked, only succeeding in eliciting a faint twinkle from the burgundy eyes. "If I didn't know better, I'd have even said you were serious when you said that."

Shizuru said nothing, trying to resist the urge to go after her bodyguard: she had been serious.

"But, yes, she's quite a find," Midori observed, obviously referring to Natsuki. "She's very devoted to you."

The younger woman confirmed it: "Natsuki is a faithful bodyguard and attendant."

"And as a companion?"

"One cannot ask for better."

"I believe you." Midori sent her a penetrating look before saying in a kind voice: "Tell me, how long have we known each other now?"

Shizuru tipped her head and looked at the brown-flecked, grape-green eyes. "Long enough for you to speak frankly of what it is that has compelled you to send our companions away so that we would be alone, Midori-sensei."

The governor grinned.

"It was obvious, wasn't it?" she said. "All right, I suppose I deserved the 'sensei' there."

Shizuru smiled and said nothing. Midori drew a breath.

"I'll get to the point, then," she started. "And I won't mince facts. Or would you like me to?"

"Please be as forthright as you can," the other invited.

"Don't forget you said that," Midori replied, a parody of threat in her voice. "I'll tell you what I know, then. For starters, Shizuru-chan, I know you're sleeping with that girl, despite the fact that you still don't go about advertising it the way some would. And I don't mean just sleeping in the same room. That's the first thing I need to get off my chest and it has to do with everything else I'm going on to say. Continue?"

The answer came quickly: "Continue."

The goblet was set down almost like a flag of truce being lowered.

"What I also know is that practically everyone in your army knows about your relationship too because-this is what some of the soldiers said-even a blind man could see that much," Midori said. "I'm not blind, nor am I senile, and I clearly remember seeing the two of you out there in the gardens two days ago. Don't think I'm some pervert spying on you. My window happens to overlook that place and it's an accident I saw the pair of you at all. Fair?"

"Quite fair," Shizuru said, smile unmoving.

"Now I wouldn't even meddle with this," Midori continued, with a flash of a grin. "I'd even congratulate you, normally, because you've been going too long without being involved with anyone and this may be just what you need at this time. Besides, the girl's lovely and I'd have snapped her up if she'd given me a second look and you hadn't snapped her up yourself, which is probably the same thing other people would say as far as her looks are concerned. She's no embarrassment there."

"I cannot argue with that."

"Then this is where I hope you will argue," Midori said, adopting a grim expression so abruptly it might have been considered droll by her companion had it not been for the circumstances. "I've been watching the way you look at her, Shizuru-chan, and it's not normal . Not the sort of thing I'd have expected. Not from you, anyway."

The piercing red eyes trained on hers, gleaming but still conveying no malice.

"Dare I ask you to elaborate, Midori-han?" the younger woman said, sounding nothing other than curious. "What do you mean by that?"

Midori sighed a reluctant sound. Amusing, since she was the one who had instigated this interrogation.

"I'll be frank in answering that, just as you asked me to be," she said with a slight thinning of her eyes. "What I mean is that every time I see you with her, you don't look like you're in lust with the girl, which is what I'd have expected. It would certainly have been more normal!"

"No?"

" No . Shizuru, you look like you're in love with her."

As Midori had been admiring the younger woman's masterly self-control thus far, she was startled by the sudden crack her last words seemed to produce. It was only for a moment, but she had seen it, small as it had been. And being no novice at siege, she recognised the advantage and battered against it.

"Well, are you or are you not?" she asked, scrutinising the finely-hewn features of the younger senator. "Or let me put it another way, Shizuru. How much in earnest are you with that girl?"

The question was met with silence. For a few seconds, she thought she had gone too far, asked too personal and potentially condescending a question. What if she had offended the younger woman? Shizuru was still a Fujino and invested with the natural pride of that ancestry. Midori might be a former tutor, she might be the elder by a good few years, but no one, absolutely no one, presumed to question the personal quirks of a patrician Fujino... no matter how quirky they might be.

The lips before her finally parted, retaining the slight upward tilt at their corners.

"You put me in a strange position, Midori-han," Shizuru finally said. "I could hardly say I take her lightly, since it would be loutish of me to do so. Nor is Natsuki the kind of person one takes lightly."

The governor frowned.

"Supposing I did give you an indication of my regard for her, then might I also ask what bearing it would have on other matters to give you enough reason to bring it up with me this way? I ask this seriously, and not in a manner intended to cut you short."

Midori released a breath she had been unconscious of holding.

"I brought this up because I'm concerned, Shizuru-chan," she said with care. "Look, I know you've had your expedition-this campaign you're on right now-be commuted to what's known as an extended military engagement, one for sprucing up fortifications. And since you're just about done with the sprucing up, that means the engagement is shortened. I hear they'll try to cut you off funds too. The outcome, unless you want to fund the rest of your time here yourself, will be that you'll be forced to return to Hime sooner than planned, probably sometime in the near future. What then? Don't tell me you plan to take your new mistress with you."

Though she had no way of knowing it, Midori's words actually gave cause for Shizuru to relax. It provided her with an explanation for the governor's actions and words, which had actually caught her off-guard.

That is why she mentioned it, the younger woman thought, glad to have a reason to latch onto for this abrupt interview. Midori thought the Fujino army would be forced to pack up and go home soon. But the Argus governor did not know about Chikane's and Shizuru's plans, which would 'extend' this military fortification into a full-scale war. Not that the older woman needed to know it, though: not just yet. Shizuru could allow her to keep thinking that for now.

I know the truth, Shizuru thought to herself, trying to ignore the small unease the older woman's words had planted in her mind. She knew she would be staying in the North for a good while, which meant she need not worry yet about the concerns Midori had just mentioned.

"What if I do decide to take her along?" she asked in jest. "She might like to see what our city has to offer, and I would gain a wonderful companion to save me from the tedium of Hime's politics. She might even help me in my troubles with the Traditionalists. I daresay a good lot of them would shrink at the sight of her swinging a daos in the Forum, you know."

Midori shook her head with vexation.

"I'm not joking," she said. "It wouldn't do. Are you really considering it? If you did bring her to Hime, you'd carry on your liaison with her and everyone would see it for what it is, which would only be acceptable if you made her a slave. You wouldn't make her your slave."

"I would be ashamed to," was the uncharacteristically swift retort. The arrow had hit, and the barb lodged almost visibly in the crack from before. "Not to one such as Natsuki."

"Then you couldn't bring her with you," the governor stated. "You know why, Shizuru, and you know she'd be a liability to your cause. If you can't even hide your relationship now, how can you expect to hide it in that busy old city, festering with gossip and built with walls that sprout ears on every square foot of brick? Everyone would be on to you in a second, and your opponents would cackle like a flock of vultures."

"Vultures cackle?" Shizuru asked inconsequentially, half to herself.

"Whatever sound they make then-I don't know." Midori released a sharp breath, looking at her closely. "What I'm saying is this. You have to make up your mind about it as soon as possible. You never know when you'll get a summons to go back home, so you have to decide. Would you want to take the girl with you or not? And, if you do decide to take her along, would you be capable of treating her in the proper way, which is as a mere slave or foreign trophy you have relations with on occasion and nothing more?"

She was surprised to see a tide of anger crest, banked deep in the younger woman's eyes.

"Natsuki is a freeborn, dignified person," Shizuru declared tightly, though in a calm voice.

Midori nodded.

"She's also an Otomeian," she replied, having decided that quick and fast would be better than taking it slow and painful. "A foreigner. I'm thinking about your goals here, Shizuru, and what you've always said you wanted. How do you think this dalliance would affect it? How do you think the people back home would react if they knew you were consorting with someone they consider a barbarian... and not in what's still an acceptable way as a mistress or master with a slave used specifically for sexual relief? Someone looking to be considered the First Citizen doesn't do the deed with foreigners-or if he does, he's supposed to treat that foreigner as something equivalent as a slave anyway, which is most definitely not what you do when I see you with that girl. You can call it stuck-up, prudish, even xenophobic, but that's the way it goes and you know it."

"It doesn't need to be love, even. The word they'd use is infatuation to describe the way you look with that girl," she said, continuing her battery. "If you take her back with you and let everyone see your infatuation, the Traditionalists would eat it up and regurgitate it daily for everyone to hear. How Shizuru Fujino has been tamed by some beast from the godforsaken North. I wouldn't say it, but they would . Even if you do get over your infatuation or whatever it is, the damage would have been done by then... and your goal of becoming First Citizen would practically be finished. Hime's First Citizen can't be said to have been tamed by a foreigner."

Affecting as prosaic a grimace as she could, she went on in a sad voice.

"The only reason you're being left alone now is because you're a general on campaign," she said. "Generals do this all the time, because it's just too bloody lonely when you're away from home and surrounded by cold iron, spilt blood, and little more. I should know, I've been there myself. But we leave it there, Shizuru, when we have to go home, and most importantly of all, we make it clear in our actions early on that we'll leave it there . We don't look like we fall in love with our lovers, and we don't bring them home. Nor do we treat them the way you've been treating that girl."

She paused and looked pleadingly at the inscrutable face in front of her, feeling as a soldier would after attempting to take down a fort alone. Her hand came up and two of the fingers massaged a suddenly throbbing temple.

"I just need to know you understand all this early on," she said, more gently than before. "Either you reconcile yourself with the idea of eventually having to give her up and make it clear to everyone that you have every intention of doing that... or go with the knowledge that if you don't, it will be another nail your enemies will use to hang your head on. It's a warning for the future, a bit of advice. That's all."

She stopped here and waited with baited breath. It seemed to take an eternity before the younger woman finally replied. And her answer, when it came, consisted of only two words.

"I understand."

Midori searched her face after that, trying to wrestle some further indication of how the younger woman felt from her features. It was in vain, however, and she finally settled back in her couch in defeat.

"All right," she said, assuming a contrite expression. "Now that that's over, I want you to understand something else."

Two tawny eyebrows lifted, indicating that Shizuru was still willing to listen.

"I'm happy you enjoy being with her or seem to enjoy it, from what I see," the governor said, in as kind a voice as she could manage. "And personally, I don't care if she's Otomeian or Mentulaean or whatever race you can come up with, since I can see she pleases you a great deal. I was just trying to tell you that other people will care, and unreasonable as that seems, it's a fact you have to deal with in the future. A lot of the big canards against most senators come from things like this. Just something to remember. I wasn't saying it out of spite."

The other woman unbent enough to smile.

"I know, Midori-han," she said. "I never thought you were being spiteful."

"Thanks for that, at least." She licked her lips. "So what are you going to do about it?"

"Just what you recommended."

"Which would be?"

"Remember that other people may be unreasonable."

The older woman had to grin.

"Sounds like something you do every day," she said humorously. Her hand came out to reach for the shortly abandoned wineglass on the table, eager to wet her unpleasantly dry mouth. "Anyway, I still agree with you on one thing, and that's your taste. Natsuki-chan's gorgeous."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow: "I am beginning to suspect I have competition."

Midori looked up.

"You probably have had it, all this time," she said. "A pretty thing like that that doesn't go around without being noticed."

"I know."

"You too. Anyone after you these days, aside from Natsuki-chan?"

"No, and I doubt she may even be said to be 'after me'," she smiled. "Ah well."

The governor made a disbelieving face.

"Sure she is! You're just being modest. Or dull." She snorted inelegantly. "Since I just said earlier you're too arrogant and too smart for your own political betterment, I'd say those aren't your excuses. Trust me. I know."

"Indeed," Shizuru said, suddenly looking sly. "You said earlier that you had been there yourself?"

"Oh, don't ask, it was a long time ago." Midori looked up, seeming to remember it to herself. "It wasn't with a fellow soldier, though."

"Do I detect a note of disapproval for the circumstances of my choice?"

The governor's leer became more pronounced.

"I don't think it's necessarily a bad thing," she replied. "But you know how it's generally discouraged, since it makes for awkward situations in what should be a smoothly functioning machine, all that."

"Quite."

"Say, for example, how would you feel about getting involved with a fellow soldier who's not Natsuki-chan? Generally speaking?"

Shizuru considered it.

"I confess I would normally be wary of the relation," she decided.

"But not if it's a cavalry captain with her superior officer."

"That is different. She may only be following orders."

The two of them laughed.

"And being reassigned a new mount, I'm sure!" the older woman said, unable to resist making the ribald jest. She was aware that the effects of the liquor she had imbibed were finally beginning to show. "Where is-who's there? Open it!"

The two women looked expectantly at the opening door, on which someone had just knocked. The face that appeared was not that of the girl both were waiting for, however, but one unfamiliar to

Shizuru.

The man addressed the governor of Argus.

"Governor, I'm sorry to interrupt you, but..."

Midori slapped her forehead even before he could finish.

"Don't tell me," she said. "It's the Arabs and Greeks again?"

He bowed apologetically. She got up from her seat.

"I'm coming. Tell them to wait there." Turning to Shizuru, she rolled her eyes upwards in a gesture of frustration. "I'm sorry about this, Shizuru. It looks like I have to go and listen to those idiots again. Can you tell Natsuki-chan I'm sorry I couldn't stay to meet your little pet? She'll think I made her go all that way for nothing."

"Not at all," the younger woman replied. "Please go ahead, Midori-han."

Midori nodded, already sweeping away.

"Wait for her here," she called over her shoulder. "Or she'll be wondering if I did something to you in case you're not here when she returns. Don't want that lovely coming after me with that daos of hers." A second's pause, as though remembering something important. "And give that birthday party a thought! I'm looking forward to it."

Shizuru smiled as the other woman finally left, the man with her closing the door. Her smile faded as soon as it shut and she was alone in the room once again.

There were a few moments of silence.

"The future, hm?"

The whispered words were soon followed by the sound of her rising, walking towards the doors leading to the balcony. She made her way there, a pensive look on her face as she passed through the doors and came into the open air. She took a deep breath and smelled the tang of the sea nearby.

In the future, I shall have to travel over that sea again.

The older woman's words earlier weighed on her mind, much though she had pretended not to be affected by them. Midori was right-she had to think of the future. And what did the future hold for her? Great things, she was sure. Conquests, triumphs, the institution of First Citizen. All things she had always wanted. But now there was something else that she felt belonged to that list, and it went by the name "Natsuki". What did that mean?

No more than what I have known for a while now, she decided. It meant she desired the girl, wanted her badly. She wished for the girl to be by her side, as she was now. But did that desire reach the point of wanting her to be by her side beyond this campaign? To put it in Midori's question to her, would she want her lover to be with her even in Hime, once the time came to go home? Or would she leave her here?

The thought caused a sudden ache in her chest. She, leave Natsuki?

"Unbearable," she hissed to herself, closing her eyes as the breeze caressed her upturned face. She should not be thinking such things yet, should she, especially when even their relation was still so new? Circumstances could change, after all. She should not spend her time being anxious over a decision that was still long in coming. Why mind concerns when they were still so far away as to be irrelevant, even if only for the time being? It was a futile exercise, not to mention a waste of anxiety. And it was putting the wagon before the ox, at the moment. To worry about that took away the time she still needed to come to grips with the very fact of herself being in a relationship, of her first time taking anyone into her bed or life this way-and, most fearsome thing of all, of feeling so much for someone else. Shizuru was a senator already, yes, not to mention already legendary for her exploits in battle. She had achieved in a shockingly small time a great deal more than many of her peers would ever achieve in their lives. But that was not the sole measure of a woman when it came to life's greatest trials, love included. She was still, in many ways, very young herself.

So the question gnawing at her, voiced by the governor of Argus earlier and repeated by a voice in her mind: how earnest was she in dealing with Natsuki? And how much of it showed that even her old friend and tutor would feel the need to mention it?

She moved forward until she stood at the very banisters. She felt a great deal for this strange girl that had come in to her life, she was aware, so much that it consumed her on occasion. Witness the incident with Takeda Masashi. Even so, how much of an indication was that of her sentiments? How could she tell if that was merely jealous desire or something as reckless as love ?

"Frightening," she whispered to no one in particular, musing over that word. She was not someone known for expressing such sentiments, or even romantic notions. Which did not mean she could be prevented from harbouring them, she acknowledged. All the same, she had never even come close to considering this question before. It seemed so alien to her, so alarming a point. Not that she was about to run away from it, come to that: she might be young, she might be new to all of this and alarmed by it, but Shizuru was never a coward.

But it still discomfited her.

"And even now that I see the disturbance she causes," she murmured, looking out at the grounds, "I still wish nothing more than that she were here to comfort me this very moment."

As though her wish had been borne to some benevolent god, she caught sight of her lover's figure in the gardens before her. Natsuki was walking with her usual smooth stride, her gait matching that of the young panther at her side. Unlike Shizuru, who had compromised with the breeze by tying up her hair these days, she had her mane falling loose as always. The wind caught it up in a flowing river of blue-black locks that streamed to one side, some crossing her face but ignored even then. There was something unearthly in the picture she presented, Shizuru thought. Something unreal . She stared intensely at her, willing the girl to look up, and Natsuki did.

Shizuru felt her breath catch, seeing the flash of acknowledgment in the emerald eyes even from far away. Then there was the slow, faint smile on the pink lips, just before the Otomeian lowered her head shyly, as if both embarrassed and flattered by the attention. The steady, graceful steps never faltered. Red eyes followed each footfall, unknowingly softening in expression as the young woman came nearer.

I suppose I do look at you a little too much, a little too lingeringly, she told the coming woman in a voice only she could hear. But why should I not? You were made to be looked at-though I do not like it when others appreciate the same thing . Or perhaps I can stand it, if you return only my appreciation. I want you to look only at me. Does that really show so much when I look at you? Can they really see it so clearly, as Midori-han told me?

Did she really look so romantic, so possessive when it came to Natsuki?

The governor's words returned: " No. Shizuru, you look like you're in love with her."

Shizuru propped her elbows on the banister and leaned forward, unwilling to take her eyes away from the approaching figure and wondering if she even could.

---

Back in Hime, a din was heard all over the Lower Forum as people filed out of the Well of the Comitia, stepping high and quickly to avoid being trampled. The tribunes of the plebs were left on the rostra, the beaks of ships vanquished by Himean generals jutting from the wall behind them. The day's Plebeian Assembly was finished, and it had concluded very satisfactorily for at least two of the men on the platform. The rest of the tribunes were clustered around their two colleagues, the ones who had successfully passed their respective proposals just today. It was these two victors who now stood at the centre of the group, shaking hands with the others as they were congratulated for their victories. One of them was the famous swordsman, Takeda Masashi.

Nao was finally able to lay her hands on one of the Mentulæan killers a full fortnight after being tasked to look into the matter. The man she caught was one Neleus of Greek descent, not a registered inhabitant of the province but one of the immigrant "weeds" of which Argus's governor had spoken to Shizuru and the senior legate. He was also known as a heavy hand for hire: one of those men, in other words, who hired themselves out for tasks necessitating the forceful exercise, often illicit, of brawn. A sort of mercenary-cum-thug. The chief primipilus was said to remark after receiving this information that it was to be expected of his type-which could have meant a lot of things, given that Neleus seemed the sort to fit into many types, few palatable to general sensibilities.

Most likely, however, she had been referring to his appearance. Neleus was a tall, thick-thewed man, with the sort of knobbly and jutting jaw that indicated a pugnacious temperament. His nose was his most outstanding feature, for it managed to exaggerate the slope of the ideal Grecian nose into a grand, hooked fixture hanging proudly from the middle of his face. So great was this nose, so aggressive its shape, that some of his past employers had even given him the moniker "The Beak". Given the man's usual line of work, it would have been even more appropriate for them to have called him "The Vulture".

According to intelligence, most of his jobs had been in assassinations or what was known in such circles as 'quick disposal'. He was not bad at it, for all that what substituted for art in his craft was a savage familiarity with his work. That he was caught was not so much a result of his inexperience but more an outcome of Nao's schemes.

During the last Mentulaeen killing, Shizuru's redheaded centurion had gone to inspect the scene of the crime with the Argus commander-of-garrison, Sakaki. The two women performed this inspection early morning of that day, and were thus able to conduct their survey before the clean-up detail could arrive to sweep away the mess. As fortune would have it, they were able to discover a choice piece of evidence during this survey. It was this crumb that led them along the trail.

The object was a crocodile's tooth bored through with a hole for a necklace. The chief primipilus found it under a table, its leather string broken. She surmised that it did not belong to the victim, for the Mentulaeans were known to dislike that particular beast of the Nile and consider it a harbinger of misfortune-a belief that might well have been true in this case, for if the primipilus was correct then the object had a chance of belonging to one of the assassins. If so, the man would return for it. Oh, not that the object itself had any outstanding value! One could find a dozen similar things from the hawkers in Egypt. No, what told her that it was irreplaceable was the minute, near-negligible inscription on the tooth itself: the words, to N., followed by the Greek symbols for the familiar form of "father". It was personal, an heirloom. The owner would come back.

And so she outlined her plan, choosing the slave tasked with overseeing the clean-up of the crime scene for her purposes. Giving secret instructions to the man, she told him to pick up that necklace, ensure that the rest of the slaves knew he had done so-perhaps by bragging loudly about such a lucky find-and then keep it in his quarters, which were two adjoining rooms in a slum complex near the western side of the city. This place was then to be monitored clandestinely by a trio of soldiers tasked to hide in the room next-door. The bait was set, and all that was left was to wait for the prey to bite.

It was a week before the man came sniffing, looking for the heirloom left him by his sire. He went about it by engaging the slaves who swept up the crime scene in casual conversation, eventually asking if they knew anyone selling animal's tooth necklaces. If they simply told him to check the markets, he would reply that it was a very special kind he wanted, one some priest had recommended to bring him good luck. Of course, it was none other than a tooth taken from a crocodile.

He was not a professional for nothing. He went about the matter cautiously, approaching them one by one and speaking very offhandedly, as if about something inconsequential, but also with bluster, as if he was a man who had every inconsequential desire fulfilled. Eventually, he hit on one slave who mentioned that the head servant during that job a week ago-the one to clean up that dead Mentulaean's place-had picked up something of the sort that he was looking for. Perhaps he should go ask the fellow if he wanted to sell it?

Neleus was not the sort of man to buy what he could just as easily steal. So he asked around a little more, found the address, and stole in to retrieve his heirloom when the slave left for an evening tipple. He was still rummaging around for it when the soldiers bore down on him with ropes and a gag.

He put up a fight-most people did-but was no match for the combined force of three veteran legionaries chosen specially for their skill and swiftness in acquiring prisoners-of-war. This was how he had arrived at his present state, hands upraised and lashed to an iron ring from the cellar's rafter. It was the very same ring used by the proprietors of that establishment to hang and carve up their slaughtered cattle.

"Fitting, don't you think?" said the primipilus, leering at him from her perch on a table. "You look like a great big steer about to be put on a spit. I could do that too. Would you like to be put on a spit?"

The lit torches of the cellar bathed her in a light that was at once sinister and sultry, and that was a shade that suited her very well, though it was doubtful that Neleus could actually appreciate the picture she presented. His eyes were swollen with bruising, the skin hot and bloated with the marks of a gruelling interrogation. And they had only started on him.

"We're just warming up, so don't get soft on me yet," the primipilus warned as she continued speaking in her deceptively gentle voice. "I'm hoping for a bit more entertainment out of you, you salty old verpa. So come on and show me some life, eh? Be a little more energetic."

The only response was a rumble from the prisoner, beetle-black eyes crawling up from their gaze at the floor to send the primipilus a hate-filled glance. Her smile grew even wider.

"Enough with the looks. I'm not impressed."

She got off the table and made her way towards him.

"It can stop if you talk, Neleus," she coaxed, folding both arms across her chest. "Tell us who's in this. Talk to me."

Neleus lifted his sweat-soaked head.

"Been talking to you a while now, Soldier," he sneered. "Told you I don't know anything. Was hired for a job and took it. That's all."

He spat to one side, the gob of saliva and phlegm marbled with blood.

"I don't ask any fucking questions because they pay me not to," he declared.

"See now, you're talking, but you're not really saying anything," Nao answered, faking a pout. "I wasn't born yesterday, Neleus. You weren't either. We both know someone at least paid you not to ask those questions you're talking about, and we also know that's the someone I'm asking for. It doesn't have to be the one at the top. I just want the messenger. Give me a name."

"Don't know his name."

"Don't lie, Neleus."

"Don't know his na-hnghf!"

"All right, let's try that again," the redhead said, inspecting the coiled rope in her hand. There were red spots on it, fresh from the new cut she had just opened on his lip. "I want a name, Neleus. What's his name?"

"Fuck you."

She laughed.

"I'm sure you'd love to, but that's too high a hope for your like," she said, using a finger to beckon one of the other soldiers in the room. There were three others aside from her, all from her own century. They were also all part of the official torture detachment. She addressed them.

"You heard what he said, boys and girls," she said loudly. "Fuck me, he says. Me. He's actually dreaming of fucking me."

She stopped to sigh.

"Can't say I blame him," she smirked. "But by Dis, that's a tall order, don't you think? He has gall, he does."

The others laughed, watching the captive bow his head after another seething glare to the primipilus.

"Might as well aim for blessed Juno while he's at it, Centurion," said the soldier who had come to stand next to her. "He likes his fantasies high and mighty, don't he?"

"That he does," Nao replied. "That, or he was dreaming when he said that. Since he's dreaming, it's our duty to wake him up."

She cocked an eyebrow at the soldier who had spoken and asked: "We don't want to bore him now, do we, Hideki?"

Hideki grunted at the tacit order, unfurling the rawhide whip in his hand. Its tails were knotted at the ends, wicked little things that left a sprayed tattoo on skin that looked like a kiss from Medusa. It was not even an instrument developed specifically for torture interrogations but for pure brutality. Used by an amateur, it could bring a man trembling to his knees. Used by a professional, it could bring his face to the floor, sprawled in a puddle of his own faeces and piss.

Hideki happened to be a professional.

"Let's give him a friendly little morning kiss, Hideki."

There was the snap of the whip, like the sound of old wood cracking under sudden pressure. It was followed immediately by a guttural cry.

"How's that?" said the primipilus, peering curiously at their prisoner. Looking unsatisfied by his pained grimace, she snapped her fingers at Hideki. "I don't think he's awake yet. Give him a few more love-slaps, eh?"

Hideki chuckled. This was followed by the cracking sounds of the whip licking out again and again. Each crack was followed by a scream, each one higher-pitched than the one before. Some people might have thought it unmanly or unfitting for Neleus to scream because of the whipping, but Nao-and every other person who had ever been lashed or had lashed someone-knew better. No man or woman could possibly hold back a grunt if it came to a good whipping. Veteran soldiers could stifle nearly all sounds if they were stabbed, pierced, shot, or even sliced. But no veteran soldier had ever been able to stay mute under the whip. Unless he was actually mute.

The whip man is a great thing, Nao thought with admiration. The good whip man could deliver fast, stinging blows that felt like wasp-bites for only a second before blooming into hell the one after. He could flick out that leather cord like a sadistic snake, reaching out to sting your skin but not cut it-or not yet, not just yet. He knew those places that hurt more than others, and he was precise. That precision, taken with that knowledge, was a cruel thing. Because a good whip man, if he rationed out his blows and had enough stamina, could keep you in a bright and nearly unbroken haze of pain for as much as ten hours without stopping.

Hideki, Nao knew, was a good whip man . He knew enough to wait just for the zenith of the first bite's pain to pass before delivering the next. His arm tired slower than an Olympic athlete's in his prime. And he could break a man's vow of silence faster than anything else.

Another scream erupted from the prisoner's throat, chasing its way through clenched teeth.

Well, it's not exactly anything coherent, Nao conceded with a smirk. But it was still better than sullen reserve. It was always good to let the prisoner find his voice . It was still something.

She clapped her hands to stay Hideki's whip. There was an interval of silence as she waited for Neleus's sighing groans to die down.

"Had enough yet, Neleus?" she asked him afterwards. "This can stop, you know. Or it can go on forever. Would you like that?"

Neleus raised his head slowly in response, hair now almost completely matted to the skull with hot sweat. The look he sent her way was not at all forthcoming, and she nodded in understanding.

"I see."

Hideki began to raise his whip hand again, but she halted him by pushing off the pillar she had been leaning against and touching his shoulder. She approached Neleus, circling around until she was standing behind the prisoner.

"Look at all these love-bites," she crooned, lifting a finger to run it caressingly over a fresh pockmark, one of the blunt cuts the lash had inflicted on his skin. He gave a shiver of pain, his large frame quivering as he jerked away from her touch. She laughed.

"Squeamish already, Old Boy?" she taunted. "And this is just the foreplay. We aren't even getting started yet."

He tried to twist around, grunting as he turned his head in an attempt to look at her from the corner of a puffy eye. All he could see was a shock of red, however, and whether it was just her hair or the blood seeping from his eyelid, he could not tell.

" Cunni, " he hissed savagely into the air. "You cunni. "

"Talking dirty already. Ooh."

"I'll kill you!"

"Tch." She shook her head sadly, poking at another wicked little welt on his back. "He's still dreaming. A few more wake-up calls, Hideki?"

She moved away as Hideki bared his big white teeth, ready to eat up the rest of the man's skin with his lash. As soon as she was far enough away again, he began.

"He's holding up better than expected though, Centurion," said the other female legionary in the room when Nao moved to stand next to her. "Think we should change methods?"

Nao snorted, speaking quietly but just enough to be heard above the cries and the snaps of the whip.

"Ah, you just want to start breaking bones already," she said dismissively, motioning to the club smacking softly in the other woman's palm. "I don't think it's time for that yet. I want him to talk, not be completely reduced to bawling."

"A broken knee would do it."

"It could also send him straight into delirium from the pain," she retorted. "He's more liable to start thinking of suicide then, and we're lucky he isn't doing that now."

The soldier nodded, tossing brown curls over her brow: "He wants to get out of this alive, even if only in prison."

"Yes, but if you break his knee, it's another story. He'll either be in too much pain to think about going on with this shit or start thinking he'll be too incapacitated to make his escape when he lands in the cells." She sighed. "Gods' sakes, I finally catch one and it turns out to be a good, old-fashioned trap-mouth."

"How about we break the fingers instead? A lot of little bones we could use there."

"Ahh, it's the same as incapacitating-"

She broke off abruptly and squinted at nothing in particular. All of a sudden, she grinned.

"You just gave me an idea," she said cheerfully. "Enough, Hideki!"

Hideki ceased. She snapped her fingers.

"Take him down, would you?" she instructed to the soldiers, watching them stride to Neleus's side. She pointed to the heavy oaken table nearby, the one she had been sitting on earlier. "Tie him down there. Lay him out so his hands are flat on the wood."

They obeyed. Two released the chains holding up his arms with a series of clinks, dragging him roughly to the said table and flipping his big body there with a few grunts. They worked with the swift care of experts, and soon he was right where Nao wanted him to be: lashed tautly on his back, both arms and legs pulled down with thick cords.

She walked over to look down on his red face.

"Well, I'll be damned," she said with a wide grin. "The bastard actually passed out. Get the water."

One of the legionaries fetched an amphora from a corner and filled it from a larger one nearby. Veins bulging, he lugged the container and emptied its contents on their prisoner, bringing Neleus awake with that shock. The prisoner shook his head dazedly, finding himself.

"See how accommodating we are, Neleus?" Nao said pleasantly, joining her hands behind her back as she regarded him. "You kept falling asleep on us so we even let you lie down. Now how's that for hospitality?"

He blew heavily through his nose, trying to clear it of water that had trickled inside. An angry grimace showed through the beginnings of his beard, and Nao was amused to see that a sliver of bravado had worked into his expression.

"You think-hnf-this is new?" he asked contemptuously, once his nasal passages were cleared of moisture. "I've had worse, had children hit me harder, saltatrix tonsa," he leered at Hideki, who scowled at him. "My hide's thicker than your fancy fucking armour, you goddamned cunni!"

The primipilus grinned outrageously at the tirade. She clapped her hands as if in approval.

"Well then, let me teach you something basic about armour, my leather-skinned man," she said cheerfully, looking at the others. "Get more water, now."

They refilled the amphora while she took the club from the other woman in the room. The thin end was forced roughly into Neleus's mouth, used to keep his mouth open. Nao looked at the female soldier.

"Hold his head fast," she ordered, motioning the men with the amphora closer. "Pour and try to get it into his mouth, boys."

They complied, and there was the sound of rushing water and gagging, mixing with wild thumping noises as Neleus banged and scuffed his feet against the table. The waterfall bearing down on him finally slowed to a trickle and he choked around the club between his jaws, spluttering water and trying to catch his breath.

"Again," the primipilus said.

It was done again, and again, and yet again after that. After the fourth time, it seemed that the centurion was finally satisfied and she let them put the amphora away. She removed the club and looked at Neleus, who was still spitting, making snorting noises and straining for air.

She smiled at him.

"Now here's the lesson," she began, speaking very gently. "Armour is made to protect you from getting hurt outside. So even if your hide is really thick enough to be armour, if I thump you just about... here."

She delivered a vicious blow to his abdomen, eliciting a sudden gag as the water he had swallowed rushed up from his stomach and erupted violently from his mouth. The others stepped back in mild surprise, finding the retreat vain as the gush of water drenched their already sodden footwear.

Meanwhile, the primipilus continued her lecture.

"You would do that," she concluded, looking especially amused. "And it doesn't really hurt on the outside, does it?"

She gave him another hard thump on the belly. It was rewarded with another retch as his body convulsed.

"No, you've got armour for your hide, after all," she said. "Your hide is hard as brass."

She chuckled down at him.

"But your insides are soft, Neleus," she whispered. "Soft and weak. Isn't that interesting?"

He groaned, too dazed by the havoc in his gut to deliver a biting retort. She beamed down at him like some munificent demon, bent on providing more pain.

"Now I'm moving on to the next lesson," she said, stepping a little away and taking one of his tied hands. She produced a small dagger from her effects and positioned its whetted tip under one yellowed, dirty fingernail. His fingers twitched, and she forced them down with one hand.

"Our next subject," she announced to the room, "is how to chip away at chinks in someone's armour."

---

"How many slaughtered hogs?"

"Two per century, I think," came the Himean commander's voice. "A barrel each of wine. Decent wine, so they can water it if they like. The rest-cheeses, sausages, bread, olive oil-can all be reckoned easily in lump."

"That's true. It's just like the usual count."

"What do you think, Takumi-han?"

"I think your estimates are fine, Fujino-san," the young man answered, setting aside his quill. "I can handle the rest well enough."

"I would hate for you to overexert yourself on my account, though," she replied, watching him as he sprinkled sand onto the wet ink on his parchment. "And for something so trifling as my birthday celebration, no more. Be sure to tell me if you need help with any of it."

"That's appreciated, but I doubt it. Procuring stuff and arranging things like this is my speciality, after all."

Shizuru smiled at the confidently-given statement.

"Far be it from me to contradict you there," she said. "I think that should be all. Do you think I have left anything out?"

Takumi picked up his quill, tapping it lightly on the table before shaking his head.

"I really can't think of anything else," he allowed with a grin. "So don't worry, Fujino-san. The soldiers will be well-feasted on your birthday. I'll make sure I get everything to the letter."

She rose from her seat and he did the same, the two of them moving away from the table.

"Be sure of something else, Takumi-han," she said to him.

"What would that be, Fujino-san?"

She smiled as she breezed past him and through the door he was holding open.

"To honour me with your presence at my party," she replied, with a farewell tilt of her head. "Thank you again and good day."

He chuckled and waved before shutting the door behind her. She was left walking in the corridor with her bodyguard, who had followed her exit. The only other creature present was the leashed panther padding quietly on one side of the younger woman.

"Well, that takes care of the preparations," Shizuru said, still striding purposefully but with no true destination in mind. She noticed that her feet seemed to be taking her to the familiar route to the gardens outside, however, and she made no effort to change their direction. A bit of fresh air was welcome after an hour spent smelling the musty odour of papyrus and old parchment that seemed ever-present at scribes' and accountants' rooms.

"Perhaps I am cutting it rather close though, finishing this only three days ahead," she mused aloud. "Takumi-han would not complain, but I cannot help but feel that I am giving him little time for procurement. What do you think, Natsuki?"

Natsuki's only reply was a shrug.

"It should be fine," the older woman allowed, before changing the subject. "Anyway, I cannot help but think of another sort of party they must have had recently back home. They have probably finished putting Bona Dea to sleep in Hime."

She frowned thoughtfully: "The letters did not mention anything about it, but they were written a good while before, after all."

Indeed, the said letters were so long overdue that they had borne replies to mail sent out nearly two months ago. The latest post from Hime had finally arrived, come not over the sea but overland by travelling the length of the great Himean highways of northern Fuuka then trekking through the unpaved roads of coastal Caledonia before finally reaching Argus. It was not a difficult journey in terms of danger, but it was a long one. All Shizuru learned from her share of the post was that Kaneda Izumi's bill was likely to find passage soon and that Chikane had spoken to the Princeps regarding their venture-when, at the time she read this, the passage of Izumi's bill was over a week old and Chikane had already moved on to speaking with other senators for support. But she had no way of knowing that, and all she knew for now was that her knowledge was dated. Hence she could not have confirmation either that the celebration for Bona Dea's winter sleep had already been held.

"Bona Dea is the Good Goddess," she was explaining to her Otomeian companion. "She is primarily a deity for women, cared for and attended not only by Hime's Vestal Virgins but also by all women in the city. She is one of the most important divinities for us. You have not taken her up in your studies of Himean culture?"

Natsuki shook her head, looking shamed by her ignorance in the subject. The older woman gave her a chuck under the chin for reassurance.

"It is all right. She is rarely mentioned aloud because her rituals are largely secret," she assured the young woman, who was tugging at her panther's leash to discourage it from pursuing its distraction by an indoor cat. "So secret is she, in fact, that the men of Hime have no idea what happens at her rituals. Only women dare to approach her temple precinct, from which all men are forbidden. Hence, only about half of Hime can ever claim to know Bona Dea."

The younger woman looked fascinated by this information, her thin black eyebrows slanting together lightly as she considered the mystery of such a deity. Shizuru waited quietly, knowing the girl would put questions to her soon enough.

"But why only women?" Natsuki finally asked, just as they passed through an archway and came under deep blue sky. "And why only women come to-come, um, come near her temple?"

She looked at Shizuru as she talked.

"Men are scared?" she asked. "Of her?"

"Well, now." The tawny-haired woman lifted her hands to adjust her pulled-back mane; she tightened the cord holding it together. "One might say both men and women are scared of her, given that she is an awesome god. But the answer to your question is that only women come near her because she loves women. And snakes. Her precinct abounds with snakes."

"Snakes?" The girl looked surprised. "Serpents?"

"Yes, serpents," Shizuru affirmed. "Hence my parents always considered it a happy occasion for me to be born in December, since it is the same month when Bona Dea, whose favoured animal is the snake, goes to rest."

Natsuki frowned, saying only one word in reply.

"Confused."

The general laughed at the childishly-given expression of bafflement, leading the two of them to a stone bench. They went there, brushing snow off it before taking their seats.

"Let Shizuki loose for a while so she can play in the snow and then I shall tell you why," she promised, cooing to the animal with them before unleashing it herself. She ruffled its furry head and gave it a push. It rumbled with pleasure, then dashed after some dry leaves blown by the wind.

"Now tell me, do you remember my personal seal?" she asked afterwards, turning to her companion. "I believe King Kruger should have one too, though I do not know what you call it in your language. It is a block usually of metal, gemstone, or wood, often used to affix something like a signature onto parchment or wax."

Natsuki nodded, saying a word Shizuru took to be the word for 'seal' in the younger woman's language.

"The one for your letters?" the girl asked.

"Yes, the one I use to stamp the hot wax."

"Yes . Ah, yes. It has your initials."

"What else is on it?"

"An image." Natsuki replied, her lips giving an unconscious pout as she attempted to recall said image. "A lion."

A smile lit her face abruptly when she added: "And a snake ."

Shizuru smiled back, acknowledging the other's little victory.

"There you have it," she told her, changing position on the bench so that she was half-turned to the younger woman. "The snake comes from one side, the seal of the Fujino. The lion is from my other family-the other parental side. Usually, only one seal is taken by a successor. But they put them together for my personal seal, because both sides are of equal prestige and distinction enough to bear the weight of each other."

"So when I was born in December, the month of Bona Dea's rites of rest," she continued. "It was considered a lucky omen for me, because of the association with snakes." She smiled suddenly, one hand coming up to stroke the golden fringe brushing her forehead. "As for the other side of the family, the omen was said to be my hair."

It took Natsuki only a second.

"Lion's hair. The colour."

"Yes," Shizuru affirmed with a giggle. "I suppose it is because they do not really have hair this shade on that side of the family. Most of them are dark brunettes and even tend to auburn. Well, I have a cousin who is another stark exception, but she is most definitely not lion-coloured!"

"Oh." Natsuki squinted a green eye. "Ohh."

A grin broke out on the older woman's face.

"Imagining how I would look if I were a dark brunette?"

There was a sheepish chuckle as the Otomeian ducked and hid her face away.

Shizuru laughed, waving off the girl's awkwardness.

"It's all right, I suppose it would make little difference to my appearance anyway," she said. "But that is what I meant earlier, when I said it was thought a good omen for me to be born in December."

Natsuki nodded shortly, her eyes flicking back and forth from the panther playing in front of them and to Shizuru's hair. The older woman was about to tease her about it when she suddenly announced something, looking very embarrassed as she said it.

"I like your hair."

She tried to look indifferent after this, but failed miserably at it. There was something endearing about that, and Shizuru would have kissed the girl if the latter had not called to the cub near them, pretending to divert herself with it. So Shizuru gave her some time to cool her cheeks before saying, almost as casually: "You do?"

She got a nod.

"I like darker hair myself."

This time, she got a shake of the head.

"Yours is good," Natsuki said slowly, her eye still on the panther. "It is, um..."

Here came a word foreign to Shizuru's ears. The Himean lifted her eyebrows.

"What does that mean?" she asked her bodyguard, who was still frowning as she seemed to search for an equivalent for her words in the Himean tongue. She finally looked Shizuru's way after another moment, apparently having found a way to translate it.

"Like gold, when you melt it," she described, brow wrinkling above wide eyes in a way that reminded the other of the artless charm of a pup. "Like gold with bronze. Many shades, all together. Pretty. Warm."

Shizuru tried to pull back the too-wide smile threatening to show on her lips, feeling an absurd sense of pleasure at those words. This young woman's manner of complimenting her made her feel almost guilty, spoiled with praise simple though the given praise might be. Natsuki was far from effusive when it came to compliments, but her guileless and sincere delivery made them sound all the richer, as far as Shizuru was concerned.

"I see," she said in reply. "Thank you very much, Natsuki."

Natsuki shrugged again, looking away.

"Then, you like it because it looks warm?"

"Mm-hm."

"Well, then." She surprised the younger woman by shifting closer, pulling the latter against her chest so that the girl was pressed against it. "It gets warmer the closer you come to it, did you know?"

That earned her a laugh. The girl adjusted position for comfort and they ended with their feet up on the bench, Natsuki sitting between her legs and leaning against her front.

"So," the Himean began, resting her chin on the other's shoulder. "Would you like me to tell you more about Bona Dea's rituals?"

Natsuki nodded, turning her head and nuzzling the older woman shortly with her nose. Shizuru went on after receiving the gesture of affection.

"Bona Dea has a six-month winter sleep, from which she is woken on May Day," she said. "The women of Hime see to this and hold a private celebration in honour of her awakening. In December, however, the celebration they hold is for the other end of the cycle. Her death."

Natsuki's head moved.

"She dies?" she asked. "This god?"

"In a manner of speaking," was Shizuru's answer. "It may also be called being laid to rest for the winter. December is when Bona Dea goes back to sleep, laid to rest by the highest-born Himean women. The event is held at night, in a house chosen by the Vestals in advance and honoured by that choice. On that night, no man may enter that house."

Natsuki hummed, an indication for her to go on.

"There are female musicians playing pipes, flutes, and lyres," she continued. "And the choicest food is set out on tables where women may eat from it as they pass. Countless silver vessels called honey-pots are placed around the house, constantly filled with wine. But on that night, wine is not called wine. It is called milk."

"Milk?" Natsuki echoed. "As milk from a goat? From a cow?"

"Yes, only it is actually wine that is called that-but only on that special night, and only by women."

"Why?"

Shizuru took a moment to think on how to explain it, burrowing her nose into soft dark hair.

"Because that is part of Bona Dea's deception," she told her. "Even the statue outside her shrine in her precinct is not an effigy of her but a false one, erected there to deceive the forces said to be generated by men. Her rites of rest give the appearance of being an occasion where women congregate for a mild dinner party, when the reality-and secret, from men-is that the women flagellate themselves into a high ecstasy with whips the latter part of that evening."

"In Bona Dea's world, nothing is ever what it truly seems. Or never completely what it seems. She is for women, and like them, is always shrouded in mystery," she said, thinking of how the description fit the woman in her arms remarkably well. "Little is said of Bona Dea in public, and that which is, is mostly a ruse."

Natsuki exhaled quietly, one of her hands going to rest on Shizuru's leg.

"A mystery," she murmured. "The men, they do-do, um-do not try to find out?"

"You mean, don't they get curious?"

"Mm-hm."

"No, as contrary to human nature as that sounds," Shizuru answered with a smirk. "I suppose they do feel twinges of curiosity on occasion, but I have yet to hear of any man purposefully acting on it. Bona Dea deserves their reverence as much as ours. Do you know what would happen if a man profaned her mysteries by something as simple as sneaking into the house and observing the ritual?"

"What?"

"Every pregnant woman would be blighted," came the ominous reply. "Each woman would have to take the medicine to make the baby exit their wombs. If a baby is born alive, it is abandoned outside the city limits and left to die. There are no exceptions and no woman tries to make one, even for her child. Because if Bona Dea is displeased, no baby shall be born whole. Each one, it is said, would be born monstrous and deformed. That is her curse."

She felt a small pause in Natsuki's breathing, an indication of amazement.

"The religious colleges would have to do their best to appease her," she went on. "Both men and women. The State Augurs-I am one of them-would watch the skies for weeks for any omens of misfortune. And the rites would have to be held again, of course, with added sacrifice. That is what no man wishes to risk, for the sake of a little curiosity. Hime is a religious nation, My Dear. We take the eccentricities of our deities very seriously, in exchange for them taking our wishes and prayers with equal seriousness."

She felt a squeeze on her thigh.

"Bona Dea is an awful goddess," the young woman breathed to her. "A great one."

"You see?"

"Yes."

She tugged at the edges of her cloak, pulling it forward so that it wrapped both of them in its embrace. Natsuki nestled closer, still rubbing her thigh.

"I would attend those rites were I there," Shizuru told her. "I still recall the sight of all those women, coming together in their finery. Everyone looked so wonderful."

"What do you wear?" Natsuki asked. "The women?"

"Dresses," she replied. "Everyone comes in dresses and gowns and glittering with jewellery. It is a special night, after all."

"Hmm."

"Which reminds me," Shizuru said, smiling broadly into the girl's hair. "You do know I expect you to wear a dress on my birthday, yes?"

The girl tried to turn her head, but was prevented by a playful bite on her ear. She let out a sound of surprise.

"No arguments, Natsuki," Shizuru murmured, her lips still on the other woman's ear. "And yes, I know that you need to protect me, but there is no reason you cannot do a good enough job of that while wearing a dress, since I am not entirely defenceless on my own merits. Unless you think me a perfect cripple?"

Natsuki made a sound of denial.

"Good!" Shizuru pronounced. "Between the two of us, that should compensate for any lack of mobility and possible downgrade of ability you may have if you are not wearing this uniform, so ease your mind. And trust in me: I can handle my own security fairly well, child. So can I look forward to seeing you in the loveliest dress possible?"

She felt the relaxation in Natsuki's posture that signalled concession.

"Good girl," she said as she angled her head, placing a kiss on one delicate cheek. "I doubt you brought a dress with you on this campaign-I know you military-minded Otomeians!-so I thought we could buy or have one prepared post-haste. Would you like me to help you find one later? I shall engage a dozen seamstresses to finish one for you quickly if you wish."

The younger woman turned her head.

"Um," she said hesitantly. "I will do it, Shizuru."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow before bringing it down slowly when it suddenly occurred to her that Natsuki might want to surprise her with her choice of attire. She did not dislike the idea.

"You are sure you can manage by yourself?" she asked.

"Yes."

"All right, then."

She brought her lips to Natsuki's ear again, only nuzzling it this time. Pretty little ears, she thought, liking the way they looked against the stream of blue-black that was the younger woman's hair. They were just so white and delicate, with a little pinkish tinge in the shell, that she could not help thinking of them as newly made. She murmured little endearments into one of them now, not words but short breaths meant to caress the pale skin. She felt Natsuki shiver, the younger woman's finger tracing circles on her thigh.

"Shizuru," she heard her say, a few moments later.

She looked at the top of the dark head on her shoulder.

"Yes?"

She received no answer, however, and decided not to bother the girl with it. Natsuki had a habit of doing that, after all: saying her name and no more. She felt, on such occasions, that the younger woman was merely saying her name for the sake of saying it and not to actually call her attention. Did Natsuki, perhaps, simply like the feel of the name on her tongue?

The girl did it at night too, or in the early morning. Sometimes, Shizuru would wake with the dark form still half-tangled with her, but far enough apart for her to be able to peek at the younger woman's face if she opened her eyes. She would pretend to still be asleep then, knowing the girl was already awake. The first time she acted so, it was out of curiosity to see what Natsuki would do while waiting. She had been pleasantly surprised by the girl's actions, which had been to stroke her back so gently she almost failed to feel it. She had continued her farce then, feeling those large green eyes on her and wondering what expression would be there if she opened her own eyes. But then she heard the girl whisper her name in that half-caressing, half-marvelling tone, and she knew she had no need to look.

The mornings after, she would do the same, simply basking in the secret attention given by the other woman. Sometimes, she could feel Natsuki's fingers ghosting just above her eyes, barely brushing the mark sustained in the Battle of Argentum when an enemy falx cut an eyebrow. Other times, the fingers simply laced into her hair or stroked it. What she liked best of all the silent caresses was the low whisper of her name, though, because there was something in the way Natsuki said her name that made her thankful for it. Natsuki said her name with something like wonder. And how many people could say it that way?

I know of no one else, come to think of it, she thought. Perhaps that is part of her gift, that she can say my name and make it seem like the only name in the world. It was clear that Natsuki was not a person used to speaking gentle things aloud, not someone used to exteriorising her feelings. And indeed, she rarely did so, even with the Himean. But when she said Shizuru's name like that, the older woman could not help but feel that there was little need for her to do anything else.

It worried her sometimes, though. Natsuki's taciturnity made it difficult to talk of certain things, particularly those Shizuru had on her mind these days. Several times now she had begun conversations meant to probe the girl's affections for her, only to retreat in the face of a fearful discomfort in those emerald eyes. In a way, however, those eyes were her only ally in that stoic countenance, for they spoke twice as much as the rest of the younger woman, and perhaps thrice as much as the Otomeian's mouth. During those situations, they would speak of a terror of being seen through even while holding a kind of desperation for understanding. It was as though there were things Natsuki wanted to say, but never could.

She supposed this was largely due to the way Natsuki had been raised. From what little she had learned of the Otomeian's childhood, it seemed that she had been brought up within the ranks of her nation's military, most of her caretakers being the officials most dedicated to the army and the like. What else was to be expected, then, but for her to hold expression in distrust and cultivate a careful detachment proper to soldiers in the army? What else but to shackle expression itself?

Yet she could not be sure that was all there was to the girl's enigma just yet. What of her bloody past, for instance, which would surely have played a part in forming her shell as well?

Natsuki stirred, jolting her from her meditations.

"Shizuru," she whispered again, making a movement to indicate that she wanted to get up. Shizuru held her fast, however, and looked questioningly at her.

"Yes?" she said, expecting a reply this time.

Natsuki fidgeted again: "Someone comes."

"Oh?"

She looked around-while still keeping her hold on the younger woman-and searched for an intruder. She found one approaching from a path on her left.

"Ah, it is Nao-han."

Finally disengaging herself gently from her bodyguard, she arranged herself so that both feet were resting on the ground. Natsuki stood up beside her, looking faintly uncomfortable.

"I never shall understand how you can hear them approaching no matter how far off they are," she told the girl. "Your hearing must be keen as a bat's. How Chie-han would love to have the same capacity."

The younger woman suddenly smirked, apparently familiar enough with the senior legate by now to understand the jest.

"But then again, it would probably come with a trade-off," Shizuru continued mirthfully. "The gods are Greek when granting gifts. She might find the price too high to pay."

"She would," Natsuki said, smiling now.

Shizuru grinned at the response.

"What is the price for having godlike hearing, Natsuki?" she asked.

"To keep godlike silence."

That broke up the older woman. She was still bent over laughing, Natsuki trying not to do the same, when Nao finally reached the two of them. The centurion's lips twitched as she regarded the pair, seemingly infected by their good humour. After Shizuru finally managed to greet her, she delivered her report.

"I'm glad you're in good spirits, General," the redhead announced. "Because I have good news."

Shizuru returned her smile.

"What is it?"

"We've got a name."

Omake:

This is irregular, yes, but here is something one thought to share. I recall the conversation I once had with a male friend-who watches anime-when I told him that I was about to write an explicit scene for this story (the first such scene, in ch.21). After a quick review of the plot, I went on to ask:

I . Have you any suggestions?

He . Maybe some exhibitionism? To add to the excitement?

I . Yes, that is a fair idea, I suppose.

He . There you are.

I . How does it go?

He . Hmm. They have a bathroom, right?

I . Yes.

He . And they share a bedroom.

I . Yes.

He . Then how about they go to the bathroom, get into some heated foreplay there, make out desperately in the hallway because they're both really aroused and can't wait, and finally burst into the bedroom to have sex in the bed.

I . That sounds nice.

He . Doesn't it?

I, frowning. Ah, no.

He . What's wrong?

I . I realised it just now. That cannot work.

He . Why not? It's sexy, it's exhibitionist. They'll love it.

I, smiling . The readers or Shizuru and Natsuki?

He, grins . It's safe to say all of them.

I . Cela va sans dire! Oh, but, wait. That was not what I meant to say. Pardon, but your idea cannot work.

He : Like I said, why not?

I : Because they start in the bath, move to the hallway, then finally to the bed. Was it not so?

He . Yes. Well?

I . Well, the bath is adjacent or connected to the bedroom by a passageway.

He, after pausing for a few seconds . Oh. So the bathroom is connected to the bedroom? Directly?

I . Mm . They do not need to pass through the hallway to get from the bath to the bedroom or vice-versa.

He . So to make it clear... if you go with my idea, that means they start to make out in the bathroom, then dash out and pass through the bedroom so that they can for no apparent reason leave the privacy they already have there and snog passionately in the hallway...

I .... Then run back into the bedroom to finish doing it.

Long pause.

I . That sounds rather like nonsensical fan-service for Exhibitionists Anonymous.

He . Yeah, you're right. I guess that wouldn't work.

"The virago returns, though not in triumph-and how it must rankle her!"

"And shall the rest of us too, now that she has returned for retribution," came the reply to these words. "I wonder how many senators took leave today as I have, in anticipation of her wrath."

The woman on the other couch giggled quietly.

"I really do think you should have attended today's session, Chikane," she said, lifting her head from the cushions upon which it reclined. Her legs moved under an ochre-hued dress that ended at her shins, the heel of one foot shown to be rubbing silkily against the other foot's ankle. "Armitage is sure to be bawling out the House at the moment for not having granted her petition for that triumph. More excellent entertainment than any Grecian tragedy!"

Chikane sighed and crossed her own legs. Unlike her companion, however, she was seated upright on her couch, both feet over one side. Now she peered at the other with a lofty tilt of her chin.

"'More tragedy' I can do without," was her retort. "I have been doing her job for the past two months, listening to the senators' daily harangues on nonsense and nothing. After all that entertainment, I dare to think myself deserving a day off from that madhouse she has so kindly forced me to oversee with her untimely vacation in Africa Province."

"You're taking an untimely vacation in abandonment of the others, yourself, right now. You should have gone." A thoughtful sound. "Think of it as divine justice. Instead of delivering their harangues to you, someone delivers a harangue to them."

"To me as well, were I there. I doubt myself exempt from being visited with that lecture."

"Well. If there is good one thing you can say of dear old Armitage, it's that she discriminates against no pair of ears."

The black-haired woman grinned, acknowledging the point with another tilt of her head. Her attention was diverted from the dialogue by the sound of a familiar step coming in the room. She turned her upper body to look for the new arrival. Sundrenched as the atrium was, it seemed to her that an even brighter star had arrived to light it... and the thought showed plainly on her face. The woman with her watched the display of fondness, privately entertained by the uncommon emotion on Chikane's generally schooled visage.

"Darling," Chikane was saying to the new arrival. One slender hand came up in welcome. "Have you finished painting? How is it?"

"I had to stop. I got tired, Chikane-chan," the newcomer answered, coming to take the proffered hand. She bent to give the black-haired woman a quick kiss on the lips, her golden tresses falling forward to kiss the raven ones near them. "But I'm halfway through. And I think it's going well."

She turned from Chikane to the other blonde in the room, who had risen from a supine position to greet her. They kissed each other on the cheeks before returning to their places: one on Chikane's couch, and one on the couch just across.

"Urumi-chan, I'm so happy to see you."

"I feel the same of you, of course. What are you painting this time, Himeko?" Urumi asked her cousin's wife. "It wouldn't happen to be Chikane, would it?"

Himeko coloured as Chikane laughed.

"How did you know that, Urumi-chan?" the urban praetor's wife wondered. "That's amazing."

"It was a calculated guess," Urumi responded. "Five of the seven times I asked this question since I've known you, your answer was

'Chikane'. Any gambler would say it was a safe speculation."

"Oh." The other blonde still looked quite embarrassed. "Oh, you're right."

"The subject, I guarantee you, is far from complaining," Chikane reassured her mate. "There are few things better than having myself captured by your hand, Himeko."

"In more ways than one," Urumi added naughtily. "Or so I imagine."

Himeko smiled shyly at them, failing to see her wife's dour look to the younger woman.

"What were you talking about before I came in?" she asked, before catching herself. "Oh, I mean, if it's important I can lea-"

"If it were that, there would only be more reason for you to stay," Chikane said kindly. "Still, it was nothing of import. We were merely discussing our senior consul's return to the city."

"Ohh. Senator Haruka Armitage?"

"What do you think of it, Hime-chan?" asked Urumi. "Our outgoing consul's homecoming?"

Himeko took some time before giving her answer.

"I think I'm relieved, somehow," she admitted with slight reluctance. The other two women gave her encouraging looks, seeing that she was afraid of expressing an opinion before them. Understandable. They were far more familiar with the political enterprise than she was, having been brought up within the ruling class and the machine itself. Who was she but a former commoner and plebeian both-or, at least, had been until her marriage to the urban praetor. All the same, her misgivings were actually for naught as both her present listeners little cared about her humble roots. They looked at her expectantly now, waiting for her to elucidate.

"It's good, I think. Because now we can really hold the elections, right, Chikane-chan?" she told them. "With Armitage-san here. They're only five days away, too."

She looked to her wife for a confirmation. After obtaining it, she turned back to Urumi with an unsure expression on her face.

"But it doesn't seem like she had a happy return, did she?" she asked, prompting the cousins to exchange looks. "What I mean is, people didn't really celebrate her coming back. It doesn't seem like they did. To me... I mean. I don't know, really."

Chikane smiled wistfully, letting her body fall gracefully to the right until she was lying on one side with a hand supporting her head, her torso just behind her sitting wife. The blonde's lower back and rear were snuggled into the crook of her hip and thigh, and that contact warmed her more than the braziers surrounding them.

"You are quite right," she told Himeko, her left hand coming up to hold the woman's waist. "They did not. Poor Haruka-san has had a somewhat lukewarm reception, I expect, ever since she arrived in Hime. As I told Urumi earlier, it is as well that I have chosen to sit out today's session, her first since her return, for I expect that she shall get back at everyone for not having wined and dined her as she doubtless deems fit."

Himeko looked down at her wife, confusion wrinkling her forehead.

"But Chikane-chan," she said. "I thought you said she was one of those people who don't like wine and feasts?"

"Who-oh. Stoics, you mean?"

"Yes, those."

Urumi interjected with a scoff.

"Oh, Haruka Armitage is not a true Stoic, Hime-chan, whether she knows it or not," she asserted. "It's true she doesn't take wine, but that might be because she cannot handle her liquor, for all we know. Besides that, she is not a real Stoic."

Chikane smiled: "Do you think so, Urumi?"

"Decidedly. Real Stoics dislike pomp and splash."

"Which she does."

"Which she does," the young woman agreed. "But only if they're coming from someone else. She's a great example for both things herself. Why, she makes the most bombastic splash whenever she jumps into any enterprise. Or conversation!"

"Bombastic splash?" Chikane repeated mirthfully.

Urumi grinned at her.

"Yes, I know it was a ridiculous image," she admitted. "I'll wager it would have great currency with the local parodists, though. Imagine Armitage leaping into the sea and dislodging Poseidon and his kingdom-now there's a formidable woman!"

"The worst of it is that I can imagine it happening," Chikane replied, tracing patterns idly on the back of her wife's robe. Himeko squirmed but did not move away. "Horrid picture."

"She's a veritable Leviathan, our senior and only consul," Urumi followed. "Scylla and Charybdis both, though she spits out more than she actually swallows."

"You are terrible," her older cousin said, eyes averting to cast a grimace towards the shallow pool at the centre of their atrium. "Now I shall have to spend the rest of the day with images of our consul draining the impluvium by simply jumping in and displacing all the water. Would it be too much to imagine she would cry 'Eureka' instead of 'Ecastor'?"

"And you call me terrible," Urumi smirked, imagining the senior consul making that verbal gaffe all too easily. "Poor Armitage, always subjected to such farcical jests. It's not even her fault that she makes a perfect caricature, really."

Chikane was tucking her hair behind an ear, and sneaked a smile at Urumi as she replied.

"Perhaps," was her allowance. "But we are all partly responsible for how people imagine us, so it is never proper to consider ourselves- or anyone, for that matter- purely victims of circumstance. Least of all those of us involved in the public enterprise."

"I know that. Still, it's primarily Armitage's bad luck that when she contrives to look impressive, which she does in any enterprise, she is perceived instead as ludicrous."

"You find her ludicrous, then."

"You don't?"

Chikane's only response was another smile. Urumi rolled her eyes humorously at her cousin's caution.

"It's only my opinion, anyway," she said to the couple. "And it doesn't change the fact that there are people whose opinion of her is more flattering, as one would put it. Kikukawa-san, for instance, has always thought the world of her. Now there's someone who surely attempted to wine and dine our consul when she returned."

"Kikukawa-san shall be holding a dinner party soon, to celebrate Armitage-san's return."

"A dinner party in honour of a militant Stoic. Dreary thought. What would she serve, olives, dry bread, and gristle?"

"Haruka-san served something of the sort last I attended one of her dinner parties."

"Heavily watered wine, too, I suppose?"

"Do you consider a cup of water to ten drops of vintage 'heavily-watered'?"

"Good god. That atrocious?"

A stifled cry from Chikane's wife interrupted them. The woman had one hand to her collarbone, her large lilac eyes shining.

"Parties," she murmured, in her soft voice. "I'm so sorry for interrupting. I just remembered, Chikane-chan: it's Shi-chan's birthday today!"

"Ah, that's true," Urumi said. "Someone mentioned to me it was coming up last week. I nearly forgot."

"It does not matter so much if you do," Chikane replied. "She is too far away for our greetings to reach her ears."

"Shouldn't we make an offering or something at a temple, though, for her sake?" Himeko asked. "It feels like we should do that, at least."

"I have already taken care of it."

"Oh, I see." A brilliant smile. "Thank you, Chikane-chan. I'm sorry I wasn't there to help."

"That is perfectly all right. The gods shall surely send your regards to her as well," was the gentle reply. "Your remembrance of it on your own, at the very least, should please her in my next missive. Our talk of parties does make me wonder what she has planned today, though. She shall have to feast her soldiers too, troublesome though it may be. 'Tis only expected of a commander, and Shizuru herself is the kind to desire everyone participating in the celebrations, from common slave to commanding officer."

There was a loud giggle from her cousin just then. Urumi flashed bright teeth giddily at her, both blue and brown eyes dancing.

"While we're on the topic of Shizuru-san and her officers..." the younger woman began, in a tone indicating whatever she had to say next was of great interest. "I just heard the juiciest rumour a few days ago. A prime piece of tattle, Cousin, that will have those immaculate eyebrows of yours climbing to Olympus itself, in defiance of Bellerophon's fate when he was dashed down by the gods."

Himeko laughed at the elaborate preamble.

"A rumour about Shizuru?" asked Chikane.

"Oh, yes!"

"Do illuminate us."

"Word among the recipients of letters from the North is that our ever-unattainable, yet ever-eligible bachelorette is now involved with a young woman of foreign citizenship and descent, whom she met while spearheading her present campaign in the Northern territories."

The haughty eyebrows did climb-though not all the way to Olympus, as high as they could on the smooth brow.

"Shizuru?" was the incredulous answer.

"Certain foreign young woman described in the letters," she intoned, "as being, quote, a delicious morsel of flesh, a tender piece of womanhood, a dark goddess incarnate."

Chikane flicked a glance at her now thoroughly blushing wife.

"Cousin," she half-heartedly warned Urumi.

Still the pale blonde continued, her small and attractive face crossed by a mysterious smile.

"Certain 'goddess incarnate' also said, by the writers of this news, to be an officer from the Otomeian support army," she concluded.

Now Chikane sat up, her long body folding from its stretch on the couch.

"Ecaster!" she uttered, looking disbelievingly at her relative. "Now what madness have you heard, Cousin? Perchance you are making it all up to bestir me?"

The blue-brown gaze met hers equably, twinkling as the younger woman replied.

"Whatever for?" she demanded. "I wouldn't even think of such a thing. Shizuru Fujino taking one of her subalterns as her lover, and a foreign subaltern, at that? It's rather too imaginative, even for me!"

Himeko suppressed a giggle as the two patricians arched eyebrows haughtily at each other.

"Anyway, it's what I heard," Urumi sighed. "And read, from letters shown to me."

"By?"

"By some of the people I meet at the crossroads colleges," was her reply. "Wives or whatnot of the soldiers from Shizuru-san's army. It's supposedly all the talk among the rankers over in the northern barracks."

"Do you think it worth crediting?"

"At first, not really," Urumi confessed, playing with a flaxen lock. She twirled it around one finger as she mused aloud on the topic. "The people have always had a fascination for anything to do with characters like Shizuru-san, which often leads them to speculating a gold mine from a mere nugget when it comes to her life. I thought they might've exaggerated it from something like Shizuru-san teasing some young woman over there-and we all know that your dearest friend is so friendly that many others often end up imputing more-than-friendly intent behind her actions. Those who don't know her that well might see more into it than we do, finding it more interesting to do so than otherwise. You know how the common people are."

Chikane nodded. As for Chikane's wife, she simply listened with a faint smile. After all, she had still been part of "the common people" only months ago.

"But then I talked to some others, like Miyabi Wara-she's affianced to one of Shizuru-san's legates, you know." Urumi pursed her lips and squinted at the fresco opposite her. "They're saying the same thing among the higher ranks. Word has it that Shizuru-san is most probably involved, in the full meaning of the term, with that foreigner. Nothing confirmed, of course. But these are old letters, so something may well have happened to confirm it by now. With so many writing the same thing, I can't help but wonder if this much smoke indicates an actual fire."

She looked at her cousin, who was frowning at her feet. After a few more seconds of silence, the older woman finally spoke.

"Fool that I am!" she said to them, touching slender fingers to her brow. "I remember it now. I have my own addition to what you have already gathered, Urumi. There was something of the sort from Suou's last letters as well. I chose to disregard it, however, because I thought it made in jest. Suou tends to be more facetious when she is speaking of people she knows well, and Shizuru would be that, if anything."

The other two gave their full attention to her.

"What did she say?" Urumi pressed.

"Nothing confirmed or definite either," Chikane replied, lazy blue eyes narrowing in recollection. "It was more in the nature of an inference from observation. If I recall correctly, she said something to the effect that she thought Shizuru was growing extremely fond of her Otomeian attendant and bodyguard."

Himeko and Urumi stared at her. She returned their surprised looks.

"Her attendant and bodyguard?" Urumi echoed, finally. "The one the Otomeian king 'lent' to her?"

"So Suou mentioned in another missive, yes."

"Why didn't I know about that titbit? The plot thickens!"

"Chikane-chan," the urban praetor's wife called. "Is that true? Suou-chan really said that?"

"Yes," Chikane confirmed. "But she has never written outright that Shizuru and that woman have an actual relationship of the kind we are imagining, either."

"But given how many people are mentioning it," Urumi reminded, "you know where the probability leans."

"Yes," Chikane nodded. "Shizuru's lack of a history in this regard actually strengthens the case for this one now, because you never even hear of thing such as this about her. There is a possibility of it being true."

The other patrician flopped onto her stomach, resting her face on crossed arms.

"Oh, isn't it fascinating?" she sniggered, looking like a very pleased imp. "I wish I were over there with Suou now, so I could see it for myself. I wonder what she looks like, that foreigner."

"I thought you said," Himeko told her, "the letters said she was beautiful?"

"She would have to be, to hook as big a fish as Shizuru-san. Ah, what wriggling little worm has played the bait to that catch? I would give so much to know."

The urban praetor made a face.

"How is it that you make even a beautiful woman sound repugnant, Urumi?" she teased. "Metaphors of worms are hardly likely to quicken anyone's pulse. It is just as well you are neither a painter nor a poet, else your talents make gruesome work of the goddess of pulchritude herself."

"Ahh, you know what I mean." She sighed and fixed her cousin with a brown eye. "Tell me you're as amazed as I am, Chikane, because I'm stunned. Shizuru-san always seemed immune to Aphrodite's charms, though I admit I don't know her like you do and am going from a few passing meetings and a ton of love-less gossip. I was even entertaining thoughts of her being a sworn celibate."

"I do not claim to know Shizuru perfectly, but I am quite certain she has taken no Vestal vows of chastity," she said. "All the same, we are yet uncertain of the actual nature of this alleged relation between her and that other woman."

"But you did say earlier that it was possible. Probable, even. Supposing she has, in fact, taken a lover?"

"Supposing that, I am as amazed as you are. Barring the allegation that the woman is a subordinate officer, all of it is rather too normal a thing for 'the general going on campaign', you see."

"And she hardly ever does live up to 'normal expectations', this particular general." Urumi flashed a cheery smile, turning afterwards to her cousin's wife. "And you, Hime-chan? This strikes you with a slap as it does us, I hope? What do you think of it?"

Himeko seemed surprised by the question, her expressive eyes going wide.

"If it's true," she told the two. "If it's true, I'm very happy for Shi-chan."

Chikane and Urumi smiled at her receptively as she went on.

"I mean, it's great news, isn't it?" she asked them. "I think it would be good for her. She's always so lonely."

Her wife suddenly looked very curious.

" Lonely ?"

---

Evening of that day in Argus, Shizuru's birthday was celebrated-as Chikane had guessed, by all and sundry. While some of the more select personages of the province were invited to a dinner party at the governor's palatial residence, the soldiers and lower-ranked members of the army were treated to their own share of the festivities at the barracks and inns, courtesy of the celebrant's purse. There was wine and food enough for everyone, most of it provided through the efforts of the praefectus fabrum . Merry faces were everywhere that night, no stomach grumbling from emptiness and no gullet dry for lack of wine. Even the locals joined in, knowing that festive occasions were good opportunities for trotting out their businesses. Prostitutes paraded the streets and inns, decked out in their scarlet dresses and togas. Artists, dancers and musicians were out as well, hoping to get at least one free drink for their troubles.

Argus was astir, and would keep stirring well into the early morning.

In the main reception hall of the governor's residence, things were much the same as they were on the streets, though a little less raucous. Instead of rough wooden benches and tables, there were sumptuous couches for the guests to recline upon and long tables laden with food. These extended to the veranda and even as far as the garden, where a faint but noticeable slackening in the Northern Winds had allowed benches to be set out for the guests who wished to do their mingling in the evening air.

Minstrels and other performers displayed their routines by torchlight, both inside and outside. Of prostitutes there were none, however, although a few guests did bring professional-and rather expensive-courtesans as their escorts to the evening. It was these people whom the celebrant's favourite primipilus and senior legate discussed as they waited for their friend to return, the woman having excused herself halfway through the revelry in order to visit the soldiers at their barracks and convey to them her gratitude for celebrating with her.

"Are you sure that one's a courtesan, Chie?" Nao was saying, tucking heartily into a platter of roast duck on the table beside her. "Because she sure doesn't look like one. If you'd have asked me earlier, I would've thought she was his wife. Too pretty for him, sure, but still classy enough to be his wife."

Chie smiled at her, peering tranquilly at the couple on the veranda.

"That's why they're called courtesans and not prostitutes," she said. "They're expected to act like all of this is natural. The clients expect it, and it's what they're trained to do. Notice how she looks like she really is a member of the upper classes?"

"She's so snooty she looks like she was born into it."

"Some of them actually are. They've simply fallen into misfortune and so enter this line of work."

She flicked a sooty lock of hair from her forehead, glad she had just had her mane cut this morning. It had grown quite long and troublesome in the past months.

"It's perfect for them, since they already know the way things work in these echelons," she continued. "I'd wager that woman is probably one of those who are relatively high-born but has had a fall in station. Oh, probably not senatorial or higher knightly families' members! Just people from the middle class families, near the top end. And, since the higher-classed the courtesan the higher the wage, she must be expensive."

Nao reached out to take two goblets from a slave. She handed one to her friend. "I do hear they cost a pretty penny. How much for that, say?"

"Thank you. And for that one, accompaniment and service would probably cost around six to seven thousand denarii."

"That's a silver talent!"

"Whoever said elegance comes cheap?"

Nao frowned and took a deep swallow of wine, as if needing something to wash away the bitter taste of such a high price.

"I'll take my regular 'accompaniment' from the streets, thank you," she snorted. "Who are they kidding with seven thousand denarii? Bugger them."

Chie looked sideways at her: "You'd love to, if you only had the money."

"If I had the money, I wouldn't waste it there. Women like that are probably snooty in bed too, anyway. They'd squeal at a little rough usage."

The other woman grinned suddenly.

"Actually, I beg to differ," she said. "Some of them wouldn't squeal at all, from what I've heard."

The redhead met her jovial eyes, tilting her head in order to make up for the difference in height. Chie looked away pointedly, suggesting to her a particular direction.

"Look over there," the legate said, eyes fixed on a group of people watching some dancers. "Do you see the pair with their arms linked?"

Nao snorted: "Half the pairs in that group have their arms linked."

"Well, it's-oh, there! Suou-san is talking to one of them." She paused suddenly to consider her fellow legate, a small smile at her lips. "And Himemiya Minor is looking quite fine, by the way. That colour flatters her."

"Isn't it that she's such a looker that most colours do? Anyway, the couple you're talking about is the blonde with the exotic, Arab-looking one?"

"Precisely. The exotic one is a courtesan, so gossip has it, who is popular for getting paid to give her clients, er, pretty rough usage . "

Nao let out an abrupt giggle.

"So, you mean..."

"I mean that she's getting paid to be the domina," came the wicked reply. "It's practically established that the people she shows up with have a desire to be dominated in sexual activities. So goes it for that woman with her right now-who happens to a very rich, very influential member of the local trade council."

The other woman held back her laughter.

"This is why it's fun to be with you at these things, Harada," she said, lifting her cup in salute. "You know about that scandalous little underbelly the bigwigs all have, and you tell it better than any public announcer."

Chie smiled at the dark compliment and raised her glass in response. As both of them sipped in toast, she ran her eye furtively over her friend's attire. The senior centurion of the Ninth, she thought, cleaned up very well. The woman more often seen in military gear had a fine body that wore dresses nicely, a good example of such dresses being the shaded green that the centurion was currently wearing and which flattered her unusual, apple-coloured hair. Of jewellery Nao had chosen to wear little and of cosmetics she used even fewer . But she had a pretty face and a tempting smirk and those were sufficient adornments for someone of her style.

"I like what you're wearing, Nao," Chie told her. "It suits you, this shade of green."

"Well, you look good too," the other said. "You're a regular lady killer. See those ladies over there giving you the eye?"

Chie only sighed loudly, not bothering to look in the direction indicated.

"I'll save the killing for battle, thank you," she said. "I don't want to get into trouble."

"Jupiter, it's not like you're married!"

"Well, I have to start practising now, if I want to be anytime soon."

"I wish you luck with that. Oh, now-looks like she's finally back."

There was a hubbub at the end of the hall, people clustered at the entrance, which indicated the celebrant had returned. Nao craned her head to get a glimpse, and let out a whistle. She nudged the peering Chie with an elbow.

"That's sure a change from the formal toga she had on earlier."

Chie nodded, thinking much the same thing as Nao's admiring whistle had conveyed.

Shizuru-san, she thought, again looks like a law unto herself .

Their commander had opted to wear a flame-coloured dress tonight, its sleeves held together at the shoulders with thin bands of gold thread. The gown was unusual in that its shade skated hazardously close to the scarlet of a prostitute's toga, and yet also contrived to give the appearance of being perfectly respectable. Her make-up too was faultless-mere touches of stibium and carmine here and there, the former darkening seductively-hooded eyelids and the latter adding a touch of colour to fair cheeks. The honeyed hair was also loose tonight, cascading over her shoulders and devoid of jewelled pins or any such adornments. Chie remembered that even back in Hime her friend had always gone against the fashion of adding ornaments to her hair on special occasions. Well, it did not matter. Her hair was of sufficient lustre to be left alone. Besides, letting it fall freely as it was now displayed the lovely wave it seemed to have naturally at the ends. Yes, it suited her.

"And there's really no surprise here," she said to Nao. "She looks magnificent. As always."

"True. Never seen her look anything close to ugly, actually. Even when she's properly kitted out and dirtied up with the rest of us after a battle."

Chie shook her head.

"She'll never look close to ugly, Nao," she said. "I believe she'll come to find us after all those fawners are done, so we should just stay put."

The redhead was taking another goblet of wine from a passing slave, and asked her if she wanted another. Chie responded positively and yielded the empty chalice to the servant before he left.

"I'm just a bit surprised, is all," Nao said. "That she didn't make that pup her escort tonight. Thought she would. It's what everyone thought she'd do. Girl'd stick to her like a burr as usual, anyway, so she might as well."

Chie looked up from her drink and looked towards Shizuru's direction again.

"Why," she said, "isn't Natsuki-san with her?"

"There." Nao tipped her chin towards the familiar dark figure, standing a little behind Shizuru as the celebrant accepted greetings from those around her. "But she's in uniform."

The senior legate furrowed her brows. "That is unexpected."

"What d'you think that means?"

"I have no idea."

"Huh. Makes you wonder." Nao frowned in thought and looked away, only to see another familiar dark figure walking nearby. She called out. "Sakaki! Over here!"

Argus's commander of garrison made her way over to them.

"Good evening," she said quietly, giving the pair a timid smile. Nao grinned back and introduced her to Chie, whom she had yet to meet. They exchanged pleasantries, after which Nao drew attention to the other's dark blue gown.

"That's a nice dress you have on, Sakaki," she said, bringing a hint of pink to the woman's cheeks. "But it makes you look even taller. That's just wrong."

"You'd say that of anything she wears, Nao," said Chie, smiling up at the other woman with them. "She's always finding fault with taller people, Sakaki-san. The only one who gets off without a tease is Shizuru-san."

"You just got here, didn't you?" Nao asked. "I don't think I saw your head poking out of the crowd earlier."

Sakaki nodded her head-which would indeed have poked well out of the crowd.

"I took the first two shifts," she explained. "My rounds finished just now."

"Ah, yes, both of you set a more regimented shift for the guard on duty tonight, as I recall," Chie said to both senior primipilii. "I can imagine it must've been bothersome, finding soldiers willing to forgo the oblivion of drunkenness just to keep alert for any trouble."

"Ah, it's fine," Nao answered. "The more disciplined the pool, the easier we can assign duty, and our kids are disciplined. So are the local ones, which would've been surprising if Sakaki wasn't here."

"What do you mean?"

"Sugiura's not really known for military discipline," came the glib reply. "She handles other things better. Say, trade, politics and that stuff, like she does now."

Sakaki reacted to this with a smile that, though demure, was understanding. As for Chie, she simply looked at Nao with surprise.

"Wait," she said. "You speak as though you know her. I didn't know you knew Midori-san."

The redhead smirked: "I do, in a sense. Not the way you do, but still."

"How and from where?"

"Let's just say an old job-scandalous old story too," she told the pair, who were listening to her keenly now. "I can't forget it. I was on an intelligence-gathering mission at a party. Typical upper class people getting sloshed with wine, so of course, she was there. The woman gave me one look and latched onto me in a second, getting me drinks and getting too close like a damned lecher."

She let them giggle, letting out one of her own before continuing.

"And at the end of the night, when I'd finished getting all the information I wanted on the target, who was one of the other partygoers, she was still sticking to me. She looked so dead drunk I was afraid I'd have to carry her home. Couldn't very well leave her alone though, seeing as everyone had seen her leave with me. What if she didn't get home that night? So the least I could do was get her into a carriage."

"So I called a litter and was helping her into it when she just gave me this look," she continued. "Oh, it wasn't a wrecked look, though she was wrecked. Gave me the fucking fright when she said, really nicely, 'So who do you work for and why do they want to know so much about him?' Then, just like that, she gives me this sloppy kiss on the cheek and tells the carriage to start away. I was so surprised I even forgot to wipe the damn slobber off." Nao started laughing. "And just when I thought she had to be one of the coolest drunks I'd ever met, I hear this groaning sound down the street and see her head poking out of the carriage, leaving a trail of vomit down the main avenue."

Her two listeners were laughing too, shaking their heads. She mirrored the gesture.

"Ran into her a few times after that," she said. "So I know how she is. That-" She motioned to a cluster of merrymakers in the garden outside, an energetic Argus governor leading them. "-is no surprise to me."

"Midori-han does know how to enliven a gathering."

Three pairs of eyes snapped back to the hall at the sound of the distinctive accent, surprised to find the celebrant herself coming to stand beside Chie. They saluted her and Sakaki expressed her greetings as well. She returned all their salutations, and then suddenly turned to her bodyguard.

"All right, Natsuki, I trust you find this suitably safe company?" she told the young woman. "I shall stay with them for now, so you may go. I am eager to see what you have picked at long last."

The Otomeian-who seemed to have made an effort to add some more of those minute golden clasps and braids into her mane tonight at the very least, Chie noted-nodded in that timid, sparing way most of Shizuru's officers knew by now. She turned on one heel and walked off with a flick of star-spangled hair. Shizuru smiled contentedly at the retreating figure before turning back to her present companions, only to find all of them looking at her with varying degrees of curiosity.

"Oh, that?" she said. "It is so Natsuki can change out of her uniform as well. She wanted to be sure she could leave me with trustworthy people first, before going off to dress." A chuckle. "She is not normally so paranoid, I should like to think, but I believe the fact of this being a very large party worries her. She told me that such gatherings can often harbour assassins and similar dangers."

"Assassins," Chie echoed smilingly. "It's a very foreign concern to have at a party, don't you think so?"

"Girl has a point, though," said Nao, who had used to take on jobs as an assassin. "Lots of people make kills easy sometimes. Easier when most of them are drunk too."

"Still, you get my point."

Nao shrugged and nodded: "Yes. Foreign enough for your high-class parties, that."

"We have to remember that Natsuki is foreign," Shizuru reminded them.

"Yes, of course. So... Natsuki-san will be wearing a dress too after all, Shizuru-san?"

"I believe so, though I have yet to see what kind of dress it shall be," Shizuru replied to Chie. "I expect it shall be a most pleasant surprise. It is not every day you see the most attractive female soldiers in our force in a dress. Witness our two centurions here, Nao-han and Sakaki-han."

Sakaki pinked and mumbled something diffident, whereas Nao smirked and gave her thanks. Chie grinned at the near-polar reactions.

"And Chie-han, of course, looks dashing as ever," she said. "Rather unusual attire-I daresay most people shall say choosing grey as a colour for party attire is unorthodox-but very fitting."

Chie swept into an affected bow.

"I return the same words to you, Shizuru-san," she said. "Unusual attire, but very fitting."

"Why, thank you! Now then, shall we have some wine? Do tell me all about what has happened while I was away from the party."

---

"You think Shizuru is lonely?" Chikane asked her spouse.

Himeko coloured a little. Her hands fluttered in front of her as she strove to explain her words.

"Well, I thought so," she stuttered. "I don't mean she looked sad or-or friendless-or something like that, Chikane-chan. I know Shi-chan always has a lot of friends and people around her, I just, well, she just seemed so lonely to me. Or I thought she was. Maybe I'm wrong."

Chikane eyed her wife appraisingly. She was in reality surprised that her wife had noticed this, even while knowing the person in question for a far shorter time than she herself had-to say nothing of many others, who would never say what Himeko had just expressed. How many would even think, let alone dare, to call Shizuru Fujino lonely ?

She supposed it was because Shizuru never gave the impression of deserving that adjective, come to it. The woman always managed to impress upon those she met that she was completely satisfied with both her state and her solitude. That she was perfectly content with only her career to think about.

Still, to Chikane, who had known her all her life, she was hardly that. Chikane was familiar with the art of seeming content even when otherwise, being a past master in it as much as her crimson-eyed friend was now. She could tell when someone was merely pretending satisfaction... or unaware of the incompleteness within oneself.

"You may be correct," she finally said. "Surely no human being can be so deprived of that social relation philosophers have spoken of time and time again. It does you credit not only as a painter but a philosopher, Love, that you are able to make that observation. Then again, perhaps all painters are philosophers in their own way."

She was pleased to see her wife blush brightly at her compliment.

"I do agree," Urumi put in. "Now I am tempted to ask what she sees in you, Cousin, when she makes you the subject for her painting. There's an intriguing philosophy, I say."

"One might say the same thing of you."

Himeko spoke up.

"Oh, that reminds me, Urumi-chan," she said with enthusiasm. "I was going to ask if you would mind sitting for one of my paintings someday. If you don't mind, that is."

Chikane smirked at her astonished relative.

"Well, Urumi?" she said provocatively. "Afraid of being subjected to the same philosophical scrutiny?"

"On the contrary. Hime-chan is welcome to prise all the nasty demons she can from the mechanisms of my soul."

"I hope not, else the sheer multitude of them keeps her at the task forever."

"So that's why she's still painting you until now!"

"Ahh, Chikane-chan, Urumi-chan," the urban praetor's wife interjected meekly, looking slightly embarrassed once again as they turned to her. "I'm only a painter..."

At their amused smiles, she continued.

"I'm not an exorcist."

The two patricians were silent for a second before bursting into hilarity.

"Ah, my dear Himeko, how you find us out for what we are!" Chikane told her baffled-looking wife, dropping a lingering kiss on the woman's temple. "You speak things so plainly it shames us when you have it exact in a quarter of the words we use."

Urumi agreed with another peal of mirth: "Hime-chan, you are the most brilliant person in this room. My cousin is a lucky woman to have you, most definitely."

The subject of their praise merely looked from one aristocrat to the other, looking as bewildered as before. She smiled uncertainly, not knowing what she had done to deserve such speeches.

She was prevented from asking by a patter of feet on the floor, followed quickly by the appearance of their head steward. All three women looked at him, Chikane and Urumi still giving out final chuckles.

The steward bowed: "Domina, a messenger from Izumi-san is at the door. He claims urgency."

"Please show him in."

"At once, Domina."

He swept a courteous, though still-dignified bow.

"He's somewhat grand, for a steward, isn't he?" Urumi asked her cousin when he had left. "Despite his looks, I mean, for he seems weathered in age. There's an old-fashioned gravity to him that I quite like, though I can't explain why I get that impression."

"I understand," Chikane replied. "It is what convinced me to take him as my steward, in the first place. When dear old Anthenor died of a stroke, I had to search a good while before I finally found someone capable enough to take his place. This one does it rather well." She smiled meaningfully. "Why, even Otoha deems him acceptable, and that says a great deal of him."

"He looks as if he would lend the role dignity without sacrificing functionality, I agree. How do you find him, Hime-chan?"

"Oh, I like him," that woman replied. "He can look serious sometimes, but he's actually a nice man. He always puts freshly-cut flowers in my studio whenever I go there, even if I never ask for it."

"I was not aware he did that of his own volition," Chikane said, knowing her wife's penchant for fresh blossoms. "I shall commend him."

"Mm," Urumi said. "Good stewards are nearly impossible to find."

They ceased their discussion when they heard someone approaching from the corridor once again. After a few more footsteps, a man with whom Chikane was familiar appeared at the archway. She rose from her seat and excused herself.

"I wonder what it is now," Urumi told Himeko, as they watched the urban praetor go to meet the messenger. "I hope it isn't anything ghastly like Armitage having slaughtered the rest of Senate by bleeding out their ears with the force of her bawls."

Himeko giggled.

"You don't like her, do you, Urumi-chan?" she said.

The other woman's lashes fluttered with surprise.

"Did I make you think so, Himeko, dear?" she asked. "No, actually, I quite like her. She's definitely more entertaining than half of the people in the House put together, and that counts for something."

"You do like entertainment more than anything else, after all," the other blonde teased gently.

"Boredom is my greatest enemy," Urumi replied. "It leaves me dreadfully melancholic, you see, and that is something I would rather not be if I can help it. Alas! Not so many are willing to offer me entertainment that I can avoid being gloomy altogether."

"I wouldn't like you to be sad either," Himeko suddenly said, with such sincerity it made the other pause. "If I can be entertaining to you, Urumi-chan, just tell me how."

Urumi answered with a heartfelt smile.

"You can be your usual sweet self, Hime-chan," she said. "That would amuse me more than anything else."

Chikane's voice sounded at the archway, calling urgently for some slaves to fetch a quill and paper. They looked at her as she strode towards them, both caught off guard by the solemnity of her expression.

"She did not tell me anything about this," they heard her mutter as she approached. "It may only be the delay, but something seems off about it. I do not trust this."

"What's the matter?" Urumi asked, sitting up in interest. Chikane turned a contemplative frown to the younger woman, showing that whatever it was had her so troubled she could barely articulate it just yet.

Himeko peered timidly at her wife.

"Are you all right, Chikane-chan?" she asked. "Is something wrong?"

Chikane looked at her spouse, a curious look on her face.

"My dear Himeko," she said. "That is precisely what I would like to know!"

---

"I wonder if something's wrong over there," Nao was saying to the other women. Her eyes were turned to a part of the room where people seemed to have crowded, and where all heads seemed to be twisting to turn the same way. "What's the hubbub? I can't see with all those people."

Chie shrugged, making no effort to rise from her own position. Like the rest of the company, she was reclined on a soft, comfortably-padded couch. She had no intention of letting someone else claim it in her stead.

"We'll find out soon enough, Nao," she said. "Anyway, returning to our topic, I'd say I prefer his later plays. They have more economy of language."

"Indeed," said Shizuru, who had not stirred from her seat either. "I suppose tha-that-oh."

The rest peered at her in astonishment, wondering what had caused the odd-and extremely rare-stutter. The red eyes did not meet theirs, however. They turned in unison to follow her line of sight, just as she let out a sound evocative of surprise.

And awe.

"Dear me," Shizuru breathed.

Chie said almost the same thing: "Dear god . "

There was a moment's silence among the members of the cluster after these two expressions. After the moment passed, a flurry of questions and remarks were hurled at Shizuru.

"Oh, Fujino-san, isn't that your attendant?"

"Would you look at that?"

"What a clever dress that is! Is it of the Otomeian style, General Fujino?"

"Jupiter, the girl's a sight!"

She is indeed that, Shizuru was telling herself, rising from her seat without conscious volition. The girl had finally made her way through the people peering at her, her searchlight gaze immediately alighting on Shizuru's crimson figure. Shizuru appraised the young woman as the latter came, her mouth drying out faster than a desert in summer.

The girl had gone with something evocative of the Otomeian fashion, she thought. She recognised the predominance of white, for instance, in the cloth draped with artful carelessness on the Otomeian: a many-layered affair of white material so fine it was faintly translucent. She could actually see hints of flesh where the layers thinned out, particularly from mid-thigh down to the hem-at which point the sheer cloth appeared almost tattered, trailing in filmy shreds that curled around the girl's legs. They looked like smoke. Or perhaps they were smoke, lit by a fiery pair of crimson eyes.

Shizuru ate up the girl as much as one could by look alone, trying to come up with reasons not to just pick her up even as she approached and bear her off to the nearest dark corner, party and attendees be damned. How long would it take, she wondered, before those interesting, sleeve-like lashes of cloth hanging from the girl's dress at the shoulders tore off in their passion, a festoon of white ripped from either the join at the shoulders or the one at the wrists? How long before that fragile, about-to-fall-apart dress did what it promised and revealed a body that still took her breath away every night?

Natsuki's voice intruded on her heavy-lidded stupor.

"Shizuru," the girl whispered once she was close enough, and that was all.

"Ah, Natsuki," Shizuru started, swiftly finding composure. She was aware that all those in and near the group of couches were watching them with great interest, having seen her abnormal lapse in self-possession. Time to recover it! "Welcome back. I am glad to see you."

The girl's head bowed.

"If I recall, you hardly ate earlier," Shizuru went on. She turned to the people surrounding them. "Do excuse us a moment as I direct Natsuki to the tables. Shame on me, after all, if I let the officer who saved my life in Argentum perish of hunger at my celebration, which is only possible due to the heroism she displayed that day."

As expected, that broke loose the chains on their mouths. Another round of queries was directed towards her-and even some to Natsuki, who looked faintly taken aback by such direct attention.

"She saved your life, Fujino-san?"

"How did it happen? May we know, Natsuki-san? It is 'Natsuki-san', yes?"

Shizuru smiled and looked to Chie, conveying the subtlest call for support. Ever the good officer, Chie agreed with a nod.

"Chie-han was there," Shizuru told the gathering crowd, which was impatient for a story. "She is a much better narrator than I, and shall doubtless render it more lifelike than I possibly could. If she agrees, perhaps you may hear the tale from her?"

"I'd be happy to," Chie said with a show of teeth. "And maybe afterwards, the Primipilus Nao Yuuki here can tell you more about our exploits with Shizuru-san, as she's served under her in some of the most unbelievable battles ever."

Nao smirked and added her own bit to it: "Maybe I can tell them about the time Shizuru-san and I snuck into an enemy camp one night and made off with an officer's head."

Shizuru sent both of her officers another smile, gratitude spoken silently by her eyes.

"Well then, I leave you to the story-telling," she said in farewell. "Methinks there are a few people I have yet to speak with, anyway, and needs must or I will be thought an ill host indeed."

Thus excusing herself and her companion, she left the crowd to Chie and Nao's tale-telling devices, gratified to see that more people were being drawn to the group she had just left. She hoped this would mean fewer persons would interrupt her and Natsuki, whom she swiftly led to a shadowed and hence more or less unfrequented table at a corner of the hall. The girl followed her willingly, saying nothing about her recent lapse.

Once they were alone at the table and no people were within hearing range, Shizuru leaned towards her bodyguard and snuck a quick kiss on one ear.

"Cruel child," she said in a deep, husky tone. "Was this your intention? Did you want to surprise me with your appearance now, in front of all these people, when I cannot have you as I would like? Surely you saw my start earlier-I daresay everyone else did. You are turning out to be quite the tease, Natsuki."

The other woman flushed.

"No," she replied. "No."

"Really?"

"No. I mean, um, yes."

"But you did want to please me with your attire, I hope?"

She elicited a quick, jerky nod.

"You have succeeded-though only in part," she followed. Upon seeing the other's puzzlement, she went on. "Your appearance pleases me very much, Natsuki. But I expect it and you to please me much more, later, when you take me to that place where you say you left your present. You did say you prepared it just for the two of us."

Not giving the younger woman time to articulate her protests beyond a choke, she turned towards the food before them and picked out an oyster in its half-shell.

"Try this," she said, delivering it to the other woman's mouth. Natsuki stared at her bewilderedly before parting her lips and accepting the morsel with a sip. Shizuru cast the shell onto a platter supplied for it afterwards. "How is it?"

She took another for herself, watching her companion chewing carefully around the meat of the shellfish. They swallowed at the same time.

"Good," Natsuki pronounced, licking her lips. "Shellfish?"

"Oyster."

"Oy-ster. Ahh."

Shizuru nodded and handed a goblet to her.

"Drink," she instructed.

They continued to eat this way, with the older woman selecting pieces of food for both her and her lover. Every now and then someone would approach them, making conversation with Shizuru and complimenting her attire-and without words, that of her bodyguard-or conveying their greetings for the occasion. Each one Shizuru spoke to with customary grace, thanking them for coming. There were some to whom she would rather not have spoken politely, however, and it was an hour or so later, after having just spoken to one such guest, that she disclosed her discomfort and the reason for it to Natsuki.

"I am beginning to think I should not have made you wear a dress, after all," she said, with the barest trace of moodiness deepening her trademark lilt. "If I had a denarius for every lout who has stared at you with lover's eyes since you arrived, I would be rich as Croesus by now."

Natsuki looked at her.

"Are you not 'rich as Croesus'?" the girl asked.

The older woman sighed heavily at the unexpected question.

"Yes," she said in defeat. "Yes, I am. Even so, you take my point."

She washed her hands in a bronze basin, drying them afterwards on the towel offered by a servant who had rushed over as soon as he saw her dip into the rinsing water. Once finished, she began to walk towards the far end of the room, where the open doors showed the rest of the partygoers in the terrace and spilling into the gardens, which were blazing with torches and where some dancers were performing gymnastic heroics on their impromptu stage. Natsuki walked close to her, their fingers brushing at their sides.

"You know I dislike it when they stare at you that way," Shizuru murmured to the younger woman, pretending to nod and smile at the people they passed. "They look at you like dogs in heat."

"You too."

She swivelled her head to the right, finding only the girl's profile.

Sometimes, she thought, Natsuki really does touch the point with a needle.

"Yes, I admit I do that too," she said wryly to the girl. "But that is differ-

"No, not you, Shizuru," Natsuki interrupted. She sounded impatient. "Not you doing it. Them to you."

The fair brows went up; Shizuru looked genuinely confused for a moment.

"What do you mean, them to me?" she asked, before apprehending the girl's meaning belatedly. She quirked her lips. "Oh, you mean some have been looking at me in the same way?"

"Some?" Natsuki mumbled. "No. Many."

The older woman stopped to exchange salutations with a few more guests before turning back to her companion.

"Is that so?" she prodded, wondering that she had not noticed. But why should she? She was so used to receiving such attentions that they no longer registered properly for her, and she had learned to bat them away on instinct. Yet she had managed to notice every little unspoken accolade given her bodyguard tonight, had she not?

"Yes," Natsuki was saying, while lifting a hand to flick black hair over her shoulder. Shizuru watched the feminine gesture, a little amused by its haughty execution. "They do."

"I see. Tell me, Natsuki, how do you feel about that? Do you dislike it, when they look at me that way?"

"Dislike? I, um..."

"Yes, dislike. Or does it not trouble you at all when others undress me with their eyes?"

"They-I-I do not-"

"Or do you not mind?"

Shizuru knew she was being wicked, fishing so obviously for a declaration from the girl. Why not? It was her day, after all, and she would love to hear a confession of possessiveness from her young lover. She herself had expressed it so many times to the Otomeian that it only made it more noticeable that the latter had not done the same to her.

"Oh, Shizuru-san, there you are! We've been looking for you."

Sighing inwardly at the interruption, Shizuru gave Natsuki another questioning look before turning around to face the person who had intruded upon her petty interrogation.

"Takumi-han," she said, affecting a pleasant smile. "Akira-han as well. You are enjoying yourselves, I hope."

"We wanted to wish you a happy birthday, Shizuru-san," Takumi said, after returning the greeting. "We weren't able to do that earlier. I hope you'll like our present when you see it later, by the way. We already put it in your servants' care, like the others."

Shizuru conveyed her gratitude in a grin: "I am sure I shall appreciate it as much as I appreciate your work for tonight, Takumi-han. And yours as well, Akira-han, for I do not doubt you assisted him in a significant way. Everything has turned out perfectly."

"I'm happy to hear that." The young man swivelled on his heel to look behind him. "And everyone seems to be enjoying the festivities. Things are pretty lively, don't you think?"

Both Himean females suppressed smirks at his innocently-voiced observation. Things were indeed becoming 'pretty lively', considering that a good many of the guests were already flush with wine. Among these people was the governor herself, made conspicuous by her efforts to rouse the musicians to louder playing and attempts to get more people on their feet to dance with her. Said woman spun around in wild circles with another, patently inebriated guest before suddenly looking their way. Her eyes lit up forebodingly even from a distance.

"Oh, damn it!" Shizuru heard Akira say. The handsome young woman frowned at her mate, all apprehension. "She's seen us, Takumi."

"Expecting trouble?" Shizuru asked.

Takumi answered her with a helpless smile.

"Sugiura-san's been after Akira and me all night, asking the two of us to dance," he explained, drawing a surprised laugh from his commander. "Can you imagine?"

"She would think of something that mad." Shizuru peered beyond them to see that the governor was indeed approaching, though rather drunkenly. It would be a while before she reached them. "In that case, allow me to begin paying you back for your help, Takumi-han."

The two other Himeans looked up at her: "You mean...?"

"Flee," she said simply. "I shall prevent her from following you."

The pair saluted her and quickly made their escape, Shizuru watching them with a small smile.

"Um, Shizuru."

"Yes, Natsuki?"

"What if she makes us dance?"

The fear in the younger woman's voice made her turn her head, and she had to suppress a laugh at the sight of her lover's face. Natsuki looked truly horrified. Well, what aristocrat would not be? Dancing at a party, of all things!

"You do not want to dance?" she teased. "But it might be rather amusing-"

"No," Natsuki said, her voice beseeching. "No, Shizuru. Please?"

"Oh, all right."

A thought occurred to her suddenly and she decided to run with it.

"Listen to me, Natsuki," she said. "I have an idea. If we stay here any longer, the chances are that we shall be made to join in the revelry one way or another. And given how drunk people are getting, dancing shall be the least of our worries soon. If you wish, we can leave now and go to the place where you said you wanted to bring me."

Natsuki nodded.

"If it is fine with you, we can go a little earlier than planned, and leave everyone else here. They shall be too drunk soon, anyway, to notice my disappearance. Would you like that? Yes or no?"

Natsuki nodded again, though more swiftly.

"Yes," she said.

"Your horse is already saddled outside, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Fetch it and meet me at the end of that path." She pointed to a lane flanked by tall, snow-covered shrubs trimmed to create a tidy wall. It was in shadow, just beyond the area touched by torchlight. "Quickly, Child, or we shall miss the opportunity!"

Natsuki nodded a final time, her green eyes lingering for an instant on the older woman. Then she slipped away, passing swiftly through both people and shadows. When Shizuru could no longer see the trailing white shreds of the girl's clothing, she returned her gaze to the direction from which the governor had been approaching, only to take a swift step back at the onslaught of alcohol-scented air slapping her face.

"Midori-han," she said, trying not to wince.

Her greeting was returned in a medley of slurred vowels and consonants.

"There y'are, Shizuru." Midori smiled happily, if a touch hazily. "Excellent party. Excellent, I say! Excellent dress, and excellent escort. Wait. Where's your girl?"

"She had to arrange something," Shizuru replied, taking the elder woman's arm and leading her to the outskirts, away from the light. "Now, Midori-han, I fear I must ask something of you. Tell me, could you possibly help us? Natsuki and I need a favour. I would be most grateful if you lent us your aid tonight, as you are perhaps the only one who can assist us here."

The older woman's ears seemed to prick up at this, her unfocused eyes sharpening. She lifted an arm to slap Shizuru heavily on the back. The latter was caught off guard at the abrupt gesture and felt her muscles flexing instinctively under her dress at the blow. She relaxed quickly, however, and returned the other's sloppy grin with a composed one.

"What d'you want? No, don't say it, let me guess," Midori sniggered. "Want to get out of here, do you?"

"You have found me out, of course," Shizuru said with a practised sigh. "The difficulty is that it would be eminently difficult to do so, given that this is supposed to be, well, my party."

"To Dis with the party!" Midori shrugged off her arm and turned to face her. "Go if you want t'go, My Girl! You deserve it already, for giving us this bash. Have a bash of your own, eh?"

She laughed at her own words, doubling over for a moment. Shizuru waited patiently.

"So!" the governor finally said when she was done with her laughter. "You want me to take care of it while you go cavort with your girl? Don't blame you. Delectable. And that dress! Love to cavort with 'er too, you weren't in the way. I would, you weren't."

Shizuru chuckled at the threat: "Thank you for stepping aside for my sake, then."

"We young 'uns must stick together," was the reply. "Right. Go, go already. I'll keep them happy and drunk. Go elope with your woman."

Shizuru stayed only long enough to note that it was not an elopement, although she doubted the other woman really cared about that little nicety of term given her state: Shizuru had not even finished speaking to her than the governor had already tottered off to stir up the partygoers with a nicely lascivious song that was popular in the taverns, and which everyone else took up in a warbling, hiccupping chorus.

Turning away from the scene with a shake of her head, Shizuru strode towards the garden path where Natsuki was supposed to meet her, her own chorus thrumming in her veins. She waited beside an oak tree, her arms at her sides and soon realised what she had overlooked when she felt a shiver course through her.

My cloak.

She chuckled scornfully at herself, unable to believe she had been so remiss as to forget that necessity of wintertime. The galloping sound of hooves sounded and she looked up eagerly, trying to see through the shadows. She squinted at the darkness that was one end of the path. So intently did she peer into them that she nearly gave a start when what she had been waiting for appeared, the familiar black stallion exploding from the gloom as though born of it. Astride it was Natsuki, both her legs naked from the upper thigh, the shred-like strips of her filmy dress trailing behind her. She wore a black cloak, and its length covered her horse's rump.

"Shizuru!" the girl whispered loudly upon reaching her. The stallion pawed anxiously at the snow-tracked ground, its haunches rippling with muscle. "We will go?"

"Yes."

The older woman went to the beast's side. She pulled up her dress. Before the girl could reach out to help her, though, Shizuru had already swung herself atop the animal's back, to Natsuki's bemusement. The older woman smirked at her companion.

"I do ride often too, you know," she said.

Natsuki smiled. Suddenly reaching into a pack tied to the saddle, she produced a large bolt of cloth that Shizuru recognised in an instant.

"My cloak," she said in amazement. "You have my cloak?"

Natsuki nodded and handed it to her, motioning that she should put it on. She did so, securing it with the clasp.

"Thank you, Natsuki." A short pause, where she settled herself more securely behind the younger woman. She held onto her with both arms. "Let us go."

There was the brief slide of the girl's thighs against hers as Natsuki dug her heels into the animal's ribs, spurring it into a thundering gallop. Shizuru felt her cloak fly out behind her as they rode away. She felt her face sting with the cold prickle of wind rushing at it, but found that enjoyable. What she told Natsuki was true: she did ride often and happened to like it very much.

Efficiently clearing the maze of the gardens, they reached the gates of the residence, where several surprised-and drinking-sentries saluted them. After passing them at a canter so that they could mark their identities, the girl urged her steed again into a mad dash that seemed to take them all the way to the ends of the city. For a while, Shizuru simply held on quietly and accustomed her body to the easy, shifting motions of the galloping horse, rocking instinctively with the rhythm. When she saw that they were passing the gates of the city itself, however, she found herself wondering where Natsuki was taking her, almost tempted to stop the girl and ask. Eventually, she did ask.

"Where are we going?" she called over the wind. Natsuki called back.

"The lake!"

Oh, yes, she thought. There is a small lake in the province, now that I think about it . Well, it did not fall within her considerations as a commander, so she had never actually been there. How had Natsuki learned of it, however? She shut her eyes as she considered the matter. The lake was a strange destination. Surely the girl was of sufficient sensibility not to hazard swimming there in this season? But what else would one do at a lake?

Fishing, perhaps, her mind supplied humorously. But I rather doubt she plans to do that.

It seemed as though it had only been minutes after thinking this that the horse slowed to a trot. She opened her eyes, finding a blue-black sky and leafy branches overhead. They were on the path towards the lake, their steed's hoof-beats the only sounds around them. Doing a series of calculations, she estimated that they had been riding for nearly an hour by now, judging from the ground covered.

"We are nearby, are we not?"

This time, the girl turned her head.

"Yes," she said, smiling.

"Wonderful."

She wrapped her hands more securely around the younger female's middle, fully appreciating the thinness of the girl's dress. She could actually feel each fine ripple in her fellow rider's abdomen as it moved. The taut muscles seemed to respond to her fingers, contracting slightly after every press or stroke. She occupied herself with this playful study of the other woman's musculature for a while, halting only when Natsuki reined in her stallion and announced that they had arrived.

They slipped off the horse, one after the other. Shizuru stood gazing at their surroundings for a few moments. They stood on a relatively unforested clearing, replete with small shrubs and plants, as well as a few odd trees. All of these had a fine dusting of snow, the white powder glowing blue in the darkness. About a hundred metres away was the lake itself, its water black in the shade, and its surface chased with silver flecks. Beyond it and them were the woods, thick and chilled to an austere beauty.

As she admired the dusky atmosphere, Natsuki led her stamping horse away, into a small shed at the end of the clearing that appeared to be for stabling purposes. Shizuru's brows quirked with interest at the structure, wondering why it should be here. What truly caught her attention, however, was the edifice next to it.

"Natsuki!"

The girl had disappeared into the shed with her stallion, and now reappeared in the lit doorway. Her dress showed nearly transparent on her from the light, and Shizuru felt a rush of heat warm her cheeks at the provocative vision.

"Where are we? Does anyone live here?"

She motioned to the modest house by the stable in particular. Natsuki shook her head, and Shizuru went to her.

"Does anyone own these?" she asked, once she was near enough to speak at normal volume. She stood at the doorway of the shed, taking in the old, salt-encrusted wood that was the mark of all aged Argus buildings. Weathered as the outside was, the inside seemed well-kept.

Studying the neat interior of the stable, she watched Natsuki covering her horse with a heavy blanket as it rested on some hay.

"I suppose you prepared the hay as well?"

Natsuki nodded before finally rising and facing her. Some bits of straw clung to the shredded bottom of her gown, and Shizuru found herself wanting to pick them out carefully.

"A man lived in the house," the Otomeian was saying. "Long ago. He went somewhere and left it to his family here. I asked."

Shizuru smiled, leaning against the doorframe.

"I see," she replied.

"The man who has it now hires it out," Natsuki continued. "I hired it. For this."

She suddenly flushed after saying this and covered it up by returning her attention to the reclining horse. Shizuru said nothing, content with simply watching her.

A while later, she finally spoke.

"Thank you, Natsuki," she said softly, reaching out with one hand. The other woman came nearer, willingly letting herself be enveloped in the warm embrace. She burrowed gently into Shizuru's neck. "I am very glad I can be with you tonight. Was this my birthday present?"

The dark head jerked backwards, the younger woman looking up to meet her eyes.

"No," Natsuki denied. "This is not. No."

The red eyes widened a fraction before returning to their usual gentle gaze. Shizuru placed her hands on the other's waist, holding her at arm's length.

"Well, then, where is my present?" she asked with a laugh. "My, does that ever make me seem demanding!"

Natsuki laughed as well. Removing the hands on her waist, she took one of them and laced their fingers, leading the older woman away. Taking care to close the door of the shed first, she went on to bring Shizuru to the house, pausing to extract a large, rusty-looking key from a pouch in her cloak. She fit it into the door's heavy lock, making a small sound of pleasure once she managed to work it open. She opened it and walked in, disappearing into the darkness.

"Wait," she told Shizuru, who had remained at entryway. "Light."

There was the sound of flint rubbing, and Shizuru saw the dim outline of her bodyguard in the gloom with each spark flying out. A few seconds later, a lamp was lit and the interior of the house was finally visible. Shizuru stepped inside.

It was, she saw, quite an old house. The floor was made of wood, much scuffed with old footsteps, but obviously swept clean. She could see a few dark spots at the corners, which she guessed were from the same damp that had discoloured the walls. At the very centre of the room was a recessed area in the floor that she guessed to be for cooking as well as a fire, since there were ashen lumps of what seemed to be used-up charcoal in it. Around this hearth were very thick woollen rugs and several pricey-looking furs she took to be provided by Natsuki, since they looked too new to be part of the original furnishings. There were even two large cushions, which seemed to invite her to settle in. For all its apparent age, the small house had no mustiness. She could scent fresh air coming in from the windows on each wall.

She looked up again to see the younger woman smiling softly at her, the lamp she was holding giving her an unearthly radiance. Beautiful as Natsuki was to her, a shiver of fear shot down her spine at the image the girl now presented; she was reminded suddenly of the portraits and sculptures of Death she had seen at home, which was a beautiful, dark-haired woman in a flowing white dress, a candle in her hand.

"Natsuki," she said urgently, in such a sharp tone that it baffled the younger woman. "Give me that lamp. I shall light a fire."

She crossed the distance between them in five powerful strides, taking the lamp before the other could begin to yield it.

"Do you have kindling?" she asked briskly. "Coal?"

Natsuki nodded, turning away and heading for the stone counter behind her. Shizuru walked over to the sand-floored hearth, trying to still the rapid beating of her heart. She brushed her hair out of her eyes, and was surprised to feel her fingers trail slight moisture on her brow. Her hand had the glisten of cold sweat.

It means nothing, she said to herself, suddenly more haunted than ever before by the lessons on signs and portents that she had been given in training to become an augur. It has to mean nothing. How many times had she seen persons disturbed by such malign-seeming visions, and gone into a panic of prayer and offering only to find that what they had been fearing had not even been possible, given their particular circumstances? How many times had she seen such ill omens reported by the other augurs with lugubrious or foreboding tones, only to be proven mere exercises of a morbid imagination? Yes, what she had seen just now was nothing, it meant nothing .

That was hard to believe when she was beginning to suspect that the subject of it was starting to mean everything to her.

She started when something heavy fell on her shoulders, atop her cloak. Her eyes found two green ones looking uncertainly her way.

"Umm."

The Otomeian had apparently removed her own cloak: this was what Shizuru felt draped around her.

"Sorry," Natsuki whispered, looking contrite. "Are-are you cold? I can make it now, Shizuru. The fire."

The older woman looked from the cloak around her shoulders to the lamp in her hand, and finally to the hearth, which was indeed prepared. She essayed a smile as she answered.

"No, do not apologise when there is no need for it," she said gently. "Come, let us go to the hearth. We should both be much warmer once I have lit the fire."

They made their way over to the fireside, Natsuki kneeling on the shaggy rugs while the older woman stepped into the recessed box and began the flame. After a minute or so of careful nursing, there was finally a fine glow to the embers, and Shizuru could take her place beside the girl.

She took off the two cloaks around her and set them aside. Natsuki gave her a questioning look.

"We shall not need them for the moment," she told the younger woman, placing a hand on her shoulder and easing her gently down. When Natsuki was finally lying on the rug, she followed and stretched her length on top. Two arms made their way around her neck, rousing her with their light burden.

She turned her head and met plump lips, parting them slowly with her tongue. The body underneath hers shifted, moved, and she anchored it with her hands as though imploring it not to leave. Even then she felt as though it could slip through her fingers, and she realised some of the fear from her vision was still inside her. That was all the more troubling as she was not a naturally superstitious person.

Let it go, she told herself irritably. It was nothing.

"Natsuki, my beautiful Natsuki."

She tilted the girl's face away to expose the pale neck, which was already rippling from Natsuki's swallows. Shizuru dipped in, sucking on the smooth ridges of muscle and tendon and dipping her tongue in exploration of the crevices beside them. She held the other woman tighter with each kiss, pressing her further down with the weight of her own form.

"It was fortunate for you that we left early," she breathed. "Had we stayed with the others any longer, I might have ravished you on the spot."

She bit into the girl's neck when she heard the faint protests, stuttered sounds cut short by gasps. Suddenly hands were pulling her head up and dragging her mouth back to the one waiting for her. Natsuki whispered her name before kissing her eagerly, their tongues tangling once again. There was a pause as both took deep breaths, followed by a very weak bite on the older woman's lip. Shizuru smiled: one would think her made of glass to see the way the girl treated her.

Then came the sound of a shuffle followed by a thump.

"Wha-Natsuki?"

She had not expected it; all too suddenly, Shizuru found their positions reversed. It was her back on the rug, her lover pressing her against it. The other's mouth was hovering in front of hers, and Shizuru could see the flash of teeth as it parted, releasing a hot stream of air that licked at her chin.

She decided to wait and see what the Otomeian would do.

"Mnnn," came the purring rumble from the girl's mouth. She was finding the constant caress of air from it quite arousing, and would have given up her plan to be patient when it suddenly ducked. Natsuki nosed under her jaw, making little sniffing sounds as she touched the tip of her nose to the fair flesh repeatedly. The older woman tilted her face upwards compliantly.

Ah, yes, she thought, enjoying the curious form of attention. I applied a touch of fragrance today, and no doubt she is taking it in. I wonder if she likes it.

She shivered when she felt Natsuki's nose trace fire from her jaw to her collarbone. Another hot breath slipped against her skin.

I daresay she does.

A gasp left her when she felt the nose replaced by a wet tongue.

"I do not," she heard the younger woman whisper, in between drawn-out licks on her neck. She strained to focus her attention on the words, and not on the velvety touch of the tongue on her skin. "I do not like... it."

Shizuru brought her hands up, yanking on the dark tresses so that Natsuki's face was hovering before her again. The younger woman's eyes were still lidded; her parted lips glimmered wetly in the dark. Shizuru could see her teeth, heard them click as Natsuki brought them together in a short, strange bite on the air. It struck her, not for the first time, that the girl looked even stormier than usual when she was excited.

"Natsuki," she said. "What do you not like?"

There was a sudden flicker in the green eyes, an unexpected shyness. She held the dark head firmly to prevent it from quailing.

"Tell me," she pressed, slipping one of her legs between the younger woman's. She slid it upwards gently against the white dress, which glided upwards to accommodate her. Her leg bent at the knee and rose until it was just below the apex of the Otomeian's thighs: they trembled at the contact. "What is it that you do not like? Tell me now."

The slender black brows drew together. Another low rumble left the girl's throat as she struggled to voice a reply.

"People," she finally managed to say, very softly. "Looking at you."

The fair-haired woman stared at her in amazement as she continued in an ashamed, sulky voice.

"I do not like them looking," she mumbled. "Like-like that."

Her eyes, so large they seemed infinite, stared at the object of her jealousy.

"At you," she added. "Shizuru."

Her grip tightened on Shizuru's upper arms after that, eyes darting away. Hence she did not see the emotion that crossed the Himean's face after her pronunciation. But she heard Shizuru's request and complied, her lips descending over the older woman's.

They kissed. The immensity of previously held-back emotions was swept into the gesture. Shizuru dropped her hands from the black hair after a few seconds, bringing them down and grasping at the girl's dress to pull it further up. Soon the gossamer cloth was gathered at Natsuki's waist and her bare legs shivering from the cold. She gave another shiver momentarily, however, this time from Shizuru's bent leg pressing further up between hers. She parted their mouths with a moan.

"I am very glad," the older woman murmured, pressing her thigh harder between the welcoming legs. "I would hate to think I am ever the only one who is jealous. It always seemed to be so."

She felt the younger woman move, hands trying frantically to pull up her dress. She let them do that, even raising her hips from the floor to help.

"I am happy to know what I thought I saw was wrong."

Their fingers were inside each other. Shizuru's breath whistled as she clenched her teeth, watching the woman atop her curling up tightly and grinding into the hand she had placed on her lifted thigh. She groaned loudly when she felt the hand touching the apex of her own legs moving faster, clenching upon her with such strength it came close to being painful. Perhaps it was painful-she could no longer tell where one feeling left off and another began. Pain was the same as pleasure, which was the same as hunger, which was the same as satiation. All nuances of sensation cascaded together in a foamy pleasure that nearly drowned her, the sea-salt scent of Argus in her nostrils, the same sea-salt taste on Natsuki's skin.

"Shizu-"

She heard the attempted vocalisation of her name, followed by several broken words she could not understand. Her hand slid from the knobby protrusions of the other woman's spine and up the fair neck, ending finally at soft black hair. She took a fistful of it in her grip and used it to bring Natsuki's lips to hers, whispering an endearment before doing so.

I wish we could always be like this, she thought, hardly coherent from bliss. To be together this profoundly, without the complexity of everything else. Whenever they were alone in this way, she found herself in a dream where neither she nor Natsuki existed-where they became lost in each other so completely that it seemed they were only one being. Even now she could feel the hot flesh sheathing her fingers tightening when she tightened, the mouth near hers gasping when she gasped. Even the muscled body she could feel shivering atop her no longer seemed smaller or more slender, feeling suddenly like a perfect mirror and extension of her own. Was it so wrong of her to want that feeling forever? Was it too much to ask?

Her eyes closed shut as they convulsed at the same time, seizing onto each other's flesh. She felt her hips leaving the rug and thrusting upwards, releasing herself into Natsuki's palm. She could even feel the fine, wet mouth of the younger woman as it brushed her cheek, its owner too far into ecstasy to discipline utterances into actual words. But words were superfluous, words did not matter at the moment, and both women tangled on that rug knew it. So no words were spoken.

It was much, much later, when the only sound was that of the wind rustling from outside, that words passed again between them.

Shizuru was the one who spoke.

"Natsuki, thank you again for this," she said, while stroking the black tresses that had splayed all over her chest. The girl's head moved and nuzzled softly against her bosom. "This is a very happy celebration indeed."

She felt the responding nod to that and fell silent once again. Her fingers were content playing with the other's sleek hair, dipping into it repeatedly as through a river. She even felt a tug on her own locks, which she took to be the girl mimicking her actions before realising that it was a call for attention.

"Your present," Natsuki whispered, "is not here yet."

She lifted her head too peer at the one on her breast.

"Oh," she said with surprise. "Do you mean to say that was not the present?"

"Mm-hm."

"Is that so?" She paused thoughtfully, lowering her head. "I see."

A moment later, she asked: "Then where is it?"

She had to laugh when Natsuki murmured, in parody of her words earlier: "Demanding." She knocked her knuckles gently on the back of the dark head, smiling broadly.

"Ah, tell me already, Rascal," she implored. "I am awfully curious, you know, since you went to all this trouble for it. What could it be?"

There was a short pause, broken by Natsuki slowly bringing herself up into a sitting position beside the older woman. Shizuru noted that her companion was focused on something outside, or so it seemed given how she was staring out of a window. She sighed and decided to be patient, already missing the heat of the other's embrace.

"It is soon, I think." The vague words made her wonder. "I hope, today."

She sat up, a little concerned now. Natsuki looked anxious.

"What is it?" she asked the younger woman. "What do you mean, Natsuki?"

The emerald eyes turned towards her, and she tilted her head expectantly.

"Shizuru?" said the girl.

"Yes?"

"We may sit there? At the door?" she said, sounding like a child asking for a treat. "Now?"

Shizuru took some time to consider the odd request, eventually nodding in acquiescence. Both of them stood and picked up their cloaks, with Shizuru bringing along blankets and furs for added comfort. It was Natsuki who added another rug to the pile, spreading it on the floor of the now-open doorway and covering it with the soft and thick pelts. She settled afterwards into it with the taller woman behind her. The two snuggled under the protection of the heavy blanket and each other's embrace.

"Is this all right?" Shizuru asked while wrapping her arms about the girl. "You want to sit here?"

"Mm."

"What is next?"

"Next we wait."

Shizuru released a sigh at the succinct answer and ducked her head, resting her cheek against the other woman's hair. She wondered what in the world all of this was about, what with all the preparation and waiting Natsuki deemed necessary to put into it. Oh, not that she was complaining! She was quite happy to do what her companion asked, finding contentment in the simple act of sitting in wait for some unknown thing intended for her pleasure. Thus she sat silent and facing the immense night with this strange woman in her arms.

Still I do not understand so many things about you, she spoke silently into the black hair, knowing that the other simply took the movement of her lips to be caresses. What secrets are you hiding that you must be so unfathomable? You are both the shell and the pearl, confounding me as you do now.

Her mind travelled at that thought to the secret she herself had been keeping for some days: a gift she intended to give Natsuki. When the governor of Argus had suggested that she take the girl shopping for a very belated birthday present, she had taken the suggestion and ended up buying an eclectic collection of presents for her lover, who had been so overwhelmed by the carelessness of the older woman's expenditure that she hardly even managed to articulate her reluctance beyond a stutter. She accepted the gifts with charming embarrassment, though, and thanked Shizuru that evening-several times over. Even so, Shizuru had felt a niggling dissatisfaction haunting her after that. It was almost as though her own gratitude at being given such a girl as her lover was could barely exhaust itself and could not be expressed properly with the presents she had already given. In years to come, this would stay the same: her love for giving Natsuki presents would never go away, and the same gratitude, that near-disbelief she felt upon looking at the girl and marvelling at the fact that such a priceless creature had chosen to be hers, would never actually fade.

Deciding that she would remain discontented until she found a present truly worthy of the younger woman, she had then searched for one. Though not at the markets this time. This time she went to the specialists and private vendors, who eventually directed her to someone they claimed to hold the most expensive and superb finds in jewels and gems: he was also a supplier for some of the more expensive gem merchants in Hime. Shizuru went to the jeweller, who presented her with something that he said would meet her demand for "the best you have, the sort that even kings would cry to own". It was a necklace of fine golden chain, the links handsomely worked indeed. But the chain itself was a paltry thing compared to what dangled from it: a huge and perfectly round, purplish-black pearl.

She had known immediately upon seeing it that it was what she wanted. The pearl was so large that it struck awe even in her, a woman whose jewel chest at home was a jeweller's dream. It was roughly the size of a fat strawberry, but round, and it was black in the way only pearls could be: with a hint of purple luminescence even in the darkness of its skin. She found that fitting. And so she bought it without any qualms and paid well for its worth-nearly two hundred silver talents, in fact. Well over a million denarii. A fortune .

But it was worth it, was what she thought contentedly to herself. And the woman to whom she was giving it was worth far, far more. How she wished she had brought it along! Then she could see the younger woman's face, see whether she liked the present or not. She hoped fervently that Natsuki would, hoped to see that flushing brightness the girl always rewarded her with after a present.

"Shizuru."

She broke off her thoughts at hearing the younger woman mumble

"Ah, yes, Natsuki?"

Natsuki shook her head, mumbling incoherently to herself. The older woman looked down at the bundle of cloth sheltering them, wondering if the girl was feeling the chill. Certainly the air was prickly with cold now, and she tightened her arms.

"Natsuki, meum mel, are you cold?" she asked, shifting a little. "Perhaps we should be going home, or nearer the fire, at least."

"No. Wait, please."

She felt the girl stir and loosened the embrace to allow Natsuki to look at her.

"Wait? Soon." the young woman pleaded. "A little more. Soon."

She nodded acquiescently.

Satisfied, Natsuki turned back to the view of the lake. It seemed as though they had been waiting for only a few minutes when Shizuru heard the younger woman whisper to her that 'it had arrived'. The Himean looked around, searching for whatever apparition her lover was referring to.

"What has arrived, Natsuki?" she asked, finally. "I confess I see nothing."

There was a low chuckle.

"The sun," came the whisper.

Shizuru looked up to see a greying sky melting into amber towards the east, past a hilly horizon. So occupied had she been with searching for something on the ground that she had failed to realise that the sun was indeed rising, allowing her vision to reach farther than a mere hour before.

Her day of birth was over and a new day had begun.

"So it is the sun."

After a moment, she said: "It is beautiful, Natsuki. Is this what you wanted me to see?"

"No. Wait."

She wondered what she was really supposed to be seeing when she heard the girl mumble softly to herself yet again, this time muttering foreign words that sounded remarkably like a prayer. She was about to ask what Natsuki was praying for when the younger woman perked up, clutching her hand excitedly underneath the blanket.

"Shizuru," she whispered enthusiastically. "Shizuru, look there. The lake."

The older woman did as she asked, unsure of what to expect. All she could see was the shimmering surface of the lake, still dark and silvery within the shadow. The light of the sun had yet to touch it, though she could see the glow coming closer like a flood of gold. It was a beautiful sight, and she said so.

"It truly is beautiful, Natsu-"

"The lake. The lake."

"The lake? What do you-oh."

Now she understood what the younger woman had wanted to show her. The lake's surface, upon being touched by the encroaching flood of sunlight, had frosted over in an explosion of white ice. The light continued to stretch, chasing the rushing spread of crystallization as it shot out in all directions of the water. Shizuru held her breath as she saw something she had never imagined to be possible, the silvery fingers of ice splintering over the lake surface at a speed faster than any mortal steed, followed by the sluggish radiance of the sun rising.

"Jupiter," she whispered, her voice failing beyond that. She could only watch silently and in awe, knowing the sight would forever be burned into her memory.

Or crystallised there, clear as the purest ice.

Meanwhile, the person who had let her see this flicked her own eyes back and forth, torn between watching the phenomenon itself and the reaction it had caused on Shizuru's face. She finally settled for the latter, noting with pleasure the slight moisture in the older woman's crimson eyes. She waited patiently for Shizuru to speak, knowing the event was almost over.

Still, there was only silence after it was done and the lake had completely frosted over. The only sounds were the sounds of the forest awakening from its sleep. Natsuki had to wait a while again, it seemed, before the older woman could even begin to say anything. But she was patient, and so she waited without complaint. That was one of her gifts: the mystery of her silence.

It was a full minute later that Shizuru finally regained herself enough to speak to her.

"By the gods," was the woman's reverent whisper. "Natsuki..."

Natsuki said nothing, simply smiling. Shizuru looked down at those knowing green eyes, unaware of the emotion still brimming in her own.

"Natsuki," she said. "That-that was-"

She trailed off here, to the younger woman's amusement. After a few seconds of patient silence, the latter finally finished the sentence for her, speaking in husky but gentle tones.

"Beautiful, Shizuru," she said softly. "That was beautiful."

Chapter 29

Another long chapter. Pardon, it was inescapable since the most prominent characters in this chapter are ones with a tendency to being prolix.

Oh, and ma chère Gale, as to how many chapters are left in this tale, I honestly have no idea. There are few points fixed as non-negotiable in the plot, and so they are the only markers I have when writing. Nearly everything else is made up during the writing, as was already intimated in earlier explanations of why so many chapters are drafts.

Vocabulaire:

1. Censor - Typically the office a politician hoped to eventually ascend after becoming a consular; the two censors were elected every five years and carried out several duties, one of those duties being the census of members of Senate. Qualification for becoming (or staying) a senator covered various aspects, some financial. If the senator failed to meet one of the qualifications, he could be legally expelled from the House.
2. Corona obsidionalis or corona graminea - This was the highest decoration for valour in battle, and extremely rare. It awarded the recipient with right of immediate entry into Senate.
3. Curule chair - The ivory chair used by public officials/magistrates owning imperium (a certain degree of authority).
4. Eleatic School (of philosophers) - group of pre-Socratic philosophers based in the Greek colony of Elea. The group was founded by Parmenides.
5. Prorogue - An English verb, here used in the original and now-rarely-used sense after the Latin root "prorogo", meaning 'to extend' as in 'to extend a term of office'.

6. Tarpeian Rock - The traditional place of execution for traitors and murderers who were Roman citizens. These people were either cast down from it or forced to jump and dash themselves on the rocks some distance below. There is yet no evidence claiming that anyone who leapt from it ever survived the fall.

7. Wakizashi - A traditional Japanese blade about the length of a forearm. Thus shorter than the katana, it was primarily used for defence, and generally held to be one of the best weapons for this purpose.

8. Zeno - A philosopher belonging to the Eleatic School (s.v.). He is most famous for his paradoxes.

The approach of the Himean elections always signalled a heightened presence of politicians and their clients in the city streets. This meant that traffic-congested enough normally to merit a few curses by those riding in conveyances-reached abominable levels of clogging due to the cliques milling about. The situation was especially dire in that area known as the Forum, where both political hopefuls and heavyweights inevitably congregated. There was the heart of Hime's bureaucratic machine, home to the senatorial offices and the Well of the Comitia, besides all the primary tribunals and temples. There as well was where all the eavesdroppers gathered after the House's daily session, hoping for a chance to pick up a juicy quote or two from some wit-wielding politician.

Already the Forum crowd was in full force, the day's assembly just having been concluded. The senators already out their hall were swarmed upon and willingly let themselves be eaten up by the mass. Today was the last date of electioneering and tomorrow the day of reckoning for many of them: the elections were coming at long last. No one was likely to overlook that event, least of all the woman slated to preside over it. It was at the fore of her mind as she stood inside the Curia and watched the other members of the House make their way out of the great doors.

"Haruka-chan."

She winced a little at the familiar address, deeming it inappropriate for such a venue as this. She could not find the heart to chastise the speaker, however, when she saw the softness of the brownish-green eyes looking her way.

"What?" she asked, perhaps a trifle brusquely. The other woman's smile only broadened.

"We should go," was the answer. "If we want to catch her. She's on her way out right now."

Haruka Armitage frowned and flicked her hair with annoyance as she thought of what lay in wait outside. She gathered her toga and leapt off the curule platform, choosing to forgo the four short steps leading from it.

"She can wait, Yukino," she said, watching her companion walk down those same steps. "She's a consular candidate."

She enunciated those words with obvious disgruntlement, brows interlocked.

"She'll be held up by those people out there," she added. "You should be going around too and wooing the electors."

Yukino Kikukawa shook her head demurely at her best friend and senior, joining her on the floor. She bestowed another smile.

"I've been doing that all the time you were away, Haruka-chan," she said, in the dulcet tones she reserved for the woman. "The elections are tomorrow and people have more or less decided which candidate they're going to vote for. An eleventh-hour spot of promotion isn't going to change their minds."

"But perseverance helps," the other grunted. "It shows them you're dedicated. The unsure ones can be swayed your way if they see how serious you are about winning. How many times do I have to tell you that you need to be more forceful about what you want, Yukino? You can't win battles without that."

She twisted her lips ruefully when her companion failed to answer.

"Never mind, don't worry," she said, to take the sting off her earlier words. "You'll get in."

"Thank you, Haruka-chan," the younger of the two said.

Haruka nodded, already starting towards the doors.

"Let's go find her," she muttered, eyeing the clusters of people ahead. Already some were headed her way, made up of fellow Traditionalists and their adherents. There were no minor clients in the group, of course, since those would be waiting outside the Curia. Only clients of high stature dared to enter the Senate floor, most of them either senators or public officials themselves. She shook hands with one, nodding at his compliments for her rousing speech to the House today-which had been on the iniquities resulting from extravagance, a subject brought up by the latest charge levelled against a couple of senators alleged to be heavily in arrears. It was always a touchy matter since, officially, a senator could not be in debt. If he was, he could be expelled from the Senate by a censor.

Unofficially, many of the senators qualified for this expulsion. Whether it was as a result of having gone on a real estate spending spree or of having used the money for bribes to gain office, the matter was that many of the members of the House were in debt to one moneylender or another. That they were not brought up for investigation before the censors was due to the clannish mentality of the Himean ruling classes, which firmly believed in holding together for such crises. Whether or not a senator was part of the opposing faction was irrelevant; the fact remained that they did not turn on one of their own. One only had to imagine the risks. What if, in order to fill up the vacancies left by the debarred senators, the censors resorted to bringing in people of dubious ancestries-provincial yokels who could not tell one end of the rostra from another?

Appalling thought, that much was certain. Much better to put up with people whose ancestors were established, whose familiarity with the way things worked could not be questioned. So the moneylenders continued to prosper and the senators continued to borrow, all of which made people like Haruka—who would rather throw themselves from the Tarpeian Rock than be in arrears-itchy with annoyance. She was, furthermore, the informal leader of the conservative rump, and thus the one scratching her head for a solution whenever some member or other of the Traditionalists was charged of being deeply indebted. All very irritating, to be sure!

"It's only right we senators should mind. This sort of thing must stop," she announced, in answer to the positive remarks being made about her speech. She accepted a few more compliments, eyes darting busily all the while. "Ho, Wang! Sergay Wang! Here!"

The man she had named detached from a flock of clients, all of them making way for him to pass. Salutations were called out and more than a few fawning faces turned his way. He was a popular man, Sergay Wang, and with good reason—several, in fact. Not least was that he was a military man with a successful army career under his belt, something his devotees found patent in the masculine face with the prominent scar on its brow. Of that cross-shaped mark Forum wits had found material for a pun or two, the most popular and long-standing one coming from his detractors: that blemish on his forehead, they said, was meant to make it easier for some charitable Bowman to pick him out from the crowd. Such was the thoughtfulness of this particular target! But to his admirers, that scar was merely further proof of his manliness, a rugged adornment to a fine, patrician countenance.

In any case, another, perhaps less disputed source of his reputation was his skill on the House floor. Sergay was thought one of the better—some even said 'great'—orators in Senate. He spoke more often than not with straightforward good (conservative) sense and fine rhetoric. While many agreed that he was not in the league of such powerfully admired speakers as the Princeps Senatus, he still commanded a good following in his own right. As such, he was one of the great pillars holding up that powerful bloc in the nation's governing body, the ultra-conservative faction.

"Haruka," he said, holding both hands out to clasp those of his fellow

'pillar'. "That was a great speech earlier. I cheered like a lunatic."

"That's good," she said with a grin, showing surprisingly small and even teeth in a mouth ironically said to be capable of producing the full vocal range of a horse. "Now! Are you going to Kurauchi's place tonight?"

"Yes, I wouldn't miss it," he answered. "And you? Yukino too?"

Both women answered in the affirmative.

"It's been a while since we've had a proper gathering," he said, before catching himself swiftly. "Not counting your welcome get-together, of course. But many of us weren't able to come then due to prior engagements. Tonight will be well-attended."

He turned to the people behind him and added, with a debonair smile: "It will be an advance celebration too, in anticipation of Yukino Kikukawa's impending victory! The rest of you had better bring congratulatory gifts already."

There were replies of agreement. The candidate in question half-heartedly reproached him for his statement, having the grace to blush as she did so. While she was feeling quite assured about winning, Yukino was also a woman who preferred not to taunt the gods. To celebrate a victory in advance was simply tempting fate and that was never wise. She would have preferred to wait for the actual turnout with as much quiet dignity as possible. But how could she complain, really, when dear, sweet Haruka looked so proud?

"Please, you're too kind," she settled for saying, demure smile a contrast to the brightly positive ones of her companions. "Though it's encouraging, naturally, when I have such formidable competition."

At the mention of the word 'competition', Haruka seemed to recall their errand. She pursed her lips and threw Sergay a terse glance, which he took as the hint to draw attention so that they could leave unhindered. He drew a breath.

"Speaking of formidable competition, that reminds me of something I've heard bruited about recently," the orator announced, with a careless laugh. "Word on the streets is that I'm having a competition with none other than Kanzaki Princeps Senatus! Imagine our surprise when we found out about it at the pub, while having a friendly-not competitive, I assure you-drink with each other. It's a story how the tale made its way to us."

Their attention diverted from thoughts of the elections to an anecdote anent the two rhetorical rivals, the group pressed Sergay for details. This gave Haruka and Yukino their opening.

"We've already heard it," the senior consul said, taking Yukino by the wrist and leading her away. "So we'll go ahead, Sergay. We'll see you later."

Sergay nodded, already beginning his tale. Haruka pushed her way out of the group and began to stride at a brisk pace to avoid being held up by any others, dragging Yukino with her to exit the hall. The younger woman followed uncomplainingly, although she did take to scrabbling with her toga to better keep up with Haruka's gait. In no time did she find herself drawn into the open air and taking salutations from another crowd, this one larger than the last.

"Keep your eyes open, Yukino," her companion told her, above the incessant buzz of conversation. "Tell me if you see her. It'll be a job looking for that woman in this lot!"

The 'lot' they faced was the Forum horde, and they waded their way past each of its denser points in search of a certain woman. Not sharing her friend's apprehensions regarding their search, Yukino actually believed it would not be too difficult a task. Their objective was sure to be in one of the larger groups in the area, being of such popularity that she regularly amassed followers without even having to make any overtures towards parading herself. Yukino simply let Haruka tow her through the mass and relinquished herself to the older woman's singular verve. Sooner or later, she was convinced, they would run into their goal. She occupied herself with waving to those senators that they passed in the meantime, counting a laughing Jin Akagi, Mai Tokiha standing with Yuuichi Tate, crusty old Jiguro-san, the ever-dry Hajime...

"There she is. Follow me, Yukino!"

And Yukino, having no other choice, followed. The woman leading her kept both eyes fixed on their goal. Said goal was standing side by side with her cousin-whom Haruka soon identified as the patrician-turned-plebeian candidate for the Plebeian Tribunate. Haruka could hardly her lip from curling as she spied this character. Here was another controversial figure! Not to say the other woman paled in notoriety by comparison. Both at the height of infamy and controversy. And to think there were so many people around those two, seemingly drawn like flies to honey. Why were the people always so taken by controversial figures?

But that was easily answered. The masses loved nothing better than a good controversy, particularly when it came attached to charisma. Haruka distrusted such dark techniques as charisma. She believed that charm was often a mask for a lack of substance. Having none of it herself, she had seen enough people use it for distasteful purposes to be wary of those who possessed it in overwhelming quantity. Take the person she was heading towards, at the moment. Such a beautiful woman! So tall and elegantly built. And so noble-looking that one was tempted to attribute to her all the virtues of the Himean eidolon without even having personally ascertained her character. The woman herself was aware of this, of course, and that was the problem. Haruka knew that that sort of effortless charm, taken with a similarly effortless claim to unimpeachable origins, made for a treacherous combination.

Everything is much too easy for her and all her kind!

They irked her so much, all these smug new aristocrats with their haughty disregard of rules as though strictures merely slid off them and their high status. And there were so many of them now: these entitled brats who rode into public office without raising a finger to work for it, then used that public office to enact ridiculous and pernicious changes to ruin a perfectly good system. They got away with it all because of that outrageous sense of entitlement they carried on their shoulders. Well, that was all they ever carried that seemed to be a burden! They rode off with that alone once they had done their deeds, leaving people like Haruka to shoulder the fallouts of their actions. She was the one left to patch up the Republic they left in tatters, without anyone appreciating her for it. What was with the people that they fell prey so easily to the glamour of these radicals, who often created their revolutionary sensations merely for their own petty amusement? Was it really so hard to see that what they were doing could only breed danger? Was it so difficult to understand the peril to the Republic?

Was it so hard for The People to see that the colour of revolution was also the colour of blood?

"Himemiya!"

The magnificent head turned her way. An affable smile lit the finely-cut features upon sight of her, and for that Haruka did not know whether to feel resentful or a little gratified.

"Our senior consul approaches," the woman herself said to those nearby-most of whom Haruka recognised as prominent Forum note-takers. "She gave an outstanding speech today, which I dearly hope you all had the privilege to overhear."

There was a buzz of acknowledgement, most of it lauding the senior consul, although there were a few titters as well. It was common knowledge that when Haruka Armitage was speaking in the House, everyone standing in the Lower Forum was bestowed with the 'privilege to overhear', like it or not. That stentorian voice was said to have the capacity to haemorrhage eardrums, so what more the simple feat of seeping out from under the senate doors?

"I just said the obvious," Haruka said with curt modesty, not liking the fact that it was one of her most stalwart foes who had brought attention to her latest victory. Why did it feel cheapened after that? Odd, how praise from one person was the same as ridicule from another. "So then, this is a nice meeting. How goes it, Himemiya?"

The other woman inclined her head.

"Quite well, my gratitude for the enquiry," she said evenly, aware that the crowd had actually hushed down in hopes of picking up something interesting from this conversation. "I hope all is well with you too, Haruka-san, Kikukawa-san."

Yukino replied with the same quiet courtesy, whereas Haruka rejoined with a declaration about everything being 'perfectly fine'. The patrician allowed both of them to finish, then ushered forward the flaxen-haired young woman beside her.

"Please allow me to present my cousin, Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura, formerly Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki," she said, with utmost correctness of preamble. "You have yet to be formally introduced, and this seems as excellent a time as any to rectify that matter. Urumi, our outgoing senior consul, Haruka Armitage and my fellow senator, Yukino Kikukawa."

The young woman being presented bowed in salute, then lifted her head to exhibit a smile nearly as breathtaking as that of her elder cousin. While the crowd practically sighed with appreciation, Haruka felt a crawling feeling at her nape. Of course she had heard of this young woman-her scandalous move from the patriciate to the plebs made sure of that!-and had heard as well that her eyes had the singular trait of having two different colours. Nevertheless, finally having those asymmetrically-tinted irises a scant metre away was proving more disconcerting than she expected, especially since they stood out so starkly in that very blonde, very fair face. Jupiter and all the gods damn her if those eyes did not promise mischief!

"Yes, good to meet you," she said, with a peremptory nod of her head. Her companion was longer in greeting. She actually complimented the young woman for something apparently written and published in the latter's name, citing it perfunctorily.

"I read your dissertation on the Eleatic schools of thought," she informed Chikane's cousin, with an appreciative look. "It was very interesting, Nemura-san."

The beautiful smile grew wider.

"Urumi, if you please, and I'm obliged to hear you think so," came the reply to Yukino. "Re-reading it after publication, you see, I myself started doubting if it was even that."

"Of course not!" interjected another voice, coming from one of the people nearest to them. Yukino identified him as a well-known scholar of the mentioned philosophies. "It was far and away the most thrilling piece of work this year, Urumi-san. I found myself so engrossed with it that after having begun I could not put it down! I even had to take it to bed with me."

"Where, no doubt, it most thrillingly augmented your slumber," the writer of said tome replied, to collective laughter. "I daresay I shall begin to promote my work as therapy for all those unwilling owls of the night. If you manage to get past the first three paragraphs then you should be a most consummate scholar, being able to read in your sleep!"

After the laugh from her cousin's words died down, Chikane turned to the senior consul, who had scarcely smiled during this interlude.

"Haruka-san, if I recall, has something of an interest in one of the Eleatics-Zeno, I believe," she supplied with patent understatement. "The two of you may find amusement in talking over his teachings, perhaps."

"Most definitely," her cousin answered. "Armitage-san espouses Stoicism, is that correct?"

Haruka answered in her loud voice.

"I espouse only right acts," she asserted. "And Stoicism happens to teach about right acts. It only follows."

"As is correct or, dare I say it, a right act," Urumi responded easily. "I would so love to discuss Zeno's teachings with you, Armitage-san, one of these days. Surely you could be of some guidance to me, philosophy-attempting ignoramus that I am."

She sighed then and suddenly looked very vulnerable.

"I find myself so confused sometimes about how Zeno would interpret and resolve certain situations. The question of passion, for instance, and how Zeno would see it. Would it be a right act to give in to a passion, or would it be wrong?"

The senior consul had a ready answer to that: "It would be wrong."

"Even, say, if passion does not always preclude genuine care? Even, in fact, if it contains it?"

The answer almost came out from her mouth without her thinking about it. Haruka clamped her teeth tight to hold it back, knowing that she could not speak it aloud in such a gathering. Never care, for to genuinely care was to feel genuine pain. A natural answer for one such as her. Everyone she had ever truly cared for had given her nothing but pain in return, from the alcohol-addled, over-exacting father who had only ever seen her as something that fell short of his ideal daughter, to the elder brother who had been nothing but kind to her, only to die far too early as victim of a plague. What of her mamma? She had died prematurely as well, too early for Haruka to know anything like a mother's love. And as for love... Her first love had ended in a most disappointing manner, the person proving to have only used her as a source of entertainment while waiting for the one for whom he truly cared. Better to forget that! She already had so many disheartening precedents, really, without remembering that too. Who cared about care ?

She shook away the memories, unwilling to surrender to them. She knew the hard truths of life, understood the disappointments it could give, and that was enough. Reminiscence was useless except for the lessons one could draw from it, as well as the courage to apply those lessons. But how best to phrase that in front of the people looking at her, waiting for an answer? How, too, to explain it to the aristocratic pup looking at her with unequal eyes that had probably never seen true disappointment, their spoiled glimmer most likely going to be confused by the truth that could answer the question?

"Always be wary of passion! What kind of care is reckless enough to be considered a passion?" she found herself saying with contempt, unaware of the brief sadness her words brought into a pair of olive green eyes. "Only responsible care is considered proper. If it is reckless, as passion is, then it cannot be care, which is its opposite. So passion is never care, not a right thing, nor its exercise a right act."

Her interrogator responded with particular delicacy.

"Yet I have heard it said that the great sentiment, love itself, is most properly and in its best and true form considered a passion," Urumi said smoothly. "For eros cannot be eros without ardour, and that is exactly what makes it passionate. But the same may be said for its aspect of caring, which is one of the true measures of authentic affection, and hence said to be one of the prerequisites of genuine love. Care being a facet of the thing above it, or love itself, a passionate care may then exist, in that both passion and care can be said to hold true of and be existent in what many call true love. Is it not so, or am I being foolishly mistaken in these understandings, Armitage-san?"

Haruka blinked, somewhat confused by the unexpected onslaught of philosophical polemic. She was aware everyone had eyes on the two of them now, not to mention ears, and it was a little unsettling. Before she knew it, she had given a nod.

"Given a kind of passion then, that can be considered part of 'true love'," the blonde in front of her followed gently. "Would you still hold that it is wrong to act upon it, all circumstances being equal? Zeno, if I recall correctly, only forbade wrong acts, and never forbade love. He even advocated love for good acts, and all that is generally good. The two parts of love that we have mentioned fit nicely into the scheme of this advocacy, in that to love the good means to care for and have a care to choose always for good, while the necessity of unflagging belief in that choice requires one to have an ardour for it, to espouse this philosophy with passion else the flame of one's conviction die out."

The young woman paused for effect before tilting her head to one side, looking happily unaware of the discomfort she had wrought in the senior consul.

"If we are duty-bound to love all that is good then, as Zeno teaches," she said in conclusion. "Can we still say that he would consider all passions, that of love included, to be wrong?"

The silence around them now had become so distinct that people from other groups had begun to come over in curiosity. Anyone asking the reason for the hush was told one of three things: enthrallment in the young intellectual's words; exasperation coming from lesser minds trying to process the argument; or the heady anticipation of what the senior consul would say next. That public official seemed a little lost at the moment, unfortunately, and the hush seemed to stretch forever. In that time, Chikane Himemiya sent her cousin a sharp look, eyes communicating in secret that she knew exactly what Urumi was doing. That architect of silence, however, did not even bat an eyelash. She simply continued to smile expectantly at the senior consul, looking for all the world like an innocent kitten that was only seeking its ball of string. Whom, exactly, was this wayward kitten fooling?

Many of the people here, curiously enough, Chikane thought to herself, while furtively surveying the crowd. There are some like me, nonetheless, who see that she has merely rolled out that ball of string to bait something at the end. And one of those people seeing it happens to be my fellow consular nominee, Yukino Kikukawa.

She ran a surreptitious glance along that woman's expression, noting the darkened colour of the often-squinting, olive-green eyes.

She is most certainly not pleased.

The senior consul suddenly responded to Urumi's query in a frightfully grave air that rather brought out the twinkle in Chikane's eye. The woman drew herself up with a deep breath and stated her answer in the usual hectoring tone of voice.

"In that case it is no longer wrong, of course," she brayed, obviously disliking the concession she had been pushed into making. "It is a right act to love all that is good. But one must temper one's love with disinterest always, and never let it rule oneself! Nothing that degrades thought and the mind must rule, and all emotions degrade the mind."

Urumi's eyes lit up. Chikane was intrigued by the realisation that her cousin was truly pleased by the senior consul's answer. But then again, things that might not please a regular person could often please Urumi, so singular were the young woman's tastes and amusements.

"A most fascinating response," that impish genius was saying now to Haruka. "I'm ignorant as to Zeno having said that last part about all emotions degrading the mind, however. Dear me, how embarrassing."

"Oh, I was interpreting from between the lines."

"Ah, of course." Urumi nodded sympathetically. "Yes, many with at least an elementary knowledge of philosophy have a talent for doing that, I've noticed."

Her older cousin hid a smirk at the jibe. It was Yukino who interceded, ending what was rapidly turning into a farcical game of cat-and-mouse.

"Himemiya-san," she said, drawing the urban praetor's attention. "I just remembered, and I hope you'll excuse me for mentioning it only now. Some papers were sent to the senatorial scribes. They were meant for you."

She motioned to the building looming above them and the cool blue eyes followed her direction as she explained. "They were papers from the last cases you heard at your tribunal, I think, and should actually have been handed to you earlier. I felt it prudent to hide them away for the time being so you could pick them up yourself, instead of sending them over care of a courier. Some of the more recent cases at your court seemed to deserve that caution, I thought. I'm sorry, was it a nuisance of me?"

The patrician did not even seem to think about it.

"Not at all. Mine is the fault, in fact, for having obliged you to do such a thing by failing to receive them promptly when they arrived. My sincerest apologies and thanks for the trouble, Kikukawa-san."

"Please don't mention it. Would you like to leave it for another time or get the papers now? I don't mind either way."

"I venture it would be best to relieve you of that burden now. Unless you are occupied with something else, of course."

"No, I'd be happy to. We're already here and only a few steps away."

"Then please lead on." The urban praetor dipped her head close to her cousin's ear, whispering something those close by overheard as instructions to meet her at 'the usual place'. Afterwards, she nodded to the company.

"Please excuse us to attend to that matter," she said in a clear-carrying voice. "Urumi here shall surely entertain you in my stead. I am unashamed to say she does it much better than I do, and if her eyes are any indication, twice the colour."

Thus leaving smiles on their faces, she allowed herself to be led away by Yukino and to the direction of the offices the official scribes of House meetings occupied. The senior consul accompanied them, guiding the conversation as soon as they were free of followers. She seemed to have regained her balance and swiftly forgotten much of her discomfort from the episode with Urumi.

"I see you're doing your share of promotion, Himemiya, with the mob." Her eyes flickered to Yukino at this. "Well? Tired of it yet?"

"It goes quite well enough, thank you, Haruka-san," Chikane answered. "But I do grant it is strenuous work."

"Anything of value needs real effort. Still, you look like you've done pretty good work."

"Tis pleasant to have you say so. I would so love to hear people say that of my tenure as urban praetor as well, once the year is over." She smiled. "It feels strangely satisfying to know that our terms shall soon be concluded, does it not? Or perhaps that is only my fatigue from hearing so many cases in my court. Please excuse me if I have unwittingly included you in an opinion that is merely my own."

"It's fine. It was a troublesome year," Haruka replied with puckered brow. "There was trouble everywhere. Here, in the South, in Africa Province. And in the North."

"Most especially in the North," Chikane said, a little feelingly.

The senior consul stiffened.

"Maybe if Fujino was doing her job properly there, it wouldn't be that way," she said tightly.

"Permit me to offer an alternative interpretation, if you please. Perhaps if she were truly not 'doing her job properly', it would go further that way ."

To which opinion Haruka merely huffed, pursing her mouth in displeasure. Chikane changed the subject.

"May I ask how your assignation in Africa went?" she asked, tilting her head in order to look politely at the other's face, instead of her yellow hair. The senior consul was shorter and Chikane's remarkable stature required that she look down on her. She was aware, too, that Haruka hated that fact. But there was scarcely anything she could do about that, was there?

"Just fine," Haruka was saying, treading her way up the building's steps. "I gave those barbarians a good run for their money! These foreign monarchs should learn to control their people. When a rebellion comes up, it's to us they all come running! They don't begin to give us enough for our pains-and then they have the gall to say we're meddling too much."

"A few of the allied nations do have an inclination to crying 'aid' a little too often. The misfortune of it is that when Hime steps in to lend assistance as they ask, they quickly find fault with the extent of interest we display in what they suddenly deem internal matters... when they were the ones who strenuously drew our attention to our relation towards the affair in the first place."

"They're a treacherous lot," Haruka agreed. "They should make up their minds in advance about where they stand, on the edges of Our Sea! First they say we're affected, then they say it doesn't concern us at all."

"It can be wearisome."

They were inside the building and walking along a deserted corridor. Haruka waved her hands at it, indicating gratitude for the empty space.

" There's another thing I'm sure you see is wearisome, Himemiya," the senior consul said crossly. "That mob outside. It's hard to talk seriously about anything with all those psycho fans crowding around."

Sycophant, Haruka-chan, they're sycophants, Yukino chanted in her thoughts, scarcely restraining the urge to correct her older friend. Since their only companion appeared willing to ignore the slip, however, she supposed she had no need to draw attention to it. She often tried not to embarrass Haruka any more than necessary during such occasions, correcting her only when it was obvious that a potentially dangerous misunderstanding might arise from the older woman's gaffe. Hence, seeing the comprehension in the the urban praetor's unchangingly polite countenance made her sigh with relief. One had to give the woman her due: Chikane Himemiya was as renowned for her discretion as for her beauty.

"The public can grow intrusive," the patrician was saying. "It is wise to guard all one's words before them lest they take a mere jest in earnest."

"That's something that happens a lot," the senior consul replied, launching into a discourse on the pitfalls of popular interpretation. She related one of their mutual colleague's experiences, expressing her disgust at the trouble that had arisen almost with relish. Her listener nodded and hummed thoughtfully, looking completely absorbed in the story.

In truth, the urban praetor was actually studying Haruka. The senior consul, Chikane decided, was looking very well. Her short tenure in Africa Province seemed to have suited her, for those cheeks held even brighter colour than before and the gorgeously thick, waving masses of hair looked more golden than ever. On the whole, she was a picture of perfect good health. But that had always been a large part of the woman's physical attractions. Even in repose, Haruka Armitage presented an image of such ready vitality that it reached the point of brashness, animation practically leaping from her skin.

So similar yet so different, Chikane allowed as she pictured her own friend, having been prompted to do so by her guess that whatever the senior consul had taken her aside for was related to Shizuru. Shizuru, who had much the same colouring and who gave off the same impression of radiant health as Haruka did now. Where the senior consul shone starkly, however, Chikane's friend was luminous. That Armitagian brashness took on a subtler form in the younger woman, from the softer, browner shade of blonde to the paler and less ruddy cheeks. And anyone seeing Shizuru for the first time would never call her animated, could only describe her as laid-back and indolent as a basking cat. Who could possibly know that someone so lazy-looking could leap and have you by the throat in one blink? But that element of surprise suited Shizuru, just as the element of vigour suited Haruka.

Which lioness is more prone to catching its prey then, she wondered idly. Is it the one who waits silently with sheathed claws or the one who brandishes them with a roar?

"On another note, I hope you forgive me for being unable to attend your dinner party," she said to Yukino after Haruka was done, though obviously addressing the apology to the latter woman as well. "I had every intention of coming, but my wife suddenly took ill and I feared to leave her alone in such a state."

Yukino expressed sympathies summarily.

"We did receive your gift," the younger of the two Traditionalists said. "Thank you so much for the wine, Himemiya-san. It was very thoughtful of you."

Chikane shook that away with polite charm and Yukino had to stop herself from saying any more. The gift the patrician sent that evening had been a deft joke, after all, that had Forum pundits giggling the whole day after. The package of wine-a standard present for such occasions-was an apology for being unable to attend a party honouring the senior consul. Everyone knew the senior consul did not take liquor.

"'Tis only correct that I offered my regards, since you were thoughtful enough to invite me to dinner," Chikane said, as though perfectly oblivious to her own jest. "I am only regretful I could not offer my presence as well, insignificant though it may be."

"Oh, of course not. But I wish you'd sent word that it was because of your wife that you were absent," Yukino returned. "I would've sent something, maybe our physician, back for her."

"How kind of you. We called over the Athenian doctor named Youko-san."

"Ah!" Haruka cleared her throat as she rejoined the conversation. "Good physician. She's fine now, your woman?"

Chikane smiled warmly.

"I thank the gods it was merely a one-day fever," she told them. "As it was, though, I still had to stay and look after her myself."

It was on the tip of Haruka's tongue to ask whether or not the urban praetor had servants to do that much, but she changed her mind about it. Chikane Himemiya had a terribly wary streak when it came to her wife and though generally mild of manner, also had the sort of haughty comportment that told you it might be life-threatening to provoke her. Better to leave the eagle's nest alone, Haruka decided in a rare fit of metaphorical imagination, and tackle the bird itself in its flight.

"It's better to watch out for things," she declared. "What looks like a one-day fever could have something worse behind it so it's good to look into every matter."

"I could not agree more. Cases that seem insignificant may well have a darker source behind them."

"That's what I mean." Haruka nodded vigorously. "Some of the latest happenings, for example, look simple at first. But they're also suspicious to me."

"I am interested to hear you say so."

That was her cue. She began to slow her walk and let them follow suit.

"I don't like the way some things have been going. Something bad is in the air and I can feel it, tickling the back of my neck." Haruka patted said body part. "My neck itches when someone's plotting something."

The urban praetor blinked, it seemed, very slowly.

"But if you would allow me to point something out, Haruka-san," the woman said. "That would mean your neck is constantly prickling, since someone somewhere is always plotting something."

"Not just any 'something.' I meant something unpleasant, Himemiya."

"It seems to me that the statement holds even so. All the more for us, since we three are in politics, and in politics there is always someone plotting an unpleasant something. I would imagine many of us have at one time been guilty of that."

"Hah!" The senior consul scoffed. "I, for one, have always had a clear conscience. That can only mean one thing, you know."

A pleasantly curious expression: "A bad memory, perhaps?"

Yukino swiftly bit her tongue to restrain the titter welling up in her throat. Wickedly tongue-in-cheek as the urban praetor's response had been, she had to appreciate the patrician's sense of humour. Haruka, on the other hand, was neither amused nor insulted; wit tended to escape her.

"Not when it comes to these things," she was saying in reply, tapping a finger on one temple. "I remember all my actions and monitor them carefully. It's only right that we should be self-aware, even if being that way shows us things about ourselves we don't want to see."

She nodded complacently and concluded: "Truth is a universal virtue."

The other woman smiled.

"I have often heard it said so," she answered.

Haruka looked grand at this ostensible concurrence.

"It's good you appreciate it too," she said. "Because I want to know the truth about something."

Chikane looked nothing if not obliging.

"In that case, Haruka-san," she offered. "Please tell me if I might in any way prove enlightening."

"You just might, Himemiya."

Haruka stopped walking and wheeled to face her, looking straight into the languid blue eyes. Both Yukino and Chikane realised she was going to put the question directly, devoid of either artfulness or prevarication.

Not that they had expected either thing from her, anyway.

"What is it you wish to enquire of me, Haruka-san?"

The blonde suddenly looked severe. Chikane continued to smile amiably, not bothering to alter expression before the fierce violet gaze.

"Tell me the truth, Himemiya," the senior consul ground out, in her extraordinarily truculent voice. "Did you know Fujino was going to run for praetor this year and were you the one who put her up to it?"

---

Suou Himemiya eyed the cutting edge of the weapon in her hand, running a finger cautiously on the steel to test its polish. Looking to one side, she gripped the shaft with both hands and touched the blade of the naginata to an imaginary foe's collar, grunting in an effort to halt it from dipping further than her make-believe target.

A little too much.

She frowned at the excess.

"I don't understand how you can use this," she told one of the other two persons in the room. "It's unreasonably heavy."

She handed over the pole-arm. A wry laugh passed her lips when the other woman proceeded to lay it carelessly over her own shoulders using a one-handed grip, seeming to give the lie to Suou's complaint.

"Oh now, see, that's just mean," Suou said with a smile, a touch of rebuke in her voice. "You're painting me in shabby colours with that display, Shizuru-san."

Her friend grinned unrepentantly.

"My excuses for that," Shizuru said, not bothering to remove her naginata from her shoulders. "But you must recall that I am accustomed to its weight whereas you are not, and so it should hardly be make you look shabby when I wield it this freely only because of having forced myself to do so for near a decade, Suou-chan."

"Now there's something I haven't heard in a while," came the other's answer. "I thought I would go mad if I heard 'Suou- han ' one more time. It was amusing at first, but I didn't think you'd be carrying it so far. What a production you do make, ye gods!"

The darker blonde laughed.

"Did I trouble you so, Suou-chan?" she asked apologetically. "Such was not my intent, of course. If you would prefer that I no longer use that honorific I would gladly accede to your wishes."

Suou said nothing, merely sparing her friend a playful smile as she went by. She headed towards a weapon rack on the wall, intending to pick up a practice spear from there.

Of course she knew what Shizuru had intended in addressing her so formally during the campaign, appending to her name the honorific of - han instead of the more familiar -chan . It had been a replacement made in Suou's interests. Shizuru had probably been hoping that avoiding the more childish nickname would make it clear to everyone within earshot that she esteemed Suou as a fully matured and capable woman: something that was held in question when Suou, not yet even a senator, was given the significant position of legate on this campaign. A surprisingly unorthodox decision, most had cautioned, and a foolhardy one. But Shizuru had not been swayed and had insisted on having Suou on her staff. And so the qualms had begun.

It was no matter that this daughter of the Himemiya was only a year younger, in point of fact, than the commander herself. There were crucial differences between the two women, particularly in the realm of experience. Suou had been given this position without ever occupying any public office before. The only military experience she had was as a contubernalis, that position of cadetship all senators were required to undergo in their youth, and then as a military tribune, another type of cadetship for young senators. Shizuru, on the other hand, had already served and even generated on numerous campaigns. She also had the near-unbelievable distinction of a corona obsidionalis wreathing her record-which decoration also happened to be the step that gave her early entry to the Himean Senate a few years back. In short, whereas Shizuru had the benefit of certain pertinent credentials justifying her generalship, Suou had virtually none to justify her taking a legatal position. The most the latter woman could lay claim to, as far as most were concerned, was her family's name. Hardly enough for the greater sceptics, was it? Of course not.

Thus Shizuru had taken to making a show of confidence in Suou, meticulously treating the youthful legate as one would a person of seniority and respect. It was part of this display that she began to address Suou more formally in public, to further convey her regard for the young woman. In private, however, she reverted to the name she had used for the younger patrician ever since childhood... for they had all but grown up together.

Tacit accomplices, they had never even discussed this substitution of honorifics until now, simply reading each other's intentions and following their unmentioned script. It often brought secret smiles to their faces whenever they did so. Suou, especially, found something terribly amusing in being called "Suou- han " so constantly by a woman who had only ever called her "Suou- chan ", her own address for said woman only retaining the more formal -san out of deference for someone she considered almost an older sister. That too was an amusing thought: imagine being addressed so formally by your elder sister!

Not that I can imagine my elder sister doing it, really, she amended to herself, with a private grin at the very idea. Chikane would imbue the honorific with such dryness I'd probably choke.

"It's fine if you keep calling me that, I understand," she finally said, having selected a spear for herself and approaching Shizuru with it. "As for the exceptional heft of your naginata, I swear I will never understand why you don't just exchange it for something of lighter make. It's not even an obligatory inheritance, unlike our bow, is it?"

Shizuru nodded, turning her beloved weapon slowly in her hands. She understood the comparison, knowing the object Suou had mentioned: the heirloom of the Himemiya, an imposing and beautifully-crafted bow, required such strength to draw that the heirs of the family actually had to dedicate a good part of their education to training for it. Suou's older sister was no exception, and still bore the calluses on her fingers to prove it, aside from the wide and impressively built back many would be surprised to see on such an elegantly-shaped woman. But Chikane was tall enough to preserve slimness even with such musculature, and Suou thanked the gods she was the same. Long limbs permitted stretched, lean muscles, instead of bunching them up too much into a stocky form. A good bit of curves was a help too, reflected the merciless observer as she glanced at Shizuru: the other, even more statuesque woman's fairly-sized bosom lent an illusion of feminine softness to what was an already hardened body.

She found herself studying her commander more closely at that thought. Outrageously tall, even by masculine standards, and very well-muscled. The latter was the soldier in her. Wearing only a short tunic as Shizuru was now, Suou could see the shaped calves that attested to the miles of hard marching expected from a Himean soldier. Flat belly too, as she could see whenever the tunic was pulled tight on the tapering waist. Good, very fit-looking shoulders.

What she had to say she most appreciated in Shizuru's form, however, was the shape of the arms. Those appendages were so long they contrived to appear slender despite being superbly muscled, the area near the biceps even producing subtle, sinewy little bulges in the proper places. She supposed it was the result of using that heavy polearm. If so, the dratted thing actually had some advantages then. Such splendid arms those were!

All of it's splendid, in fact, but I can imagine some disadvantages to her look as well, she allowed later, while watching the other woman go to the weapons rack to look for a practice spear of her own. Relativity, as always, played a part. Shizuru's size was a definite consideration since, even while possessing the correct proportions in itself, it could not be denied that placing her next to someone of average height and build would usually dwarf the other person. Just as well she preferred women. Most Himean men were not romantically predisposed towards someone whose physical strength and stature so obviously rivalled theirs. Someone of Shizuru's looks roused competition or sheer admiration from them more than amorous affection.

The musical voice broke in upon her concentration and she thought for a moment that a query had been put to her. She realised quickly, however, that it was not she being addressed. Shizuru was talking to her bodyguard.

Now there's another interesting study in physical type, she thought with sudden interest, watching as the Otomeian approached her friend and held conference. Both were obviously military women, with the vigorous looks expected of the type. Shizuru's Natsuki, however, also seemed the type most men would quickly go after, the thwarted Takeda being only one example. Why was that?

She set aside the matter of their facial features for now. Instead, she considered the Otomeian's figure next to Shizuru's, noting the heights of the pair.

Another tall one, though definitely the shorter, she determined. Almost my height, and I do fall below Shizuru-san and my sister. Very slender, too, though possessed of a fine set of shoulders. Not entirely flat-chested, but small enough to be willowy. Quite similar to the older woman. What in there was the crucial difference?

Shizuru's hand came up to the girl's arm, her slender fingers wrapping around it. Suou blinked as she realised what it was that she had been looking for.

Natsuki-san's actually much smaller, she concluded, pleased at having an answer. Fantastically lean, she would say, to the point of looking nearly delicate. That was interesting in such an athletic person. If Suou had to guess at what was underneath all those layers of dark clothing, she would say that it was a body with muscles similar in shape to those of the Ninth's chief primipilus: long and stretched out. As Natsuki was taller than the primipilus in question, however, her muscling appeared leaner. She had fine bones as well, judging by the width of the neck and wrists. Almost fragile! If her guesses were correct, that girl carried hardly an ounce of spare fat. How in the world did she manage to stay warm?

Well, I suppose Shizuru-san sees to that, she thought playfully, not knowing that the general actually was pressing her bodyguard to eat more as a result of similar-though more intimate-observations. And I suppose that's also why the men would find it easier to go for her. She doesn't look as stunningly powerful as Shizuru-san, which means she's not as threatening.

The memory of one of her subordinate's complaints came forth and she added a clause to her conclusion: So long as she doesn't glare at them, that is.

The other practical ramifications did not escape her. She understood now that any sparring match between the two would boil down to a match of speed against strength. True, Shizuru had a name for being one of the fastest warriors in Hime, but from what Suou had seen of the Otomeian, even the fastest warriors in Hime would weep. Her agility cost her in another area, however, as the disparity in size and stature determined an advantage for Shizuru in terms of pure force. Of skill, Suou supposed they were matched. So which one would win?

"Shizuru-san, it just occurred to me to ask," she said simply. "Have you ever tried sparring with Natsuki-san?"

Shizuru cast a smile down at her bodyguard before answering: "No, truth be told, though I have asked time and time again."

The ashen brows went up.

"Do you mean Natsuki-san refuses you?" she asked, with authentic surprise. "I must say that's unexpected."

The other Himean sent another quick glance at Natsuki, who shuffled back to her earlier seat with an uncomfortable look on her face. The panther tethered there leapt on the bench and curled up next to her.

"Yes, Natsuki refuses me."

Shizuru sauntered over to Suou, carrying a bladeless spear similar to the one the latter had.

"Natsuki rarely spars, or so she tells me," she revealed, while arranging her position to indicate that Suou could attack. "At least, not with her weapon of choice, the daos."

"What a pity. Nao's been saying she'd love to try her with that thing."

"I was rather disappointed to learn it too, at first, but soon understood her reasons for it thereafter."

She swatted away the incoming spear and began moving, sometimes just avoiding the blows instead of parrying them. They talked while Suou continued her shower of jabs.

"What are the reasons, then?" Suou asked, freeing the end of her spear from under Shizuru's foot with an outward kick. This was to avoid it being broken by Shizuru's other foot coming down to snap it against the floor. The older woman executed a nimble step back and pointed her spear forward again before Suou could return to attack.

"One might say there is only one reason, actually," Shizuru said, lowering her spear and circling the other woman with a casual step. "All others would stem from it, I suppose."

There came the sound of wood hitting wood as she flicked away the spear jabbing at her.

"So what is it?" Suou asked.

Another clacking sound, followed by a giggle from Shizuru as she threw her own spear over her shoulders in patent relaxation. She wiggled her eyebrows tauntingly at Suou, who grinned back.

"Natsuki says it is because she does not know how to use her weapon for sparring."

She affected a sigh of boredom, obviously trying to provoke her opponent into making a move. Suou merely looked at her.

"So for only what does she know how to use it?" Suou asked.

They smiled innocently at each other.

"She only uses it with the intent to kill," Shizuru answered.

No sooner had the words left her mouth than Suou lunged, the blunt tip of her spear aimed at Shizuru's unguarded chest. Shizuru immediately dropped to avoid the charge and rushed at a crouch past the younger woman's side. Suou compensated for this peculiar evasion by bringing her spear down at an angle to her foe-only to miss when she was startled by a firm blow on the back of her neck. She stumbled forwards and away, feeling her spear pulled irresistibly from her grasp as she distanced herself to retrieve balance.

"Ecaster!" she cried in frustration upon turning back to her opponent. "Now that was foul!"

Shizuru, now proudly holding both spears, laughed. The spear she had wrested from Suou during the younger woman's moment of surprise was in her right hand. Her own spear, which she had thrown up to cause a surprise when it fell back down and on Suou's unguarded nape, was in her left.

She smiled at her friend.

"And here I thought it was cleanly done," she said teasingly, before looking at the others in the room. "Both Natsuki and Shizuki seem to agree with me. What is the collective verdict, Natsuki?"

Suou looked behind to see the girl with one leg pulled up, face buried into the knee and further shaded by one hand as her shoulders shook noiselessly. The panther next to her had its mouth open, pink tongue lolling in what seemed a coincidental comedy. Suou laughed too.

"I plead an unfair jury," she complained. "You can be mean sometimes, you know."

"Untrue," Shizuru answered, while returning to her the spear. "You confuse me with your sister. She would have added a spank to your rear in that exercise, which would indeed have been mean."

The very attractive, very fair features pulled into a grimace.

"So she would," Suou said, the fondness in her voice belying her scowl. "And she only ever does it to me! See, I've seen her give lessons and spar with dozens of people and she never teases any of them that way."

Shizuru tilted her head to one side.

"I suppose it may be a token of her affection, Suou-chan. You are her only sister, after all."

The other woman rolled pale blue eyes upwards as if in divine supplication.

"Oh, heavens," she heaved. "You and Himeko-chan get sweetness galore as tokens of affection while I content myself with the occasional spank. What diverse kindnesses my sister does bestow!"

"Even so, not entirely unwelcome, I suppose."

"'Not entirely' being the operative words." Suou twirled the weapon in her grasp, looking at it pensively afterwards. "As I thought, I really do better with shorter weapons like swords. I can't get a good feel for what to do with the extra length, and having so much more of it confuses me." She sighed in resignation. "Even more with your weapon, which is so large. What a long pole you have there!"

She received no response, however, and looked up curiously at her opponent. To her surprise, the older woman had a hand to her mouth, laughing quietly into it.

It took a few more seconds before she understood.

"Natsuki-san." Suou turned and cast a grim look at the listening Otomeian, trying her hardest not to give it away by giggling. "Your charge has a very bad mind."

"Pray do not corrupt Natsuki's mind against me!"

"Pray you haven't already corrupted it yourself!"

Both started chuckling, ignorant of the Otomean shaking her head at their antics.

"That was a fine rebuttal," the young general was saying to Suou, wiping away the moisture from her eyes. "I should have seen it coming."

"I'm glad you didn't, or I wouldn't have been able to showcase my, mmph, verbal virtuosity."

Shizuru grinned with distinct enjoyment.

"Now that," she said, "reminded me of Chie-han."

"That's a compliment. Chie-san has a great feel for wordwise humour."

"You cannot be described as laconic, yourself."

They were moving again, making brief and stabbing attacks at each other. Two sets of feline eyes watched as they danced, one set golden and the other green.

"No danger of that," Suou said to Shizuru. "No Himemiya has ever made a reputation for being laconic. We love playing with our words a little too much."

She parried a thrust and went on: "Unless you count old uncle Ayato, I guess."

Shizuru leapt away from her reach.

"Your uncle Ayato?" She tilted her head in perplexity. "I thought he had a speech impediment."

"He did," Suou smiled lazily. "Can you imagine a better reason for becoming laconic?"

A laugh: "Fair enough."

"But you see what I mean-we're all insufferable when it comes to our talk. And it's so difficult to resist dropping this little jest or that, sometimes at the expense of being concise."

"I have the same conceit. It tends to rule me too."

"You more than me."

"Reito-han more than all of us."

"He is the Princeps Senatus," Suou said, with a sling that was flicked away contemptuously by Shizuru. She grinned and persisted in her attempts to hit the older woman. "Chikane is on par with him, though. Yet my cousin Urumi defeats them both."

"Ah." Shizuru sidestepped another thrust. "That prodigy interests me very much."

"You've only met her a few times, right?"

"Yes."

"She's a terror."

The other woman laughed, crimson eyes sparkling with humour.

"If you say so, she must be," she said.

"Actually, it's Reito who says so." Suou shrugged. "See, she picks on him."

"I was under the impression that they got along."

"Oh, they do. It's not that she dislikes him as a paterfamilias or anything." She stopped to catch her breath, resting the butt of the spear on the floor. "It's more that he presents her with such opportunities that she can't resist. I remember one time she took him down for size in front of us. It was just before we left for this campaign and Chikane was having him, Urumi, and another Kanzaki over for dinner. Himeko-chan and I were there too."

"What happened?"

"It was after the meal was over and the topic of conversation was past military expeditions," Suou recalled. "Chikane had just finished describing hers, when Reito recalled his own experiences, lamenting that he wasn't able to go on more than one campaign as part of the high command before becoming Princeps. And as Princeps, he claimed he wouldn't be getting any more chances to go on another—so went the excuse."

Shizuru furrowed her brow thoughtfully.

"He spoke the truth," she told the younger woman. "The Princeps is never sent out in battle because his theatre of war is ever after the senate floor. Reito-han is actually no mean swordsman, you know, nor is he a coward."

"I know. But he would much rather stay in Curia than go waging wars with his sword elsewhere. Not a coward but careful. Reito doesn't take risks in the sense that he likes to ensure he's never in the immediate line of fire. It's hard to preserve himself that way if he's in a place where real arrows are flying and not ones he can easily deflect somewhere else—like in politics. It's more his area of comfort being crafty and manipulating battles from the curule chair."

The red eyes fixed almost eerily at her, seeming to rise in attention.

"Suou-chan," came the lilting voice. "That is a very good assessment of Reito-han you have just made."

The flaxen-haired woman shrugged again.

"He is practically family," she told Shizuru. "Besides, Urumi's the one who drew my attention to it. She understands him very well."

"Which spells disaster for Reito-han, if your cousin's temperament is as you say."

They smiled at each other.

"Going back to the story," Suou prompted, tucking away a few strands of wayward hair. "Reito was making his excuses. Since he's Reito, naturally, he had to say it in a flowery way. He struck his gravest pose and declared: 'Tranquil as it is to remain safe and not sore, I do sometimes wish for blood and gore .'"

Shizuru emitted a chuckle: "As expected of Reito-han. Not bad."

"Yes. But just as we were thinking so, Urumi took up the rhyme with singsong sweetness: 'You do keep saying you want action more, yet here you remain with us, playing a bore .'"

They doubled over with mirth, forced to lean on their upright spears.

"I adore your cousin's style," Shizuru managed to say. "But poor Reito-han!"

"It was his fault. He shouldn't have paused to allow Urumi a word in edgewise. Be careless for a second and she'll do as she did to him, taking your laughs and running away with them."

"An oversight on his part. Perhaps he forgot because he was busy admiring his own 'verbal virtuosity'?"

They cried with laughter again.

"You know," Suou said, when she had recovered enough. "I think Urumi's going into politics too. Soon."

"Oh? Was she planning to run for quaestor or some other office?"

"I thought so, but her letters give me the impression otherwise. She wouldn't say exactly." A grin. "See, she's sly like that."

"I should hope to have her as a friend rather than a foe, then."

"Chikane will rein her in for you-as much as anyone can, anyway," she said almost ruefully. "I'm afraid you'll have to do the rest yourself, since Urumi pretty much operates on her own terms. If she finds you amusing, she'll like you. The problem is telling which way that like is going to go, or how she intends to show it."

The older woman nodded thoughtfully, glossy strands of hair waving on her brow.

"A complex one, then."

"Yes."

They levelled their spears at each other once again and resumed their former activity. For a while, nothing could be heard except the sound of their feet on the training room's mats, their spears clacking as they met and clashed off each other. Then Suou asked a question.

"When your plan with Chikane comes through," she said, pausing to wipe at the beaded moisture on her forehead. "I'm curious to know how many of the legates you want to keep with you."

"As many as possible, of course." A short pause, accompanied by a slice towards her temple. She tilted her head to avoid it. "Unless there are strenuous arguments to the contrary. Why, do you wish to return to Hime already, Suou-chan? I would understand if you wanted to."

"No, I've every intention of staying." The frosty eyes met hers. "To be honest, Shizuru-san, I had someone specific in mind when I asked that."

"May I know who it is?"

"Chie-san."

Shizuru jumped a few steps back, wiping damp hair from her forehead.

"Oh?" she said. "You are concerned about my keeping Chie-han?"

Suou nodded.

"For her sake," she explained. "I hope you will pardon me for saying it, Shizuru-san, but it seems to me that Chie-san could have reasons to go back to Hime instead of staying for a full-on campaign, which could go from a year to years."

"To be precise, a reason: Aoi Senou."

"Unlike the rest of us, she has that unfinished business," Suou agreed. "Kenji-san, while also waiting to come home to someone, is at least assured of her waiting for him too. They're already affianced, after all."

"Whereas Chie-han has not that guarantee," the other said wistfully. "Ah, I do feel for Chie-han. If only Senou-han-the father, I mean-were not so stubborn! He could scarce do better than Chie-han for a daughter-in-law and a faithful partner to his daughter! She is as excellent in her sentiments as in her scribal sentences."

"That's so." Suou looked hesitant for a second before adding: "Senou-san is quite conventional, isn't he?"

Rusty eyes twinkled: "You mean to say that his affections lie with the Traditionalists."

"Well, yes."

"Oh, you have no need to say it so delicately, Suou-chan," Shizuru said, with a laugh. "I am aware of it. One of the reasons he opposes Chie-han's suit is because she is part of the opposite camp... or more specifically, part of mine."

Suou heard the guilt in the lightly-spoken words. She rested the knuckles of one hand on her hip.

"It's hardly your fault," she stated positively. "Even without you considered, Chie-san in herself isn't conservative and would never be. Senou-san would still have found something objectionable about her, politically speaking."

"But were Chie-han closely allied to a less suspicious non-conservative instead of me, he would not find her as objectionable, of course," came the retort. "Were that only the case, we know Chie-han's suit would be at least marginally smoother. You need not attempt to allay my guilt by arguing to the contrary."

The other heaved a sigh at that.

"We choose our allies, anyway, and can't hold anyone else responsible for that choice," she said. "But excuse me for bringing it up."

"Oh, no. I suppose I needed to finally say it aloud, in any case."

"Just in case, isn't there someone else in whom Chie-san has an interest, at least? She's an attractive woman. There have to be a dozen others who'd be glad to have her."

Shizuru shook her head, looking amused by the very thought.

"One of Chie-han's best qualities is her loyalty," she told Suou. "She has never been the kind to blow hot and cold in her affairs, and that much may be said of her affections as well."

Suou conceded the point.

"If you say so, I believe it. And I do think so too. She's in love with Aoi-san, isn't she?"

"One could say it is far from a mere infatuation."

"I see. Too bad about the tata ." A pause. "So would you let her go, if she did ask?"

"Of course. Besides, Chie-han's support has worth whether here or in Hime. Outstanding as her performance has been here, one could expect even better from her were she fighting instead in Senate. After all, she would then have the attention of the one she loves upon her, and every person strives to be more outstanding under his beloved's regard."

Shizuru then suggested that they take a break, both to slake their thirst and to rest. Suou agreed and presently found herself on a bench, facing the general and her bodyguard as they rested on another. The older woman was bantering with the girl, drawing half-heartedly sullen responses.

"Natsuki here has a way with words as well," Shizuru remarked to Suou, who lifted her brows in answer. "We were talking the other day about the Mentulaean killings. I told her that I wondered how Midori-han would handle it, since we already provided her with a lead as to the masterminds."

"You left it up to her, I heard."

"It is her province, in the end." Shizuru pressed a towel to her neck. "What we did was adequate. I would hate to encroach on her authority."

"I see."

"In any case, I was pretending to guess at her actions. One of the possibilities I mentioned to Natsuki was a table-meeting with the masterminds, though I also pointed out the difficulties. I told her that it would be quite hard, talking to them diplomatically."

"Yes. And then?"

Shizuru shot a mirthful look at Natsuki before replying: "If that was the case, Natsuki said, perhaps we could just thrash them diplomatically."

Both Himeans chuckled as Natsuki frowned their way. Afterwards, Suou turned a contrite smile to the girl.

"Pardon us, Natsuki-san," she said. "But it was a good answer. See, what you suggested was an actual option."

The Otomeian said and did nothing, although Suou had the impression from her eyes that she was nodding in comprehension. Meanwhile, Shizuru placed a hand on the girl's head and patted it fondly as she asked her about something else. Suou's eyes stayed on them, part-hidden by the platinum fringe of her hair.

"I suppose one could do that, instead," Shizuru was saying. "What if..."

The conversation faded away as Suou took to watching instead of listening to their dialogue.

I know she's unconventional, she thought, but does she really think that's how people treat their bodyguard? She took a sip of water from a ready decanter, trying to hide her smile at the general's affectionate gaze upon the girl. And that's not how they look at them either. How my sister would laugh to see her like this! She looks like an adolescent after her lover.

A sudden insight came to her and she almost let slip a laugh.

Oh, Shizuru-san, you are a rascal, she thought with amusement. Unknown to the other legates, she had actually sparred with Shizuru many times before, only never spoken about it. She was wondering today why the older woman was not as gentle with her as usual, for Shizuru often scaled down her own prowess when they used polearms to allow for the fact that Suou's preferred instrument was not the spear but the sword. Today the woman had not gone easy, and Suou first thought it was in keeping with the act of equal regard they had started ever since this campaign. But then again, there was no one to see the show, was there? No, the only one seeing them was Natsuki.

And it's that audience that matters for another reason, she concluded. In retrospect, she should have seen it earlier in Shizuru's glances whenever she paused to address Natsuki, eyes bright and shimmering. The woman would have died rather than disappoint that exquisitely young thing watching her as though she were the most admirable being ever beheld. But how peculiar to find her so conscious of someone's attention. Or should she call it revealing instead?

Shizuru-san, you are caught! Your words on Chie-san earlier apply to you as well, and that means this is no mere infatuation. She has you in her hand as firmly as a fish trapped in the net!

She looked away for fear she should fall about laughing, her glee shown only in the taut corners of her mouth. What would her sister say about this, she wondered? Surely it was time to write again, to make what she had been hinting at clearer. After all, the truth was that Chikane had suggested her as a legate to Shizuru not only for Suou's experience but also to keep an eye on their beloved friend, whom both considered a third sister. Suou was supposed to be Chikane's eyes and ears, reporting to her anything out of the ordinary.

Suou knew it was not that her older sister lacked faith in Shizuru here. It was, rather, that Chikane was a woman of calculation. There were times, she had explained before Suou's departure, when she felt that Shizuru had a tendency to being too complacent, where a combination of the younger woman's innate self-sufficiency and her sense of embarrassment prevented her from seeking help when it might be essential. This, from someone Suou thought had the same trait! In any case, that was her purpose: to be on the lookout for such occasions.

And if I'm right, Shizuru-san will be needing help on this particular occasion, Suou decided thoughtfully as she pulled out the cord tying back her hair. The pair in front of her was still happily chatting-or one of them was, while the other nodded and mumbled-and for all purposes looked caught up in their own world. She paused to look at them, fascinated by the change the girl could work on Shizuru's attitude and composure. Perhaps even more than fascinated...

This isn't something I can put off any longer. Chikane would want to know, so she could start thinking of something in advance. She should know if there's something to do, or anything that can be done.

Yes, her decision was made. She would write to Chikane as soon as possible and express her judgments in no uncertain terms. How interesting to visualize what the older woman's face would look like, once she received the letter. Suou had to wonder if her sister ever imagined, seeing them off on this venture, that her best friend was going to the north only to encounter a situation nearly the same as she had, not too long ago.

---

"No."

There was silence and then the word was repeated by another voice.

"No?"

"No." Chikane smiled helplessly as she delivered the answer a second time, even teeth coming out in a dazzling exhibition of white. "Haruka-san, were you under the impression that Shizuru informed me before she made her tardy decision to be among this year's praetorian candidates? Close friends she and I may be, but I doubt our relationship would remain so healthy if we ceased to surprise each other at times."

The fiery violet eyes bored into hers, showing flames of doubt.

"So you're saying it was a shock to you too?"

"Yes." Seeing the other's distrustful look, she closed her eyes and sighed lightly. "If you do not believe me, you have leave to ask my wife. She was there when I received the news."

A loud snort. "How can I trust her account? She's your wife ."

"As well as the worst liar in the world." The dense lashes fluttered up, revealing a playful glint in the blue eyes. "Why do you think I never even bothered to attempt concealment of our relationship from the outset? I submit Himeko could not have lied successfully about it to her own mirror-which practice attempt of hers I chanced upon, in fact."

She turned a twinkling eye to Yukino and concluded, with obvious delight for her wife's 'failing': "I am sorry to say not even her own reflection looked convinced."

Again Yukino had to bite her tongue, though to no avail; the chuckle escaped. Haruka, on the other hand, merely harrumphed.

"If she's the only witness, we'll have no choice but to take your word for it, won't we?" she said in her most prosaic tone of voice. "How lucky for you."

"My cousin Urumi was there as well, if you would let another vouch for me."

"Your cousin!" It was clear the name did not inspire confidence in the senior consul, who was still smarting from her first official meeting with that patrician. "Another rule-bending nominee! I guess you're going to tell me her little game with the Plebeian Tribunate was a shock to you too?"

"It was."

"You're the one who endorsed her adoption!"

"Which did not prevent me from having been genuinely surprised prior to that, when she first informed me of her objective," Chikane replied with great calm-something she was aware drove the senior consul to distraction. "My initial reactions out-of-the-way, I fail to see how Urumi's actions constitute 'rule-bending', however. True, they have engendered surprise in many others, but only because it is still beyond most of our aristocratic peers' sensibilities to even consider giving up patrician status. That Urumi is willing to do so, thus going against the common grain, should speak of the strength of her feelings for both the office she seeks and her desire to serve the plebs... not to mention her observance of the rules, since it is only in cognisance of them that she has even come to such a decision."

The thick, brightly-furred eyebrows slanted down angrily. Yukino knew what had set this storm brewing on her friend's brow: the urban praetor's citation of the elevated regard many people still harboured for patricians. Never mind that she had not given any indication of agreeing with it and had only delivered the statement as an accurate description of prevailing attitudes. The fact was that Haruka held a grudge against patricians, deeming nobility the great enemy of the Republic. What was to prevent one of these blue-bloods, she often asked Yukino, from trying to crown himself one day as the King of Hime?

It makes things worse that the one who just reminded her of it is someone so well-bred that her family's name is actually taken from that of the nation itself. The Himemiya could practically trace the cobwebs of the state in their blue veins. Yet they were also known for being a peculiar, if brilliant brood. Against all expectations, no Himemiya had ever even attempted to be dictator, had ever attempted to usurp the powers of the Senate to a truly crown-seeking degree. Yukino herself had an explanation for that. The members of the clan, she felt, had the enviable right to rest with perfect security in their exalted pedigree. Why attempt to be a monarch when it was sufficient for everyone to know that you could be one? No wonder Haruka was wary of them.

There's no guarantee that one will not someday go against the family history, she reasoned out for both her friend and herself. A sudden image of mismatched, blue-and-brown eyes came to her and she added another thought to her musings: It's only more reason to be guarded, when we face their latest, and what looks to be the unruliest, generation.

"It's an insult to the plebs, you mean!" she heard Haruka saying heatedly. "It goes against all tradition to have a patrician become tribune of the plebs!"

"I would not say it goes against all tradition," the other woman replied, still mildly. "Many of the past tribunes actually had patrician blood a few generations along their roots. Some of them intermarried whilst some simply 'turned plebeian' later on. Divers former patrician families' members have taken up seats on the tribunician bench."

"A travesty! The offices of the plebs should be left to the plebs!"

The urban praetor was facing a window now and she looked sidelong at Haruka. The light shining upon her gaze seemed to bring its colour a little closer to that of the other members of her family: the wintry, light blue tint so evocative of a glacier. But the illusion vanished quickly and her eyes were wholly her own again, with depth upon structured depth of fathomless blue waters. Yukino, who was watching her closely, thought that she understood the woman a little better after that vision. Each layer of that mind was stratified, she realised, in the same efficient yet impenetrable logic that scholars claimed stratified the deep seas into supporting life. It was rational and it worked, but the reason was apparent only to its god and owner-and if one was reckless enough to simply plunge into it, there was a distinct possibility of being surrounded by the sharks.

"I recall hearing something of the same kind," the woman was saying gently. "When my grandfather used to tell me about the days our ancestors joined in the movement asking for plebs to be allowed seats in government as well. The naysayers-not all of them patricians-used to cry that 'the offices of the patricians should be left to the patricians'. Interesting, the cycles of history."

Yukino slid a worried gaze to her best friend. The urban praetor's family had historically been one of the first to endorse plebeian rights in political office. The woman herself was married to a plebeian, and one of unmentionable rank too. What could one say to that?

Haruka, being Haruka, found something to say.

"Are you saying you'd like to take those offices back, then?" she said accusingly. "Since they should have been left to patricians?"

Yukino chewed on the inside of her lip at this blatant misinterpretation. Whatever she had expected in reaction from the urban praetor, however, it was not the tinkling laughter that hit her ears, coming from the raven-haired woman at the window.

"Haruka-san, do you think me such a villain?" Chikane asked, producing an astonishingly large and generous smile for the dumbfounded senior consul. "I never even thought of it, what you just suggested. Even had I done so, you would have been the very last person to whom I would express such an idea, vanguard of plebeian rights that you are. Acquit me of stupidity, if you please."

She bowed after this, bending gracefully with her neck.

"Methinks I shall simply have someone pick up those 'papers for litigation' later, as I do have a prior engagement that beckons me irresistibly at this hour. If our walk has concluded, permit me to take my leave now," she said, smiling pleasantly at the two women. "And I believe it has indeed concluded, since we appear to have returned to the very place from which we set out."

Haruka's brow lined with confusion as she glanced quickly around; they were not in the same place they had begun their walk, after all. But the woman beside her was nodding, for Yukino knew what the urban praetor meant.

"Thank you for your time, Himemiya-san," she said now, offering the other senator her exit. The two of them shared a look, dusky olive eyes meeting clear blue ones. It was over in a second. "It was a pleasure walking with you."

"And with you," the woman replied. "Please feel free to call me Chikane, Kikukawa-san. We are not in session any longer and it is allowed of such old colleagues as we are."

Yukino was about to answer in kind when Haruka interrupted, glaring terribly at the other woman.

"Don't think you can mislead Yukino with your charity," she said, making both her companions wonder if she was being ironic or had simply confused the word 'charity' with 'courtesy'. "I wouldn't try anything funny, Himemiya, whether with your cousin or Fujino. I'll have my eye on you."

Something crossed the patrician's face for the briefest instant. Was it annoyance, Yukino wondered? Or amusement?

"That shall be eminently simple to do in the coming year, I expect," came the woman's unruffled answer. "After all, sitting on the consul's chair tends to make one easiest of all to see. Ah, but you would know that better than either Kikukawa-san or I do."

Inclining her head once again, she turned on one heel and left a stiffening Haruka behind, the latter's fists clenching at her insinuation of victory in the elections tomorrow. But that was only Haruka and how Haruka understood it. What the senior consul failed to understand was that the urban praetor had been declaring something other than her certainty of winning a consular seat-since that much was already so obvious that it could be taken for granted. It was Haruka's protégé who took the true meaning of the parting words. The senior consul's seat was in front of the junior's on the curule stage, which meant it was the easier chair to see. Whoever was seated on it, in fact, was the most prominent person on the entire platform.

Chikane Himemiya was saying that she was going to be elected tomorrow as Hime's senior consul.

---

The woman who had just left the head of the Traditionalists with words tantamount to a declaration of war strode along an empty walkway, tapping at the weapon hidden under her clothing. It was her wakizashi, a precaution she had begun to take with her ever since the start of electioneering. She was obliged to mingle with the crowds more often than usual, after all, and had to be mindful of enemies. For the same reason had she taken to using gigs more often than palanquins, because the latter were so slow and easy to ambush. A palanquin borne on servants' shoulders could not intimidate a crowd into parting quickly in an emergency; a small carriage pulled by thunder-hoofed stallions could.

Thus it was a two-horse coach waiting for her now, parked at the side of the building instead of the front. The location was arranged for safety as well. People looking for a senator leaving one of the State edifices tended to look to the front steps of the building, which afforded many an attention-hungry politician his grand entrance or exit, as the case could be. No one expected a senator to leave from one of the side portals, which were so ignored that most of them had been barred up by the keepers. She passed through one of the few still-functioning ones now, shutting the door behind her on hinges creaking from disuse. There were no people around, save for the waiting carriage's handlers and its occupant peering at her.

"What did our senior consul want?"

"To inform me, apparently, that she holds me under suspicion."

A merry laugh: "Of what?"

"Conniving with you and Shizuru for something or other. At any rate, she says she shall 'have her eye on me'. That statement was ominously delivered, and in a manner that would have undoubtedly delighted you, Urumi."

She entered the carriage after these words, ordering the coachmen to start off. The two women soon felt the jiggling motions that meant they were moving on cobblestone roads, and eased themselves into more comfortable positions on seats facing each other.

"Oh, what a poseur!" Urumi was giggling, manifestly pleased by this turn of events. "She is marvellous though, isn't she? All the lines you would find in a standard epic. Or a farce."

The other woman smiled tolerantly at her.

"You were somewhat cruel earlier, you know," she said. "Was all that really necessary?"

"Do you mean to say you didn't enjoy the show?" Urumi asked with near-guileless curiosity. "I have to say, dear Chikane, that I thought you would at least appreciate my performance."

Chikane was conciliatory: "It was frightfully entertaining, yes."

"There you are."

"Indeed. There we probably all are."

There was a short pause after this, during which she looked appraisingly at Urumi.

"Your besetting vice, Dear Cousin, is that you play with people as an already well-fed cat does with a hapless mouse," she said all of a sudden. "Often for no other purpose save your entertainment, and with the cool detachment of a smile."

Her relative's brows went up at this analysis.

"Vice," Urumi countered, "is not always without value. Between the two of us, we've often found good use for my little custom without purposes related to debauchery."

Chikane was not quite able to stifle the smile. Urumi returned to their earlier topic.

"Please don't keep me hanging, it's mean. What did she ask you, exactly?" she demanded. "I'm sure she conducted an outright interrogation, since it's not her style to wander about when there's something she wants to know. God forbid our darling Armitage beat around the bush, else the whole garden end up looking trimmed by a cyclone!"

The older woman paused to contemplate the metaphor, eyes crinkling in good humour.

"She enquired if I was aware of Shizuru's intent of candidature prior to her name being officially registered, as happened a few days past," she said. That candidature had shocked her too, in fact. "She undoubtedly thinks I had a hand in it."

"Ah. And you told her...?"

"The truth."

"How forthcoming of you. You do know that's going to make her even more paranoid that you're telling a lie, right?"

Chikane smirked. Urumi reciprocated the expression.

"Well, I don't see any harm in making them worried," she continued. "What I would like to know is whether you're worried about it, this very moment. You spoke to Marguerite-san yesterday, didn't you?"

"Ah, yes. I did meet her." A short pause. "Shizuru's cousin is an interesting young woman."

Urumi laughed.

"In the same way that people would say of me, Chikane's cousin is an interesting young woman?" she teased.

Her elder chuckled.

"Hardly," was Chikane's answer. "Remarkable as you both may be, I submit I much prefer your characteristics to hers, in a relative."

The asymmetric eyes flashed.

"Then you think the rumours might be true?" she asked. "I've picked up the one about her being involved in a provincial landowner's death, though I'll grant it may simply be an unhappy coincidence that he suffered the seizure at her home and she knows a dozen substances that could conceivably elicit that reaction from his body." She shuddered, though not entirely without enjoyment.

"Apothecaries are always suspect when someone chokes at dinner."

"I would not go so far as to credit that rumour with truth, but I would not be so quick to dismiss it either. It still falls within the range of possibility."

"Always so careful, Chikane! But you think her dangerous?"

"Dangerous? Perhaps." She took a moment to mull over it. "Perhaps the better word is 'venomous'. That seems more fitting a description, especially given her famous specialisation in the area of poisons."

"I notice you don't add 'and their antidotes'."

They shared a glance.

"What saith the venomous Tomoe Marguerite, relation of your dearest Shizuru Fujino? They're related on Shizuru-san's matriarchal side, yes?"

"That is so, though not by blood. Her father married Shizuru's aunt."

"So what did she say?"

Chikane exhaled a weary breath.

"No more than I expected her to say," she revealed. "She claimed that Shizuru gave her the instructions in a letter a month or so ago, and described an agreement Shizuru forged with Takeda Masashi-san, whose timely return to Hime made possible the bill allowing her in absentia candidature. According to Shizuru's cousin, Masashi-san actually agreed to this scheme during his sojourn in the north, where Shizuru approached him on the matter. This is consistent with what Masashi-san has told our man."

"The rumours about that praetorian-hopeful friend in Sardinia being wrong," Urumi added, knowing Chikane had sent her own tame tribune of the plebs to get what he could out of Takeda Masashi. "What else?"

"That was all."

"Then she doesn't know about your scheme to take on the Mentulaeen Empire with Shizuru-san. Or is she feigning ignorance?"

"That, I am inclined to doubt," Chikane answered. "If she is feigning anything, it would be innocence. One wonders what she has to hide that I should get that impression. Nevertheless, I do admit that it is still possible that Shizuru would have asked her to carry out all of this... as Tomoe-san claims."

"Possible, but not likely. It stands more to reason and previous experience that Shizuru-san would have informed you of it first."

"Conceded."

The urban praetor settled herself into the plush covers behind her and sighed. Her hair seemed to melt into the near-black, expensive Tyrian purple of the seat and the contrast made her face look paler than ever.

"Tomoe-san posited some of her own suppositions," she began. "She gave me to think that she believes Shizuru's intent in this plan- assuming it is her plan- is to use the praetorship to break the stranglehold the Senate currently has on her army. Once I am consul, I can arrange for the lot she draws for the governorships to be for a suitably rich province, whereupon she can then claim the right to move her army into that province as part of its garrison. She would also be able to draw upon the State's moneys for her military funding as well, if she does indeed become praetor - governor of a wealthy territory."

Urumi made a sound of agreement.

"All very easily done, of course," she replied. "Shizuru-san is sure to win and it would be a simple enough thing to rig the drawing."

She suddenly cast a knowing look at the older woman.

"Whether or not Marguerite-san is telling the truth that this is Shizuru-san's scheme, it fits nicely into the one you two already have for the Mentulae, doesn't it?" she asked shrewdly. "It may even be beneficial. All you have to do is fix the lots so that the province whose praetor-governor she becomes will be one in the North. Sosia would be ideal, since the governor for Argus seems very likely to be prorogued again."

Chikane nodded and she went on.

"She'll have to come home for the drawing first, of course," Urumi continued. "But provided you're successful at fixing the lots, she can be off again in no more than a month. That way she can still mobilise quickly once you get that declaration of war you're seeking. Why, she'll already be there, or headed that way!"

The dark-haired woman nodded once more. Something was brewing in her mind, however, and Urumi could sense it. The young woman waited for her elder to speak, voluptuously stroking the thick drapes of their conveyance.

"No doubt you shall say I am becoming over-wary in my old age," Chikane finally said, provoking a laugh from the younger patrician-who was well-aware that Chikane had yet to even reach the Himean standard for middle-age or forty. "Yet I cannot help but fear something else being both the result and purpose of this development. Perhaps it is only that this has come so unexpectedly. I cannot help but harbour misgivings about something whose author is still uncertain, since it goes against my knowledge of Shizuru that she should have failed to inform me of this decision."

She closed her eyes meditatively and affected a conciliatory bow of her head as she made her allowances.

"True, there is the matter of our correspondence being much-delayed at the moment owing to various circumstances, but I doubt she would have failed to apprise me of such a scheme while managing to tell her cousin and a tribune-of-the-plebs whom she only recently met. Furthermore, it seems to me that this was not managed in Shizuru's usual style - and that, above all, strikes me as sinister . "

Urumi produced a sound in the back of her throat, urging her to go on.

"These uncertainties render me restless," the older woman disclosed. "Hence I cannot help but fear some nefarious plot running underneath. I can deal with anything adverse if it comes, but perhaps only after it has run a good part of its course already and thus caused some damage. I worry if I have indeed gone through all the undesirable eventualities this could possibly hold for us and made all the possible preparations."

She smiled quietly at the flaxen-haired woman, who had knit her eyebrows together in thought. Urumi understood Chikane's concerns since she was of same mould as the older woman; both of them were most at home with being provocative and dealing out the pivotal strokes. It was more in a conservative's nature to be reactive or on defence. Chikane's personality, in particular, tended for even her reactions to be phrased as provocation, her responses given so far in advance to an opponent's moves that they often prevented the move itself from coming about.

In a situation like this, however, she was forced to await an incoming blow and suffer its effects prior to being given the chance to counter. How irritating to be deprived of the opportunity to dodge! Still, taking a hit was sometimes necessary in brawling. Chikane was hardly a gawky greenhorn unable to weather a little damage, and the same held true of Urumi.

"I appreciate your thoroughness, Cousin, since I always expect it from you," the fair-haired woman said after a moment. "But all your misgivings considered, wouldn't it be best to whittle those myriad 'undesirable outcomes' away until you come to the most uncomplicated ones? There are too many uncertainties, as you say, and we have no choice but to disregard what we don't know at this point. The simplest answer is often best. You yourself taught me this."

Chikane nodded approvingly.

"Well put," she said. "And I did think of that. After putting the razor into practice, however, it struck me that there is a very real possibility of the true function of this scheme being something that may delay our plans against the Mentulae for at least one more year."

She looked straight into the differently-coloured eyes opposite as they stared attentively at her.

"A year of postponement, of course, is not too bad," she allowed. "Which is the only reason you do not see me worrying so much yet. But one cannot tell in matters such as these whether a year is indeed reasonable allowance or not. The Mentulae may decide to launch wide-scale invasion within a year, thus robbing us of the advantage of first strike. Then again, they may not act against us within the same year at all. The ambiguity is unsettling. And I am not the only one who feels so. The true author of this development-of Shizuru's sudden candidature-may well be risking it all on a gamble with popular opinion, if the purpose is indeed as I fear it to be."

Not for nothing was Urumi considered a genius. She heard her cousin's intimations as plainly as though they had been spoken directly to her.

"So that's where you're leaning, hm?" she told the older woman, silvery brows drawing close again in consideration. "I thought of it but didn't know whether to think it more likely than the other possibilities or less so. It's not impossible, either. Do you really think it could turn out that way?"

"You may be even more attuned to the electors than I am. What think you?"

There was the briefest pause.

"Now that I consider it, Shizuru-san just might-"

Any following words suddenly turned into a shriek. Urumi was unable to continue as a whirlwind tore through the shut drapes of the carriage and burst upon them, jerking their conveyance into a halt. Loud voices rang outside, at least a couple recognisably belonging to the urban praetor's servants riding outside the carriage. The coach rocked slightly on its wheels, the frightened horses reined in and clucked to by a groom. Once the beasts finally quieted down, it was the murmuring of the bystanders that seemed to grow in volume. What on earth had happened to the urban praetor's gig?

One of the coachmen finally realised that he had better check to see if his mistresses were all right. He stood outside the lightly fluttering drapes, now concealing the trap's interior, and called to the people inside. There was no reply. He called out once more, swallowing nervously. Still no answer came from within, however, and he pulled back the drapes with trepidation.

Whatever evil picture the man expected to see went flying away as he found a remarkable tableau: his still-seated mistress pinning an unkempt figure to the floor of the coach and brandishing her unsheathed wakizashi, while the mistress's cousin sat pressed into the seat opposite with eyes wide open. He breathed out his gratitude to the gods, thankful for the domina's skill and admiring the swiftness that had allowed her to get the upper hand even in surprise. He would have relieved her of the culprit when she suddenly pulled the trespasser up and- How bizarre! -flashed that person an easy grin. The culprit grinned back.

That was when he recognised just who had barged into their carriage.

"Mikoto-chan, I welcome you," the domina said, petting the girl's cheek tenderly with the hilt of her blade. "I do wish you would give warning the next time you do that, though, so you do not alarm my men. See how you have frightened them."

She turned to face the servant looking in through the drapes.

"You see who it is," she said simply. "All is well."

The man nodded and pulled away to see to the horses again. Meanwhile, the cause of commotion rolled happily on the seat next to Urumi, Chikane having relinquished her grasp.

"Mii-chan, you scamp!" Urumi was saying to the bouncing girl. "You gave me a turn with that entrance. That was an excellent jump, I daresay."

There was a soft metallic screech in front of her and she glanced to see Chikane returning the wakizashi to its sheath. Chikane saw the look and returned it with her smile. Urumi exhaled in a whistle of staged relief.

"You're lucky Chikane's reflexes are just as good at stopping as they are at swinging," the blonde chided their latest companion, helping smooth down her dishevelled clothes. "Else cousin Reito would be one sister less. What in the world are you doing here? Shouldn't you be with your pedagogue or something?"

The younger sister of the Princeps Senatus shook her head, sending two long braids waving from what was otherwise a closely-cropped mane. She beamed at the older woman with an untrammelled smile.

"I wanted to see you," she said cheerfully, before pulling aside one of the drapes and poking her head out of the carriage as she went on. "I was with Mai but she was talking to someone! I think she's done talking. Mai! Maaiii!"

Urumi and Chikane exchanged looks as she screeched the well-known senator's name. One might have thought that instead of calling to such an important woman, she was calling to heel a pet.

"Mikoto!"

The call was from outside, audible enough for the occupants of the carriage to hear the reprieve in it. Chikane leaned over to pull the drapes aside entirely, thus baring not only the squealing girl's head but her body as well as that of the other riders of the coach.

"You shouldn't just vanish like that!" the woman rushing their way was saying with exasperation. The sunlight seeded fire into her hair as she came forth, her ginger locks tousled by the wind. "It worri-oh! Hello, Chikane-san, Urumi-san! I'm so sorry about that. She just disappeared on me, you see."

"Don't worry, Tokiha-san. We know what a handful Mikoto can be," Urumi answered, with an affectionate ruffle for said handful's head. She waited for the senator to reach their carriage, smiling down at her.

Chikane spoke next.

"Good day to you, Mai-san," she said, giving a smile of utmost charm. "Would you prefer to collect Reito-kun's errant charge or would you allow us to collect you, that you may come to dinner at my house? Our conservative friends, I hear, have a gathering tonight. It might satisfy their inclinations to suspicion if we did the same. I would hate to disappoint their most basic expectations."

She paused and gave the chuckling woman on the ground a significant look as she went on.

"Perhaps we may even humour them by taking up discussions on the same things they shall. One fancies it easy to guess at the subjects, certain noteworthy events having taken place."

The red-headed senator's eyes showed understanding that Chikane was referring to the announcement of Shizuru's in absentia candidature, but they showed hesitation as well. Chikane wondered what it was that made her pause and-for just a second-was tempted to entertain a flicker of worry. But then the senator standing below her smiled brilliantly and lifted both arms in a gesture of apology.

"I'd love to, Chikane-san," she said repentantly. "I really would. But I'm afraid I've already promised Mikoto dinner at my place, and she's been holding it over my head for three days now. We were on our way to my home, in fact, when she bolted into your carriage."

Chikane nodded, already formulating the proper regretful response. The other woman beat her to it, however, and produced what she found to be an excellent alternative.

"But I'd be very happy if you and Urumi-san came over," Mai told her, with a hopefulness that contained heart-warming authenticity. "And I'd be thrilled if you brought your wife too, if she's willing to sample my dinner."

She slanted her head to one side and looked quietly embarrassed.

"I'm sure it's probably simple stuff compared to your usual fare, but-"

"On the contrary, Mai-san, I have no doubts it will be exceptional," the urban praetor interrupted, extremely pleased that her spouse had also been invited without any perceptible trace of derision. That was quite unexpected. But then she remembered that derision was rare indeed from the woman in front of her. "Consider us your willing guests. I trust Urumi desires to accept as well."

Urumi answered in the affirmative, causing a wide smile to break out on Mai's face. Chikane held a hand out to the red-haired senator and beckoned her into the vehicle.

"Do get in, Mai-san, and we shall save you the walk," she said, fluidly helping the woman into their midst. "If you would permit us to pass by my abode first, however, I shall pick up my wife in order to let her honour your gracious request."

"Oh, yes, please do so."

"Thank you." A pause to let their host for tonight settle in. "We may set off. You are ready, Mai-san?"

The eyes that came up to meet hers flashed a bright, dazzlingly-hued purple. Chikane was reminded suddenly of the two other sets of purple eyes she had seen today: one belonging to a woman who woke up with her in the same bed and another belonging to a woman who had been set on making it clear that she was an adversary. This day was one of purple eyes, she thought, and of women. Should she consider it a sign that all day her thoughts seemed to have constantly centred on another, faraway woman whose eyes were coloured crimson joined with her own blue was a necessity for producing a supreme violet? If it was indeed a sign, it was a sign of what?

She sighed to herself, hiding the wistful expression from her companions. Who would have known that she would harbour the same misgivings as the senior consul, had the same fear of someone plotting something unpleasant? And why this uncomfortable powerlessness to guard against it, even as it loomed on the very horizon? Why all of this so suddenly and now?

Shizuru, My Friend, she found herself thinking, almost as though speaking to the woman herself. If only you were here you could clarify my doubts for me. But you are not, and I must wonder at what is happening. Not only to you but to us. For whatever clouds are approaching head your way as much as mine, and I am so strangely afraid that, in your part of the sky, you have no way yet of seeing them as they come.

"Yes, we should go now, Chikane-san," Senator Tokiha was saying, breaking into her silent meditations. Chikane reacted instinctively by conferring a standard smile upon the woman, only to receive in response an unusually warm, yet still very lucid one. The latter could sense some of the concerns troubling her, she apprehended, and was silently offering support.

"We do have a lot to talk about," the redhead ventured good-naturedly. "But that can come later, I think, after we've all had a good dinner. It's hard to keep yourself in good spirits on an empty stomach, right, Mikoto?"

Mikoto chirped in agreement. Chikane smiled in answer, suddenly glad to have this woman as an ally. She parted the carriage's drapes and peered at the driver outside.

"As you were," was all she needed to say, and soon they were moving along again.

Chapter 30

Thank you to the reviewers and readers, as ever.

Vocabulaire :

1. Bona Dea - The good goddess; a deity more fully detailed in the last part of Chapter 27 . The use of the name here is the same as when one would say "Jupiter!" or more proper to the modern context, "God!" In other words, it is used as an exclamation.
2. Censors and their investigations - The censors of Rome, who also regulated the member rolls of the Senate, were in charge of expelling them from that governing body if they contravened the rules regulating senatorial conduct. Some of these rules concerned the acceptable methods for a senator to make money (see note on senators and moneymaking below).
3. Contubernalis - A military cadet; a contubernalis coming from a reasonably upper-class family was often kept in the command tent, far away from the fighting.
4. Denarii (pl.) - The singular form is 'denarius'. The denarius is a Roman coin, often made of silver. 6,250 of it make a silver talent or 25,000 sesterces.
5. Domina - The English equivalent would be "mistress" or "madam".
6. Femina mentula - A lethal insult to a man; literally "a woman with a penis".
7. Gerrae! - In English, "Rubbish!" or "Nonsense!"
8. Hispania Ulterior - (L.) in English, Further Spain. In Roman times, Spain was divided into two parts, and the one that was more distant from Rome was called Hispania Ulterior. It was the more important Spain, during that time, to the Romans, especially because its mountains were rich with ore. Modern-day Cádiz lies there.

9. Ineptus - A n incompetent, a bungling fool.

10. Senators and moneymaking - A senator had limited paths open to him in the realm of business. The most acceptable method was in the ownership of property/real-estate, although owning shares in companies was also permitted. The most he could do with the latter was to get a sleeping partnership in the company, which meant that he had no seat in its board of directors and had no say in how the company was managed. All he could be was a source of capital. If a senator went beyond these methods in moneymaking, he could be expelled by the censors (see note on censors and their investigations, above). Hence the senatorial squabbling over potential campaigns and their command, since it was one of the few legal ways a senator could hope to make money-chiefly from his lawful share of the campaign's booty.

11 . Stimuli - Singular is "stimulus". These were the fire-hardened, pointed stakes used to mine military ditches.

12 . " Tace!" - In English, "Shut up!"

13 . Vestal / Vestal Virgin - One of the women ordained to serve in the priesthood of the goddess Vesta; from induction to the time they finished their terms thirty years later, they had to remain chaste (virginal) so that Rome could stay in good favour with the goddess. Vestal chastity was jealously guarded since it symbolised the fortune of Rome itself; if sullied, Rome's fortune would be as well. After those thirty years of chastity were over, however, they were released from their vows and allowed to marry and (speaking euphemistically) do as they pleased.

Shizuru stirred in bed, searching the room to ascertain the time of her waking. There was only darkness, however, and when she turned to the direction of the window she saw the bluish glow that meant the stars were still in the sky. She turned away from that luminescence and to the shadows again so that her eyes could grow accustomed to the dimness. After a while of this, she could make out the vague shapes of things in the room.

One shape was clearer than the rest and it breathed softly beneath her. It was Natsuki, asleep and naked from their lovemaking. Her body was covered by Shizuru's limbs under the blanket, and the slim length of her felt cool and smooth to the latter woman's skin. Shizuru peered at her face, in profile since her head was turned to one side.

Moving gently and trying not to wake the girl, she rose up to kiss the exposed cheek. She moved down again to rest her head on the bare chest, something she loved to do because it calmed her so much faster than anything else ever had.

She loved too that she could hear the young woman's heart. Her ear was on one of the small, soft breasts and she felt its tip remain supple as she put her weight against it. But it had been different earlier, she remembered, when she held it in her palm. It had been soft then, yes, and small too, but rounded with heat and firm-pointed against her flesh. How nice it would be to hold it like that now. She felt her face redden and frowned at herself for even thinking about rousing the girl from her sleep for that purpose. Natsuki deserved her rest, especially given the exertions through which Shizuru had put her earlier.

Shizuru herself had to marvel at it. In the past, she had often heard people widely considered 'degenerates' boast of spending uninterrupted afternoons or even days in bed with the object of their passion, but had always thought it empty swank. Now she herself spent nearly every afternoon- and on two occasions, the entire day- in bed this past week with her lover, who was just so lusciously accommodating that Shizuru found it nigh impossible to exercise restraint. They certainly did not spend that time sleeping, either, and seemed to allocate only a minimum of time for the necessity. Oh yes indeed, she marvelled at it! Was this behaviour a sign that she had become 'degenerate'? She liked to think not, or not until she became so crass that she felt the need to boast of their nightly excesses to others.

One can hardly fault me for acting this way with such temptation as I have, she pretended to comfort herself, listening to the sluggish beating of Natsuki's heart. Natsuki could crack the resolve of a Vestal in her prime. Even one word from her is enough to torture the most resolute ascetic.

It was the voice that was responsible for that delicious persecution. It did things to her she could not define, and she doubted she would ever understand the effect. How had Chie described it? Like black fur brushing skin. Yes, it was like that. Low and soft in approach, with just enough intimation of something predatory underneath to be devastating. Exactly like that. Chie certainly knew how to put things well.

What Chie had not described, however, was the special style conveyed by that voice. Since Natsuki rarely spoke to the legate, it was only natural for Chie not to notice the girl's odd manner of speech. Being her most constant confidante, Shizuru was the one who did notice. After all, it played havoc with her as much as the voice itself did. She could still remember their conversation earlier when the other woman's speech had played so much havoc with her that it spurred her into initiating several rounds in bed. They had just finished doing the deed once, in fact, when the exchange took place.

"Ahh," she had been sighing, feeling the last tingles of pleasure all the way to her tongue. "Oh, Jupiter, methinks I almost died."

Natsuki had bolted up from her side of the bed, looking distraught.

"What?" she asked then with some alarm. Her eyes were on Shizuru's hand, resting over the older woman's heart. "Why? What is wrong? Not all right?"

Shizuru looked at her and chuckled, reaching out to guide her gently back down. The girl obeyed a little unwillingly, eyes still riveted to her as she stretched lazily on the covers.

"Do not worry so much," Shizuru coaxed, propping herself up on one elbow. "Come now, be at ease. I meant no ill by it, Natsuki."

She gazed at the black hair spread out in rivulets over the sheets. The river-length of it always fascinated her, even after Natsuki explained that her people rarely cut their hair and usually trimmed only to keep it hanging a little past the waist. Some let it grow even longer, working into it those handsome tiny braids and either letting it hang thus ornamented or catching those braids into knots, whorls-all manner of loops-atop their heads. Very rare it was that an Otomeian settled for the simplicity of a single and unornamented tail or a twisted bun, though there was no shortage of complicated modifications of those either.

It was only one of the myriad disparities between their cultures. While it was true that many Himeans sported long hair too, most had no qualms about cropping their hair to a mere two inches' length. Witness the short hair on many of her soldiers' heads, for example. But to Otomeians it was as much a point of custom as of pride to wear it long, and so it was to Natsuki too. Shizuru could not speak for the rest, but she certainly did find reason for pride in the girl's luxuriously dark mane.

"I did not mean anything ominous by it," she said, while running a finger through one of the raven locks nearby. She picked out one of the few braids the girl had woven in, less than half the thickness of a finger and owing most of its weight to little bands of thin gold thread. "It is no more than an expression we have, and is not meant in the literal sense of dying and losing life."

The Otomeian's face changed. She had a look Shizuru knew, recognising in it something she often portrayed herself. It was the face of a person quietly sorting out new categories, carefully making room for information in the stock of what she already knew.

"You are not bad?" she asked, no longer so anxious. "All right?"

"Yes. Quite the opposite of 'bad', in fact. Such is that expression."

Natsuki nodded against the sheets as she repeated the word carefully-something Shizuru noticed she did often, especially with words that seemed to fascinate her.

"Expression," she murmured. "An expression."

"Yes, an expression," Shizuru said. "A poetic conceit, you might say, meant to express one thing by comparing it to another. It means that you experience such pleasure your soul leaves your body in ecstasy, as though you were dying."

"Oh, that," Natsuki said, as though discovering what she meant for the first time. "Yes."

"You understand now?"

"Yes."

She nodded thoughtfully afterwards before speaking again.

"I die too."

"Do you?" Shizuru asked, fascinated by the strange statement. "Really?"

"Yes." Natsuki took a leisurely breath. "Each time, I die."

"Each time?"

"Mm."

The words echoed in her mind: Each time, I die.

What a curious way to phrase it, she had thought then, looking at the girl's lips as they moved. What a very foreign way.

It was true, she thought, that Natsuki spoke their language very well. She spoke it absent any foreignness of accent, and indeed seemed to have a talent for picking up pronunciations almost instantly, upon being told how a written word that interested her should be spoken. But there were times when the manner in which she used the Himean language showed how distant it was from her. The pronunciation was perfect enough to be local but the construction was so different it bordered on alien. She could go from sounding like a child to a poet, and Shizuru thought her style had the ring of truth always because it expressed that which was complex as though it were simple.

She grinned to herself at this appraisal and thought, This is of her too and hers alone.

"Then," she had ventured. "Is it so pleasurable for you as well?"

The colour scalded Natsuki's face even as she answered with a mumble.

"Um." A second later: "Yes."

Shizuru looked at her a little proudly.

"Wonderful," she told the girl. "I would like you to feel that kind of pleasure when you are with me."

And she added, with more tenderness: "Each time."

Natsuki said nothing to that, looking away in another of her weak efforts to hide embarrassment. She only moved one of her hands so it was brushing Shizuru lightly on one lean thigh. After a while, when the latter was beginning to wonder why the blush on the girl's face refused to go away, she finally explained its persistence by stammering out something very unexpected to the older woman.

"Thuh-thank you."

Shizuru's jaw dropped even as a smile fought to close it. She stared at her companion while delivering a reply.

"For what are you thanking me, Natsuki?" she said, already knowing what it was the girl deemed worthy of gratitude. What odd courtesies she could have! Still, one had to admit they were part of her oh-so-exotically-alien charm. "You need not. It is only natural that I should hope always for your satisfaction, and more than that, if possible. You must not expect any less from your lover."

Natsuki's complexion darkened further at the word 'lover', and Shizuru was tempted to repeat it. She did not do so immediately, however, and merely looked at the girl as she continued to flush, choking out words in the attempt to explain herself.

"Still I said that because I think, um," she babbled, as Shizuru had realised she was wont to do when flustered. "It is puh-puh-proper to duh-do that because you are, um, you are..."

She shook her head as she lost what she had been about to say.

"You are-" she tried again.

"Your lover."

The large eyes looked up at Shizuru's interruption. The older woman repeated it.

"I am your lover," she clarified mildly.

An odd sound left Natsuki's lips, and Shizuru had to steel herself not to laugh at the awkwardness of it.

"You're blushing again," she said with some mischief. "You do blush quite often, do you not?"

Natsuki scowled at the quip, nearly snapping out her answer.

"No," she lied shamelessly, looking indignant. "No."

Again that pride!

"Is that so?"

"Yes."

"Yet you are blushing now."

Natsuki shut her mouth and turned away again, looking to the other side in a childish show of displeasure. But Shizuru continued watching her and so when the girl peeked to see what she was doing she only found the older woman looking at her the same way as before, the flirtatiously-lashed eyes studying her with all their blood-infused intensity.

She mirrored their colour with her cheeks again and Shizuru giggled.

"Yuh-you do that," Natsuki said grudgingly, after a few more chuckles had sounded. "You make me do it."

Shizuru smiled apologetically.

"I force you into it?" she asked.

"Uhm, no."

"Yet you say I make you do it?"

A confused look.

"Would you like me to stop?" she asked. She saw the sudden indecision her query brought to Natsuki's face, and spoke again. "I know I must be intolerable at times. So, as I thought, if you want me to stop-"

"No!"

Shizuru allowed a small grin to come to her face.

"So you do not want me to stop?" she exhaled, practically dripping curiosity.

Natsuki was mortified, the colour on her face eclipsing that which had been there before.

"Nuh-no, you can, Shizuru," she stammered. "You can or not. You can do it."

"Now you are making me confused."

"That you can if you want," came the still-embarrassed reply. It carried a touch of exasperation now and Shizuru realised the girl was annoyed at herself for having difficulty saying what she wanted. She felt bad for teasing her then. "It is fine to do it if you, um, if you want. I will not be troubled."

Shizuru let some time pass to let the girl calm a little.

"That is very kind of you," she eventually said. "But is that really what you want?"

The hand resting on her thigh went up. Fingers brushed the proud ridge of her hipbone and lingered.

"It is what you want," the girl said, once again with her simple complexity. "What you want, I want that. Always."

Shizuru blinked, affected in some inexplicable way by that answer.

"You want that," she echoed later. "Natsuki?"

"Mm. That."

Natsuki looked at her then, with eyes that were suddenly impatient and full of hunger. Shizuru understood and moved too.

"Come to me and I shall show you what I want," she said, gathering her up and kissing her. "I want to have you die again." She continued kissing her, the younger woman returning the kisses. "And then I want to summon you back to life."

"Shizuru."

"Always, and each time."

So it was that they had fallen to making love over and over again, with the driving sweetness of people completely satisfied with yet unable to tire of each other. And after that, had fallen asleep from sheer physical exhaustion, still in this undressed state. She had been too worn out earlier by their exercises to do more than glance at the water-clock in the room, noting only vaguely that it was too early to go to sleep since it meant they would wake at an ungodly hour later. She had gone to sleep anyway. Now she was awake, and it was indeed an ungodly hour, but she did not repine any of their actions for it.

She shall wake soon as well, she told herself, feeling contentment settling dully over the need to touch the other that way again. Natsuki had much the same sleeping patterns she did, which meant they often slept and awoke within minutes of each other. So she could be patient. Or she could go about her ablutions, since she had neglected to do so earlier before sleeping.

No, a bad idea. It was too chilly and there was no one to draw hot water. Besides, it was better to wait for Natsuki to wake so they could perform that daily ritual together. Oh, how nice to be with someone who was also fanatical in matters of hygiene! She could not even begin to imagine being with someone who did not smell sweet or did not engage in plucking body hair to guard against revolting things like lice. Let the others make the jests and call her pernickety. At least this way she was sure she and Natsuki could enjoy more of each other: there was nothing to mar the taste.

So that went onto the list: bathe together. Other necessities like replenishing themselves with a meal followed. What else did she have to do come morning? Check in with the centurions, see that the legionaries were behaving. The coldest part of winter had started and inertia in extreme conditions tended to make the veterans jittery. Have them continue drills but cut the frequency, just to make sure they stayed fit but not overwrought. Continued discipline would also serve as a hint to the rankers that there was another, more profitable campaign being planned by their superiors. Best to give them that hope: the promise of real fighting with real booty in the future.

What else, what else? Oh, finding good ballistae and artillery-makers from the locals to help their engineers. They had not brought nearly enough pieces from Hime, intending to get most of the supply from the local artificers. It was easy enough and also necessary for the coming invasion. Siege engines could be wonderful things even on the march if they were not too large and cumbersome. She did not need anything too large and cumbersome. She wanted nothing that could slow her down.

Then to find guides and accumulate information about the area. Study the terrain, memorise its features. It was never too early to begin preparations when going into foreign territory, and part of that preparation was to learn the lay of the land until it was no longer so foreign. The coming expedition would cover a large area and that meant a lot of marching. She needed to see as many of the routes as possible early on. She had heard there were fewer roads, though, than should be for so much land. That was troublesome. The Mentulaeen rulers obviously did not grasp the concept of mobility and its advantages. Most of the walking would have to be done on unpaved soil, not on roads that made it easier for the legionaries. Never mind. If there were none, she would make the roads where they needed them.

Having wholly reconciled herself to this invasion, she was now only waiting for the official sanction of it. Once her friend took the consul's chair-and Chikane was certain to do so-the only question left was how fast the woman could obtain Senate's approval. A hard task, perhaps even monumental. But knowing Chikane told her it would still happen, probably within a month or two. Ample time for her to make the necessary preparations.

Have the elections not been held yet, she wondered. Surely they had. She doubted the House was feeling lenient enough to permit the elections to be delayed any longer than they already were, errant senior consul present or not. It was already so late and the new year was fast approaching. She looked up to see the round, dark object on the sheet near Natsuki's neck and recalled that it had been more than a week since she had given that ornament to the girl. That had been over a week before the Calends of January; Natsuki received the pearl the morning after Shizuru's birthday.

To think that it was only a few more days before the start of a new year. How queer to realise that the old one was almost finished! The latter part had gone by quickly, or so it seemed. Perhaps that was because she had enjoyed it so much? So it was true what they said, that time flew when you were happiest.

She put a stop to her reflections when she felt a change in the body beneath her. Natsuki was waking. Good. Smiling inwardly, she had an idea to play a little prank on the girl by pretending to be asleep, but also restricting Natsuki's movement with the weight of her body. Natsuki would not be able to rise from the bed, nor engage in her usual secret attentions whenever she thought the older woman was sleeping. She wondered what the girl would do.

Thus she waited. It was not long before she felt the girl's head stir, trying to peek at her. It fell back onto the pillows after receiving no sign of consciousness. All was suddenly still again, and a few minutes went by this way, without excitement.

Oh, I almost forgot, Shizuru thought wistfully, nearly releasing a sigh and thus breaking her own farce. Of course she would simply wait. Natsuki is nothing if not patient, come things like this. This sort of game with her is of little use.

She did not give it up, however, and simply satisfied herself with resting there. It was not a bad place to be, after all. Natsuki was such a pleasant medley of contrasts, all gentle contours and sharply sloping angles in her spare frame. Shizuru might actually have fallen asleep again had that spare frame not stirred, its owner calling gently to her.

"Shizuru?" went the whisper. "Shizuru?"

She wondered if the girl had caught on.

"Uhhh..."

The mumble was succeeded by an attempt to slide out from under the prison of her limbs. Shizuru smiled privately, apprehending that the other woman wanted to go somewhere and was being held down by her supposedly asleep body. Natsuki tried to move her again with a gentle motion. Since she was larger and heavier than the girl, however, it was in vain. All the more so since she had taken to using a breathing trick, shown to her by a past instructor, that had the effect of making her weight seem to be greater.

Natsuki apparently felt the change.

"Shizuru?"

She continued 'sleeping'. Another minute of silence went by, broken only by the girl's occasional calls.

"Shizuru," Natsuki said again, before wriggling in another attempt to move her. "Shizuru, pardon me, I am... umm."

Ah, yes, that voice. It really was a pity the girl was not a talker!

"Shizuru," it went again. "Shizuru? Shizuru?"

There was a subtle difference there. She could not be sure, but it seemed that the young woman sounded a little more insistent, almost beseeching. She frowned to herself, wondering if Natsuki had discovered the game.

"Hnn-Shizuru, are you..."

The rest faded into a delicate jumble of foreign words that rolled over one another, lulling her with their softly guttural notes. She listened to them, captivated by the unfamiliarity of the sounds. As she listened, Natsuki continued trying to move her, failing again and again. Dimly, Shizuru noted that the girl's attempts were becoming slightly more forceful, her trapped arms moving more clumsily. But she was too enchanted by that deep, melodious voice muttering unintelligibilities to really pay attention to it, and so Natsuki's struggles continued, her pleas eventually devolving into hoarse, strangely urgent whispers.

" Shizuru! " came a harsh gasp. "Hhhah-Shizu-Shizuru!"

That was when Shizuru saw that something was wrong.

Why does she sound like that, she wondered, tempted for a second to turn her head and check if there was anyone else in the room. But she knew there was no one: she would have heard them herself and Natsuki would have at least given a shout to alert her of it. Or reached for the dagger she always kept nearby, either by the headboard or on the nightstand. Why, whatever could be bothering her if not-?

Her train of thought broke as Natsuki's body suddenly went dead like one asleep. But it was not like sleep in that it held a rigidity to it, and that was enough to bring Shizuru out of her detachment. Even more when the older woman felt the heartbeat under her ear erupt, the tense form beneath her spasming almost into convulsion. She jerked up, hands set on either side of the younger woman's body, and looked down upon an alarming sight.

"Natsuki."

The whisper left her lips, amazed and afraid. The girl lying below her was shaking uncontrollably, eyes blind and staring up unseeingly at the still-dark ceiling. No, not blind, not unseeingly . She was seeing something Shizuru could not see, some immense fear taken form in the shadows, and it was terrifying her.

"Natsuki!" Shizuru cried, frightened too. " Ecaster! Natsuki, what is it?"

She shook the girl with one hand, pulling her up swiftly to sit on their bed. Still the fit continued, and Shizuru was afraid the young woman was having an episode of some malign disease, as was the case with people who had the wheezes or epilepsy. But the young woman's eyes were not rolling upwards, her mouth issuing no froth. Her gaze was not insentient; it was just turned to another world. She kept staring up and forward into somewhere Shizuru could not reach. Had Shizuru only been able to do so she would have beaten back whatever figment made the girl this way, slain it for all eternity. But she could no more reach it than see it, and it continued to torture Natsuki and Natsuki alone.

"Ye gods!"

She leapt off the bed and took the young woman in her arms, fear fuelling her so soundly that she made it to the bathing room in scarcely five seconds. There she knelt and set the quivering body on the tiled floor, reaching into the cistern for some water. She cupped some in one hand and splashed it onto the ashen face.

"Natsuki, look at me!" she demanded, drawing the girl up with her other arm. "Natsuki, listen to me. Natsuki! "

As if weakened by her voice, the shivers began to diminish. She spoke again and again until Natsuki's eyes fluttered, the green irises coming out from that awful flatness and seeming to regain depth.

Shizuru took heart at the change.

"Natsuki, listen to me," she repeated urgently. The younger woman's eyes twitched away, then towards her. It was as if she were seeing Shizuru only now. "Come back to me, meum mel . Please come back to me."

Natsuki responded with a gasp, drawing air more loudly than Shizuru had ever heard her do. The Himean could feel the girl's hands clawing and scratching onto her skin, one hand on her upper arm and another on her back. She cupped the back of Natsuki's head and chafed it soothingly with her thumb, ignoring the clipped nails digging into her own bare flesh.

"Shhh, it's all right, it's going to be all right," she assuaged, her low voice slipping into the younger woman's ears like a charm. "It's fine, Natsuki. I have you."

Relief flooded her when the girl finally nodded, breaths slowing and becoming quieter. She held her that way for a while, unmindful of the discomfort coming to her knees from the achingly hard and cold floor. All she could focus on feeling was Natsuki's body, loosening slowly from whatever dread nightmare had twisted it around itself and coiled the whole so tightly it had almost snapped. Her own body was coiled-up too, tense with frustrated energy, and her mind was racing.

Ye gods, what was that, she thought. She tried to still her own pounding heart with a few deep breaths as she thought of what had just happened and attempted to dissect it, tried to find an answer for all her questions. What could have caused this? Could it be she has an illness? But no, she has never shown anything of the kind until now. I doubt it has something to do with the soundness of her body. What was that, then?

Something was whispering to her in her memories and she gave her attention to it, hoping it could provide answer. Where had she seen something like this happen before? That sudden paroxysm, the open eyes focusing on something unseen. She had seen it before, she was sure of it. Where and from whom?

Oh. By Jupiter!

She had to restrain herself from banging her head on the floor as she realised the answer. Of course she had seen it before. Quite a few times, in fact, though rarely of such paralyzing violence as she had just witnessed. It was a symptom of what the Greek physicians called a mental trauma, the manifestation of some past harm done to a person's psyche. She recalled that they held it to be the residue of a malign event the person had either witnessed or experienced, and could be summoned up by certain triggers reminding them of that event. It was something common among soldiers or war victims, and in such people had she herself seen it.

One of the cases she had been privy to had involved a fellow contubernalis, on her first campaign. It had been that other youth's first war as well and like most upper-class cadets, he had not expected to be thrust into actual danger while doing scribal duties in his commanding officer's tent. A good way from the front lines, that! But an enemy band had somehow skirted round the battlefield and ambushed their marching camp, taking the members of their cohort prisoner and executing them one by one. The youth had been among those at the end of the execution line, so he was one of the few saved by the relief force sent to retrieve the camp. The damage, however, was done. He had seen nearly all his comrades impaled in execution and it stained his nerves forever. Shizuru could still recall the vicious twitching that broke out in him whenever he saw spears or even mere stimuli lying around their camp. It had been such that he could never go into battle again.

In Natsuki's case, she supposed that what she had triggered was a remembrance of the massacre of the young woman's kin. From what little she knew of that event, Natsuki had survived by being hidden under their dead bodies. Only natural for the girl to have such a violent trauma, then! But how thoughtless it had been on her part not to remember that! She should have known or at least considered how her little game would affect the young woman. This was her fault and she was furious with herself for it. How could she have done this to Natsuki?

"Forgive me, Natsuki," she murmured, in between endearments. "I did not think. It's all right now. It was my fault. Please forgive me for it."

Her fault; very much her fault. She said that, yet part of her begged to differ. How could she have known, after all, that such a thing would cause this reaction? How, when she knew so little about the girl on the whole? And things like this were what she needed to know, really, if she had to know anything at all. She needed to know them! Look at what had happened due to her ignorance, what it had wrought upon Natsuki. Oh, but it showed how remiss she had been! She had not yet done everything she could do to learn more about this young woman now trembling lightly in her arms, the selfsame young woman that accompanied her everywhere and saw everything of her in the daylight. She knew nothing of the demons that this girl had or of the dreams that lit her vision, yet she held her each dark and delicate night.

Yes, she knew hardly anything. And yet her heart still broke to see Natsuki this way.

"Shh. You shall be fine now. I have you."

A pitiful whimper sounded, and she redoubled her caresses to soothe Natsuki into silence again. She whispered and heard the strangeness of her own voice husky with pain.

"It's all right, Natsuki. Whatever it was, it is gone. I am here."

What a strange quality it had, this pain. Tied-up and bunched in her throat straight down to her chest, where it seemed her heart was being pulled by each whimper coming from the girl's lips. Remorse and concern and empathy and sorrow: all those things were bound in the two of them, both where they touched and did not touch. And nakedly embracing as they were, there were so many areas where they did not touch. Shizuru had known that before but had never fully apprehended it until now. Now it was the full awareness of it, more than the freezing-cold tiles, that sent a chill through her core.

I could have prevented this, she berated herself, holding Natsuki tighter in an effort to keep away the grief that was suddenly assaulting her. I could have. But I did not because I did not know. And that is my failure, not an excuse. To say that you did not because you did not know is the excuse of the feckless!

The young woman's voice cut through her concerns. Oh, that her voice should be weakened this way!

"Shizu-Shi-"

"It's all right. I am here, Natsuki," she said again to the whispers, trying to keep as much of the girl as possible from touching the floor. She did not want her to be chilled any further, and the girl's skin already felt cold and damp. She was sweating, the poor darling. "Better now?"

There was a mumble of assent, followed by an attempt to say something that she cut off, after recognition of the coming word.

"Shizuru," Natsuki whispered. "I am sorr-"

"No. Do not be sorry."

"But-"

"Please do not be sorry for anything. I apologised because I had reason to be, whereas you have none."

Then, as an afterthought: "Although you may if it would make you feel better, Natsuki, but rest assured you have no compelling reason to do so."

Natsuki mumbled incomprehensibly into her chest, and she stroked her once more.

"It's all right," she said another time, both to Natsuki and to herself. "It shall be better now."

I swear it. Upon my word, I swear it shall be better.

She knew what she had to do. This was something that had only returned a long-standing concern to her attention and galvanised her to finally act upon it. There were things she had to find out, and some of them by herself, because she knew it would be too cruel to ask Natsuki. She would have to begin with those she could not ask the girl, because those would tell her the beginnings of it all.

Suddenly the words of her father returned to her, words that had been given as instruction for military strategies but which she saw now to be applicable to so much more. Had he known it when he produced them for her benefit? She had to wonder.

Remember the obligations you have when you make a resolution to shield another, he had spoken to her years past. Remember that you are obliged to gather intelligence for that task, whether with the shielded party's permission or otherwise. Whether you shield a fellow soldier or an entire city, you must know what it is that you shield it from.

And if seeking that intelligence is impossible, she had asked, only to have him frown disapprovingly.

It is never impossible, had been the answer. If you think it impossible then you are only making excuses for your own laziness in searching for it. The necessity of protection arises only in relation to the awareness that there is a foe. How can you protect something if you don't know that foe? You might as well be a net against arrows. Your determination is worthless without the information of the arrows' origin. And if your determination is strong enough and uninformed enough you can destroy the thing you are trying to keep safe. You might as well cut its throat with your own hand. You might as well send it all up in flames yourself.

*Never - no - not I to Natsuki and never, she thought angrily, seized by anguish at the idea. Never would she want to cause harm to this creature resting quietly now in her arms. Never again would she hurt it in the way she had just done, thoughtless and uninformed as she had been. How could she, when just seeing this it in this state hurt her so much? They had already become bound together, she realised, in such a way that this mutual feeling and destruction was now possible, and protecting the other already meant protecting herself. What a strange feeling to learn oneself capable of such a relation! Yet she did not know if Natsuki shared the awareness of it and that uncertainty sent a fresh pain in her. She was pitiless enough with herself to credit that possibility, though just acknowledging it hurt in a way she had never imagined. What if the girl did not feel the same way? It was still a possibility.*

The thought made her feel so cold. Even the consideration of it left her feeling empty in the gut, sick with a feeling of rejection she had been fortunate enough never to truly experience before. Discipline your pride, Shizuru, and swallow that consideration, she rebuked herself. But even then she knew that it was not merely pride that had her feeling so suddenly alone, an instinct trying to gain control over her body and curling her. Oh, but why did this torture her so much? So this was what they meant when they said that emotion could actually be a vulnerability.

And that its strength, more often than not, is actually proportional to its weakness.

"Nnh, Shizuru..."

She felt the warming body in her hands and knew she could not stand it. She could no more stand the feeling of being separate from the emotions animating this person than she could stand the thought of being separate from this other body, left alone by its absence. The knot in her continued to tighten. She was being assailed by suddenly unstrung emotions and unexpected resolutions and the world-rocking sense of accepting something that changed all that would go on now and all that went before. All of it rendered her speechless. Even so, it was in that chest-aching, hollow-making loneliness that she was finally able to say to herself something she had been looking to articulate for a very long time.

---

Late morning of that day found Shizuru's senior legate and chief primipilus with their heads together, inspecting an item the senior legate lay on the table. They were seated at a corner of an inn, the only other people in the shop being the barkeep himself and three Argus locals having breakfast. The primipilus had actually been accompanied by her faithful body-servant, but the girl had chosen to stay outside, having "run into"-Nao believed they had set it up between them-a certain dark-haired Otomeian trooper fixing her boots on the bench there.

"So what do you think of it?" Chie asked the primipilus, looking just the slightest bit fretful. "It's not too shoddy, is it? Do you think it's enough?"

"Enough for what?" was the answer. "Wait. Let me have a look-see."

She picked up the brooch on the table, turning it over carefully in her hands. It was a pretty little thing, she decided, and would be even prettier in Hime, for it would be something very unusual there. It was the gem set in the middle of the ornate silver curlicues that made it so. Shaped like a tiny flower, it was a translucent green cut with fernlike patterns that could be mistaken for petals. If not for those she would have thought it to be glass.

"What do you call it again?" she asked, flashing it in the light. "This crystal."

"I forgot, " Chie told her with a laugh. "One of those unpronounceable names the northern peoples use, you know! I doubt it's made its way to Hime's shores yet, so I'm hoping this advanced present will please Aoi."

"It will," Nao said, returning the brooch. "She'll love it. Are you holding it or sending it now?"

"Sending, with the next homebound mail."

"Eager to remind her you're still alive?"

Chie sighed, still smiling.

"I'm vain enough to think Aoi remembers that much without being told, at least," she said.

"How'd you find it?"

"Just went stalking through the shops," was the reply. "Everyone's been on a jewellery-shopping kick lately, ever since news got out about the pearl Shizuru-san bought Natsuki-san."

She grinned with lingering enjoyment at the juiciness of that topic.

"Scandalise though it did some of us, people soon realised it was a smart idea," she added. "You can get stuff here that you'd never find from the hawkers back home, and it's much cheaper to buy here too. So those of us who have someone"-a cough-"are buying something. Granted, it's not as spectacular as Shizuru-san's choice, but we're not all that rich."

"Few of us are," Nao said, with a snigger. "So that's why my soldiers have been totting baubles lately. Probably comparing finds with each other."

"Yes, I'd suppose so." Chie looked at her meaningfully. "Really have no one to give something to?"

Nao suddenly smiled.

"Know what?" she said to her friend. "I think I will go shopping for trinkets after all."

Chie gaped.

"I was joking!" she said. "There is someone?"

"More than one."

"You dog! What have you been hiding from me?"

To her surprise, the red-haired woman simply started laughing, strawberry-hued locks flying as she shook her head.

"I'm kidding, Harada, so don't get your hopes up," she confessed. "But I am buying trinkets for some girls and boys back home, so there."

Chie eyed her balefully, a little disappointed.

"Who are they, though?" she asked.

"Clients, I hope," Nao answered. At the other's baffled expression, she explained. "If I buy the jewellery cheap here, I can make a profit if I sell it for the regular price back in Hime. It's a nice opportunity and I'd be an idiot not to take it, don't you think?"

Chie smiled: "According to your lights, you would be."

"Why don't you do it too? You'd have more capital than me so you can afford to get pricier gems like that one." She pointed to the brooch in the other woman's hand. "You'd get bigger returns too."

"True, but not actually possible," the legate answered. "If I do buy enough precious things to make a profit worth reckoning, I'd be in trouble once I tried to sell them. It's a little too mercantile to pass muster when the censors do their investigations. You know a senator has limited opportunities open when it comes to business."

"Owning property and a few shares in companies, right? Still, I don't think anyone's actually going to pay attention to a little jewel-hawking on the side, especially if you just say you overbought here and you're trying to make up the capital," Nao objected.

"I'd rather be sure and steer clear of it," Chie told her. "It's hard to sell jewellery without word getting around. There are some senators known for carrying out much grander and similarly forbidden activities while managing to hide evidence of it, but everyone who's aware of what they're doing hates them. There's no easier way to incur the House's enmity than to make more money than the rest."

The light green eyes were thrown open at her: "Our general does."

"Yes, and they hate her," Chie quipped, making both of them laugh. "No, seriously, however, you should know it's not unlawful in her case, and most of the hate is for things other than her wealth, anyway. All of her sources of income happen to be perfectly legal, from sleeping partnerships in companies to the real estate under her name... and all the way to her mines in Spain."

"Mines are allowed?"

"They're technically real estate, so yes."

"In the Spains. What's mined there, again?"

"You name it-silver, gold, lead, iron, copper, all there. And Shizuru-san owns mines or parts of mines for every one of them. More than you can count on one hand, and worth half of that country. She can pull out several thousand talents at the flick of a finger and I doubt she'd feel the sting."

There was an audible gasp: "Jupiter, no wonder she could buy that monster of a pearl! I heard it cost near two hundred talents!"

"Sounds about right. Perfectly round pearls are rare enough, but round black ones? And ones that size? A hundred talents wouldn't be enough."

"Damn. When she mentioned she had ownership in some mines, I thought she meant a few shares in one or two. But if what you're saying is true, goddamn!"

"So much for you being a great intelligencer," came the tease.

"No one ever contracted me to research her," Nao shot back. "I don't just go around poking into people's pasts, you know. Least of all the general's. But Juno and all them gods could slap me right now. I knew she was real rich, but not even that rich."

"Oh, she is, ludicrously so, in fact." Chie's brow wrinkled, eyes screwing up as she tried to recall something. "If I remember it correctly, it's the great-grandfather who's responsible for most of the mines. He served as governor of Hispania Ulterior," she explained. "That was still during the time we were contesting the local tribes there for ownership of that territory, and he was the one who led the exploits that pushed them out and our boundaries to the limits they have today."

"Took the chance and carved it up, eh?"

"Well, he was smart enough to buy land as soon as we gained possession of it. It was going pretty easy, what with the danger of the Spanish tribes still lurking nearby. Hime's Treasury is generally happy to leave ownership and care of land to individuals, so long as it gets a cut." She shrugged and finished the story: "So the Fujino descendants continued to own the Spanish mines, and now it all belongs to the only direct descendant of that name left. Shizurusan."

Nao released another string of invectives, obviously awed.

"Now that's lucky," she breathed, once her profanities had rolled down. "Damned lucky."

"I'd say so," her companion uttered. "The Fujino were said to be well on their way to financial straits at that time, so the Spanish mines saved them. The Noble Families almost all reach a point where their finances run thin. Great-grandfather Fujino saved his line from penury."

"Shot it all the way to the other end," Nao put in, grinning. "You say them nobles get a lot of money trouble? Here I thought they were all as rich as their names."

"It's the name that makes them poor, more often than not. It's because of the obligations and politics they have to pay for, and the attendant luxuries expected of the upper-class. They really do beggar themselves for their pride."

"Huh. What about your woman's family?" She cast a shrewd eye upon Chie. "Are the Senou in trouble too?"

The sooty-haired woman smiled, nodding slowly.

"Somewhat, they're starting to feel it," she said, turning pensive. "It could be a little mean of me to say this, but I'm actually hoping it's worse by the time we get back. Maybe then I could present a good enough proposition to tempt Aoi's father, assuming my booty on this campaign turns out to be large enough. He has a weakness for money, does Aoi's tata ."

Nao smiled big-heartedly at her. "Bribing your way into marriage? Why don't you just borrow from the general for now, so you can seal the deal already? She wouldn't refuse you, go on!"

"Dear me, no!" was the shocked reply. "I'd be ashamed to do that, Nao."

"Rather beggar yourself for your pride?"

"It's too embarrassing, and it would make me look like a beggar," Chie explained, running a hand through her hair. "Shizuru-san wouldn't refuse, as you say, but what if Aoi's father does? It would all be in vain. I really think it's too early at this point. I'd be better off waiting for him to stew a little longer and searching for my own money to use, anyway. There's a good amount I've already tucked away and I bought a few shares in some companies before we left. But it's better to have more leverage, just in case. This campaign will see nicely to that."

"You expect a lot of booty from the Mentulae."

"If the rumours about their hoards of gold are true, yes. Shizuru-san says they most likely are and even if they aren't, booty would still turn up. It always does, doesn't it?"

"I can't argue with that." Nao smiled jokingly at her friend. "So we wait?"

Chie sighed: "Much as it hurts, yes."

"Hope good old Father Senou doesn't marry her off to someone else first."

" Tace, you wretch!"

They laughed. Nao lifted her hand and signalled to the barkeep, who scurried over with a fresh flagon of wine for them. He set it on the table along with a new decanter of water. Having done this, he bowed and returned to his stool behind the counter, wishing he could have had a reason to stay with the two women longer. One of Shizuru Fujino's primipilii and a Himean senator at his shop! Oh, what an honour! He would boast of it to his wife later tonight-complete with an embellishment about having had an actual prolonged conversation with them, of course.

"By the way, I heard there haven't been any new murders yet," Chie said, pouring wine into her beaker. She diluted it with water afterwards. "That name you got from the man you caught seems to have helped Midori-san, though I don't know what she did with it."

"Glad it helped," Nao said, filling her own beaker. "He was pretty glad to give it to us too."

"Was that before or after you took the hide from him?"

A smirk. "I didn't take anything but his nails."

"Oh, Bona Dea ! Spare me the details, please!"

"Then spare me the sanctimonious righteousness!" the primipilus shot back. "It's not just Sugiura and this province who's ever benefited from me taking the hide off someone and you know it."

Chie smiled soothingly, holding a palm up in pacification.

"Yes, I know, and I didn't mean it that way," she told her peeved friend. "You know I wouldn't delude myself with that sort of hypocrisy, Yuuki. I just get the jitters when I hear that stuff, that's all. My stomach can't take it."

Nao sneered, but looked mollified.

"Lily-livered politician that you are," she grumbled good-naturedly.

"Yes, well. We lily-livered politicians are the ones paying for your dinner."

They grinned at each other. Both women knew the real source of Nao's irritation and Chie's discomfort, however. It was the fact that, even among some members of the army, Nao was considered with some apprehension as a barbarian: a dangerous, uncivilised, un-Himean element who thought nothing of torturing a man for her purposes as well as entertainment. Part of the slur came from the detail that she was of shady origins, claiming to be from Hime's Sulpician territories but without any creditable proof of ancestors. She had no real evidence that her parents were locals, some said, and she did not even have the look of a real Himean. Besides which, no real Himean enjoyed torture! It was barbaric action, distinctly alien.

Or we 'real Himeans' would like to think so, Chie said ruefully to herself. It was true that most Himeans still recoiled from ideas like torture and considered them specifically foreign phenomena, but ever since meeting Nao and serving in Shizuru's army, she had come to understand that torture was as alien to Hime as drinking . Nao revealed to her that many of the Sulpician intelligencers were actually trained for torture in case the eventuality should arise. Rare as it was that such a thing happened, it still served its purpose militarily. This was why there was always a torture detachment in the army.

Nor was torture restricted to the military. Every now and then, a rumour would come up about some dominus or domina torturing his or her slaves for entertainment, though nothing or no one ever came forward to substantiate it, naturally. All of which shadiness did nothing to demolish the widely-held belief among Himeans that torture did not exist in their society.

Even now, I still have trouble accepting it myself, she admitted secretly. And in that respect, Nao will never really be Himean. It's not Himean to accept the necessity of torture with as much pleasure as she does, in that most Himeans recoil before it. No matter if it's part of the job. It's those who take pleasure in it that are the outsiders, and she's one of them. An exception and an outsider. She actually enjoys that part of her work, and it's why they'll always consider her a little barbarian.

She held back a grimace at the thought of her friend's candid remark on removing nails.

I wonder if maybe I do too.

"Anyway, you did a fine job actually getting a name," she said again. "Midori-san should have rewarded you."

"Oh, you didn't know?" Nao said, frowning quizzically at her. "She did. Pretty generous too, the old girl."

"What did you get?"

"Nice bag of denarii," she said contentedly, purring. "She'd have given me more, but I told her to buy me a drink instead. Bought enough to sink a ship."

"So that's what happened to you the other day, when I went to see you in the afternoon and Ers-chan said you were still in bed. Whooped it up with the governor, huh?"

"That woman probably taught Bacchus how to drink!" She started laughing. "Oh, she drank me straight under the table. I've never seen anyone guzzle that much that fast."

Chie laughed too. "She knows how to drink, all right."

"Right master of it, that one." She looked at her cup on the table, still half-full. Up it went as she drained it in one gulp. "She can talk, too. Told me all kinds of yarn about her travels to this far-off place or that, complete with crazy adventures. Seemed to me like every story had a part about foreigners in revolt, though, and making a lot of mayhem. Crazy things, like trapping their kings in the palace and stacking up shit near the royal windows." She looked disgusted, though still amused. "Can't imagine that happening to our senators, even if some of them are regular bastards."

Chie took a drink, grimaced.

"It wouldn't. Our people are still more civilised than they are, even in revolt," she said. "And besides, we don't get true revolts in Hime. Not of the kind that foreign rulers see, and even when we do, they're few and far between. We like to complain the Himean mob is unruly, but it's still better behaved compared to the ones abroad."

"Oh?" The primipilus was refilling her beaker. "Why's that?"

"It's simple. What's the basic difference between our poor and theirs? What do ours get that they don't?"

" Panem et circenses. "

The answer came not from the primipilus before her but from another woman standing by their table, having just approached them. They looked at the newcomer in amazement.

"Shizuru-san!" Chie cried, looking pleased. "That's not nice at all, sneaking up on the two of us. And we being among your most trusted officers, I had thought."

Shizuru smiled: "Ah, I doubt I surprised Nao-han."

"You did," Nao admitted. "I didn't notice you coming up at all. Taking lessons on silent approach from your Sphinx, General?"

"I can only hope to be half as stealthy as she is."

"You did a good job just now." Nao chuckled and clapped, the fingers of one hand tapping the other's palm softly. "I'd know. If she won't applaud you, I'm doing it now."

Chie smiled at the two of them, her eyes taking in Shizuru as she bowed and pretended to accept the applause. The woman leaned down, the luxuriant hair with its curl at the ends-of which she was surely vain!-sparkling in the light from the windows as it spilled over her shoulders. The sun upon her was a different thing: golden even when low, the shadows having the lovely deep warmth of brass. She was such a radiant woman, so easily noticeable. How had she ever managed to creep unseen upon them?

"I don't see your usual escort," she began, only to have Nao point at something behind her. Following the pointing finger's direction, she found the girl she had been looking for, complete with a leashed panther at her side. The Otomeian was standing just outside the door of the inn, talking to the other Otomeian there, or Erstin's. She remembered something in a flash of insight : the two Otomeians were cousins.

"Ye gods!" she said, turning her attention instead to the black-furred feline sitting calmly near the door-and drawing uneasy glances from the only other breakfasters at the inn. "That beast's growing longer and more frightening by the day. Isn't she the least bit worried it could turn on her?"

It was Nao who answered, slurring through a yawn: "Ah, the general has that girl on a tight leash."

Chie and Shizuru exchanged a look.

"I was talking about the panther."

"Oh. Well, I think the other beast can take care of that one," Nao said with a wink. Her companions laughed. "Sit down, General. What's that you were saying earlier? Panem et circenses, you say?"

Shizuru nodded, taking up the primipilus's invitation by pulling a spare stool from a nearby table. The barkeep—who had been holding himself back with stunned awe for a while now—rushed over to provide her with a beaker. She thanked him as he simpered reluctantly away.

"That would be the crucial difference Chie-han was talking about earlier, which determines the relatively rare incidents of rebellion we have compared to other nations."

"Bread and games?" Nao echoed.

"Foreign rulers rarely subsidise the poor's supply of wheat, as we do," Shizuru explained. "Nor are they in the habit of providing them with free entertainment."

"More likely, they're the ones going to become the entertainment," Chie followed. "A look at most foreign histories shows ruler after ruler suffering a rebellion because of famine and hardship on the people's parts. That's something Hime's leaders recognised when they founded the Republic. Our previous rulers had to deal with the same thing during their time—it's even part of why our Kings and Queens were done away with in the first place." She looked at Nao. "Keep the people fed and entertained and they won't complain more than a peep. Right, Shizuru-san?"

Shizuru smiled and quoted the maxim: "Hungry bellies roar the loudest."

"Well, I get it," Nao said to the two of them. "But wouldn't it be hard to do that constantly? I understand Hime can do it because we have grain provinces of our own aside from having contracts with most of the other grain suppliers but some foreign states and rulers might not be so lucky. It'd cost them more, somewhat."

"Yes, as you say, somewhat," Shizuru answered, with a conciliatory tilt of her head. "But that difference in cost is still generally conscionable, and not something that should prevent a ruler from providing his people with grain. If a state's purse is so poor that it cannot even afford to weather the cost of the people's food when they have none, then it has not the right to be a state at all as far as I am concerned. Nor does its ruler have the right to such a position."

No ruler has ever gained title without the people and if the people are dead of hunger, much good may his empty label and stored-up wealth do him."

"It's hard to fatten the purse without thinning the little people, I guess," Nao said with a nasty smile, her lip curling to reveal the sharp canines she often kept hidden. "Many a verpa doesn't have the gumption and still can't resist it."

"Perhaps," Shizuru granted. "Then there are also those who simply do not consider feeding the people part of their kingly duties. Witness Egypt, and the unremitting uprisings of Alexandria."

"Oh, don't get me started on Alexandria!" Chie suddenly cried, looking both dismayed and amused. "It's a fright how often the mob takes up arms against the rulers there. And not just out of hunger, either!"

Nao nodded: "Fractious people, them Alexandrians."

"As we all are," Shizuru said, smiling.

She decanted some wine into her beaker, then diluted it with water. She took a sip and flashed a smile of approval to the anxious barkeep. He beamed with pride and a measure of relief.

"So what brings you out, Shizuru-san? I haven't seen you about as much as I used to, though I guess that's to be expected since winter's in full swing."

"Ah." She set down her beaker. "Yes, the weather is rather taxing."

"Chilling!" Chie agreed. "Even Midori-san admits it still bothers her, and she's been stationed here for years now. I'm just glad we're not wintering up in Otomeia-now there's a prospect that freezes me immediately."

Nao grunted in assent.

"I was actually going to see Midori-han later," Shizuru remarked absent-mindedly. The two women looked up at her, both taking on pleasantly inquisitive expressions.

"Going to ask her about the Mentulaean murders?" Chie asked, receiving a tilt of the head in response.

"I had meant to mention it, yes, but my chief agenda today has not so much to do with the public interest."

"Oh? Are we allowed to ask about it?"

"Indirectly, you already have," Shizuru pointed out. "Yes, since I intended to ask you for help, too."

She paused here and surveyed their surroundings lazily, Chie thought, though both she and Nao understood this was more than a casual glance. For what she was searching, however, neither of them knew yet.

"I have been occupying myself with tracing the histories of foreign nations recently," she began, eyes seeming to settle with satisfaction on the figure of her bodyguard talking to the other Otomeian outside the door, a good distance away. "All quite fascinating, so much so that it is fast becoming my favourite pastime of late. Chie-han surely understands why."

"Definitely!"

"I always did have an interest in the subject, but only now found the joy of probing more deeply into it from a scholastic viewpoint. I run into a constant impediment in my latest hobby, however: one I am certain you run into as well." She sighed and produced the problem: "It seems to me that some nations have great patches missing from the tapestry."

Chie let loose a knowing chuckle.

"That's a beautiful way of putting it," she said, before looking at Nao. "Some peoples don't keep as many and detailed accounts as we Himeans do. Sometimes, you run into what we call a dark period in their history-dark because there's nothing and no one who can shed light on it."

"Sort of an uninvestigated hole, eh?" Nao said. She pointed her chin at Shizuru. "So what's the hole you're looking to plug and who does it belong to?"

Shizuru smiled broadly while Chie hit their friend's shoulder.

"Nothing so sordid as plugging, I hope, but I shall hazard some peeking," Shizuru said playfully. "I was looking into the past of the people known as the Ortygians."

Both women easily recognised the name, of course, since it was part of a famous legend. Nonetheless, the quality of that recognition was tinted with two different colours, she realised. Chie seemed to perk up visibly, her interest in the name unvarnished and without the taint of anything but scholarly curiosity. Nao, on the other hand, seemed to retreat slightly into herself almost as though her interest had waned. Shizuru knew this meant the exact opposite of what it obviously conveyed. Nao knew something.

"A recently extinct northern people," Chie was saying. "Most have heard of their massacre, of course, supposedly by raiding Mentulae, though no one still knows for sure. It's all very shady. Is that what you've been reading?"

"Yes, in fact."

"It's hard finding sources for that, all right. The whole affair's shrouded in mystery."

"So I have found."

"I'm not sure I have anything on that. I've read texts mentioning it in passing or as an example, but not really from any direct sources, which is to be expected. Most direct sources are dead."

Nao finally spoke up, pellucid green eyes meeting the deep red ones looking at her.

"No," she said, offering a small measure of mutual comprehension in her smile. "They're not all dead, are they?"

Shizuru said nothing and only quirked her lips in reply. It was Chie who talked.

"Maybe," she said. "But of texts or records you can find nothing. Well, maybe because it's still relatively recent. You won't find much on it yet in the absence of scholars doing investigation."

"Sure about that?" Nao asked.

Chie replied in the affirmative.

"Huh!" the primipilus coughed, taking a sip of her wine. If she could not feel those crimson eyes on her before, she could feel them now.

"Why, Nao-han?" she heard Shizuru say, voice soft but compelling. "Do you know anything?"

Their gazes interlocked and did not narrow; neither was willing to cross that line of aggression, out of respect for each other.

But you think it, don't you, Nao asked the other woman silently, not betraying any unease at having those quizzing red eyes upon her. She was too much of a professional to even hasten a blink. You think I know something, Shizuru-san, and you want it out. The question is, will I tell you, or won't I?

She did know something. It had been told her by none other than her body-servant. The adolescent, as much her living companion as her friend, had disclosed quite a bit about the young Otomeian who was cousin to the general's Natsuki-the one named Nina. Nao actually knew that both Nina and Natsuki were not really Otomeian, were survivors of the famous massacre of Ortygia. She also knew that one of the troopers in the party that had found them that awful, long-ago night was still alive and right there in Argus, serving as arms- and stablemaster to the Lupine Division. This person, Erstin claimed, was highly-esteemed by both surviving Ortygians. Erstin also said that, according to Nina, Natsuki had a particular affection for this trooper because he was the one who had found her. If there was anyone who had the rag-tag 'patches' missing from the general's 'tapestry', it would be that man. Yet she hesitated to tell Shizuru.

Nao's vacillation stemmed from a very personal reason, one neither Chie nor Shizuru knew. Her silence on the present matter was related to her silence on another: her past.

Nao's past was a murky, muddled thing, and she kept it that way. Even though she was aware of the hearsay about her not being truly Himean, she never produced the evidence that could dispel all such rumours. And she had evidence! She had Himean ancestors, certified by the census and written on the list of Himean citizens in her hometown. But she did not say anything about them because she wanted no one to know the identity of her mother, who had been the town whore.

It was not that Nao was ashamed of her mother-or not chiefly that. Nao had resigned herself to mamma's occupation a long time ago, when her father perished in some cold ditch after a night of trying to escape his creditors. Village loan sharks, those same men had returned to their little home and taken everything, including her mother, again and again. Nao's mother had begged them to leave Nao alone, which they did, and to leave something for their sustenance, which they insisted they had. They left the bed, they said, and the roof over their heads. They left her life, which, with her body, could surely find some purse willing to open in exchange for the privilege of opening her. Nao's mother took the hint. What else could she do?

Many other things, all more decent, the young Nao used to think. But the wisdom of age let her admit these days that that was not true. Her mother had been a sad, pathetic little thing-not very smart, clumsy with her hands, too weak for any kind of decent work. Her only gifts, in fact, were those she had passed onto her daughter: eyes the lovely colour of a lime; hair so red it mimicked the skin of a strawberry; and an attractively small, pretty face. All things that worked well for her chosen profession. Half the town eagerly bedded her, and the other half might have done the same... if only a vacationing politician passing through the district had not slept with her, then given orders afterwards to have her killed. Nao had seen it all, since she rarely bothered to sneak out if her mother was with a client; she had grown used to it, and the only way out of the house was past her mother's pallet.

Why had the politician ordered her mother killed? Most likely to shut her mouth. He might have been in a position where news about him with a prostitute would have been somehow damaging. Nao did not really care. The point was, he should have thought of that position before getting into a position with her mother in front of his hips, his voice urging her to part her lips. The horny ineptus, femina mentula. He was such an ineptus, in fact, that he failed to check the little room where Nao had been watching through a crack in the wall. She escaped from that town and ran, ran, ran all the way to the Sulpician territories, where some fighting instructor discovered her innate talent for activities to do with espionage after she tried to burgle his home. He sponsored her entry into one of the province's special schools and it was there that Nao found her calling. That was at fifteen.

What did all this have to do with her hesitation to help Shizuru? Even she was unsure. If she had to guess, it was a furtive sense of camaraderie with someone who had experienced something similar to what she had, a reluctance to disclose that other person's secrets knowing she had ones of her own. Nao still had dreams sometimes, farcical repetitions of memories where her mother lay folded in a pool of blood and blankets while that man pushed the knife under her ribs. If that girl-the general's Natsuki-did not have dream-memories like that, Nao would eat her cape. And if Natsuki did not guard those memories like an awful inheritance, Nao would eat the rest of her gear, sword and all.

It's a bad thing that pup's doing, and I know because I did it myself, she thought now, eyes going to the trio of young women visible through the wide doorway. It was the tallest one that she looked at, the general's girl, and it seemed she had a vision of her past in doing so. Now that girl was smiling, seemingly young and cheerful as the other two, but Nao knew it was a lie. Oh, she was different from them! A shadow prowling the light. Nao could feel her holding that shadow to herself like a broken treasure, a balled-up secret. She wondered if the girl could see her own balled-up secret, still riding on her back.

But hers isn't on her back, is it, she pondered, studying that young woman's eyes in the distance. No, it's different from mine. She's holding her secret to her chest.

A real bad thing, she thought again, but with more conviction. That young pup outside did not understand that what she was harbouring so close to her core could destroy her, bind her in a different way from how it had bound Nao. To that extent, perhaps it would be better if she told Shizuru about the old trooper? Who knew, perhaps the general could take that dark bundle from the girl's hands and be the one to throw it away. Oh, not all of it: never all of it. But even a little was a start, and it could spell all the difference between certain destruction and a lessening of the pain. But what if Shizuru could not do it and only made it worse?

Well, hoo-hah! Who'd have thought I'd be so bloody thoughtful, she thought irritably, surprised even at herself. Never in her life had she thought herself capable of thinking so deeply for the sake of another this way. For the most part, never in her life had she done so. But it was that past the girl had, really, and her own past could not resist the call of something similar to it, curse the thing!

Nao thought of this as a rare abnormality since she believed herself incapable of compassion. But it was only that she refused to believe the existence of compassion in any of her actions, having decided long ago that compassion was both a failure and a weakness. She would not permit such a weakness to dwell inside her, and hence failed to see it in herself, choosing instead to label it with names like cold pity or concession or sensible consideration. She did not have many opportunities to show it to the degree where she would have to question these names, anyway, so it did not trouble her too much. But this was a rare situation indeed, so she chose to blame it on whatever vestigial weaknesses that younger Nao from the past had left. It was thus that she laughed at herself, perhaps a little bitterly: Nao Yuuki, you're turning into a soft-hearted, sentimental idiot.

She thought about it a little longer, weighing the possibilities against each other. As she had no other respondent, she was forced to answer the questions herself. Would she have liked someone making inquiries about her past when she had been younger? Definitely not. Would she have liked someone trying to unearth her secrets to the roots? No, naturally. Would she have liked someone enduring her opposition and persisting in trying to know her? Well, that was a difficult question to answer. But would she have learned to be more normally, happily human had there been someone strong enough to do all of these things, little though she would have liked it? Yes, she supposed. Most likely, yes.

And maybe that's the answer, she told herself. She knew that in her case, cruelty had been the refuge, the sublimation of all those nights of watching her mother fornicate with stranger after stranger, and the shock of that woman's death. Cruelty more than killing, for the latter was no more than a chore to dispose of an exhausted source of amusement, to end a dried-up man's puny life-strand.

But that girl outside, at the door, was different. That girl's refuge was a different thing altogether, Nao could feel it in her bones. She could not tell exactly what the quality of that refuge was, but she did not like the feel of it. It was too quiet and mysterious and turned upon itself, like a festering guilt. Given time, she thought she could be afraid of what was building in that guilt, but she was only someone who looked upon the girl as a stranger. She was someone who would be afraid of what was in that young woman, but she knew Shizuru would be different. Shizuru was someone who would be afraid for her.

Gods help me, but I'm going to do some bloody good for once, she decided. Shizuru-san wouldn't thank me for keeping the information secret, anyway, and I'm sure she'll find out one way or another. Better tell her now, while she's still expecting something.

"I think you'd best talk to Erstin," she finally ventured, gaze returning casually to Shizuru. "She's cosy with your pet's cousin, General, and that girl told her something about an old cavalryman who rode in after that massacre-one of the members of the original party sent out for rescue."

Both her listeners sat up at the information, though for different reasons. Ironically, it was the legate who said something.

"Jupiter, now that's interesting!" she said. "Someone who was actually on the scene? I'd love to talk to him too."

Shizuru looked at her.

"Chie-han," she began. "You have already spoken to at least two people who were also on the scene and even more so than he could have been. You did not know? Natsuki and her cousin are surviving Ortygians."

Chie's jaw slackened. It became apparent to her from Nao's grin that the primipilus knew about it too.

"You both knew?" she said, astonished. "I didn't! Why didn't I know and how could it have escaped my ears?"

Nao shrugged, whereas Shizuru offered an answer.

"Perhaps, Chie-han, because it is not really the kind of thing of which people would often speak?"

The legate saw the justice of that.

"True," she agreed. "But it's astounding."

"Indeed." She looked out at Natsuki on the street, pleased to see the younger woman fraternising with others closer to her age for once. "Thank you for the help, Nao-han. I truly do appreciate the information."

"Nothing to it," Nao said flippantly, swishing the wine in her beaker. "Say, have you taken breakfast yet? We have, but we wouldn't mind keeping you company if your want to get yours now."

Shizuru obviously found the merit of the suggestion.

"Ah, yes, we might as well," she said, looking again at her companion through the doorway. "It might be best if we did not eat here, however, since Shizuki could make others uneasy and that would be damaging the good innkeeper's commerce. Forgive me for being unable to honour your invitation, Nao-han, but I hope you understand if I am loath to injure this establishment. Natsuki and I would do better to take some food with us to eat as we walk."

"You sure? I don't think the man will mind. There's few people coming in this early, in this weather."

"It's quite all right," Shizuru insisted, already beckoning the barkeep.

He dropped the rag he was using to wipe the counter and scurried over. "I do not think Natsuki will mind if we do not stop here to eat."

That was an interesting sentence, especially to both her officers: why did it matter at all if Natsuki minded or not?

"General Fujino?"

The barkeep was there, all ears for her order.

"Would it be possible to have some honey cakes-about four, five-and hard-boiled eggs wrapped for me?" she asked the man, who nodded eagerly. "A couple of eggs should be fine. And perhaps a skin of wine, two parts of that liquor and one part water."

He grinned hugely, obviously more than happy to comply with her wishes. He apologised while asking her to wait a moment, assuring her he would get it ready as soon as possible. Oh, the sheer excitement: Shizuru Fujino herself talked to him!

"Chipper little man," Nao observed, when he was gone. "He's good wine, though."

Shizuru glanced at the jug on the table.

"Oh?" she said curiously.

"Yes, not bad at all," Chie concurred. "Try it. It has a sort of Tuscanian taste, I think, though with a little something different."

"Gerrae !" Nao suddenly objected. "It's not Tuscanian. I'd bet you ten denarii the general will say its closer to Chian!"

Here the three launched into a healthy discussion of vines and vintage, each one enjoying herself immensely-for if there was anything a Himean enjoyed, it was wine. Stoic anomalies aside, there was hardly a Himean living who did not revere the fruit of the vine, and Himean viticulture was the most sophisticated in the world. Its product was taken in the morning, in the afternoon, and in the evening; it was drunk by the richest of Himeans all the way to the poorest of their poor, who would sometimes take to begging for a cup from some munificent passer-by instead of the usual alms. Oh, wine! The average Himean's lifeblood, so the joke went, was half red wine.

The trio bantered cheerfully on the subject for a while, and were soon surprised by the barkeep's shadow looming above them. He had finished preparing Shizuru's request, carrying in one hand a small wicker basket. It was covered by a tidily arranged cloth, and the top of a wineskin poked out of it. He presented the basket to Shizuru, who stood up.

"The honey cakes are a little small, Domina," he said. "So I threw in a couple of bread-pockets for you. They're good stuff and have good, high-quality mincemeat in them. Good clean pork, not beef, and onions. I make them myself."

"Oh, thank you: it smells delectable," she said appreciatively, detecting the aroma of spiced meat from the package. She reached for her coin-purse and proceeded to pay him, declining when he offered to get the change.

"Keep it, please," she said. "I have already deprived you of a wineskin and basket. Please take the cost of the items from the excess and excuse the trouble I have given you."

"No, no!" he said, mightily pleased. "It's no trouble at all, Domina . "

She thanked him again and he returned to his counter happily, carrying with him the image of diffident crimson eyes and a red-lipped smile. He would cherish the encounter for a week, telling anyone coming to his inn for a drink that the Shizuru Fujino had thanked him.

"I shall go now, Nao-han, Chie-han," the Shizuru Fujino was saying to her friends. "Forgive me for being unable to stay. I had a wonderful time talking to the two of you, however, and hope to continue our discussion another day."

"I'm not letting it go, it tastes like the wine from Tuscania, and that's it," Chie said, amidst their laughter. "It tastes like wine from Tuscania."

Nao raised her beaker to Shizuru, the little liquid inside swishing audibly.

"She won't believe me, General, but we both know I'm right," she said to the blonde, who was still laughing at Chie's stubborn expression. "And about that other thing, just talk to Erstin whenever you want. You know where we are."

Shizuru nodded.

"Thank you again, Nao-han," she said with quiet authenticity. "It really is kind of you."

And then she left, provisions in hand, going to meet the girl waiting for her by the door. Nao watched her go, thinking about the words the woman had spoken in gratitude. Kind, she said. But Nao was not kind, so she could not have been being kind. So it had been something else, and Shizuru only mistook it for kindness. What was the word for it? What else could you call it?

She could not come up with a word yet. She needed a drink.

Well, now, we can't say I was being kind, the primipilus told herself as she lifted her beaker, the claret beverage in it reminding her of her commander's probing eyes. She was the sort of woman who would admit to dangers she considered powerful enough to threaten her, so it cost her nothing to admit that she had been unnerved by those eyes earlier. It was hard not to be, especially when they fixed upon you that way, like small beads of fire trying to set off sparks in you too. What she had felt on her earlier were just tiny warm embers, but she had seen Shizuru enough times in battle to see them blaze up into two pools of conflagration. Hot and scorching. Terrible.

A tiny smile drew up her lips.

Kind, was what the general said of her actions just now. But she was wrong; Nao was not kind, so she could not have been being kind. You just can't call it kind.

Maybe you could just call it self-preservation.

Vocabulaire :

1. Grammaticus - A teacher of rhetoric or public speech
  2. Insula - The literal translation is "island". However, the word also refers to an apartment building. Romans had high insulae (plural form), sometimes reaching up to 30m in height. These buildings were given the name of insulae/insula because they were often surrounded by lanes or streets on all sides, like islands surrounded by waterways and channels.
  3. Lamia - A mythical child-murdering demon.
  4. Lingua mundi - The common language (of the world).
  5. NOTE on the calendar - The story uses the modern calendar's months as we have them today, to make things a touch simpler. Hence, for instance, December has 31 days in this story, as opposed to the 29 days its equivalent had in Latin times. September too has its present total, which would be 30, instead of the Latin 29. Here we eschew the proper Ancient Latin terms Quinctilis (which we call July) and Sextilis (which we call August) in favour of the ones we have today.

---

Two days later, Shizuru was with her senior legate and primipilus once again, having a late breakfast at the hired house where the primipilus had her quarters. They were in the main room of that edifice, which functioned also as the receiving area as well as the dining space. It adjoined a smaller room that held the kitchen, and it was from this kitchen that Nao's body-servant, Erstin, came out bearing two bowls for the pair of Otomeians accompanying them as they broke their fast.

The Himeans were already eating, for the table already held dishes of bread and fish, as well as fruit. The two Otomeians, however, had been promised a certain dish by Erstin, and had chosen to await it instead of taking from the fare already on the table. Shizuru and her officers had been in discussion over matters relating to the army when Erstin had spoken to the Otomeians, however, so they were unaware of what food the young woman had promised to bring the dark-haired cousins. Hence their curiosity when Erstin came out of the kitchen and served the two foreigners their special fare.

As Erstin returned to her seat, Shizuru leaned over to her side, where her bodyguard was seated. She peeked at the bowls the two young Otomeians had before them: they were full of a white and creamy gruel with coarse bits of grain. It steamed too, hot and smoky to the air. It had the look of that soup she knew the Himean poor were reduced to eating during grain shortages, the thin gruel of millet that was their staple during an unavailability of bread. Yet this was far whiter, and had none of the usual bits of flavouring one typically saw in those bowls, from little chunks of salt pork to dark speckles of pepper. It did not smell savoury either, as such gruels often smelled. Rather, it smelled oddly sweet.

"A gruel?" she said, looking at the brew curiously. "What is that, Natsuki?"

The others had been eyeing the stuff too and lifted their brows when the girl answered, "Oats."

Shizuru smiled and jested: "I do hope you haven't stolen it from your horse."

The rest chuckled as the young woman frowned at this answer. Shizuru apologised charmingly for her rude humour, however, and explained that it had caught her by surprise since it was uncommon fare in Himean culture-although she did qualify that it was fairly common to use millet in a porridge as well. The Otomeian's displeasure faded quickly at this intelligence.

"Is it regular food for your people?" Chie asked aloud, tearing her roll of crusty, white bread with deft fingers. Natsuki nodded in reply while her cousin answered the legate verbally.

"Yes, it is regular, Legate," said the younger Otomeian, speaking again with her brand of quiet formality. "We eat bread too, but in winter, oats are more common for breakfast."

"Do you put anything in it?"

"Only milk."

"Milk?" The Himeans exchanged looks: they were not a milk-drinking nation, after all, at least not after being weaned from their wet nurses' breasts. "That's all you put in it?"

"Those who like it sweet add honey. This has both, along with apples." Nina paused and seemed to think of something. "You want to try some, maybe?"

Chie looked at the coarsely-textured porridge-with milk, of all things!-then at her own sweet-tasting, deliciously soft white bread. She smiled and declined a little sheepishly, to Nao's obvious amusement.

"I think I'll do that some other time, thanks," Chie said, trying to work up a glare for her sniggering friend. "And I'm not saying this out of any misplaced sense of Himean culinary superiority, I assure you."

Nao remarked that her friend's refusal was rather out of "a sense of upper-class weakness in the gut".

"I do hope you shall allow me to defend the upper-class stomach," Shizuru said while setting down her own roll of bread. She turned her head to the side and to the listening Natsuki. "Would you permit me to try some of yours, Natsuki? I confess myself curious as to how it tastes."

Natsuki nodded and moved the bowl a little closer to her. Shizuru picked up the wooden spoon and gingerly lifted some of the gruel to her mouth. The rest watched.

"Hmm," she mumbled, after swallowing the morsel. "Sweeter than I expected, I daresay, and with a good deal of texture. The taste of milk is prominent, but not unpleasant. The honey and apple augments it, so it tastes closer to a dessert course than breakfast, I think."

She slid the bowl back in front of Natsuki and thanked her, picking up her bread again.

"Not bad at all," she announced to the company. "Though I admit I still do prefer bread."

A smile crossed Natsuki's lips, but it vanished quickly when she took up her spoon and resumed eating.

"All Himeans prefer bread," the primipilus was saying. "But if you say it isn't too bad, then it likely isn't, General. Hear that, Chie, you chicken?"

Chie would have retorted had Nao's body-servant not beat her to it.

"But you did refuse to try it last time too, Nao-senpai," the girl said to everyone's amusement-save Nao's, of course.

Chie laughed the hardest, beaming appreciatively at Erstin.

"I'm not the only chicken here, Yuuki," she crowed at Nao, who was sparing a dry look for the girl who had practically sold her out. "Oh, at least it shows you're Himean through and through, all right. No oat-lovers, we, just as we're not a horse-people either. Himeans don't ride but trudge close to the ground, so it only makes sense we'd rather peck at other grains like old hens scratching the soil, cluck!"

Even Nao laughed at her last statement, for she delivered it with a comic flap of the elbows and even more ridiculous bob of the head. Only Nina's cousin did not emit a sound, though the tightly-controlled smile on her lips showed how close she had been to doing so.

"By the way, I'm curious," Chie said, later. "You say both oats and bread are staples-or common, anyway-at your tables, but I can't say I remember any farms in Otomeia. You're a citadel high up in the mountains, after all! The most I saw growing on the ground was that thick, hardy grass you have, and the rest of it was snow. I doubt you could grow oats there."

Shizuru agreed with the legate's statement.

"Indeed," she said, looking at the cousins, one after the other. "Whence do the grains come?"

As everyone expected, it was the younger Otomeian who answered. Nevertheless, she did wait to receive a nod from her older cousin and superior before doing that.

"Our other land in the valleys," she explained. "We trade too, when the harvest is too little. Often with Rheia, and also here, with Argus."

Chie slapped her forehead lightly.

"Of course, I forgot!" she said. "You do have other territories, like us. One tends to forget that Otomeia is just the capital."

"Just as we tend to forget that Hime is in only part of Fuuka," Shizuru smiled.

"Ah, but it's not the same, is it?" Chie returned. "From what I remember of the Otomeians, the inhabitants of their other provinces are still all considered Otomeian. Theirs is an empire. Ours, a republic of one city with allied nations around it. An Otomeian of the plains is still considered the equal of an Otomeian of the capital, am I right, Nina-san and Natsuki-san? Yes? There you are, then. By contrast, a Fuukan is not the equal of a Himean."

"That is debatable," Shizuru grinned, provoking droll looks from her two officers. "You remember how often the Fuukans used to debate it all the way to arms with us."

Chie laughed uncertainly.

"Still," she said. "They did lose all of those debates, as you call them."

"Which does not mean the argument itself is concluded." The tawny-haired woman sipped at her drink. "But going back to our subject, yes, Otomeia is much larger than Otomeia Citadel, not so, Ninahan?"

Nina nodded, intrigued by the discomfort the foreign commander's digression had brought to the other Himeans. It was interesting, she supposed, that there was such a distinction being drawn between Himeans and Fuukans-but it was ultimately not interesting enough for her to give more than a moment's thought to it. She was not as much of a scholar as her cousin, nor as politically sharp.

"The valleys and plains are also where most of our horses are bred," she went on to say. "There's also a big, flat place low down the mountain but still close to the city where grass grows well, and we graze the city horses there. Also the goats and cattle."

"Ah, yes," Shizuru said. "I remember it, your city's permanent cavalry camp. I was shown there some months ago, and I recall it had a finely-kept road winding from that grassy bowl and up to the main citadel."

A thoughtful furrow passed her brow, all of a sudden.

"It was a good path," she said to them. "Had there only been another path leading down from that camp and to the base of the mountain, it might have been a better route for the army to travel, since the camp was in the right direction for a party travelling between Otomeia and Argus. We must have passed by it when we took the more winding main road, instead. What a pity. I am certain we could have saved more time had we passed through the camp itself, instead."

"Can't we, if we go thereabouts again?" Nao put in. "Maybe there's a path and we didn't see it."

Shizuru sounded denial.

"As it was, I saw only rocky crags on all sides of the camp," she said. "The only path out from or into it seems to be the one going up to Otomeia, so I suppose even their cavalry has to go up the path leading to the city first, then turn from there to the main road, if they wish to descend the mountain. A wearisome detour, I should imagine."

Everyone saw Nina's meaningful glance at her older cousin, who returned the glance expressionlessly and with the merest flicker of her eyes. The latter set down her spoon and, unpredictably, answered Shizuru's questioning look herself.

"There is a path," she said. "Through the crags."

"Do you mean a proper path, Natsuki, where wagons may pass?"

"Yes," Natsuki said, before adding: "Small wagons."

Shizuru expressed her interest in the matter, and Natsuki sent her cousin a look the Himeans took to mean that the younger Otomeian was being tasked to answer by the elder, for that was what Nina did.

"One of the crags is a false wall, General," she explained, addressing Shizuru personally but speaking as well to the others. "If you pass to the side, you see a gap in the rocks. It's dark because of the cliffsides around it, but wide enough for small wagons. If you go deeper you reach the forest and pass through it, then come out near the end of the road you took when your army was going up. The main road. The turn to the cavalry path is kept hidden for safety."

Nao grinned as her fellow officers digested the information wonderingly.

"I'm surprised you told us about it, then," she said to the younger Otomeian, who looked a little surprised too at her next statement. "What's to prevent us from using that information against your people, one of these days?"

Shizuru winced inwardly at her centurion's impolitic bait, preparing to diffuse any arising tension by writing off the words as a joke. But Natsuki spoke before she could do this.

"Nothing," that sombre young woman said, without a trace of animosity. "You may try to use it. Against us."

Everyone at the table stared, her fellow Otomeian included.

"Heh," Nao snorted, once she had recovered. "That sounds like treason to me, girl. You're practically giving me licence to use that knowledge against your people's interests."

The deep green eyes met lime-sharp ones with a challenge.

"I said you may try," Natsuki said shortly. "You will fail."

Smiles appeared on all faces, even on the centurion's.

"Sure about that?" the primipilus asked bitingly. "I'd like to know why you sound so convinced about it. I don't see why I can't storm that path with a good cohort of Himean legionaries at my back."

Even as she said this, however, she already knew that would not be possible, as did Shizuru and Chie. They guessed-and their guesses were right-that the path was littered with protective measures and stationed guards, hidden in watch. The tops of the crags on either side of the end of that path, too, were probably prime positions for archers, just as the mountain shelves and nooks by the main road their army had taken up to Otomeia had been filled with look-outs toting bows. Any army trying to force its way up that path was easy prey for an ambush, especially given that it would be fighting its way up, and the defenders throwing their weight down.

Shizuru had a shrewd thought just then: no wonder Hime had always been on good terms with the Otomeians. Not only did the latter never impede Hime's actions in that part of the world, but their centre of government and main citadel was nigh-impregnable. Difficult to either overpower or invade! Too strong for the former, too usefully accommodating for the latter. In other words, their circumstances made it such that Hime's best policy with them was that of a friend.

She thought it was just as well, and not only for the sake of her personal interests in the matter. Hime always needed strong friends to help keep the peace in other areas. Friends in high places, in this case, and quite literally. It was true that the mountain-based Otomeians were a mercenary and warlike race themselves, but they had only become so out of decades of effort to keep their own territories invader-free and peaceful. There were many other tribes in Otomeia's eastern lands, and they were not known for being peaceable.

"Again you may try," Natsuki was saying colourlessly again to Nao, breaking Shizuru out of her ruminations. "You will die."

Shizuru saw the grin struggling to form on Nina's face and wished it would gain victory over the girl's control, if for no other reason than that her own smile wanted to do the same. She reined it in, however, since she had to be ready for whatever scathing outburst the primipilus might offer as a reply. But Nao surprised them all by grinning hugely and replying to the girl in tones devoid of anger.

"Well, you're a gruesome little brat, aren't you?" Nao said to the young woman staring at her from across the table. "I can't say I like the way you just predicted my death so casually, but I like that you don't mince about."

She reached to Chie's side for the wine flagon and asked Erstin to fetch a beaker, which the girl did. Nao poured wine almost to the brim of the fresh cup and shoved it over to Natsuki's part of the table, grinning very roguishly as she quite affably delivered her revenge.

"Bugger trying to storm the path. I'll drink to your people's health, Girl, if you'll drink to mine," she said to the startled Natsuki. "Go on, have a drink. Don't tell me you'll refuse it, since I already poured the stuff!"

Thereupon she filled her own cup as well and tipped it to her mouth, swallowing the undiluted contents in three loud flexes of her throat. She set the beaker back on the table with a clatter, looking expectantly at Natsuki.

"Uhh..."

Shizuru stifled a chuckle, seeing that her bodyguard was eyeing askance the cup poured for her and making no move to take it. She assumed Nao knew the same thing she did, which was that Otomeians, more used to the alcoholic beverages they called beer and mead, rarely took wine unwatered. Added to which was the fact she knew and she felt Nao suspected: Natsuki was no great imbibor of liquor. Even when she and Shizuru drank in their rooms together, Shizuru drank a full cup for every sip from her. So the young woman was stuck, unable to refuse the centurion's gesture yet unable to temper the wine with water to make it more endurable, since the cup was already full. Shizuru could see her trying to work out the quandary and felt a twinge of pity, for all that she found the deftly-worked dilemma terrifically amusing.

She made her decision in a second and popped a piece of bread into her mouth, swiftly chewing.

Forgive me, Nao-han, she said silently, suddenly reaching for the cup the centurion had set before Natsuki. But I am going to save Natsuki from teasing, this once .

"Oh, dear god," she said with a cough, bringing the cup to her lips and drinking the contents to less than half the previous level. She grinned repentantly afterwards at the company. "Please pardon me for that, Nao-han, Natsuki. I felt a choke coming on from the bread, and my cup was empty. I was afraid that if I did not drink something immediately I would have hacked rather embarrassingly before you all. Nonetheless, it was still bad-mannered of me when Nao-han poured it for Natsuki, so please excuse me."

She said this while replacing what she had drunk with water from another flagon. The now-diluted cup of wine was returned to Natsuki.

"That's fine, and so you know, I know just what you were afraid of, General," the primipilus said humorously. She looked at Natsuki again and leered. "Well, drink it up already. The general's saved you, so drink!"

The Otomeian looked at her saviour awkwardly before turning her eyes to the beaker. Her knee rubbed gently against Shizuru's, under the table, and the older woman threw her a quick, private smile. Everyone smiled too as Natsuki finally took the beaker in front of her and drank from the liquid quietly, two spots of red on her cheeks.

"Good!" Nao proclaimed, when Natsuki returned the half-empty cup to the table. "Want some more?"

Chie and Erstin giggled when the Otomeian responded with an earnest shake of the head, hastily holding up her palm. Nao laughed.

"Thought so," she said, pouring more wine for herself. She did not fill her cup this time, however, but diluted the beverage with water as well. "Go back to your horse-feed and teat juice, then. Oats and milk! Jupiter, you people are interesting. What else do you eat?"

It was to Nina that she directed the last query, so it was Nina who answered.

"Beef," the girl supplied, after addressing Nao as 'Centurion'. "It's mostly cattle and goats we keep, so we eat their meat and drink their milk. We make cheese from the milk. Black bread is common too."

"I was fascinated when I first saw it," Chie interjected. "Your black bread. Jupiter, I even thought for a while that it was that colour because you baked it until burnt!"

There was laughter and Nina shook her head.

"No," she said. "It's tougher than the white."

"Do you put anything on it? I haven't seen any of your people eating it with oil."

Shizuru nodded at that. The first time she had eaten bread in the Himean way-by tearing off hunks and dipping them in olive oil-she noticed that Natsuki had eyed her with something approaching fascination. It had been like that too when she first taught the girl to do the same, although she did notice that Natsuki already took to sopping stew with bread even before that. So she guessed that it was only dipping in olive oil with which the Otomeian bread-diners were unfamiliar.

"We dip it in soup or broth," Nina answered, as she had expected. Then Nina offered another piece of information. "But more often we smear butter."

"Oh! Butter," Chie said.

"Yes."

Chie grinned.

"Except for the black bread, it seems that the average Otomeian runs on milk," the legate remarked. "All foods derived from the creamy, white stuff! Even the meat can be said to come from it, after all, since all calves and kids subsist first on their mother's milk. Milk, milk. I wonder if it accounts for the remarkable paleness of your complexion."

"No, it's the mountain weather, innit?" Nao said on behalf of the two snow-skinned Otomeians. "Stay in these regions long enough and you'll lose that brown skin of yours too, Chie. These parts are all around cold. Some of the Mentulaeans are also fair, even if they do live on lower ground."

"Not like the Otomeian fair, however," Chie said. "Some of the Mentulae are dark too, as diverse in complexion as us since some of their territories stretch further south and to warm weather. But I have yet to see an Otomeian who isn't white."

She turned to the cousins, who were following the conversation curiously.

"I hope you don't think we're being rude, talking about this," she said courteously. "I've just been wondering at the differences in physical traits among the peoples in these parts. As you can see, I myself am among the darker Himeans, both in hair as well as skin. Our race runs across the entire gamut of colours. But I find myself struck by the Otomeian tendency to run so exceedingly fair."

Nina seemed to understand.

"Most of us are fair," she said, stopping abruptly when she saw her cousin smirk.

All heads turned to Natsuki too, who bowed her head without bending the ramrod straightness of her back.

" They are fair," the elder Otomeian said matter-of-factly, twinkling eyes indicating a hidden meaning to the words. "My cousin and I, we are only pale."

There were a few seconds of silence after this enigmatic statement, broken when Shizuru finally worked out what the girl was hinting.

"Oh indeed!" she said with emphasis, prompting the rest of the Himeans to look to her for the explanation. "Have you not noticed, Chie-han? The darkest-haired Otomeians we have seen are still brown."

" Ecastor !" Chie cried, seeing what Shizuru was getting at. "You're right! I think the darkest one I've seen had hair just a shade next to the one we call mouse!"

All of them turned to look at the Otomeians present, who happened to be exchanging a look at that second.

"Why, you two must stand out among them, then," said Chie, giving voice to what everyone was thinking. "You're pale like the rest, but your tops set you out of the crowd, right?"

The two black-haired girls smiled: one with her lips, the other with her eyes.

"Yes," Nina affirmed, mouth still curving. "But I don't mind."

"Yes, none of the others even approach dark brown. So that's the difference between you and the fairer peoples of the Mentulae. They still have some darkhairs among them."

"Many Mentulae are fair, too," Nina replied. "But their fair people are not like ours. They are a little less pale of skin, more pink."

When Natsuki is blushing, I doubt that, Shizuru thought to herself.

Natsuki muttered something.

"Sorry, Natsuki," she said, drawing attention to the girl. "I fear I did not catch that. What did you say?"

Natsuki said it again a little more loudly, and though the words were perfectly clear, it was plain that their meaning was not understood by her auditors.

"Mentulae," she told them. "They have red."

The Himeans exchanged confused glances while Natsuki calmly returned to her meal. What did she mean, the Mentulae had red?

"My cousin is saying," Nina finally explained, "that there are people with red hair among the Mentulae."

Nao uttered an oath as all of them realised the implication of the girl's statement, which she voiced in the next second, herself.

"And Otomeians don't have any!" she cried, looking amazed. "Dis take you! So that's why Kenji and me got such odd looks when we were in your city."

At Nina's faintly curious expression, she explained: "Kenji's one of the legates. He's the tall, lean one with red hair."

"Not as red as yours, Nao-senpai," Erstin noted.

"No, not as red as mine," Nao replied with a measure of pride.

"But gods, I'm ashamed to say I didn't notice that either!" Chie exclaimed. "No redheads among the Otomeians, eh, and no black-haired ones either. Did you notice, Shizuru-san?"

Shizuru smiled.

"I did notice some other differences in physical type, especially compared to ours," she volunteered. "For instance, take the noses."

"Noses?"

"Otomeians have small, sharp noses I liken to blades," she expounded, stroking her own perfectly straight nose with a finger. "Whereas Himeans, though with a tendency to be sharp as well, have noses a little less thin and quite a bit longer. I am speaking of the typical characteristics of a classic Himean nose, of course. There also seems to be more of a tendency among our people to develop bridges or strong, pronounced bones in the nasal appendages... though intermarriages between Himeans and the other native tribes of Fuuka have produced some small noses recently as well. Even so, they are not straight then, but either curving or snub."

"You're right, that's so," Chie said, thinking on it. She sneaked a glimpse of Natsuki's nose, which indeed looked like a small axe blade. Then, feeling as though she had to contribute something, as she was the official describer of their campaign's adventures to the Senate, she said: "Something else I've noticed. Your people run to the long side, don't they? I mean the tall side. Most of you go past the average Himean's height, and I've seen more than a regular number of giants. The Mentulae are shorter and more like us in that respect too."

Natsuki agreed quietly.

"It's damned odd," Nao suddenly proclaimed, "how the Mentulae have so much more in common with us. They even speak our language! Why in Juno's name do they talk Himean, anyway? I know it's starting to spread, our tongue, but it's still Greek that's more popular outside our territories. Yet the Otomeians say most of the Mentulae don't talk Greek."

It was Shizuru who answered, having asked Natsuki the same thing before. Hence it was the girl's speculation that she offered to the rest, having the grace to credit the young woman for it as she did so.

"I have discussed the question with Natsuki and find her explanation of it eminently sound," she told them, noting quietly the faint blush on her lover's face. "Apparently, the Mentulaeans speak different languages among their tribes, or originally used to. When their kings conquered the whole and unified them into one nation, however, they took to using Himean as their common language. Natsuki feels that this was because certain cultural and geographical circumstances meant that they had little commerce with the Greeks, and were not a people generally inclined to such Grecian interests as scientific scholarship, written literature, and philosophy. Even their distinct, varied tribal languages were restricted to the spoken word, rarely set on paper, which is why most of their tradition is passed by word-of-mouth and hymns."

"Given our relative proximity to them, especially with our early expansion north," she went on, "there was regular trade between the Mentulaean tribes and us, even before they became united under one ruler. Himeans scatter in every part of the world, after all, and when you think about it, the Mentulaean lands are not actually all that far from Fuuka. Why, we do not even have to cross the sea each time to get here!"

"Hence," she concluded, "it was not Greek but Himean that introduced the conveniences of written and read communication to them. It became the language with which all their tribes were familiar-because of contact and dealings with our travelling countrymen long before. Never mind that they were also familiar with other written languages by that time. Himean already happened to be the most widely-recognised among their varied peoples and the easiest-learned alphabet. The result of that convenience is that they adopted our language for their own, though with some variations due to their culture, of course."

The others digested this quietly. Even Natsuki's cousin, Shizuru noticed, seemed a little amazed by the explanation and once sent her elder cousin an admiring glance. It was well-deserved. She herself had sat silent for a while after the girl offered the theory to her, admiring the girl's scholarly explanation. How it pleased her to let others see Natsuki's intelligence! And how it tickled a little to realise it too, for that meant she was yet another "chicken" at this table: a proudly clucking mother hen!

"That's a good explanation, Natsuki-san, and I agree with Shizuru-san. I believe it too," Chie said later, offering a smile to the blushing girl. "But it really makes the Mentulae sound even more like barbarians, doesn't it, that they don't know the real lingua mun di . Now there are people of whom you can honestly say they don't have an ounce of Greek!"

Shizuru smiled, acknowledging the legate's joke. It was a play upon one of the most common deprecations the senatorial conservatives cast against someone of questionable ancestry: that he or she did not have an ounce of Greek. Greek was the language of educated people, required of every Himean whose family could afford to send him or her to school, or acquire the services of a private pedagogue. Even if Himean was spreading around the world, it was still Greek that dominated inter-state relations. It was also the supposed original language of scholarship. Hence every educated Himean had to know Greek.

Although of course, "knowing" is just about all there is to it for most, she thought pitilessly, aware of the truth about her fellow senators and upper-class citizens. A good deal of them are still shockingly awkward when reading Hellenic texts, or even conversing in the language. So much so that I can barely understand what they are saying, on occasion .

There was another thing about Natsuki of which she could be proud, she realised. Natsuki spoke not just any Greek excellently, but Attic Greek, the most refined and cultured of all the variations. It was something she-to be perfectly honest-had not expected at all. Imagine the shock it had given her one day when she muttered something to herself in that language and was answered by the girl with a perfectly appropriate response, in equally perfect and appropriate Greek!

What a pleasure it could be to share certain kinds of knowledge with someone you liked! That was aside from sharing the quality of having an acute mind. She definitely appreciated it, all the more as lack of that last faculty had always been one of her most damning criticisms for potential matches when discussing them with her now-deceased mother. She could still remember those times, quite a few years back in the past.

"What about her?" her mother had often asked, pointing to a name on a list. There were only ever female names there, as Shizuru's preference had long been common knowledge to the two of them. The problem was, Shizuru was extremely difficult here-as in many other things, her mother often said to friends. The difficult daughter could still recall, years afterwards, the many times her mother had tried to argue the value of a certain candidate to her, only to be turned down without hesitation.

"A respectable child," she had said once, during one of the last times she had tried to make her daughter finally consider someone. "As is fitting from such a respectable family. She's reasonably sweet too, if what I've seen is any indication."

As expected, Shizuru declined.

"To be honest, Mother," she said, "I fear I found her rather dull."

"I see." Her mother pointed to the next name on the list. "What do you think of this one? She comes from a rather more unruly brood than the last one, but still generally respectable. She has a lovely face too, so you certainly cannot tender a complaint in that department."

"Then I must tender the complaint I did about the previous one."

"Really, Shizuru? I myself find the girl interesting, so I doubt she would put you to sleep."

"I'm afraid I failed to make my meaning clearer, Mother," Shizuru smiled. "When I said 'dull', I was referring to mental acuity, which is nevertheless part of what generates interest."

"Ah." The older woman sighed. "Both of the young women I have just suggested come from well-to-do families, so I expect they are well-educated. Even so, I take it you do not simply mean that they are, er... ignorant?"

"Not merely, no."

"I see." Resigning herself, the older woman looked at the next name on the list and smiled with approbation. "This one may finally meet your criteria, then. Not only does she have all the good qualities the other girls have but she is also clever. If I remember aright, her father boasted of her pedagogue's regard for her, as she was already committing sections of the law to memory at thirteen. I have also heard her name being trotted out by many a grammaticus on the watch for future great advocates. There, now, shall you still dare to tell me she is dull?"

Shizuru suppressed a giggle.

"I'm afraid so," she said.

Her mother gave her a long-suffering look.

"I do not understand, Shizuru," she said. "Are you going to tell me she is not mentally acute, when everyone else would say otherwise?"

"She is clever, as you say, Mother," Shizuru answered with a deferential smile. "However, she has not the kind of cleverness I find interesting. She has wonderful capacity for retaining information, yes, but she does not possess the faculty for producing it. While having a great memory is an excellent thing, it does not always make one more interesting. Oddly enough, it may even make you duller! The reason they laud her so much is because she sticks to the tried and tested formulae, recites lines from old and accepted speeches. Or the laws. It's all repetition and regurgitation, never original construction! How can that be interesting?"

The elder Fujino had her lips pressed thoughtfully together and frowned.

"Much as I am loath to admit it, I see the justice of your argument," she told her daughter. "Nevertheless, I am only suggesting these names to you for the sake of your initial forays in companionship... for while all your friends have begun to venture in that field, you still have not done so, even at this age! It is high time that you did. In other words, these are only suggestions for a trial, not a permanent match. You need not marry any of these girls I am suggesting, Shizuru, so you have no need to be so exacting from the outset."

She stopped and fixed a querying eye on her daughter.

"I asked you this before and you denied it, which answer is the only reason I have actually decided to help you along with this. So I shall ask you again. Is there really no person who catches your fancy, Shizuru?"

"I fear not."

"Yet you make eyes at everyone," her mother said shrewdly.

"Only because I have eyes for no one."

"Really!"

It had been Shizuru's turn to sigh.

"The unfortunate fact is that the whole business scarce interests me," she confessed. "I cannot force myself into feeling excited about it. Being charming is all fine and good and also amusing, but I confess I cannot imagine myself being so earnest with anyone. If I must make a venture, as you suggest, then the person with whom I must undertake such a venture needs to be tremendously interesting, else the whole endeavour be doomed from the outset. I would rather not be a churl, either, by feigning my own interest in the person for the sake of gaining the experience in matters of companionship and romantic relations. No, Mother, I must be exacting."

"How exacting, pray tell? Can you not supply me an example for someone who would meet your rigorous measures?"

She thought for a second.

"Chikane would be excellent, but since I feel no romantic attraction for her and she is already my friend, the point is moot."

"Chikane!" her mother echoed dryly. "Chikane of the Himemiya, child?"

"Yes."

The shaded auburn eyes, darker and browner compared to her red, regarded her wryly. Shizuru tried very hard not to smile.

"Sometimes I wonder if you are not trying to play your games with me as well," her mother told her, voice gaining a low drawl of exasperation. "For I swear only mischief could have prompted you to supply such an example. Chikane is far too singular a young woman in every respect, intellect included."

"As singular, perhaps, as you would permit your daughter to be?"

"Oh, my daughter is undoubtedly singular," the older woman replied with faint irony.

"She believes herself to be so too," Shizuru replied with an unrepentant grin. "Oh, don't you see, Mother? I cannot be interested in someone average, someone dull. When I do choose someone, it shall have to be someone singular too, else I would simply expire."

"I do not expect you to be so melodramatic as to express mere boredom through suicide, Shizuru," her mother replied witheringly, eliciting a laugh from the young woman. "Though given your nature, boredom really just might cause you to die in another sense."

The elegant planes of the older woman's face, still smooth for one her age, suddenly drew into a taut expression.

"I fear for your marriage, as it seems it shall have to be terribly exciting to last," she told her daughter. "That, or be quickly relegated to the flames of divorce once you have lost interest or excitement. And an exciting marriage is only ever a tumultuous one! It is not seemly to have such a relationship, though it is only a little more seemly to have instead an endless series of affairs. I hope you remember this, as I have no desire to see you turn out to be a philanderer like your older cousin."

Shizuru did not need the name to know exactly which cousin.

"I thought you liked her," she replied.

"Do you?"

"I do, as a cousin."

"I feel the same, as her aunt. I like Shizuma for what she is, and due to her own charms. But I do not like that she goes through the female population of Hime as though it were her private harem, especially when she bears the name of my side of the family. It is unseemly."

"Ah."

"While I know that you are capable of generating similar adulation, I still expect more restraint from you. But not to such a degree that you turn sixteen without even having taken a fleeting interest in anyone!"

The still-fifteen-year-old smiled with her teeth, saying nothing.

Her mother lifted an eyebrow and continued: "Can you not lower your standards a little for now? I do fear you may turn out the other way altogether if you keep this up and put me in the delicate position of informing your father that we are the proud parents of both our families' first self-determined spinster."

Shizuru emitted a chuckle.

"Before that, allow me to say this," she said. "You and Father have been married for nearly two decades now and with hardly any disputes or tumult at all. If you would not gainsay me, your marriage has never been a tumultuous one, which would mean in light of your earlier words that it is not exciting either. I hope either of us is mistaken, then, because I would hate to think my parents' marriage has no excitement or interest for them. But to return to our topic, please permit me a question: did you ever lower your standards for father?"

Her mother's lips had been trying to twitch into a smile ever since Shizuru made the jest about her relationship with her husband. She tried to hide it now as she answered.

"Decidedly not. But our relation is that of marriage, a more serious thing by far than the ventures of which we have been speaking."

"Conceded. But did you ever lower your standards in such ventures, prior to meeting Father?"

Her mother finally allowed the smile to come out.

"Of course not," said the extremely proud, extremely patrician woman.

Shizuru tried to hide her triumph.

"Then you have my answer," she said. "I must be exacting even now because it befits me to be, and that means I cannot abide someone I consider to be dull."

The older Fujino regarded her daughter, then finally exhaled gently, settling back into her couch.

"I find it intriguing you should say that, Shizuru, since you are constantly surrounded by people who are undeniably dull-for most people are that, compared to you. Chikane and a few others are the only exceptions." She tilted her head, a mannerism Shizuru had taken from her. "Have you not learned to tolerate lesser minds, until now?"

Shizuru looked at her.

"If you would permit me to point it out, you taught me to feign tolerance, Mother," she said mildly. "I was not aware I had to manufacture the genuine article."

"I was hoping that by dint of practice you could produce a perfect facsimile."

"Fool myself to that extent I cannot. Nor, I think, would you like it if I did," Shizuru replied. "My apologies, but I cannot concede this point. Frittering away my time with someone less than what I hope for would be distasteful to me, and it seems to me that romance often proceeds by frittering away time. It strikes me as superfluous already, so the very least I can do is find someone with great personal worth to salvage it."

She added then, provoking a small frown from her mother: "You know, I believe I would quickly grow to hate a lover who is dull. She would be nothing but an uninspiring burden, to the point that I would prefer to have a brilliant lunatic instead. At least I could then have the benefit of both intelligence and a source of interest."

"Sometimes, Daughter, you almost make me wish I had given birth to someone duller," her mother retorted wittily, making Shizuru dissolve into soft laughter.

As though someone of her ilk could ever have spawned dull children, Shizuru thought, shaking the memory away. She was aware of a rueful smile turning her lips. Why was it that even the mere remembrance of her mother always made her feel like a young girl again, a feeling her father had never been able to provoke from her? She did not feel off-balance, not smaller or reduced to infancy, but somehow-with the attendant advantages and disadvantages-younger.

She wondered suddenly what would her mother have thought of Natsuki, who made all those past suggestions for romantic interest seem so much duller indeed. What would she have made of Natsuki, who was not even Himean, was five years younger, was mentally crippled by some injury so grave it could near-paralyse her, was in spite of all possible objections to eligibility the only one Shizuru had ever found interesting enough to want?

But her mother was dead now, and it was no use wondering what she would have thought of Natsuki, she supposed. She would never know.

"I am aware that unlike the Mentulae, Otomeians know Greek," she said, returning to the conversation and her original train of thought. "Has it any exclusivity, however, or is it restricted to any levels of society?"

"The middle to upper classes," Nina answered readily, though without conceit. "Of course, my cousin and I both speak and write it."

Nao, who had struggled over Greek lessons as part of her training, raised both eyebrows.

"Well-educated little brats, aren't you ?" she said archly, in near-faultless Greek.

"As a matter of fact, yes," came the low-voiced answer, spoken in truly faultless Greek.

The primipilus narrowed her eyes at the unexpected retort from Natsuki, whereas Chie and Shizuru both started chuckling. Erstin, who had not had either the opportunity or the privilege to learn the language, looked about with polite enquiry until the younger of the two Otomeians turned and began to whisper to her what had transpired.

"Ah, forgive us for the amusement, Nao-han," Shizuru said, trying to prevent the centurion's hostility before it could crest and crash. "I doubt Natsuki meant anything other than to answer your query honestly. You know how earnest she can be; she sometimes takes even rhetorical questions seriously."

She looked at the girl from the corner of an eye, praying she would not contradict her words and give cause for Nao to be antagonised further. Her fear was in vain, however, as Natsuki was already back to eating her porridge. Shizuru turned back to Nao and saw that the red-haired woman looked torn between smiling and snarling. As was the centurion's custom, she settled instead for producing a halfway-nasty grin.

"Seems like sauce to me," she said with a shrug.

Shizuru decided a change of subject was due.

"Well, on another note," she said, after finishing her roll, "have you learned what Midori-han has done regarding the Mentulaean killings?"

"Mentulaean Murders, Shizuru-san, and Mentulaean Mur-de-rers!" Chie corrected, to her amusement. "It's what everyone is calling them now, for the sake of alliteration. Double the M's, if you please, for the sake of alliteration!"

"Alliteration's attractions are absolute, after all," Shizuru replied with light sarcasm, eliciting more laughter; even Natsuki smirked behind her spoon. "Forgive me. I acknowledge my mistake, Chie-han, and follow your lead. Have you learned what Midori-han-witness another M, which means I triple it!-has done regarding the Mentulaean Murders?"

Chie laughed gleefully before replying.

"Yes, I did," she said, before going on to an explication. "Well, she's given out that she's willing to prosecute the culprits in a proper court, to ensure that both justice and the law are observed. She didn't name anyone, of course, just made it seem like she had the names but was still keeping them quiet while waiting for more evidence. Which, she made clear, she meant to gather from the next such incident. In other words, the next Mmmmentulaean mmmurder," she hummed, provoking some smiles. "Curiously enough, it's been a long time now without any such murder happening. Care to make a guess on whether one will take place or never again?"

Nao snorted in amusement: "Of course it won't. She's practically threatened to murder the ones responsible, herself."

Her body-servant shifted, apologised for intruding on the conversation.

"I'm sorry, but can I maybe ask why?" she asked the elder women, looking slightly embarrassed. "I mean, the governor only threatened to prosecute them and didn't even name anyone, to prove she really can take it to court. She's been threatening them with worse things before now."

"It's because she never claimed to have any names or suspicions about their identities before," Chie began, waving a morsel of bread gleaming with oil. "Not even once did she claim to know, Ers-chan. She never cried wolf. So now that she's kicking up a racket about finally knowing the wolf, they're more inclined to believing her and her threat about the trial. Oh, they think the dogs are let out to howl now! But the truth is that there aren't any dogs at all. Midori-san would never take it to a court, let alone release the names to the public. She's too smart for that; she knows that a lynch mob of resident Mentulaeans would descend upon those she cites, even if they're only suspects."

She stopped here to pop the piece of bread in her mouth, and Shizuru continued the explanation.

"It comes down to this: the masterminds in this matter think they have the cut of Midori-han, but actually misjudged grossly in what they think to be her measure." Shizuru's eyes looked calmly into the girl's light, sea-green ones. "Anyone truly knowing Midori-han would know that she is not the sort to risk a riot, or a lynching of the kind that we can expect if she did indeed disclose names by holding public trials. To be fair to their misconception, it is easy to think her a lackadaisical governor, on occasion. But that is an illusion, or a reality she reserves for other areas of her governance, such as economics, which she handles with a very free hand."

"Just right, since the circumstances of Argus mean that it flourishes better with less trade regulation than others," Chie followed. "Aside from that, though, there's also the fact that she goes around looking half-drunk all the time. So what would the citizens of Argus think? Oh, there goes our governor, a regular lush, always out for a good time, not very strict or sharp. A pushover."

She exhaled and nodded with approbation.

"Well, she may not be very strict, but she is sharp!" she exclaimed, her soft golden-brown eyes gleaming with pleasure in the discussion. "This talk about public trial, the shady release of information that one of the hired assassins was caught and interrogated-it's nothing but sharp! She has the ones really responsible believing that she knows who they are, and the ones who aren't really responsible but still in the know believing she thinks it's them. In effect, they're all on edge about the jug of retribution the crazy, not sharp governor just might pour for them. And they're probably warning each other not to try anything that can provoke her into doing that, since she just might be-in their opinion-stupid enough to do it."

Erstin looked impressed, as did the Otomeian beside her.

"She's not stupid at all," she said, face lighting up. "But she's counting on them thinking she is, is that what you're saying, Chie-san?"

"Yes, and that she's 'reckless' too," Chie said. "Oh, she's a fox, is our Midori-sensei, right Shizuru-san? Who would've thought she had such a grasp of human nature?"

Shizuru displayed her teeth in a bright smile.

"I suppose one who specialises in history would eventually recognise patterns in human action and reaction, Chie-han," she ventured. "And one of Midori-han's greatest pleasures in her studies has always been the identification of such cycles."

"Wicked old fox, all right," Nao said, re-inserting herself into the conversation. "That's a crafty trick she's pulling. What if people realise it's just a trick, though?"

"They won't, or they'll never be sure that it is just that," Chie replied. "The fallout's too dangerous to even risk it on the bet that it's only a trick. Oh, the idea will cross their minds, but that's all. They'll never actually get up the daring to try and see if the governor really is stupid and crazy, or if she's just crazy."

They laughed, stopping when Shizuru made a move to rise.

"Oh, please excuse me," she said with apology, looking around with a distracted expression. "It nearly slipped my mind! There is an errand I have to run nearby. Do you remember, Chie-han?"

Chie arched her dark brows, looking as though she had just remembered. The legate could see the general's bodyguard putting down her spoon, getting ready to rise as well, and immediately tried to prevent it.

"Well, let's go do that and leave the rest of them here for a moment," she said smoothly, getting to her feet and sparing the Otomeian captain a wide smile. "Oh, stay, stay and don't let our errand interrupt your meal, Natsuki-san! I'll escort Shizuru-san in your place, and somewhat poorer companion as I am compared to you, I still do flatter myself that I'm not completely useless."

Shizuru looked down at the girl, who looked uncertain about Chie's offer.

"Stay and eat, Natsuki," she said kindly, though with a hint of firmness. "You know I would feel bad if you do not finish your meal on my account. I am not going far, anyway, and Chie-han is with me."

Between the two of us, we should be able to take care of ourselves."

"Listen to 'em," Nao said, through a mouthful of grilled fish. "Those two together are stronger than you think. They'd bury anyone in range with just their highfalutin talk, words heavy as boulders!"

"Best artillery in town and we never run out of ammunition!" Chie said with a burst of laughter. "Don't worry, Natsuki-san. We'll just be a few minutes, and I'll get her back safe and sound."

Natsuki finally nodded. She took up her spoon and resumed eating quietly, glancing up at Shizuru every now and then. Meanwhile, the two women standing rinsed their hands in a bowl given to them by Erstin. Afterwards, they put on their cloaks and parted from the company, a pair of dark green eyes following their exit.

"I was afraid for a moment there that she'd try to send that giant cat of hers in her stead," Chie joked to Shizuru, once they were on the street. "So where is this ancient trooper and how do we get there? It really is close by, right?"

"Yes, actually," Shizuru said, smiling gratefully at her friend. They had discussed this beforehand, of course, and prearranged everything so that Natsuki would not be present on this 'errand'. "Thank you ever so much, Chie-han. I have troubled you yet again."

"No, it's all fine," the other reassured her, brushing dark hair from her brow. "It's my pleasure to be of service."

Shizuru's breath clouded into a faint chuckle.

"Then rest assured I shall provide you some service as well, once this is over," she said.

It was Chie now who laughed.

"I'm holding you to that," she said warningly. "I'm excited to know what you learn about the circumstances surrounding the Massacre of Ortygia. Though only what you'd be comfortable with telling me, of course."

"Interesting qualification. Out of consideration, you mean, for

Natsuki?"

Chie smiled and winced at the same time.

"The poor girl," she said. "I'm not such a ghoul for information that I'd pry into something that she might not want known, Shizuru-san."

An amused sound: "I must seem a ghoul, then."

"Oh, no!" Chie laughed too. "That came out wrong, I'm afraid. I meant that there were things she might not be comfortable with me knowing, but comfortable with you. It's different."

There was no use pretending ignorance of the relationship, as she had done in the past; everyone knew by now exactly how "different" it was.

"I see."

They walked on for a little more, two cloaked figures painted blue by the winter light. Both women had their hoods on, so people did not recognise them as they passed and gave them no salutations. Shizuru, in particular, kept her face well-buried in the great folds of her cloak's hood, since she was the person more likely to be recognised. The sight of her walking down the street was often enough to cause a murmur in the avenue, people eyeing the beautiful young general with a mixture of natural curiosity and admiration.

And sometimes, envy too, or even contempt.

"So if it's a secret for now, does that mean you're not going to tell her?" Chie asked, side-stepping what looked like a bit of frozen mule's dung. "Or will you do that after you've had your talk with the chap?"

Shizuru lifted her head. Her lips parted to reply and Chie noticed the lower, fuller one glistening so healthily that she wondered how in the world the woman kept them from chapping. Chie's own lips were sore with the cold, and had several dried wounds where the air had finally forced them to crack.

"I shall tell her later," Shizuru said. "For now I deem it wiser to keep to myself. Any discussion that may result from bringing up the subject with her shall be delicate. As in delicate cases during court proceedings, I wish to minimise the questions to which I know not the answers and maximise those to which I do."

Chie smiled, ignoring the faint pain from her lips.

"Going to put her on trial, Shizuru-san?" she said.

"Only for restitution," came the solemn reply. "As the victim."

Chie's smile faded.

"She must've had it bad, hasn't she?" she said gently, a few seconds later.

Shizuru drew a breath before answering.

"I suppose," she said. "Perhaps that is what I am going to find out."

---

The 'ancient trooper' the two Himeans were set on seeing was a former cavalryman from Otomeia's cataphract division. Now past sixty years of age, he had retired from that position in favour of another: armsmaster of the Lupine Division. This meant that the maintenance of the Lupine warriors' daos, their armour and saddles, their gear and that of their horses, was all assigned to his care. Intriguingly, he was also supervisor of the detail that cared for the equine steeds themselves. Every cavalry member generally cared for his own horse, but non-combatant grooms were still necessary to ensure the steeds' fitness and safety. It was the ancient trooper's job to oversee these grooms and receive reports on the Lupine Division's horses' shape: a significant duty, since every cavalryman derived half of his strength in battle from his horse's performance. The arms-master understood this and knew this was the reason the horses were included in his care. In a sense, the animals were the cavalrymen's living, breathing arms.

Given these duties, the arms-master was an important man. It was no surprise to Shizuru that he merited separate accommodations from the rankers. After conducting inquiries, she found his quarters to be in an insula only a few blocks from the barracks, and along the main road leading to her army's cavalry camp outside the city walls. It was this edifice that she now entered, passing unmolested by the few tenants in the courtyard and ascending the stairs to the second floor. There she searched for the door to his apartment, and upon finding it, knocked twice on the hardy wood.

She had been directed to this man by her chief primipilus's body-servant. After Nao's hint that she could learn something of use to her researches if she interviewed the girl, she had immediately followed on the suggestion, thus obtaining the old trooper's name. After that, it had been a simple matter to review her army clerks' accounts and look for his address. She had sent a message to this address detailing her request to speak with him, as well as a request not to inform anyone-the Lupine Division's captain, in particular-of the matter. She received a positive response, also by letter, and had continued to exchange messages with him until they agreed upon meeting today, the last day of the year. Never once did she have occasion to meet him until now, so it took her somewhat by surprise when he answered the door, all seven feet of him.

"Greetings, Mino-han," she said, not betraying her astonishment at his imposing appearance. Upon hearing of his age and occupation, she had been expecting someone more wizened-tall as the other Otomeians, yes-but not someone so healthy he still exuded physical power. Nor indeed had she imagined someone so extremely large he seemed so even to her, a woman passing six feet by several inches.

The Otomeian before her was not only tall but also gigantic. He had arms and shoulders heavy with the swell of muscle, a chest like a barrel, and neck more than twice the thickness of hers. He was an astoundingly well-kept man for his age, Shizuru thought, unable even to detect a paunch on the man's belly beneath his clothes. Why, there was another thing to note about the Otomeians! Why did they never have any podgy people? She struggled with her memory, trying to remember if she had seen any Otomeians with flab or excessive fat. No, none at all-but that was impossible! All peoples had some who ran to fat.

Had she asked the man in front of her about it, he might have explained what seemed so mysterious to her. In Otomeian culture, it was practically a mortal sin for a warrior to go to seed. In their society, even the retired members of the army were still called to return to the service on occasion, unless they were too old or infirm to do so. No right of permanent discharge after having completed sixteen years in the army! Warriors were warriors forever, part of a pool that could be called up at any time in the future. No exceptions for the unfit were allowed, because the Otomeians believed that the best way for a person to get into shape was to thrust him or her into battle. It was an enforced cultural prejudice against those in poor condition. This meant those who were weaker than the rest—the slow, the out of shape, the overweight—were usually the first to fall in battle. What other option was there for one who liked living but to keep fit, not fat?

"Thank you," Shizuru told the Otomeian as he let her inside. She saw that the room was large, and looked even larger since it had very little furniture and a bare (but clean) wooden floor. There was only one big rug at the centre of the floor, and over that a small, low table. There were no chairs either, which she took to mean that they would sit on the rug, as the Otomeians were prone to do. She removed her hood and looked at him. Their eyes met at that moment, for he had been eyeing her. She eyed him back.

Mino had blonde hair, and it hung all the way to his waist in great cords. Two large braids kept it out of his eyes, weaving the hair from the temples and pulling it to meet at the back of the head. The man was clean-shaven and square-jawed, with prominent bones in his face. Shizuru decided he had the look of a mountain warrior: sharp of profile and blue of eye, lips no more than a harsh and pallid slash.

He regarded her stonily, saying nothing as he motioned her to the table. She walked towards it silently too, and stopped at the edge of the thick brown rug to divest herself of her boots.

"No," he said curtly in Himean, revealing an unsurprisingly deep, bass-heavy voice. He also had a thick accent. "Boots are fine."

She nodded and folded her legs, settling down with so much poise that he seemed to find it odd. It showed only in his eyes, for when he sat just across her end of the table, his mouth was expressionlessly flat.

He set a jug of some beverage on the table, along with two cups.

"No wine," he said. "Only beer."

She smiled cordially.

"I am thankful for anything you can offer," she told him. "And I do not find beer unpleasant."

He nodded and took up the jug, pouring the frothy dark liquid from it into both cups. Afterwards, both of them moved their cups closer to their ends of the table. But neither of them drank.

How interesting, Shizuru thought, meeting his piercing gaze with hers. He's not afraid of me at all.

After they had stared at each other to their hearts' content, she finally broke the silence.

"I am gratified you agreed to speak with me," she said, meeting only a flat look in response.

"You are the general," he said, sounding surly.

"Yes, I am," she said, in a cheerful tone that confused him. "But you could have refused, as I was not asking you in the capacity of a commander but rather in that of a comrade with whom you have fought."

He cast a doubtful look.

"So I could refuse?" he said, dubiously. "And what you do if I refused you? If, in place of saying 'yes', I said before 'no'?"

"Then I would have asked you again in my capacity as commander," she said, eyes dancing with humour. Mino's lips quirked, but he said nothing to this and she went on. "But this does not matter since you have already agreed to meet me. Permit me to ask: did you tell Natsuki that I asked for an audience-that I asked to speak with you?"

He gave her another flat look.

"You said do not tell Natsuki," he stated.

She shook her head.

"If you would permit me to correct you," she told him, "my letter asked if you would be willing to withhold it from her for now. You had the option of telling her."

"And again you ask of me something," he said astutely. "If I refused, you would ask me again as a general?"

"Not in this case," she said. "Had you truly wished to tell her, then I would not have stopped you."

"I did not tell."

"My thanks, then, Mino-han. All the same, please know that you truly could have."

He finally lifted the cup in front of him, raising it to his lips and gulping half the contents in a fashion that would have been approved by Nao and provoked a competition from Midori. He wiped his lips with the back of his great, broad hand next and looked stern.

"Speak first," he said simply. "Then we see what I tell Natsuki."

Her smile widened: "A sound proposition."

"What you want?"

It was her turn to drink, and she did so with a smooth, noiseless sip. She could feel his eyes boring quietly into her, those fair blue eyes most of his race seemed to have. They reminded her suddenly of her legate and friend, Suou Himemiya. Surely that young woman fit easily among the Otomeians, for she had the same colouring as these peoples of the north. Whereas she, with her strange red eyes, would be found out easily for an intruder. Oh, but these eyes made people uneasy with their colour! She knew that, and knew the man had been studying her eyes ever since she entered this room, but without much of the usual apprehension others would. He was no weakling, this one, and not a man easily loosened in surprise.

Nor, she thought while smiling at him, is he easy to loosen in the tongue .

"I expect you know already what it is that I want," she said genially. "I want to speak about Natsuki."

He took a while before answering, and when he finally did, it was clear that he had been expecting her to say something more.

"Speak, then," he grunted in that fittingly large voice. "Speak of Natsuki."

She added a little helplessness to her smile: "Actually, I was hoping that you would do most of the speaking."

He scowled at that, two big ruts carving themselves into either side of his mouth. She fell a little inside, afraid that he would refuse to continue this interview.

"I sense hesitation," she probed, not losing her smile. "You are reluctant to speak about Natsuki?"

He finished off the rest of the beer in his cup, then began to refill it from the flagon. It was during the latter action that he answered her in the form of a question.

"Why speak about Natsuki?" he asked gruffly, and she saw from his face that her answer would determine whether or not he would be willing to say any more. She sighed to herself and picked up her own cup, draining it in several quiet sips. How she wanted wine just now, for a moment like this!

"Why speak about Natsuki?" she echoed, once the cup was empty and on the table again. "Because it is the only way I can truly begin to know her. I wish to know her. The difficulty is that I must learn certain things in order to do so, and they are things of which I cannot speak to Natsuki, because I do not want to pain her simply because of my selfish desire, or no more than necessary."

She met his stare evenly.

"Yes, I will speak with her about them in time," she said, "because that is inevitable. But if I can spare her at least the rawness of speaking them to me for the first time, and if I can spare her the pain of a clumsy tread, I shall do so. Hence I speak not with her first, but with you, that I may know the path."

A little of the coldness, it seemed to her, left his blue eyes.

"You want to know her?" he asked, still sternly. "You want to know things you cannot speak first with her? I do not speak Natsuki's secrets for her."

"And I do not ask you to. All I ask is that you tell me what she does not hold deliberately secret from others and what can help me."

"Help you what?"

"Help Natsuki."

"Help Natsuki how?"

"Help her live with the past," she said, too conscious of the truth in the words to wince at their triteness. "Or herself."

He narrowed his eyes, faint creases appearing like fans at the outer corners of each one. Shizuru suffered the intensified scrutiny with unruffled calm, neither moving nor saying anything. Oh, the feeling of being measured by someone! She was used to it, and knew exactly how to comport herself to suit a certain account, how to arrange even the tilt of her head to give exactly the correct impression. But something told her today that she had no need to pretend any pose other than that reflective of what she was really feeling, and so this once she made absolutely no adjustments to her mask. She gambled that it would be satisfactory to Mino, and her gamble was correct. After what seemed a long time, he moved again and reached for the beer flagon, refilling not only his cup but hers as well.

Shizuru knew she had passed the inspection; he was willing to speak now.

"You will be careful of her if I speak to you?" he asked, still sounding faintly suspicious. "This is the first time we talk. We do not know each other."

She slanted her head to acknowledge the point.

"But we understand each other, I hope," she said gently. "And you understand that I wish to understand her."

He put down the jug and picked up his cup, staring darkly at the liquid in it. He looked upon it, Shizuru thought, almost with disapproval. But he still put it to his lips and took a great swig, his tongue licking his lips after.

"You will ask questions and maybe not understand the answers I give you," he growled out. "That is not a child you understand if you are weak."

"Do you think me weak?"

The question earned her a stare that spoke volumes of wariness, of a hard-bitten secrecy, and of a resolute intent. He is saying this because of Natsuki, she realised then, finding in herself a sense of solidarity with the big, guarded man glaring at her.

"I think you are very strong and very powerful," he finally said, in reply to her question. "But I think you have weakness when it comes to her and because of that you can hurt her with your strength."

She stared levelly at him, hiding her surprise at the blunt-and somehow, ominously perceptive-statement.

"Then I shall alleviate one and diminish the other," she retorted. "I would hurt myself first before I hurt Natsuki."

A disbelieving look: "It is easy to say but not do."

"And do you believe the difficulty of an undertaking has ever been enough to deter me?" she demanded with such an air of certainty that he had to pause.

His lips parted for a second, then shut again. He lifted his cup and drank deeply.

"You are really very strong," he rumbled later, holding on to the cup.

She inclined her head.

"I return the assessment with regards to your communication," she told him. "You don't pull your punches."

"You die fast in battle if you pull punches." He looked at her significantly. "We also talk about Natsuki."

She allowed a faint uplift at a corner of her lip: "That she is the subject prompts you to be direct?"

"We talk about Natsuki. She is already hard to understand when you are direct."

She saw the reason in that.

"I see," she said, nodding.

There followed a short but not awkward pause. This time, Mino was the one who broke it.

"What you want?" he asked again, though less frostily than he had the first time.

She responded without hesitation.

"I want to know what happened to her. I want to know what you can tell me, from the beginning."

The fair locks moved as he drew back his head and fixed his eyes in her direction. But that was only at the start, and soon she realised that his sights had moved somewhere into the distance, right through her and off into the fields of his memory.

"You call her people Ortygian, the people of the Forest of Ortygia," he began, voice echoing so lugubriously in the room that it gave her a small shiver. "They are a people who belong to the forest. Their forest was the forest you call Black, I think, the Great Black Forest.

No one who is their enemy goes through. I think your people met them, many years ago, when you tried to go up into their forest and steal their gold. Your people were eaten up."

She nodded assent, knowing the tale. It was true and written in history too, even before the founding of the Republic. Past centuries ago, a Himean noble on deputation to the north had learned about the rumoured richness of the far northern tribes in gold, and took his army to hazard a series of raids upon the peoples of the area. He had been successful the first few times and with the first few plain-dwelling tribes. But then he had the idea to take on what was said to be the richest of the barbarian peoples, the forest-dwelling Ortygians who hid themselves and their homes deep in the very heart of the Black Forest. They were also reported to have the least number of persons, which gave the Himean noble high hopes for a quick sack and loot. Unfortunately, the actual venture did not turn out that way.

When he drew up his great army with perfect confidence of winning against a tribe that was rumoured to have had no more than eighteen thousand to his forty thousand, he found himself thwarted by an arcane foe made up both of terrain and man. First was that the Black Forest had earned its name for a reason. It was so dark, the trees so large, the animals so huge, and the paths so mazelike that it deserved all the connotations that often went with calling a forest "black". It was not a forest of any type the Himeans had ever encountered, as indeed their local guides had been trying to warn them over and over on the march: this was a forest no one had ever penetrated absent the permission and help of its wards.

The second problem arose with the discovery of the wards themselves. The Himeans were astounded by a people so inhumanly swift that they vanished into the trees within seconds, so unexpectedly warlike that they really ate up the Himean soldiers to nearly the last man. For the Ortygians were the fiercest of all the peoples of the north, even if they were also the least numerous. And their leaders were intelligent, unexpectedly possessed of a military organisation previously thought absent in such barbarian peoples. They even had enough know-how to be aware of their land's natural fortifications and use them accordingly-in particular, the solid walls of the forest in which they lived. Alien to the lay of the land, laid out before an unexpectedly strong enemy whose forest-tactics were unknown and unpredictable, that long-ago Himean noble and his army fell.

Following that atrocious defeat, which was related only by the few straggling survivors, the Ortygians became a sort of Lamia for a while to Himeans: legendary savages mentioned by mothers to their children when trying to frighten the brats to sleep. The Otomeians moved into the mist of popular imagination as easily as they had moved into the trees during that battle, a momentary glimpse of them provoking terror every now and then, and immediately after, vanishing into fantasy and fiction. Unbelievable beings, to destroy a Himean army with such ease and without the benefit of numbers. They could not possibly be real! They had to be mythical. Mythical or not, however, the lesson was learned afterwards: the Ortygian forest were left alone by all Himean armies that came close enough to the north to even consider marching to it.

Then Hime began its expansion, its people striking out in all directions of the world. Somehow or other, Himeans daring enough to risk journeying to the far north began to bring back word of the Ortygians again-but Ortygians different from the ones that had come to occupy the collective's forested nightmares. These tangible Ortygians still ran about the forest, it was said, but were actually-unbelievable thing-reasonable! For fantasies of Ortygians had grown to the point of painting them as bellicose savages who attacked at random, creatures with whom one could not reason. People forgot that it had been the Himean noble who antagonised them that fateful day, provoked them with a threat that they had had no choice but to repulse. So when reports came in about these mythical monsters acting like civilised people, the intelligence was greeted with incredulity.

Eventually, Hime cast off its kings and queens to become The Republic. When this happened, Hime also experienced another spurt in expansion, as well as power. The concept of foreign client-states began, and one of the first alliances made was with one of the also-growing and more civilised kingdoms of the North, the very kingdom with which Shizuru was now working on her military endeavour: Otomeia. It was upon establishing official relations with this realm that the Himeans-or those Himeans who still remembered and cared about that mythical race called Ortygia-finally began to learn the truth about the Black Forest's people... for it turned out that the Ortygians and Otomeians considered themselves kinsmen, their leaders even claiming to have common ancestors along the kings and queens of the line. Kings and queens! The Ortygians, it appeared, were even more civilised than anyone could have thought.

The Otomeians provided their history. Both Otomeians and Ortygians, apparently, were not from this land. They were from one race, a people living on an island near the coast of the ocean to the far northeast and which they referred to with an unpronounceable name. It had been a damp isle, with a few chilly mountains and lush green vegetation.

While they considered themselves one people, the ancestors of the Otomeians had been distinct from those of the Ortygians. The Otomeians' forebears had lived up in the mountains of that island-as they did now, north of Fuuka-while the latter's forebears had inhabited the valleys and lowlands. Since their single citadel was built in a valley, it was the Ortygians' ancestors who had been kings, those lines of nobility being the ones inhabiting the physical seat of government. Thus the lower-dwellers were the ones of higher nobility, though there were some nobles among the mountain groups as well.

Unfortunately for the lower-dwellers, they had been last to heed the rumblings in their isle. They did not see the strange, sudden appearances of bumps in the mountain that were like the land's pimples, growing fat and bursting until they spewed some odd detritus with steam. It was the Otomeians' forebears who took the signs as warning, growing fearful of the tremors that seemed to roil in the belly of the mountain. They knew the mountains and the mountain gods and so they took the hint. They tried to persuade those dwelling below that what was happening was a sign from the gods to leave and settle elsewhere, but to no avail. Leave these rich and fertile valleys, these lovely wet forests because of some supposed omen? Insanity! Paranoia, even! Eventually, the mountain-dwellers gave up trying to convince them and left, led by a family of nobles. Crossing the waters and travelling the new land for decades until they found yet another mountain upon which to settle, this group became the founders of Otomeia, the nobles leading them being the forebears of the present King Kruger.

And what of those left behind? They refused to leave that ill-fated island, believing the mountain-dwellers' predictions full of hot air, not knowing that the same could be said of the tallest mountain next to them... for those rumblings and signs so feared by the Otomeian's ancestors were the first belches of a waking volcano. Just before it erupted and finally sank the island and everyone on it, another group detached from the isle's population and crossed the waters towards the same direction their Otomeian kinsmen had gone. The rumblings had grown too difficult for all the lower-dwellers to ignore.

The second deputation was much smaller than that of the Otomeian one, composed of people apostrophised as heretical for leaving like that earlier, foolish group of mountain-dwellers. The leader of this newer, smaller group also happened to be the brother of the present king of the isle, which nearly got the enterprise branded as a political attempt at treason. But the group left, anyway, and slunk off into the new land, entrenching themselves finally in a near-impenetrable forest in the continent to the west and becoming the tribe of Ortygia.

It was just in time. A few years later the volcano on the island finally erupted, dragging all those left behind there into the sea forever. That ancient civilisation was gone, the race split in two distinct peoples with distinct lines of royalty-although the original ruling dynasty's blood was still present in the leaders of the Ortygians, the line that took on the name Chalinitis. These were Natsuki's ancestors, this was Natsuki's ancient pedigree.

I never paused to consider it so deeply before, Shizuru wondered, feeling a little awed at the thought that Natsuki was descended from royalty possibly even older than Hime's original bluebloods. It had been a while later in their acquaintance that she had hit upon the remembrance that Natsuki's house had in fact been that of the ruling Ortygian dynasty. Little wonder the other Otomeian nobles had been constantly and noticeably courteous to the girl during their stay in Otomeia. Little wonder too that the girl radiated such awesome dignity on occasion. The girl had a fantastic ancestry, if you really thought about it! Perhaps even a little chilling, and imbued with a sense of tragedy. Strictly speaking, Natsuki was the only one left in that dynasty. The blood of those antique rulers was now almost completely extinguished in the world.

"I remember," she said, speaking again to Mino. "I also recall that the governors of Sosia and Argus at the time had been considering sending ambassadors to Ortygia to foster trade relations. Unfortunately, that event happened."

His thin lips managed to thin further at this, and she knew why. The mere mention of it almost made her grimace too.

"Everyone knows of it," he said, accents hardening all of a sudden. "What you call 'The Ortygian Massacre'."

"Yes."

Mino fixed her with a hard stare, pupils contracting into tiny pinpricks of black in an ocean of light blue. She saw the ridge on his lower cheek move, showing his jaw tightening. He was angry now, she understood, but not at her.

"Say to me what you know of it," he demanded. "I want to hear what you know."

She acquiesced and began to tell the story.

"A chieftain of one of the many northern tribes began to aspire for power," she started, speaking low and earnestly. "A certain Mithrii, of the people known as the Atii. This Mithrii, by dint of fighting all challengers and killing them, had risen to a position among his people where he began to call himself a king. But this was not enough for Mithrii, for he wanted to be king of all the northern peoples. And thus he began to bring together the other tribes, fighting at first for the right of rule, but eventually finding more willing groups submitting peacefully to his leadership. For his people had always been the most numerous of the northern tribes, and thus defeated all of their first enemies. By the time he had assimilated at least two more peoples into his own, the strength of their numbers often persuaded other, smaller tribes to simply go along without a murmur."

She paused here to see if her description had met with approval. She was a little pleased to see the man nodding briskly, trying not to look too impressed by her knowledge of those events.

"Yes, it was so," he said to her, sonorous voice rolling in the room. "It begins with Mithrii, the false king, who wanted power. He wanted the power of the many tribes of the north. I knew he would go to us too, one day, but he went to the Ortygians first. He wanted them too."

"To submit and be part of his people?"

"No."

He surprised her by showing a scornful smile.

"No," he said again. "Mithrii wanted the people of Ortygia and Otomeia, peoples with true kings. But he was no king. After the massacre he was killed by the tribes he called 'his people'. He had no blood and was a barbarian. The Ortygians and Otomeians know this. It is why he had to kill them, not force them to bow. Ortygians, they never bowed."

"I am aware that the different tribes turned upon him afterwards and returned to their discrete groups," she said. "But I never was aware of why they killed him. What happened?"

A thin lip turned up in disgust.

"He promised to them wealth," he told her. "That is how they followed him in killing the Ortygians. He promised that he would give them the Ortygians' wealth."

"And he did not, I gather?" She held a humourless smile. "What a regular politician."

Mino sniffed the air, his thick but light brows drawing together.

"He did not give them because he did not find it," he rumbled. "The wealth was not there."

She arched her own fair eyebrow: "But I was given to believe the Ortygians were among the richest of the northern peoples, this being because their ancestors brought with them many of the royal treasures when they emigrated from the island, which were supposedly remarkable since the now-gone island had been rich in gold and gems. The Otomeian accounts say that the Ortygians stole the treasures from the royal vaults in the understanding that they were saving the treasure from whatever fate had in store for their island. There are also sufficient records from the lands of the east to indicate that they ransacked and plundered a great many towns and temples on their trek to the forest. Was that a misconception?"

"No," he said.

"So Mithrii merely failed to find it?"

"No. It was not there. It was lost."

"Lost?"

She noticed the chill back in his eyes, the freezing way in which he was staring at her. He was on guard, she realised, and it had to do with that missing gold. Why, and what was he not saying? Perhaps it was not really missing? But his guardedness was not that of a guilty man. There was a different quality to it, something like defence yet again, and that confused her a little. Just what was he protecting?

Well, never mind, she said serenely, deciding to hush her natural curiosity's desire to solve a puzzle. She had other things to discuss right now, things much more important to her. And in this Mino was actually able to further assess her, for he had fully expected Shizuru to press the matter. Every Himean, after all, wagged his tail at the scent of gold. Yet not this Himean general and politician, or perhaps not right now.

"Let us return to the subject proper," she said, prompting a nod from him. "As the accounts tell me, the Ortygians were slain by a confederacy of northern tribes under the instigation of Mithrii, who claimed to be their king. This confederacy even included some of the present Mentulaean peoples, if I recall aright. The stories say the slaughter of the Ortygians took place in the Ortygians' own home forest, which strikes me as curious. How is it that they were unable to repel these aggressors, this time, when they did so with a full-fledged Himean army before?"

The lines on his face suddenly seemed to grow deeper.

"They were ready for your people's army," he told her, face growing darker by the second. "They knew your army was an enemy. But those"-here he said a word which she took to be an epithet, given the way he practically spat it-"pretended as not enemies. Friends. That false king, Mithrii, he said to the Ortygians that if they did not want to join his people, they could be friends of them."

"When you say friends, do you mean allies?"

He assented.

"Mithrii,"-here came another obvious epithet-"said he wanted to be allies because he needed to take his people to better lands up, far up north. He said he wanted his kingdom there, to be safe from growing powers here. Mentulaeans in the empire were getting stronger. Your people too. So his people wanted to cross the Ortygians' forest for safety."

She saw it now: "And they allowed him passage for that migration."

"After many peaceful talks, yes," he said, looking very gloomy now, even with his light colouring. He suddenly glowered at her and the fierce look was explained when he went on to say: "You do not think it because you think people who live in the forests barbarian. Your people are like that in their thinking. You think people who live with the trees are not good. But the Ortygians are-were-a good people. They talk of things, they are not barbarians. Their leaders were from kings. Even their city, though it was in a forest, was grand."

She nodded sombrely, to show that she approved.

"They were civilised," she offered, to which he agreed.

"Mithrii and those other tribes were not," he told her. "The Ortygians let them pass the forest, and they pretended to be the Ortygians' friends. But when they were passing near the Ortygians' homes and the palace, Mithrii waited for the dark to come and then told the tribes to kill the Ortygians while they sleep. The Ortygians were too few, and not ready. That is how it happened and they were killed. That is the massacre."

"That perfidious wretch," she hissed, unable to help venting some of her own indignation at what Mithrii had wrought. When she spied her companion's face, she explained: "I was calling Mithrii a treacherous or untrustworthy person."

"He is," he concurred darkly. "It is a bad man who breaks an oath made in front of the gods. He broke his oath to the Ortygians. So he died."

"Certainly one may say his failure was divine punishment," she said. "If this happened in the Ortygian forest, it is quite far from Otomeia. How came your people to be there, then, in time to discover the remnants of the massacre? I take it that Mithrii's conglomerated tribes had already gone off to return to their separate homelands by that time, thus leaving the scene."

"A group of us, riders, were to see them with a message from our king," he replied. "There is much exchange between them and us."

"I see."

"When we went and saw what happened, it was late," he said. "They were dead. We sent our best riders back to tell Otomeia, and the rest of us stayed with the dead."

She was silent for a few seconds, her eyes on the weathered top of the table between them. One might have thought she was fascinated with the whorls and knots in the grain, for she looked at them so pensively.

"Then..." she started, still not looking up. "Then you found Natsuki."

Mino grunted in response, the sound somehow a clear affirmation. Shizuru finally lifted her eyes to his.

"Where did you find her?" she asked. "And how?"

"I was moving the dead nobles, like the others," he told her. "To burn first. They deserved that."

"Yes."

"I saw a big pile, in the middle of many dead," he continued. "I saw it because the pile in the middle looked big and high, like the dead people tried to fall over each other. It was only Ortygians in the pile. All the bodies around them were from their enemies, the other tribes."

She nodded slowly, knowing what was coming.

"I saw that pile," he said, suddenly looking aggrieved by the memory. "And I saw they were nobles. I saw their king too. I saw his face, and I knew him. And I saw too his queen. They were many, all dead. I moved them all, and then I saw the bottom of the pile."

Now she felt pained too.

"Natsuki," she volunteered.

He nodded. Shizuru took the opportunity to ask if Natsuki had been lucid when he found her, and received a positive answer.

"She had the eyes open," he said, his strong voice suddenly holding a faint strain, as though he were just peeling off its husk and discovering something raw and tender underneath. "She-she looked at me and her eyes were big and knowing. That was why I knew she was not dead too."

"Did she-" She cut herself off abruptly, knowing somehow that the young Natsuki had not said anything to him. She replaced the query with another. "Was it only her father and mother among her relatives...?"

He finished the sentence for her with a curt answer.

"No."

She blinked, held her eyes shut for a second after.

"I see," she murmured.

"They made the pile," he said, encouraged into saying more by her prolonged blink. "That is why they were that way. They tried to fall dead over each other."

"Would they not have tried to escape first, rather?"

For some odd reason, she saw that the question brought the guardedness back in his manner.

"Escape how? Where?" he grunted sulkily. "The enemy was around them."

She tried to soothe him: "I merely thought it possible their knowledge of the forest and their own city was such that they would have managed it."

"Not possible," he said, even more sulkily. "It is too hard. They still die if they tried. It is not possible, no way to do it."

She wondered at his sureness of the impossibility of escape when he had not even been there to see its circumstances. He was hiding something and she wondered about it, sensing it to be relevant to her purpose. But she also sensed that the best way to get him to reveal whatever it was would be to agree with his verdict, make it seem as though she believed he was hiding nothing at all.

"Of course, I should have realised it sooner," she said seriously, injecting just the slightest bit of embarrassment in her voice—embarrassment for having been unable to see his point. "It would have been impossible for them, especially with being hemmed in and unprepared for that attack."

He studied her for a second after. Eventually he nodded.

"Not possible," he repeated, before dropping his eyes to his cup a little surreptitiously. He took it in one enormous hand, obviously intending to have a drink. But he paused too long over it than usual. Right before it touched his lips, too, he ventured something with a close-to-perfect nonchalance that did not fool Shizuru in the least.

"And, too," he muttered casually, as if were of no consequence. "Hard to run for some. Like Natsuki. She had a bad leg."

She watched him as he drank, tamping down her stoked interest and keeping her voice level.

"A bad leg?" she echoed absently.

He continued drinking, swallowing slowly as though trying to draw out the process of chugging down the beer he had been gulping like a fish earlier. She waited for him to finish, perfectly patient on the outside but deathly eager within.

"Yes," he finally said, after finishing. "Her leg was bad."

"Do you mean the bone was broken?"

"Yes, it was broken. The bone."

There! Her mind flashed immediately to the time she had discovered something while studying Natsuki's body, her fingers detecting a subtle ridge of bone under the skin of the younger woman's left shin. She could tell that it had been a grave injury, even if the bone had healed, given the feel of the ridging. But Natsuki had refused to disclose more than that it was a very old wound, and Shizuru, seeing the Otomeian's dark uneasiness, left it at that. Now she was beginning to realise the reason for that uneasiness and just how 'very old' the wound was.

"This was an injury she received during the incident?" she asked Mino, treading carefully. "The massacre?"

"No." He allowed a few moments before elaborating. "Before that."

"So it was prior to the massacre."

The great, grave head nodded, and his eyes seemed so pale just then that they looked lightless to her. But he was watching her, and he knew she could already see why he had withheld this information until now, why he said it had been impossible for those dead Ortygian nobles to escape in any way. He could see too why she was not talking any more under the stifling weight of what this meant for the girl she had come to speak about. And, though she did not plan it, this was what warmed him to her a little further-for if she could be so oppressed by a burden that belonged to Natsuki, he told himself, then perhaps she was not such a casual woman after all.

"It was already fixed. Fixed with cloth and wood," he began, struggling with the description of what Shizuru took to be a regular dressing and splint. "But it was very bad. It was bad because she tried to move it, we saw, when we fixed it again. We thought she would be lame."

"Natsuki's body heals well, fortunately."

If he noticed that she specified Natsuki's body, he did not comment-or not obviously.

"She is strong," was what he said.

There was a pause again between the two of them.

"What was she like?" she asked, conscious of their shared sympathy. "How was she, exactly, when you found her?"

His thin lips parted, releasing a whistling sigh.

"When we found her she was at first very strange," he started, creases folding into his high brow. "Today she is better. She used to shiver all over like a wet animal if you touched her. She did not speak even if spoken to, and only opened her mouth when we showed her her cousin. We found her cousin too, but not in the same place."

"Ah, yes. I know Nina-han."

He regarded her blankly.

"And then we brought her to His Majesty and he knew her and she knew him."

"Do you mean they had met before?" she asked. "Natsuki and the King?"

"Yes. They were close of blood," he said. "Her kin was close to his, like her people were close to us."

She tilted her head lightly, more curious now about the orphaned Natsuki.

"How was she?" she asked. "How would you describe her as a child?"

He frowned, reaching for the jug and emptying its contents into his cup. He took a drink before answering, and she saw that there was some white froth left on his lip.

"She was very bad," he told her, putting the cup on the table with a clack. "She did not talk and was too thin, like someone sick. She was a serious girl but when you are a child they do not think you are serious and call you strange instead. But she was young so they also took pity. It was different when she began to grow."

He threw her a strange glance.

"She was very beautiful," he said.

Her eyes narrowed for a second, a smile coming to her lips.

"She is very beautiful," she corrected.

It seemed he would smile too, but the intent was gone quickly.

"I mean when she started," he said, sounding morose again. "She was starting to become beautiful and was very young and many thought that her strangeness meant she was mute. Some even thought she was wrong in the head. What do you think happens to children like that?"

She felt anxiety rising, a flutter of trepidation. But she had to know.

"Perhaps you could tell me," she invited.

"The first family that took her in had a bad son. The baron-no, both his parents were good people but he went wrong."

She swallowed and found that her throat was barbed with thorns.

"Did he do something to her?" she asked.

"He tried but did not get far," Mino answered. His fierce warrior's face was furious. "She hit him with the daos of his father. It was hanging close and he did not think she knew how to use it or had the power to struggle."

He showed a scowl, a deeper one than the others thus far, and she knew that he was wishing he had been the one holding that daos when it hit that man. She knew it because she was wishing the same thing.

"She was strange in the head and quiet and small," Mino growled. "He did not think he would have his head split open by such a small and quiet girl."

"How far did he go?" The question, raging in her head, was spoken by her lips. "You said it was not far?"

"Yes." He looked apprehensive about saying more and would have fallen silent, had he not seen the expression in her eyes. He settled for saying: "Only touch. No more."

"I see." She thought back to the first time she had taken Natsuki, and remembered the blood. At least she was sure of that, and knew it had been the younger woman's first. "You say she was small. What was her age when this happened?"

"She was twelve."

Twelve! She herself would have been seventeen then, and getting her first taste of battle. Whereas Natsuki would have been getting what? Her first taste of violation?

Her hands were on her lap, out of sight because of the table, and it was there that her distress manifested. She clenched them convulsively into fists, the skin across the knuckles stretched so tight it nearly split open. And in her Himean mind, a mind that like all other Himeans took seriously the forging of contracts directly with the gods, she uttered a thousand defiant oaths and swore fealty to the lords of the Underworld if they would only promise to give unending torment to the shade of the man who had attempted to lay a hand on Natsuki, her Natsuki.

"You said she split his head?" she said, voice unwavering. Oh, but how much it cost her to keep it that way! Even her face was tight with the strain of keeping her expression calm. "Did he live or did he die?"

"A man does not live after his head is split."

"Some men do."

"Not when what split them is a daos. That girl killed him."

"With good reason," she said severely.

"I know and so knew the baron, the father," Mino replied, growling as though she had insulted him by making it seem that he disapproved of what had happened to that man. "The father was a good man. But a good man loves his son no matter how evil the son. She had to leave."

"To go where?"

"His Majesty," he said. "His Majesty was very angry when they told him, so he chose to keep her in the palace after. He wanted her to go to people he could trust, the ones close to him and who lived with him. So people in the palace looked after her from that time. Many people, so she had many to look over her."

"And they treated her well, these others?"

"They did not touch her as that dead man did." He shifted and rolled a massive shoulder. "They taught her many things too. Some taught her lessons in books. Some taught her how to fight and kept her safe. You do not think they treated her well?"

She knew he had been one of these teachers.

"Humans are complex enough to contain limitless possibilities for negating the condition of treating others well," she retorted, only to curse herself for her recklessness. Her agitation over what had happened to the young Natsuki had her disturbed; her tongue had run away with her. She had slipped into her usual manner of speech, and knew the Otomeian arms-master would grow wary with it. Swiftly, she rephrased her statement.

"There are many ways of hurting a person aside from what that man did," she said. "Especially when the person is a vulnerable child."

Who happened to split a man's head with a scythe at twelve, but still

He regarded her coldly, obviously put off by her earlier statement.

"They treated her well," he said. "What you want me to say?"

She inclined her head in concession, still trying to get a firm hold on her anger from earlier.

"I heard she was still passed around from one high courtier to another, even so," she told him. "Why is that?"

"His Majesty wanted her close," he replied, after moment. "She did not go to another family, after the first one, and was of the palace as the royal family. But there were different people told to see to her. Different people at different times. As one does with a prince or princess of Otomeia, to teach them much."

She wrestled a little with his words, trying to make sense out of them. The difficulties of the language barrier were more manifest with him than with Natsuki, and it drew her attention to the suggestion of learning Otomeian. She resolved to do that sometime in the future.

"Do you mean, then, that though she was passed from guardian to guardian for the purpose of education, her first guardian was always King Kruger?" she asked. "She did not go to live, strictly speaking, with other people any longer?"

He assented.

"She lived in the palace, yes. Sometimes, she would go away too, but only for battle. This was when her guardians went to fight, so they would bring her to teach her. At first she only watched. Soon she could fight."

"What age was she, exactly, when she was allowed to participate in the actual fighting?"

"Fourteen."

That set confusion in her.

"As early as that?" she demanded. "The king allowed her to participate in the battle itself?"

"Yes," he said, making the word sound as though it meant 'of course'. "How was she to learn how to fight?"

Oh, indeed, she told herself, realising her mistake. A military people. Naturally they think being thrust into battle at that age is normal.

"I see." She looked thoughtful. "And now, in Otomeia, does she still live in the palace? Has she still her quarters there?"

"Yes." He shifted in his seat, moving one bent leg and repositioning it. "His Majesty orders her to live there."

"The king is fond of her," she observed.

"Many are," he said shortly, and she had to smile.

"I suppose they no longer think her strange, then," she said jokingly.

But he shook his head.

"Some think her strange still," he told her with some defiance, as though daring her to contradict him. "Because Natsuki is strange still. You know that. Why else you come to me?"

She met his glare squarely, as he was beginning to learn she would always do.

"I have already answered that question," she replied. "And as to Natsuki being strange, it may only be that she is so special, she makes us all feel common."

They stared at each other for a moment. Then he looked away from those red eyes, those strange hot eyes, and at the rim of his cup, which was lifted to his lips. He finished it, using the beer to rinse his tongue.

He looked at her again, his face bearing faint curiosity, and asked something she had not expected.

"You said, before," he told her. "You think her beautiful?"

She lifted her eyebrows, and that already answered the question without her saying anything.

"Anyone with eyes would," she said, anyway.

"But you do?" he pressed. "You have such eyes?"

She looked a little amused now, although her answer had the sound of truth when she delivered it.

"I have never thought Natsuki anything less than magnificent."

"You tell her?"

It was her turn to look curious before answering: "Yes."

He grunted noncommittally in response, indicating neither approbation nor disapproval. She gave in and asked the question.

"I beg your pardon, Mino-han," she said gently. "But why do you ask me this?"

He was quiet for a moment, looking intractable and pensive.

"It is good you tell her," he eventually said, looking bad-humoured as he did so. "You tell her what you think."

"Permit me to ask why I should do that, for all that I already do."

"Natsuki," he said, as though that were an answer in itself. He squinted shortly, and she saw that it was like a shrug to him. "She does not know it, but she is young. The young worry."

A thought came to her and she leaned imperceptibly forward.

"Does she-does she worry?" she asked. "Has she told you so?"

"Natsuki?" This time, the name was said with an amused rumble.

"Natsuki does not tell. Sometimes, not even herself."

She had to smile at the answer.

"True enough," she said. "Thank the gods her eyes do."

Her own eyes went to the window then, noticing the brighter light from the noonday sun, and so she did not see the brief flash of surprise that flickered across his face after her statement. She was too busy thinking of how long she had been away from the girl now, and that she had spent longer here than she had intended. But she did not regret it, for it had been time well-spent.

"Just as she shall not tell me later, I expect, that I worried her by going off on my own so long," she said suddenly, turning again to Mino. "I fear I must go now, Mino-han. As you say, Natsuki does worry, too much on occasion. And I hate that the cause of it should be me."

He unbent his legs and began to rise, actions she followed. They towered in front of each other for a second, the low table ridiculously squat compared to their heights, and then exchanged small nods of the head. She thanked him graciously for his time, taking care to put all her sincerity in it. He said nothing until she was already on the threshold, he in the room and holding open the door for her.

"She was right in what she spoke of you."

She stilled at the sudden remark, looking over her shoulder.

"She spoke to you about me?" she asked him, trying not to sound too anxious. "Natsuki?"

He squinted.

"She said you were strange," he told her. "And different."

Shizuru's lips pulled into a smile.

"Yes, I suppose she would say that," she conceded with a sigh. "Different from whom, I wonder."

"I asked that, too."

"And she said?"

"She said, 'from everyone'."

This time Shizuru said nothing, because she did not know what to say. She could feel the blood going to her cheeks, however, and though it embarrassed her she supposed the old trooper could take that as an answer. She inclined her head again in farewell and thanks, and then drew on her hood as a cover. She was expecting him to shut the door immediately after she passed through the entryway, but he did not. Instead, he produced another strange and abrupt remark.

"She had eyes on you," he said to her, in that rolling, deep voice. Whether he was talking about Natsuki's actual role of watching over her, or something else, he did not elaborate; his face was stony as ever. "Always, very seriously."

Shizuru turned to face him, standing outside the door. She had recovered now, and whatever colour was left on her cheeks was hidden by the curve of her hood. But he could see her mouth, and he saw it was smiling pleasantly.

"Does she still have them on me now, in your opinion?" she asked with some humour.

The spectre of a smile flickered on his face, a small muscle near his lips quivering.

"Why you ask me that?" he said curtly. "You had eyes on her too."

And giving a short nod, he shut the door.

Chapter 32

Vocabulaire:

1. Meleager - A very famous poet of ancient times; he was known for his poem Love's Garland, which is quoted by Shizuru and Natsuki in this chapter.

2. Narcissus - Mythological character who was supposedly so beautiful that, upon perceiving his own appearance in a pool of water for the first time, he became entranced by it and attempted to kiss his reflection, which led to him falling into the water and drowning to meet his death.

3. "Semper ego auditor tantum?" - "Am I only to be a listener forever?" This is from the first part of IVVENALIS SATURAE or The Satires of Juvenal, and is the opening line of the first satire, which is often titled by translators as "It is difficult not to write satire" (in Latin: difficile est saturam non scribere).

In the days following her interview with Mino, Shizuru did a lot of thinking. Part of the thinking was concerned with placating the subject of that interview, who had not exactly communicated anger to her for her actions, yet whose demeanour afterwards had evinced a quiet sullenness over the matter. Shizuru had confessed to her immediately after talking to Mino, and the young woman had said very little in reaction, save a few practically unintelligible responses accompanied by a faint scowl. The Himean, having prepared instead for a direct backlash, had been momentarily confounded by this response. It would have been much easier for her to deal with the young woman's ire as she admitted wryly to herself she had done so several times before due to her teasing of the girl. But Natsuki's ire this time seemed so laced with other things, some of which she could not understand. Or not at first, anyway.

Later, after she began to decipher and dissect the many parts of Natsuki's reaction, she was able to soothe that tender spot more gracefully. It was a curious form of apology that reconciled them, delivered after an entire day of awkward silences and anxiety over understanding each other's positions. The two of them were more alike than they realised: both were prideful women, too dignified in their treatment of such matters to speak either in apology or anger unless in complete earnest. Then again, perhaps they were only so alike when it came to each other. Shizuru, after all, had had much practice in speaking apologies of rote to others, given her circumstances. Yet she could not bring herself to simply give one now, since she did not actually regret having gone around the younger woman to make those inquiries about her hidden past. After all, the fruits of that endeavour had been immensely valuable. Delivering a less-than-sincere apology to Natsuki seemed repulsive to her.

As for Natsuki, Shizuru had realised from long observation of the girl that the Otomeian actually had little difficulty expressing herself when angry: whether by scowl, growl, or some even more obvious gesture. Yet she also saw that Natsuki could not seem to bring herself to truly frown at her now, displeased as she seemed to be. Both of them were restrained in their reactions, both unaware of how to deal with this restraint. Thus, for an entire day following the incident, both were stuck in their own mires-which happened to be adjacent to each other's.

Shizuru in particular fancied herself in quicksand. It frustrated her. She felt as though she were sinking deeper with every hour of reserve between the two of them, even as she yearned for things to go back to how they had been before. And it was not merely the girl's easy companionship for which she longed; it was also for her skin, her lips-simply her touch. By afternoon of that sticky, sluggish day, she thought she had reached her limit. Just when she was about to reach out to Natsuki, an interruption came upon them in the form of a visit from some of her officers. Deeming the older woman safe in the company of some of her most trusted mates, Natsuki asked to be allowed to go out. Shizuru gave permission a little wistfully, wondering where the girl would be going. Only later in the evening, when they were together again, did she realise the clue Natsuki had given, which was the mimicry of her own excuse when she had gone to see Mino. "An errand."

She understood. That same evening, right after blowing out the lamp by their bed, she had turned over and rested her hand over one pale shoulder. As she had hoped, Natsuki rolled over at the touch and looked at her. It was then that she had delivered her apology, to which she had given a full day's thought.

"Forgive me," she had whispered. "Not for what I did, but what I failed to do. I confess I am not sorry for having sought Mino-han's counsel, so I do not apologise for that. Nor am I sorry for not having told you of it beforehand, the circumstances considered."

Her grip had tightened on Natsuki's shoulder as she went on.

"But I am sorry if my methods, which I yet deem to have been necessary, have wounded you. I am sorry if I failed to come up with better ones."

It was dark, but she knew two green eyes were looking at her.

"I would have done it better had I only known how," she pressed on. "I would rather not have offended you. You must believe me."

She had fallen silent after that, waiting for the younger woman's answer. After enough time had passed for her to begin to despair of a response, Natsuki had finally replied.

"All right," was all she said. "It is all right."

Shizuru had nodded in the dark, wondering if it would be all right too if she drew the other woman against her. She had something else to say, however, before she dared to do that.

"I am sorry as well if, well," she began, speaking in a halting fashion that enlarged the green eyes in the gloom. "I am quite sorry if what I have done is presumptuous of me. After all, it may very well be sheer audacity on my part to think myself having the right to inquire into your life in such a fashion or presume such necessities of going about it for your sake. You only have to say if you find it so, Natsuki, and I-"

That was as far as she got. Natsuki had stopped her with a kiss, one she had only been too happy to receive. That, as Natsuki's lips seemed bent on communicating to her, was that. The trifling crisis over, Shizuru's initial hopes for their reconciliation were nevertheless dashed by the days afterwards, for she had hoped that they would return to how they had been before.

They did not.

Shizuru was astute enough to realise this, even with the veneer of similarity their present relationship seemed to have with their past. What she was not astute enough to understand was exactly how their relationship had changed. She could not say it was a bad change, since it did not make her uncomfortable. Yet she could not outright say that it was a good one, either, since she was uncertain of it. She could not even identify it for what it really was. Finally, she decided to simply leave it and see what would happen overtime. If there truly was a seed sown, she believed, it would eventually manifest its fruit.

She thought of this now as she sat pensively in the bedroom and beside their growing pet, the panther cub she had given Natsuki. She scratched its black brow and watched its owner tying up her hair before a mirror. The mirror was a highly-polished sheet of metal, as flat-planed as the best smiths could possibly make it, and reflected Natsuki's image with only the slightest aberrations. It was a fine mirror, really, though still far from perfect. Red eyes acknowledged that with a swift flick.

It was a pity, Shizuru thought as she looked at it, that mirrors were so flawed. One day she would find the perfect mirror or one close to it and give it to the girl before her. She wanted to see Natsuki's expression upon seeing herself in all her beauty, just so the young woman could understand why people were always looking at her. She wanted to see, too, if the same young woman would be amazed at her own magnificence if she saw it as others did. She wondered if the Otomeian would be so amazed as to play the part of Narcissus. She thought it was not impossible, but then that was only her opinion, and her opinions tended to appreciate Natsuki very highly indeed.

She especially appreciated Natsuki's appearance this afternoon. The two of them having elected to stay in all day, the Otomeian had chosen to wear one of those blinding white robes her people favoured. This was good to the Himean: Shizuru liked seeing her lover in white. She liked it too that the robes Natsuki chose were often interestingly cut. This robe fell straight from the young woman's shoulders, small enough to show the outline of her body, yet soft enough to hint at the angles and curves underneath.

It was not as soft as the dress she had worn on Shizuru's birthday celebration, however; that other dress had been made swathes of Egyptian linen, the finest and sheerest in the world. Nonetheless, it was still of good material, and the way it exposed so much of her neckline pleased Shizuru. What pleased her further was what Natsuki was doing at the moment: tying her long hair up in a high, tidy stream of black.

"You rarely put your hair up that way," she remarked, prompting Natsuki to look her way. "I never realised until now how fetching it is on you. Your neck looks magnificent."

Natsuki's lips quirked, embarrassment warring with pleasure on her cheeks. She turned back to the mirror with an awkward gesture, although the tilt of her head after that seemed to Shizuru similar to that of a filly prancing for the first time.

"I supposed you are not going to braid your hair today?" she guessed.

Natsuki shook her head.

"It has grown longer, has it not? You have not cut it since we left Otomeia?"

"No."

"It's lovely."

Natsuki looked at her again.

"You too," she said. "Your hair is uncut since then."

"Yes, it is," Shizuru affirmed, before asking the question: "Would you like to braid mine?"

There was a pause as Natsuki's brows shot upwards.

"Do you want it?" she asked Shizuru. "I can."

"Only if you want to do it. If you do not feel like it, it is fine."

"I will." She went to fetch her effects. "Wait. Please."

She waited for Natsuki to come back with the necessary implements, then patted her lap invitingly. The young woman looked at her askance, although Shizuru could detect some amusement in the expression. She produced a theatrical huff of air.

"It would be most convenient," she told the girl, who darted towards her one of the arrogant dark looks Shizuru enjoyed so much. "Really, Natsuki, you should be used to it by now. Or do you find me such an uncomfortable perch?"

The close-slanting brows eased upwards and Natsuki rolled her eyes. Despite her expression, however, she did comply with the invitation and walked forward to settle herself atop the other woman's thighs.

"No," she said generously. "Not uncomfortable."

"Thank you."

Shizuru leaned forward to give her a kiss on the forehead and paused there, sliding her nose to the raven wing of hair at the temple. A purring sound rose from her throat as she found herself sniffing deeply. This close, she could smell Natsuki's familiar yet also foreign fragrance; she could smell the warm female scent of her.

"Shizuru?"

"Yes? Oh, right." She sighed and put space between them again, smiling. "Forgive me. Of course you cannot do what I asked you with me being that close."

Natsuki chortled, brushing a finger against the older woman's jaw.

"You may commence."

Out came two pale hands, the fingers like white lilies falling into her hair. She shut her eyes as they began moving, tangling themselves into her tresses, then pulling out and letting her hair pour from the gaps. This happened several times. Once it had gone on for a while, she cracked open an eye to find Natsuki smiling at her hair.

"I thought you said you would braid it," she whispered teasingly, giving the other woman her full attention now. "Not play with it."

Her companion regarded her guiltily.

"Sorry," she said, ceasing her game and finally choosing a golden lock to braid.

"Oh, I do not mind, Natsuki," Shizuru reassured. "It felt quite nice, actually. You may do it for as long as you like. Incidentally, I have wanted to ask you about it for some time now. Why do you seem so interested in my hair? It is surely nothing new to you. All your people are blondes or fair."

The other frowned a little, working deftly with fingers used to the job.

"Yes, but... curls," she said, lifting the braid she was starting and indicating the waving ends. "Different."

Shizuru echoed her inquisitively: "Curls?"

"Such curls. Big and loose. And soft, Shizuru." Natsuki pursed her lips earnestly as she tried to explain it. "It is very nice."

"Is it?" Shizuru peeked at her own tresses, the ends of the locks falling over her breast and indeed curling into waves there. She looked at Natsuki's perfectly straight, equally fine strands. "Curls are rare for your people, are they?"

"Yes." A nod. "And not like this."

"I see."

She knew what the young woman meant since she herself was aware of her luck with her hair: largely waving while remaining soft, lank halfway from the top until suddenly gaining volume near the ends. It was an inherited trait from her mother's side of the family and a rare one, at that. Most curly-headed Himeans had either wiry, rather undisciplined waves or small and tight kinks. While this was appreciated too, it was her form of curly hair that was generally preferred-and more unusual as a natural occurrence.

She was of sufficient vanity to understand all of this, which was partly why her hair had remained, despite all the contrary elements to which it had been exposed, so remarkably healthy and lustrous. She took great pains with its care. Even so, this was perhaps the first time she had ever felt so keenly glad for that trouble. Knowing Natsuki thought her hair beautiful made it more than worth it, she thought with a touch of pride.

"I am gratified for the compliment," she decided. "Though I like your hair too."

Natsuki smiled gently at her before turning back to the braid.

"For some reason, this brings Meleager to mind," Shizuru went on, watching the face so close to her own. The young woman's gaze was intent on her task, however, so she settled for closing her eyes and reciting in a low tone: "I will twine the white violet and I will twine the delicate narcissus with myrtle buds..."

She prised her lids apart when she heard Natsuki continue the verse absently in a murmur.

"And I will twine laughing lilies and I will twine the sweet crocus..."

She stared at the Otomeian, who had moved on to another braid.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, whereupon those eyes finally turned to hers. "You know that poem! How so?"

Natsuki looked baffled by her amazement.

"I read it," she answered flatly. "Before."

"But how is it that you remember it enough to recite it?"

The younger woman seemed to shy away at that, turning swiftly back to what she was doing and shrugging off the question. Shizuru pressed on.

"I meant to remark on it earlier," she told her. "But you really are well-read, are you not?"

A flicker of green.

"I like to read," came the defensive answer.

"Yes, and I love that, since it only shows again how much we have in common," Shizuru smiled charmingly, feeling the fingers in her hair falter. "From where or whom do you get your texts? In Otomeia, for instance."

"His Majesty's collection."

"Oh, I see. He lets you use it, then?"

"Mm."

"And what sort of things do you like to read, often? What kinds of texts?"

The fingers in her hair tugged, finishing the braid quickly, then moved on to a new one.

"Any."

"You mean you have no particular preferences, Natsuki?"

The pale face before her moved from one side to the other as Natsuki shook her head.

"I see. What have you read from his collection?"

Natsuki took a while to reply, and when she did, her murmured answer aroused another exclamation of surprise.

"All."

"All! And around how many books are there in His Majesty's library?"

A pause.

"I do not know," Natsuki finally answered.

"It is a very large room, though, of course? Larger than this?"

"Yes."

"Dear me," the Himean said, appraising the girl anew. "You must have read at least as many things as I have, Natsuki. I expect you have read Homer?"

"Mm."

"Virgil."

"Mm."

"Ovid."

"Mmm."

Shizuru narrowed her eyes: "Juvenal."

" Semper ego auditor tantum? "

They burst into laughter, holding on to each other.

"Oh, all right, I concede defeat!" Shizuru giggled. "Though I confess myself astounded. Reciting Meleager was a feat in itself, but Juvenal too? You do impress me, Natsuki."

The girl smirked victoriously at her before suddenly sobering, averting her eyes. Shizuru watched her as she seemed to struggle.

After a while, the Otomeian finally revealed the source of her discomfiture.

"No," she said, smiling hesitantly. "That, the first parts. It is all I remember, Shizuru."

Shizuru eyed her questioningly.

"From him," the girl expounded. "Juvenal."

"Well, I am still impressed, all the same," Shizuru chuckled, amused at Natsuki's candid disclaimer. "Perhaps doubly so now, because of your honesty. You might have just let me go on thinking you could recite it in its entirety, you know."

Natsuki shook her head.

"I thought, what if you make me?" she said slyly, eliciting another laugh from the older woman.

"And you were worried I would find you out then, once you're unable to remember any more?"

"Mm-hm."

"You could just change the subject once you run out of words."

"Like you?"

They traded smirks like mischievous children.

"Perhaps. Though I like to think I never run out of words," Shizuru said. "I suppose reading is one of the things you do when you have free time then, Natsuki? In Otomeia Citadel?"

"Yes."

"What other things do you do?" she asked, thirsty with curiosity about the younger woman's ways. "Aside from reading?"

"Umm, riding." Natsuki shifted a little. "I practise too, my fighting skill."

"You mean work with your weapons?"

"Mm, yes. That."

"I see. I confess I was thinking more in terms of purely recreational activity, though," Shizuru said and smiled at her. "Reading is an example, though what I am asking has to do with something more social. Pastimes, I mean, or recreational activities in groups."

"In groups? Like hunts?"

"Yes, if that is how you enjoy your free time with others. Is it a typical recreational activity with your people?"

Natsuki narrowed her eyes in considering it.

"Uhhm."

Shizuru offered another example: "For instance, my friends and I used to have parties, special dinner get-togethers, chats over cheeses and wines. Or we would go to see a play, or some presentation being made at the theatre. Those kinds of things. How did you and your friends make sport in Otomeia?"

The other's hands stopped abruptly at the last sentence, her head jerking back a quick, curt fraction as dark lashes shuttered away her eyes. Shizuru was puzzled by the reaction. Not until Natsuki finally answered did she know the reason why.

"I like to read," the girl said in a very low voice. "More."

Then she fell silent.

Oh, Shizuru thought. Oh, I see now.

No wonder the young woman was so surprisingly well-read. It was because she had little else to keep her entertained. More precisely, she probably had no one else.

I suppose she has very few people she considers friends, the Himean thought with some pity. What a consummate introvert this young woman was turning out to be! Prior to this, Shizuru had always wondered if Natsuki's friends among the Otomeian cavalry did not seek her every now and then. Long before this she had even offered Natsuki a reprieve from her duties on several occasions, thinking the girl might want to have some time with her fellows, but was often met with a polite refusal. The few times Natsuki had taken her up on the offer, she realised from hints and hearsay later that the young woman had spent most of the free time by going through personal ablutions and either going off alone to some quiet spot or heading to the stables to cluck to her horse. Sometimes, she just went to meet with the other Otomeian commanders or her own troopers to do some work. And sometimes, she went back to their quarters and stayed there.

Shizuru guessed that the girl was reading again whenever she did that. Books had probably become her substitutes for companionship, her isolated world populated only by characters of literature and spectres of the past. Natsuki had probably gone through book after book in the King of Otomeia's collection while her peers caroused outside, in her youth. Strange to think that lonesomeness had made such a scholar out of her. Shizuru felt sorry for that, of course, but she knew that some part of her was glad for it too.

Now the green eyes were lifting again, touching fleetingly on Shizuru's gaze before escaping to hide in the wheat of her hair. Shizuru burned away that hiding place with a smouldering glance.

"I understand," she said gently but with depth, taking care too to keep the pity out of her voice, for she knew it would wound Natsuki to hear it. "I feel the same, you know. I like reading more too."

The slender black brows went up.

"I also prefer to read instead of those other things, most of the time," she said, permitting a sluggish curve to her mouth. "Sometimes they can grow so tedious, and reading is a welcome escape. Do you feel that way, as I do?"

Natsuki nodded, looking more at ease now.

"Also," she ventured with faint hesitation, "it is good because you, um, you learn. Things."

"Ah yes, books can be a wealth of knowledge. I suppose you like to learn things, Darling?"

"I like to know them."

Shizuru agreed with a chuckle.

"But there are times when it can be nice to go out too, of course," the older woman followed carefully, taking Natsuki's hand with her own. "Sometimes it is fun. Theatre, for instance, can be very entertaining, all the more because it often features plays with which you would be already familiar from the written literature."

She hushed here and looked as though remembering something.

"I recall now what Midori-han told me a few days ago," she said, after an instant's reflection. "That she was having some actors from a troupe wintering in the province. I quite forgot about it, but perhaps it is not yet too late. Shall I inquire if they are putting on any shows tonight? It may be entertaining."

The young woman, she was pleased to see, actually looked interested in the notion.

"Actors?" Natsuki asked. "What kind?"

"I am uncertain. Methinks they specialise in farce, however, so I am afraid we shall not see any of the grand tragedies you seem to enjoy reading."

There was a smirk at that.

"But, actors," Natsuki muttered after. "Yes."

"Shall I make the inquiry?"

"Mm. I mean, uh, if you want."

It was clear in her eyes, though, that she herself did want.

"Wonderful." Shizuru put up one of her hands to give the trim waist a squeeze. "For now, though, shall you recite something to me? It does not have to be Juvenal."

She saw the expression on Natsuki's countenance just before the younger woman nodded, however, and so she stopped her before she could continue the rest of the poem they had been delivering earlier.

"Hold a moment, Natsuki," she said. "What is it?"

Natsuki pretended bemusement.

"Oh, cease," the Himean said again with a laugh. "You are turning into a regular actress yourself, are you not? You looked as though you had something to say to me prior to that. Out with it now. You know I shall manage to extract it in the end, so let us save ourselves some time. What was it?"

The young woman was amused, and seemed to restrain a smile as she answered, slowly, that she had meant to ask something but it could wait. Shizuru pressed her again, though, and she finally consented to express it-as Shizuru had warned her she would eventually do.

She did murmur something with wry humour first, however.

"Like a goat," she said to the Himean. "You."

Shizuru, whose only associations when it came to goats were those animals' incorrigible state of hunger and swift reproduction, made a face. She asked Natsuki what her simile meant, supposing it was an idiom in the younger woman's language.

"When goats try to chew through something," Natsuki said, with a small grin. "Goats, they never give up."

"Ah, you think me persistent," Shizuru laughed. "Goats! Well, I prefer to think of it in terms of water and rock."

"How?"

"Water seems weaker than the rock, at first. Yet flowing water eventually weathers down a rock through sheer persistence."

Natsuki seemed amused again: "You weather me down?"

"More properly, I penetrate ."

She released a peal of laughter at Natsuki's red face, which was scowling away from her. She jerked one of her thighs to startle the young woman into looking at her again as well as into placing two alarmed hands on her shoulders.

"Bad child," she said mischievously while prodding the tip of the small nose with a finger. "Very bad. Of what interpretations were you thinking? I meant in terms of your character, of course."

The boiling head turned away once more. Shizuru smiled and nudged her again until she finally deigned to turn back, giving the older woman a jaundiced glare.

"I was only teasing you," Shizuru coaxed. "Excuse me for that, please. You know it is one of my vices. Excuse this inadequate, goat-like person this once and humour her. I promise I shall not emulate my fellow satyrs, and abduct you to kiss in the forests like a stolen nymph." She paused, seeming to think better of it after remembering the positions in which they presently were. "Well, not at this exact moment, anyhow. Maybe later."

The younger woman, entertained by the thought of Shizuru playing satyr, acquiesced. Her face was already recovering as she reached for another lock of the Himean's hair. She did not start a new braid with it, however, but simply held it in her hand, turning it this way and that. Shizuru realised she was watching the play of its colour in the light. She cupped the young woman's cheek fondly, running the pad of her thumb over its smoothness, and then reminded Natsuki of their earlier topic.

"You meant to ask me about something, earlier," she prompted. "Interrogate me as you wish."

Natsuki, in being reminded of that, seemed to have been reminded of her bashfulness too. She let the hair escape from her hand.

"What is it?"

"Well, uh," Natsuki began, her face looking almost as though her hands would come together at any moment and she would begin twiddling her thumbs. "About your friends."

"My friends?"

"Your friends in, um, back home."

"Yes, what of them?" Shizuru stopped and proposed a guess at what the girl desired. "Oh, perhaps you want me to tell you what they are like?"

Natsuki nodded, seeming relieved that she need no longer speak out.

"Friend," the older woman said.

Natsuki replied with a word from her own language, which Shizuru repeated. The girl smiled with approbation.

"Yes, that is good," she told Shizuru.

This was an exercise that they did every now and then. It amused Shizuru to have the girl teach her little bits of the language at random times of the day. Whenever a particular word caught her attention, she would put it to Natsuki and let the younger woman give her the equivalent in her people's language. Often it was a word, but sometimes it was a full phrase. Hence Shizuru's Otomeian vocabulary expanded each day, although it was rather an eclectic bunch of words she ended up gathering as a result of the method of collection.

"Thank you," she said now, giving the other woman a peck on the mouth. "I shall tell you about them. Though you have already met some, Natsuki."

"Your officers?" Natsuki asked.

"Yes. So I suppose we may talk about the ones you have not met yet."

She paused for a second, whereupon Natsuki suggested a name.

"Chi-ka-ne?"

"Chikane?" Shizuru echoed curiously. "You wish me to tell you about her?"

A nod, the younger woman adding: "Interesting."

Shizuru smiled.

"From what you hear, I suppose she might be," she told the Otomeian. "Do you think so? Interesting, hm? Yes, one could certainly call her that."

"What would you?"

"What would I...?"

"Call her."

The Himean's response was accompanied by a small grin.

"You do have a fine way of putting things, Natsuki," she said, seeming to think on it. "What would I call her, indeed? A very impressive woman. A good friend, of course. A rival, too."

The green eyes bored into hers.

" Rival? " Natsuki echoed.

"Yes. A rival." Shizuru brought a hand up, tapping her own cheek thoughtfully. "Not in a bad way. It may even be a facet of our friendship, that rivalry. She makes an excellent adversary in that sense, really."

Her companion was confused. She moved, shifting her weight back onto her rear and closer to Shizuru's knees.

"But, Shizuru," she started. "You two are friends?"

"Yes."

Natsuki shook her head: "I do not see."

Shizuru laughed, comprehending how it could be difficult for the Otomeian to understand what she meant by the term 'rival'. The notion of rivalry that she was applying at the moment was a distinctly Himean concept, one some scholars even said to be singular to their culture. She began to explain it to Natsuki.

"You see, in our society, we have the concepts of dignitas and auctoritas," she started. "I have spoken of them before, so I shall dispose of their definitions quickly by saying that dignitas is roughly one's personal worth and public standing, whereas auctoritas may be generally understood as one's personal ability to influence public events with his clout. The two are not the same, but they do weave together into the total value or pre-eminence one may have as a Himean citizen. Do you understand that?"

The black hair curtained as Natsuki tipped her head meditatively.

"I remember this," she ventured, after some seconds. "It is similar to-umm-prestige?"

"Indeed. For now we can use that word to indicate the sum total of one's dignitas and auctoritas. All right?"

"Yes."

"Going on with the explanation, then," Shizuru continued. "That prestige is, for Himeans, something to be constantly enriched, as far and as much as possible. Each Himean with the ability and opportunity to do so strives to enrich his or her personal prestige, measuring it always, of course, against those of his peers. Think of us as climbers all striving to reach the peak of a mountain. Some go quickly, some crawl upwards, and some try to rise only to lose foothold and fall."

A glimmer of humour passed over the other's face.

"Like mountain goats," she supplied.

"I am starting to think," Shizuru replied wryly, "that your favourite animal is the goat after all."

Natsuki tried to hold in her grin.

"You try to go up," she cued the older woman. "You compete? Like a race?"

"Something like that." Shizuru turned her head a little to the side, as though pondering something. "But it is a race that never really ends. When someone actually does reach the top or, to use our simile with the race, puts an indisputably good distance between him and the one closest to his tail, he cannot simply stop at the finish line and rest on his laurels. He must keep going, trying to maintain that distance that puts him at the head of the pack."

Natsuki asked how this was different from the competition she herself understood, which was that of royals and rulers.

"Let me put it this way, my dear: kings and queens tend to dispose of their competitors to the throne, do they not?"

Natsuki nodded.

"Royals, to secure their position, would either cast their opponents down from the mountain or cripple them to ensure they never rise up, so to speak," Shizuru continued. "Their equivalent in Himean culture, however, does not do so. What the Himean seeks is not the kingship. In Hime, what one seeks is the institution of First Citizen. That is the position of being head of the pack in our society, where the rest of the pack is not crippled or prevented from trying to overtake him but is constantly running as well, always seeking to wrest the title of First Citizen from his grip. The height of prestige for us, Natsuki, is to be primus inter pares. "

"First among equals."

"First among equals," Shizuru repeated with approval. "That is what I want, what Chikane wants, what every other person in the pack wants. And the one who shall have this, the one to be acknowledged First Citizen, shall encourage the ones running behind him to try and catch up. Himeans do not do away with challenges to their position. Rather, they cultivate them. Why do you think so? Think on the words 'to be first among equals'."

A brief silence ensued, during which Shizuru watched the girl's face arrange itself into a portrait of concentration. She amused herself while waiting with studying the densely-curling fringe of Natsuki's lashes. How preposterously black they were! She wanted to brush them with the tip of a finger.

"To keep beating them?" Natsuki finally answered.

She shifted her attention from the dark lashes to the equally dark pupils at the centres of the green eyes.

"Why, yes," she said. "Exactly, Natsuki."

"Why?"

"Why what?"

"I wonder." Natsuki hesitated. "That is tiring."

Shizuru chuckled: "True, it is."

"Then why?"

The older woman inhaled, then released a soft but long hiss of breath.

"Because that is the only way one can truly deserve the title of First Citizen," she answered firmly. "No one can possibly be the most prominent, most respected and honourable member of a nation like Hime without having to work constantly to own that title. And no one can possibly find any prestige in having gained that position by dint of having merely eliminated all others who could gain it as well. Where is the contest in that? Only by keeping one's rivals can one seek to keep going further, pushing and being pushed by them, increasing his prestige far more than any royal leader because of the right to this claim: All my rivals are present, all of them my peers and equals, and yet I am still the one who is acknowledged first of them all."

Natsuki gave her a long look, fine dark brows drawn together. She understood the concept, Shizuru realised, but only on a purely intellectual level. Her cultural attitude, however, was still wrestling against it. Not that Shizuru had expected her to accept the notion further than intellectual curiosity would permit, of course: Natsuki had been brought up in an entirely different milieu. Still, the mere ability to accept the logic of such a foreign idea was already more than she could ever have hoped for from most people.

She listened to the girl.

"That is why Chikane is a rival," Natsuki was saying. "Your... peers or friends. Also your rivals."

"Yes, since nearly all of us are striving for the top."

"And who is at the top? Now?"

"No one, in fact. There is not, at present, one who may claim to be Hime's First Citizen." Shizuru made a dismissive movement of her head with casual grace. "The position is vacant. It often happens to be. Rarely does a person ever achieve the title, especially because you cannot even claim it for yourself. For it to matter, it has to be a title used by your peers to talk about you-it is granted by others, and not even formally but popularly."

"Oh. And who is close, Shizuru?"

Shizuru sighed a little wistfully.

"Who knows who really is coming close?" she said, half to herself. "The only certainty is when one actually achieves it. Otherwise, you might say fortunes come and go, they rise and fall. Fortuna can be fickle."

"Even for you too?" Natsuki put in impishly. They exchanged a smile, knowing the joke about that goddess favouring Shizuru so often.

"Perhaps even for me," Shizuru answered. "Though I shall admit that, for the most part, Fortuna has been good to me of late. She has even granted me you."

Natsuki turned her head away shyly, but Shizuru could still see the red splotch forming on her cheek, softening the hauteur of her face. She cooed to the young woman.

"Kiss me," she requested. Natsuki did so, slanting hot lips over hers. She opened her mouth immediately and caught the tip of the girl's tongue with her own, circling it gently. After some moments, they parted.

"Yes," Shizuru breathed, conscious of a rising heat in her body. "Fortuna has been good to me."

The tip of Natsuki's nose brushed hers, nuzzling before moving away.

"And Chikane?" the younger woman said abruptly, with a solemnity too sudden to be real. "She is close too?"

Shizuru blinked, surprised by the question.

"I should say so, not least because she is most likely consul-elect already, at this time," she admitted, guessing this to be so because the new year had already begun. "Only, we have not the news of it yet. But I expect it shall come to find us soon, whether by the Senate's formal missive or by her own letter."

"Her letters. It is the blue wax always, no?"

"The one with the seal of an eagle encircled by thorns, yes." Shizuru's mouth quirked; she had an idea of what had caused Natsuki to mention it. "You like the design, don't you?"

Natsuki smiled reluctantly, like someone caught out.

"Pretty," she admitted.

Shizuru returned the word to her in Otomeian without being taught, and she laughed with pleasure.

"I think so too, though. Do you think it prettier than mine?" Shizuru teased.

Natsuki chuckled tolerantly while answering in the negative. Shizuru thanked her for the indulgence.

"Like mine, hers is a composite of two families' seals," she said. "The thorns are from her mother's side. The eagle is from her father's. I believe the latter design is partly allusive to the family heirloom, The Himemiya Bow."

"Ah." The limpid eyes lit with interest. "An archer?"

"A very good one," Shizuru said. "Though she is very skilled with the sword too. The Himemiya tend to favour it."

"Like Suou Himemiya?"

"Like Chikane's sister, yes."

"Hm. And Chikane?"

"Very good with the sword too, as I said."

"No," Natsuki said, shaking her head. "No, Shizuru. Chikane Himemiya. How is she?"

A few seconds passed, but Shizuru understood better after them.

"Well, since you have no doubt overheard much of her prior to this as regards her public activities, I suppose you are asking me about her personality. Am I correct?"

"Yes."

"How is Chikane indeed? This may be a little complicated." She frowned as she tried to express her thoughts. "In speaking of her, methinks it necessary to understand, first, that Chikane is a very attractive woman. Of the kind that cannot even be served any further by exaggeration..."

She stopped here, feeling something touch one of her eyebrows. Natsuki met her sparkling red look with a cool green one.

"You have much the same colouring, actually," she murmured while following the sensation of the finger skimming her brow. "From hair to skin. It would not be wrong of me to say you are terribly alike in that regard."

A small wrinkle appeared on the Otomeian's forehead.

"We are alike?" she asked.

"In some aspects. As I said, especially in colour. But the rest of it is different. Think of my legatè, Suou-chan. As regards the face and body structure, they are greatly similar. Just not in colouring. You may gather from this that Chikane's looks are very elegant. And this makes up any severity that might otherwise have been given to her appearance due to her character. You see, Chikane tends to be quite sombre. Or should I say, rather, that she has a tendency to reserve herself so much that it leads her into being sombre?"

"Sombre? How?"

"Well now," Shizuru said. "I suppose you could just say she can be serious. More so than I am."

She was startled by the throaty laughter from her companion.

"What did I say?" she enquired of Natsuki, who finally reined in her mirth enough to reply.

The young woman practically twinkled at her.

"More serious," she repeated, "than you?"

Shizuru's mouth twitched.

"Now I have to wonder if that means you think me too serious or not at all," she said to Natsuki, who produced her sexy laugh again, much to Shizuru's enjoyment. "To be clear, Chikane is actually terrifically witty, so she is not sombre in the usual sense. If you compare the two of us, however, I think her humour tends to be drier than mine. Unless in the presence of a few, select persons, her laughter is rare as well. She usually smiles instead of laughing. She has a kind heart, too, and intense strength of conviction." She hesitated. "The latter trait is especially patent in the incidents leading to her marriage."

Natsuki moved against her.

"The, um, poor wife? Low birth," she said.

"You know of Himeko-chan?" Shizuru asked with wonder. "You have overheard it, I suppose? Well, I suppose it would not be surprising. It is still the talk of many of our peers and even some of the rankers, because it happened only some months ago, their marriage. You know what happened?"

A nod.

"I see."

There was a passing silence.

"Did it hurt her, Shizuru?"

Shizuru asked to whom she was referring.

"Chikane Himemiya."

Shizuru stared at her again and Natsuki tried to make her enquiry clearer.

"In the climb," she started, hands curling about Shizuru's waist. "Like the competition. With her peers and rivals."

"Ah! That competition." Shizuru smiled a little distractedly, moving her gaze to the young woman's bare neck. "You mean if it hurt her prospects of becoming First Citizen."

"Yes. That."

Shizuru threw her a sharp look and said: "Well, perhaps. Perhaps, though it does not really matter if it did. Chikane has sufficient prestige in her own right to overcome any censure she might have gained from it."

"Censure?" came the echo.

"Yes."

"So they criticised her? Many persons, Shizuru?"

"Yes. And yes, of course they did," Shizuru answered shortly. She shot another quick glance at Natsuki, then ducked swiftly to place a kiss on the girl's exposed clavicle.

"Neck."

Natsuki gave her the Otomeian word for it, but went on to say: "So it did hurt her."

"What matters it if it did? As I said, she can weather it," Shizuru returned, aware of her own increasing discomfort with the subject. It seemed to call up those little niggling worries she had at the back of her mind, and this was not supposed to be the time for her to think about them. Right now, this moment, this hour, this day, she merely wanted to enjoy living with Natsuki. She wanted to enjoy Natsuki herself.

She shook her head and ran her hands over the girl's back, kneading the leanness of it under the cloth.

"Robe," she said.

Again came an Otomeian word.

"But still," Natsuki said huskily afterwards. "It was bad."

Shizuru's head came up, her hair tumbling over her shoulders in a loose profusion of blonde waves, threaded with the handful of thin braids Natsuki had finished. The light from the window behind her struck up the gold in her hair and that, with the fierceness of her face, made her seem a gilded portrait of Venus merged with Mars.

Or at least that was what the young woman facing her thought and what made that young woman catch her breath. Shizuru only noted the reaction dimly, though, as she was occupied with saying something.

"No, it was not bad," she declared. "It could not have been bad, for she gained something from it that was worth all the trouble it cost. She is happier now than she has ever been before, and if the philosophers are to be believed on this, that is all to the greatest good. I believe that. How can it possibly have been bad?"

The big, liquid eyes only looked at her softly in response and Shizuru caught herself. She bent forward for a quick peck on Natsuki's mouth. Their lower lips stuck together for a half-second at the end, as though unwilling to separate.

"In any case, what made you ask about Chikane, Natsuki?" she asked, partly out of a genuine desire to know and partly out of a desire to change the topic. "Or, rather, what made you hesitate earlier when you were about to task that I tell you about her-or about my other friends, for that matter? There must have been a reason."

She received a slow smile in answer.

"Because, I thought," Natsuki began quietly. "I thought it may be... you do not want to tell."

That surprised her.

"You thought I would not want to speak of them?" she said in amazement, looking confusedly at the younger woman. "But I have spoken of them before, many times, with you. I'm certain I have-"

"You talk of things that happen with them," the other interrupted. "But. You do not often, hmm, describe?"

"Describe?" Shizuru repeated. She shook her head again. "I have, I know I have. I do describe them to you as I perceive them, all the time. I have described so many people to you already, Natsuki."

"Yes. No."

"What do you mean?"

Natsuki cocked her head, looking artlessly at her. There was something earnest in that artlessness, however; Shizuru could feel it.

"You describe others, Shizuru," she said simply. "You talk about many."

Shizuru nodded, urging her to go on.

"But you do not describe your friends or your-uh, people close to you," the girl continued. "You do not describe people like that so much."

She lifted her brows and added: "The people you say who know you really. Like a secret. Your secret."

Shizuru stared in astonishment at the serious young woman, suddenly at a loss for words as she began to see what Natsuki was getting at. What lesson was being taught to her and why.

Natsuki smiled just a little at it, though her voice seemed solemn when she spoke once more.

"You do not tell me," she said again, "so I thought I would ask first, Shizuru."

---

"Don't tell me you're going to do it. Surely you can't!"

Mauve eyes regarded him apologetically in response. The Princeps Senatus of Hime sighed.

"Then it's so, Mai-san?" he pursued, his forehead gathering only the faintest cloud of disapproval. It passed quickly, as did all clouds on this serene brow. "You're really not going to change your mind?"

The red-haired woman in front of him sighed too.

"I'm sorry, Reito-san," she said. "But I don't see why I shouldn't go ahead with it."

"It seems too early."

She smiled doubtfully at this.

"Like things have been decided in less time," was her answer.

"But without such mitigating factors as this has."

"What mitigating factors does this have?"

Up went the corners of Reito's lips, his handsome face taking on a rakish look as he assumed a smirk. Mai Tokiha flushed at the suggestiveness of the expression.

"Really, Reito-san," she began hesitantly, watching his smile soften at the plea in her voice. "Please! Do try to understand."

"Does Tate?"

"Reito-san," she said again.

He looked at her for a long moment before shutting away his amber gaze, a breath making its way out of his lips in a whistle. Even while emitting such a rueful sound, the woman opposite him mused, his lips did not lose their slightly smiling expression, nor did they lose the lovely crease they had at the corners. The Principes Senatus had lips shaped as memorably as the words they produced, folded and sensual in form. They were different from Tate's lips, which were more harshly-cut, browner compared to this wonderfully alive red.

They're beautiful lips, she admitted to herself while studying their colour. Just beautiful...

"Of course I'm trying to understand," he said then, and her eyes went up to find that his gaze was fixed on her once more. She felt her cheeks warm a little and hoped he had not noticed where she had directed her attention for an instant. "But I hope you shall forgive me for my opposition. As your friend, it is only right to expect that I should be happy and congratulate you. Excuse me for not being so much that. Because as someone who is more than your friend, it is also only right to expect that I should be dismayed on the occasion of your engagement to another man."

He was only a little amused to see that she did not even attempt to restrain her wince.

"Reito-san," she said again in admonition.

He lifted a thick, black eyebrow at the familiar refrain.

"For all that my name seems to be all you have on your lips, it seems you're still intent on doing this," he joked lightly. "In any event, when do you plan to marry Tate? Mind you, this does not mean I've accepted defeat. Though I suppose that makes you wary now. You're probably worried I will play saboteur at the occasion itself."

She chuckled reluctantly.

"No, no," she told him. "I'm sure you wouldn't do that, Reito-san."

"Which is your way of saying Please don't do that, Reito-san."

They laughed at each other. It was rather short laughter.

"We were thinking sometime in February or March," she told him afterwards.

The amber eyes stared at her again.

"Next month!" he cried. "As early as that?"

"Yes."

"Have you been planning long before this, then?" he asked suspiciously, putting a touch of faultless hurt into his voice. He knew it would discomfit her. "Ah, I am dismayed!"

She jerked a little forward in her seat at this exclamation from him, her hands going up from their death-grip on the arms of the chair to clutch instead at empty air, then coming back down. A wild embarrassment was suffusing her face and rushed all the way up to the roots of her red hair. He leaned forward too, lifting his back from its relaxed slouch.

"No, not at all!" she was saying to him now, practically babbling out her explanation. "We really did just decide on it recently, Reito-san, it's just that Yuuichi and I thought-well, there's no point to dragging it out."

"Trying to be merciful in applying the sword swiftly?" he teased, gratified to see her discomfort rise another notch with his words. His lips assumed a frown. "Rather, you make me wonder again with that. If you are going to wed so soon and have only decided upon it recently, as you claim, that means few preparations have been made. Do you intend it to be a small celebration?"

She nodded.

"Something private. With only our most intimate friends," she murmured diffidently, before sweeping red-gold lashes upwards. He smiled gently at her uncertain expression, understanding what would come next. "Naturally, we were hoping that you would come to the banquet afterwards."

He said nothing to that, and she burst into more stammers and flutters of her hands, which had been exactly his intention. For being the person on the losing side of this conversation, he reflected with a degree of malice, he was far and away the more composed one. That gave him a measure of gratification: one had to be thankful for the small victories, after all.

Not that that meant he acknowledged Tate's definite victory over him, of course. Nor hers, for that matter.

"Mai-san," he said firmly, cutting off her babble. "Of course I would come, if that is what you want of me. Is that what you want of me?"

She coloured again at his tone.

"I am still-no matter what happens-your friend," he continued. "As I am Tate's mentor and friend as well. If my cheerful albeit slightly tattered presence at your wedding is something that would please you, I would be only too glad to grant it. For your pleasure."

If she noted the emphasis he had placed on that particular word, she said nothing. Instead, she merely began to thank him profusely until he finally cut her off once again, waving away her diffidence with his own and thus causing another outbreak of discomfiture. How good to know that he could still embarrass her so easily, at least! That meant he still had a chance, his pride told him, to even the scales. And he would-oh, he would, sooner or later! He had not become Princeps Senatus of the greatest country in the world by simply surrendering a battle once circumstances foiled him. A woman he himself had been pursuing might be getting married to someone many viewed as his young dependant, true, but that petty circumstance was nothing. Marriages were nothing, easily-dissolved things in this day and age! And one did not even need to dissolve them to get what one wanted, sometimes.

I hope you don't think you've overtaken me already, Tate, he told his rival and protégé silently, even while maintaining his smile to the woman in front of him. You've a few things to learn yet!

"Anyway, Reito-san, I wanted to talk about something," she was saying. "Something else."

"And that would be?"

"About the plan."

There was no need to ask which plan. He understood.

"I see."

She nodded, tossing a few fiery locks forward on her brow: "I brought it up because I've been hearing some rumours about the Mentulaean suit being retracted."

He took the measure of her with one of his clear-eyed sweeps, noting that her usual easy confidence was returning now that they had moved away from personal matters. How like her that was, he thought, and how it amused him to think about it. It would amuse him more to discomfit her by refusing to cede the choice of their topic and pressing the personal issue they had been discussing, but he supposed that would be considered spiteful of him. He did not want to look spiteful, as much as he wanted to see her squirm.

That was not part of his plan.

"I hear that their ambassadorial party is thinking of leaving soon, given the difficulty they've found in their attempts to procure a treaty," she went on, sensing by his expression that he was willing her to continue. And he was, for his logical mind had already shelved away whatever feelings or thoughts he might have regarding their earlier conversation and concerning her marriage. He could deal with all of that later, when it suited him.

"Have you heard anything about that?" she asked him. "About the Mentulaean party leaving?"

Here he smiled. She knew he had been meeting with the head of the ambassadorial party, the Mentulaean Prince Nagi, quite often in the past few weeks. Of course he would know if there was a departure in the wind.

"Yes, I did hear something of the kind," he allowed, folding one leg carefully over the other. The fabric of his tunic slipped a little to one side in a soft swish of material.

"Although it's only talk of yet," he went on. "That is what I hear."

"Oh." Disappointment was patent in her voice. "I was hoping you'd know more than I do."

"I'm afraid not." He angled his head to her in apology before attacking her suspicions head on. "Though I may appear quite thick with Nagi-san and the other Mentulaean officers, I fear that's just an illusion. The only reason they stick to me is because I am the Princeps Senatus, and it would be good for their cause were they to win me over to their side. As such, they would hardly tell me something that doesn't put them in the best light. They tell me no more than what gets around from the rumour mill."

Out came his perfectly white smile.

"Shady bunch," he told her. "That."

She made a noncommittal sound in response. After all, she thought he could be shady too.

"I will say this much for them: they know how to throw a fine party," he continued.

"That's nice for you, I suppose," she said with a small grin. "At least you get entertained."

"If anything," he pursued. "Though I doubt they're offering the same type of entertainment to our friends up north."

"No," she said. "I doubt it, too."

He nodded: "To that end, one could say that their ideas of withdrawal from their suit could bode ill."

The reply was swift.

"Do you have any suspicions, Reito-san?" she asked.

"Some, but that's only normal," he said, showing a grin. "I'm a politician, after all."

She produced a sound of amusement.

"Then, as one of our best politicians, would you listen to me if I suggested something?" she asked, not all timidly.

"I would be happy to listen to you at any time," he said, provoking a smile. "But, yes, I think I already know what you want to say, Mai-san. You're thinking we should keep them here a bit longer, yes?"

She agreed.

"For safety, I think," she said. "It would serve our-and Shizuru-san's-cause far better. Don't you think it would be better for us to keep them here as long as we can?"

"Most definitely," he said.

"Can you find a way to do it?"

"My dear, I am the Princeps Senatus," he said with some grandness. "If there is anyone who can delay a person's departure from this city through the entangling snares of legality, well..."

Out came his hand in a gesture obviously drawing notice to himself, and she laughed.

"That's wonderful, Reito-san," she approved. "I suppose we'll be counting on you for that."

"Of course," he replied, deep-set eyes peering at her slyly. "I can't say I'm not going to be gaining anything from it, you know, since I do expect the Mentulae to ply me with gifts galore in an effort to bribe me into whatever they want, be it for fostering approval of their proposed treaty or for their release from the bonds in which I will put them, whether by fair means or foul. I think I'll actually be enjoying myself a little too much with this project."

Her eyes were dancing. "So long as you can put up with the glorious prince a little longer, then."

"Ah, Nagi-san." He was mindful of the sarcasm she put in the adjective. "You don't like him."

"No, I don't."

"I admit he can be somewhat malicious," he said. "But he's not actually too bad. As company, I mean."

Her tone was evasive: "I wouldn't really know."

"Mikoto dislikes him immensely, did I tell you?"

Her eyebrows rose. They were a lighter ginger at the moment, he noticed, as she had not darkened them today. He knew that she sometimes took to deepening their shade with stibium for social occasions so that they would show better. Had she been truly blonde, she might have let it be as did the others, but since the hair on her scalp was actually several shades of ginger darker than that on her brows, the disparity seemed to bother her enough to merit that cosmetic touch. It was probably the reason too why she let them grow thicker than other women, who took to plucking theirs in order to slim the line.

Personally, he did not mind it either way. Her face had enough character in it, he thought, to overshadow any trifling effect decided by overlight brows or otherwise.

"Mikoto's met him?" she was asking now, her orangey-gold brows still high. "How?"

"Just once, in passing," he answered. "She told me later that he reminded her of an overgrown white rat."

Both of them laughed.

"Oh dear," she said through her laughter. "Mikoto and her imagination."

"I told her she should have liked him, then, since he probably seemed tasty to her," he added, invoking their joke about his younger sister being part-feline. She released another giggle of amusement and he went on. "But Mikoto maintained that she didn't like him."

She pulled in her lips for a second.

"Generally," she submitted, "Mikoto is a good judge of character."

He released a guffaw of hilarity and she stared at him curiously.

"You do know," he snorted out, "that Mikoto doesn't like Tate, right?"

Her face was priceless; he laughed even harder.

"Excuse me, Mai-san," he said unrepentantly later, once his amusement had dwindled to an occasion chuckle in between breaths. He dug into the sinus of his toga for the handkerchief he always kept on his person and pressed it to the corners of his eyes. "I'm afraid I've enjoyed myself a little too much with that joke and somewhat at your expense."

She was too much of a good sport not to giggle back.

"It was a bad slip I made there, wasn't it?" she allowed, looking a tad embarrassed. "I guess that wasn't very cautious of me."

If you really were serious about him, you wouldn't need caution at all, was what he thought. But he kept that to himself, like a warm secret in his breast.

"Anyway, about the plan," she resumed, a trifle awkward in her shift of topic again. "Have you spoken to Chikane-san lately?"

The answer was yes.

"She says the general purpose remains as it is." He shrugged lightly, recalling that stately woman's cool expression when they had had their meeting. "Not that I expected anything else. Once that woman has made up her mind to achieve something, she stays firm on it. In her own words, A slight delay means little to the end if you modify the means in the proper way. Thus says our senior consul elect and archplotter, Chikane Himemiya."

He said this with easily discernible admiration, and Mai smiled as well. She asked another question.

"I guess she's already started modifying, then?"

"I would think so. Rest easy, Mai-san," he assured her. "Chikane has a genius for organisation. She will see to it all on her end."

"Yes. Yes, of course." She stopped and looked thoughtful. "And when does the Senate intend to discuss the matter of a successor?"

"For the present mission up north?" he said, quite rhetorically. "Oh, I expect it to be brought up tomorrow. It should make for some interesting discussion. Would you like to wager that it shall be one of the less-known, glory-seeking upstarts who shall try to replace our well-known, already-glorious upstart?"

She grinned and said, "I wonder what Shizuru-san would say if she heard your description of her."

"I daresay she'd simply laugh," he said good-humouredly. "Though the real point to ponder, I think, is how all of these developments will be received by her."

"Oh!" She did not even attempt to hide it. "Yes. I was worrying about that, too."

He repeated the word delicately: "Worrying."

"Yes."

"Might I ask why you feel that you should worry?"

She tilted her head in a manner that suggested she would be scratching her hair now, had she been a little younger.

"It seems awkward to me," she answered with a wistful smile. "I know it can't be helped, given the circumstances, but I can't stop thinking that most of the actual blood-toil will be on her part, and we're just preparing the stage for her."

He frowned lightly. "Which is our task in this project."

"Yes, but she isn't aware of how exactly we're doing that!" she returned. "Oh, we can send letters to her every now and then, but they will all get to her long after events have been finished and we've probably moved on to taking action on another thing. And Shizuru-san will just have to deal with the fallout."

He inclined his head in confirmation.

"Yes," he said. "It may very well turn out that way."

She groaned softly, indicating her discomfort further.

"I don't know," she told him. "We're deciding things without her, Reito-san, even though we're deciding them for her. Even if we ask her opinion on something through courier, time constraints mean we often just presume her accord with us even before she replies. And it bothers me! Because I imagine what it would be like for me in her situation and how comfortable I would be with something like this. I knew this would be the case, too, when Chikane-san first asked me for support on this endeavour, but I guess I can't help but worry for Shizuru-san's sake now that we're in the thick of it. Oh, but I shouldn't be troubling you with my-"

"I understand," he said gently, interrupting her. "But, as you say, we have no other choice. And besides, I believe our judgments of Shizuru-san's possible responses are sound, especially given that the person directing the judgments is the one who knows her best in this city, if not the entire world. Chikane would know, more than any of us, if our friend would be in accord with something or not. That is the way it's been ever since they were younger. If anyone can understand and predict anything about each other, it would be those two."

She nodded, obviously eager to accept his assurance. He went on.

"Besides, I believe Shizuru-san is doing the same thing we are, at this moment. Since most of our actions are unrevealed to her, she is probably left with the same doubts we entertain, you know."

She sighed.

"You're probably right," she told him. " But but I can't help but still feel as though I'm being so big-headed, to think that she'd just agree with whatever we decide. It's Shizuru-san, after all!"

He laughed at that, understanding exactly what she meant.

"But I know you're right too," she went on. "Excuse me, Reito-san-I know I'm being a worrywart."

He bestowed a large smile upon her.

"Not at all. I suppose," he proposed, "that for reassurance we can simply rely on that wonderful human quality we now call 'trust'. Even Shizuru-san, I think, has nothing to go on regarding our concern for her save that great human quality of faith."

The red-haired woman regarded him gently, with a look in her eyes he could not quite decipher. Just as he was about to ask her what it meant, however, she began to speak again.

"Of course, Reito-san," she said. "It's beyond me to be worrying about things I can't help, after all. I was just a little anxious, you know. I'm sorry for troubling you so much."

"No, please," he said quickly, ever so smoothly. "You know it's my pleasure to help if anything ever troubles you. You need only ask."

"Then do you mind if I ask one last thing? Related to our present subject?"

"Please do, Mai-san."

"Do you really think Shizuru-san would be willing to leave her present mission in someone else's hands for a while? Again I'm invoking the refrain: it's Shizuru-san, after all! Do you think she would really give it up without any misgivings?"

He exhaled confident laughter.

"Of course she would," he ruled boldly. "It would only be sensible for her to return to Hime. She would actually be quite glad to do so, I imagine. There is nothing she stands to lose at this moment if she leaves the cold fastnesses of the dreary northlands to come back to our fair city."

Chapter 33

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala (s.), alae (pl.) - Cavalry unit. The estimates for it vary, but for this story, the fixed number of troopers per ala shall be 500.
2. Lorica segmentata - A type of segmented armour, often made of iron strips.
3. Triumph – Also known as a triumphal parade, one that a returning and victorious general could hold in Rome after having been given the accolade of being hailed "Imperator!" by his troops after battle. He had to petition the Senate for permission to hold this parade before actually doing it, of course, as the whole city generally turned out for these grand spectacles-which not only involved feasting but also a display of the spoils, captives, and defeated enemy commanders from the campaign.

In the billet of the chief centurion of Shizuru Fujino's Ninth Legion, a figure shuffled quietly in one of the rooms. The room was near-black, for it was late afternoon in the winter, and the slatted window shutters meant to keep out the wind did the same for the light. The figure moved carefully in this semi-darkness, feeling its way to a small corner table and pausing there. An instant later, a lamp was lit, and the room recast in the sharpness of the flame's chiaroscuro.

The light revealed some effects tangled together in a heap upon the table, and these were picked up as the figure began to dress. She moved briskly, efficiently, and though she felt the cold stiffening her joints and urging her to return to the comfortable immobility from which she had just risen, she ignored it. Her hands were chilled, every inch of her body marked with gooseflesh, but she ignored that too. She did not even pause to run her palms across her sides and indulge in a shiver. That would have wasted a few precious seconds she could spend more efficiently.

Just as she was about to finish dressing, other sounds were heard in the room. First was a soft exhalation. This was followed by a shuffle of cloth, and then the faint creak of the bed against the wall as another figure, this one melting into the cream-coloured sheets, slowly sat up.

"Nina," came the tentative call. "Are you going already?" There followed a pause, a stifled yawn. "Nao-senpai won't be back yet."

Nina was finished dressing, and drew out a stool from beneath the table. The wood scraped curtly on the floor and she seated herself.

"I know," she told the other girl. Her arms bent down, reaching for the boots she had left on the floor. "But I have to go back soon."

"Are you doing exercises again today?"

"Yes."

"You always go in early, don't you?"

"Of course, Ers." She stopped, searching for the words in the other's language. "Good discipline is important."

Erstin smiled as though at a private joke. Her short, pale hair glowed agreeably in the yellow lamplight as she ran her hands through it to work out any tangles. Nina spared a second to watch before turning her attention to her boots and pulling them on. She knew Erstin would not find any tangles. Erstin's hair was too short, too soft for them. She knew that because she had worked her fingers into it earlier, tried to tangle her hands in it, only to find the flaxen strands slipping teasingly away.

Her fingers faltered as she was lacing up the straps. She irritably began the knot again.

Meanwhile, the other girl got out of bed, dressing hurriedly but with a great deal of unnecessary movement, in Nina's opinion. That might have been because her clothes were scattered all over the floor near the bed, whereas Nina's had been carefully deposited in one place.

"Do you want to eat something before you go, Nina-chan? I can fix you up something."

Her voice quivered a little and Nina realised she sounded breathless, but that was probably the cold.

"No. Thank you."

"Are you sure? It's no trouble."

"I'm sure."

"Uh... a drink? I'll get you something to drink, at least."

It was on the tip of her tongue to decline again, but then she looked up.

"Yes, please," she conceded, inadvertently producing a smile when the other girl did. "Thank you."

"What would you like to drink?" Erstin asked her. "We have wine and water... and I think I still have some milk from this morning."

"Why do you have milk?" Nina asked, aware that Himeans did not treat it as a beverage and considered Otomeians odd for favouring it even after passing infancy.

"Used it to cook something. So would you like some milk? I can warm it up for you."

"Milk is fine. And it's fine if you don't warm it."

"But it's so cold," Erstin protested. "And you're going out. I don't want you to get a chill."

A thin laugh passed Nina's lips.

"Where I live, this is not cold," she explained to the other girl. "The winter of the lowlands is still autumn for Otomeia."

"It must be freezing up there right now," she remarked. "I keep forgetting you're used to it, Nina-chan."

Nina nodded.

"Then, if you're sure, I'll just go get the milk." The blonde took a wrap hanging from a hook on the wall and opened the door, then paused to ask. "You're really sure?"

Nina was finishing with the other boot.

"Yes," she said.

"I'll be back really quick."

She had dashed out of the room too fast to hear Nina mumble her reply: "I know."

While Erstin was away, the other girl worked on gathering up and putting on the rest of her military impedimenta. She remained on the stool once finished, sitting very still as was her wont. A moment later, she relaxed her rigid posture and curved a little, sighed out. That was unusual for her.

This other of the last surviving noble Ortygians was not a terribly introspective person-or, at least, not the kind of introspective person who thought of such things as would induce sighs. Her thoughts were often more concerned with the stuff of duty and execution, things that had to be done and how to do them effectively. Not good material for sighing at all. And that suited her just fine.

This was because Nina's mind was as ramrod straight as her back, unflinching in its determination to remain consistently rational according to the reason that dictated it. As with most people of truly consistent reason, this meant she herself did not wholly appreciate the effects of this trait. If there was anyone who knew her well enough to appreciate it on her behalf, it was perhaps her elder cousin, who understood more than anyone else how Nina's steadfast mind was both her strength and her weakness. But given that the same cousin was also the kind of person who hesitated to take such liberties as advising another absent solicitation, it was unlikely that her insight would ever be imparted to Nina. Thus, Nina simply went about life and contemplations of it in what she thought was her own coldly rational way. For example, she now attempted to reason out to herself what she was still doing here, waiting in a Himean girl's room when she could be on her way to the barracks for morning duty.

I'm frittering away time needlessly, she was telling herself. I should have said I had to leave immediately, but that would have made Ers sad, and that would not do. One doesn't treat people who treat one well with shabby conduct in return. Still, I should drink the milk quickly and go.

That was what she told herself, thinking that she would rather have left as soon as possible and with minimum fuss. It was, she thought, much more economical. In this she was both right and wrong. It would have been more economical in that it would have permitted her to arrive early for the morning muster of her division. That meant more time to see to her duties and tasks. However, the question of economy was always one of measured gains, and she had to admit that a little more time spent with Erstin was not without gain either.

But then, there was always that feeling to consider.

I wonder why I always feel like this afterwards, she thought to herself. Every time it starts, I just feel like I have to get away or be stuck in it. I don't understand it at all. The morning after, I always feel so strange.

Strange-or perhaps a better word was "awkward". She was unable to explain it, but she could certainly feel it each time: a kind of dislocation or vertigo alien to her, and it bothered her very much. What was it and why did it always seem to come to her after she woke up next to the girl even now returning from her errand?

"Here you are," said the Himean, coming in and handing over the promised cup of milk. It was warm, and Nina was a little surprised by that. Erstin had warmed it after all. "I'm sorry I took so long. I got you some bread too."

Amber eyes took in the hunk of bread, the dark crust broken by a white fissure. Erstin spoke again.

"I put some butter in it," she explained, almost as though in apology. "I thought you'd like it."

Nina stared at the items in her hands, her head inclined so that a few locks of hair fall over her face. That was a calculated move; her cheeks felt warm.

"Yes, I like it," she said slowly. "Thank you, Ers."

"You're welcome."

"I will eat the bread on the way."

"Sure."

She raised the cup to her lips while the other girl pulled up another stool. She observed the blonde as the latter rubbed at her eyes sleepily. Another hand came up to cover a yawn.

"Go back to the bed," Nina told the other girl, grinning at the succession of eye-rubs and yawns that proceeded from the first set. "You're sleepy still!"

The soft and pale eyes came up.

"Oh, no, I'm fine," Erstin protested gently. "But you're amazing, Nina-chan, so awake so quickly. Did you sleep fine?"

"Yes."

"But you never seem sleepy."

"I wake quickly, like you said."

Erstin nodded, a couple of flaxen locks falling over her brow. Nina's fingers twitched on the cup.

"Oh!" Erstin's exclamation surprised the quiet of the room. "I just remembered! Fujino-san's new armour."

She sprang up from the chair, one palm against the table.

"I think I'll walk out with you after all, Nina-chan," she said, smiling ruefully. "I just remembered that one of the local armourers-some really popular blacksmith, I think-he met Nao-senpai yesterday. He left a cuirass Fujino-san commissioned from him, and asked Nao-senpai if she could give it to the general. I think he had to go somewhere so he couldn't do that himself-I forgot it yesterday! Nao-senpai will scold me if I don't do it this day."

"No," Nina interrupted with surprising firmness. "No, she will not scold you, Ers. I will take it to Fujino-san myself. I'm passing by the governor's mansion. I will bring it to her."

"Oh, no, I couldn't make-"

"Give it to me, it's fine." Nina smiled. "You should sleep. Rest."

"I'm sorry for the trouble, Nina, really."

"It's fine, I said." She put the cup to her mouth again and finished the rest of the milk, feeling its warmth settle pleasantly in her stomach. "Where is it?"

Erstin went to fetch it with her. It was wrapped up in a sturdy stitched-leather sack. Nina shouldered it, hiding the slight strain it put on her back and arms. She knew such an object would encumber her were she wearing it in battle, so she could not help but wonder how the Himean general would fare with it. All the same, she gathered from Erstin's idle banter as they walked through the house that the primipilus, upon handling the object yesterday, had pronounced it wonderfully light. Wonderfully light? She herself could not fight properly with a millstone like this around her neck. A miracle if she did not lose balance and tip over onto some waiting spear!

But I'm part of the light cavalry, she allowed to herself. She had never been used to fighting with heavy armour, and this was why she had joined that particular unit of the Otomeian army. Aside from her preferences in combat, she had her own body type to consider. She had much the same build as her cousin, a woman slender as a stalk. The only difference was that, whereas Natsuki was quite tall, Nina herself fell only to average height for women-and with respect to handling added weight, that could very well matter. Still, she doubted that her taller cousin would be willing to wear such a cumbersome thing for going into battle. Just like her, the older Otomeian prized mobility very highly when fighting, and that meant as little extra weight as possible.

She shifted the object against her back as she trudged through the streets, having said farewell to Erstin with a press of their lips. It had made her mouth tingle earlier, but the biting wind had soon replaced that strange tingle with a more familiar one. That was preferable; it lessened her discomfort. Familiarity, to Nina, was always comforting. Having thus imposed a familiar feeling on her body with the help of the winter cold, she then went about imposing familiar thoughts on her mind. She began by listing the things she needed to do this day, and the way she would go about them. That was finished quickly, however, as she had no particular duties today that were out of the routine. Except for the delivery of the package on her back, of course.

Well, that brought a new subject to mind. She set her lights immediately on that new topic, seizing on it with the swiftness of a hound finding fresh game. Even if the immediate subject was unfamiliar, it nonetheless involved something that she did know and care about: her cousin. Hence her enthusiasm in pondering the immediate subject, which was the Himean named Shizuru Fujino.

Shizuru Fujino-even the name is unusual, she thought, being familiar enough with Himean designations to understand that there were few Fujinos among those people, and possibly even fewer Shizurus. Being from a society where name choice was handled reverently, she appreciated that sense of uniqueness. It was only fitting, anyway, that such a woman should have a distinctive name.

Nina thought the Himean general especially distinctive for a particular reason. To be sure, she acknowledged that the foreign woman's distinction arose from many traits: she had distinctive good looks; she was a distinctive warrior and an even more distinctive commander; she came from distinctive stock; she had those distinctive eyes. So many distinctions, on the whole! But, impressive as all of these were, Nina's impression of the Himean was based primarily on one particular merit, one that touched directly on one of the constants in Nina's life: the achievement of having broken through the fortified walls of her cousin's mind and heart. There indeed was a great distinction!

I myself can't lay claim to it, she confessed. Whatever Nina's relationship was with her cousin, she knew it could not possibly compare to the relationship her cousin and the Himean seemed to have forged in their short time together, a relationship of strange depth and baffling sincerity. To say it baffled Nina would be an understatement. To her, Natsuki had always been Natsuki: cool, enigmatic, and methodical. Dark of temper occasionally yet almost blindingly just. Learned and logical. Worthy of having been the heir apparent to the throne of Ortygia.

It would be fair to say that Nina came close to idolising her cousin: how could one not idolise one so remarkable? Yet, perhaps because of her admiration, she had failed to perceive several things about Natsuki too all this time. Some might even ask if she had chosen to disregard them. There was a difference between the two kinds of ignorance, certainly. Even so, to one of Nina's ilk, it was all the same. Asking how she had not known something before was neither here nor there after the lack of knowledge had already been discovered. She had been ignorant of some things about her cousin; that was all.

Weeks now into the revelation of these things, she still could not quite come to grips with them though. One of the things of which she had been ignorant was integral to her cousin's relationship with the Himean. Simply, it was that Nina had never thought of her cousin as a sexual being before this affair. That aspect of the association-or the only aspect of the association, if some were to be believed-had struck her like a kick in the teeth. Her teeth were still rattling. Who would have thought it before this? The Princess Natsuki, a sexual creature?

But if she knew of Erstin, Natsuki might say the same of me.

No, it was a bad idea to think about that. If the kick from the revelation of that side of her cousin was still rattling her teeth, the one having to do with hers had not yet ceased stomping. Better to think of her cousin's situation instead. Better to think on what it could bring.

But what could it bring, she wondered anxiously.

"A delivery for General Shizuru Fujino," she said to the guards of the gubernatorial mansion, holding up the sack she had on her back.

They waved her through and she followed a slave who had been corralled into acting as her guide through the huge residence. Soon she was in a corridor leading to a room with her target. She declined to have the slave announce her presence for her and he left her to walk down the corridor alone.

She could see the Himean already as she approached, the woman's height and fair hair making her easy to spot even from a distance. Nina's cousin was with her, of course: they sat together, hands clasped.

Odd to see her in that pose, she thought with the unease of a person seeing a former acquaintance as a sudden stranger. Despite the brief misstep this caused, she quickly returned to her usual gait. She was using it as a way of announcing herself to her cousin, who had probably already detected her approach. Had she? Yes, Natsuki had detected it, if that slight tip of her head was any indication. And the fact that she did not bother looking in Nina's direction surely meant she had identified the younger woman by her walk now.

In the back of Nina's mind, in a recess where all those odd but familiar things were stored away, some part of her wondered at that ability of Natsuki's for the thousandth time. In the back of her heart too, in a similarly-assigned recess, a part of her warmed at the thought that her cousin should know her so well as to be able to identify her merely by the sound of her walk... for there were occasions when the elder Otomeian would profess to being unable to recognise the pattern of the steps nearby, but never when it came to hers. While this was a fine thought, it was just as well that she never enquired further from Natsuki herself. Had she done so, the other's answer might have diminished some of the romance of her secret comfort, for the reason was actually quite straightforward: it was in Nina's walk itself.

What Nina did not apprehend-and which Natsuki had long noted-was that she was a very distinctive walker. Her distinction was in the fact that she had absolutely no affect. She had no swagger, no sway to her hips, no strut and no swing. Nina did not mince her steps or extend them; she had absolutely none of the drama of her cousin, who either glided in the sun or prowled in the shade. Indeed, that difference extended even to their characters: both being generally perceived as solemn, the elder had a sombreness that encouraged high drama, while the other had one that encouraged only a straightforward, uncomplicated gravity. So Natsuki could easily tell when it was Nina approaching, for the latter's gait mirrored her character. It was of the rare rhythm that suggested nothing in its intention save the most practical one: to simply, perhaps even boringly walk .

Thus moving along in her steady fashion, the young Otomeian finally reached the pair. They were no longer hand-clasped when she stood before them and returned their greetings, explaining her purpose and offering the leather pack she had been labouring over for the past half-hour. She offered it to both of them, unsure of who should relieve her of it. The Himean took it before Nina's cousin could do so, squeezing a warm hand on Nina's arm fleetingly in thanks for her trouble.

Look at that, Nina thought when the woman lifted the sack. She handles it like it weighs nothing. Yet her touch on my arm was featherlight.

"I thank you, Nina-han, and am sorry you had to come all this way," the Himean apologised. "This is quite heavy, and I fear I have troubled you somewhat."

The girl shook her head, ignoring the twinge in her shoulder that agreed with the words.

"No, I was glad to do it, General Fujino," she assured in her most official manner.

Her eyes darted to the side, towards her cousin, and she nodded deferentially to that other woman present.

"Natsuki," she said.

Natsuki nodded back.

"I go to morning duty," she went on. The unspoken question trailed after her words like foggy breath. Do you have any orders, Cousin?

Natsuki delivered in her customary fashion: "Kyo. Report to me. After three hours."

Nina was about to confirm the message when she heard a long exhalation from the other person present. She turned to the Himean general, whose smile was wry.

"I thought I was concise," that woman muttered, lifting a brow at Natsuki. "You do not have to restrict yourself to such curt syntax, Natsuki. If the subject of your message is clandestine, you could simply use your language. Gods know I am not able to understand much of it yet."

A healthy crimson spot appeared on each of Natsuki's cheeks.

"No," Nina's cousin said after a swallowing pause. "It is not that."

Nina looked from one woman to the other, noting the mischievous glint in the foreigner's red eyes. Deciding to simplify things for her apparently beleaguered cousin, she took it upon herself to explain and save Natsuki some trouble.

"We speak like this often, General," she said, changing what should have been 'she' into 'we'. "It's clear for us."

Shizuru smiled at her. Yet when Nina glanced at her cousin, she saw that she did not look too pleased, although Natsuki did not exactly scowl either. Why, what was the matter with what she had just said? Had she not said it for Natsuki's sake?

"Oh, I see," the Himean before her said, intruding on her doubts. "Forgive me for the accusatory tone of my suggestion then, Nina-han."

Nina stopped her scowl before it could come as a result of her confusion. Why was the woman apologising to her? It did not sound sarcastic, yet the woman had no need to apologise, being supreme commander of the Himean-Otomeian army on this expedition and thus technically superior to both herself and her cousin. Truly this person was a unique character! Hard to understand. In spite of the articulacy for which the Himean was much-lauded, she could also be surprisingly incomprehensible.

Just like the Princess Natsuki, come to it.

Straightening from her bow, she took in the pair before her with swift estimation. That chance review let her see something she had failed to notice before.

The same eyes, she noted with amazement, while struggling not to betray it. The same eyes in them. How to describe it? It was apparent only when you contrasted it to their manner, after all: both cool, generally unruffled. Stoic impressions. And yet their eyes spoke differently. Oh, not that they betrayed exactly what they were thinking-far from it! Those eyes were too complex in their expressions to read easily. But the way those eyes-one pair red and the other, green-looked out showed something of what was hiding inside. Something volatile, something of far greater energy than what the rest of the demeanour betrayed.

They're still on the outside, she mused, trying to grasp the flash of insight threatening to slip away. They're still but not within. They're hiding something else within. Damn it all, what was the word for what she was thinking of here? What did one call that? "Energy", perhaps, or "power"? Could it even be "danger"?

The best word would actually have been "passion", but Nina's vocabulary did not admit of it, alas!

"Have you taken your midday meal already, perchance? There is a goodly spread set in the mansion's dining tables at the moment, and I think they would not be at all bothered to have another diner over."

The silky invitation cut in on her thoughts again and she snapped quickly to attention, berating herself for being drawn into such convoluted evaluations of the two women before her. A silly thing to do, after all, and with little likelihood of proving productive in the future.

"Yes, General," she answered, remembering the bread she had in her pouch. "I've eaten."

The beautiful face before her-one of them, anyway-tilted to one side, lips curving into another smile.

"That is well," the woman said.

Nina nodded, feeling more and more self-conscious by the second. The scrutiny of those bloody eyes did not escape her and she knew that for as long as she stayed, she would not escape them in turn.

"I will excuse myself now, General," she said, striving to make it sound as businesslike as possible. "To go to duty, if you would allow me to go."

"Oh, of course," the fair-haired woman said. "Excuse me for having not only obliged you to detour for this-" she lifted the pack containing the cuirass, and again Nina noted how easily she did it "-but for also having detained you this long. Please do not let me keep you any longer."

"I was glad to bring it to you, General," Nina reassured, all crispness and official manner now.

The young woman went off, leaving Shizuru watching her as she walked away. Nina's cousin turned to the Himean then and offered to take the bag with the cuirass from her. The older woman declined.

"No, but thank you anyway, meum mel," she said. "I can carry it myself. Let us go to our room? I would like to unwrap it there."

Natsuki agreed, so they turned and began to head towards their quarters. As they began navigating the passageway returning to the main hall, from where they could more swiftly access the corridor leading to their actual destination, Shizuru began to talk.

"I think that your cousin..." she commenced and trailed off, to Natsuki's curiosity. "Well, now. How do I put this?"

A few seconds passed.

"Nina?" the low voice finally prompted, obviously wanting her to continue.

"Yes. Nina."

"What of Nina?"

This time, it was Shizuru who looked curiously at her. The look was assessing, and its silence confused the younger woman enough to try again.

"What-what of Nina?" she asked, dropping her voice to its lowest register after her stutter. It only served to make it huskier, and that was an effect that made the other woman smile.

"What of Nina indeed?" she said, quite enjoying too the attention the green eyes were giving her. "I was thinking that-"

She is quite different from you, after all.

"That she seems a brisk young woman," she finished, at which Natsuki's expression eased only a little. It was clear the younger woman was still curious about what she had meant to say and suspected rightly that it had been something different from what she eventually said. "How old is she again, Natsuki? Two years younger than you, correct?"

"Yes."

"Her demeanour is that of someone further on in years, it seems to me."

"Oh."

"You disagree?"

There was the slightest pause before Natsuki answered: "No."

"No?" Shizuru repeated dubiously. "Yet there was hesitation just now."

This time, the pause was decidedly longer.

"No reason," came the reply, a gentle evasion. "I was thinking. Shizuru."

Shizuru grinned. Why was it that the girl seemed to use her name as punctuation whenever she wished to stress something and when had it begun? Well, no matter. Two could play the same game.

"Is that so? I see. Natsuki," she said, tacking on the name after a long pause at the end. Judging from Natsuki's dry peek, the girl took her jest completely. "I was simply wondering. You hardly tell me about her and she does intrigue me too, you know."

"Uhm."

"And besides, I think it only fair that you should tell me about her now, in exchange for all the things I have been telling you about my friends, the entirety of last week."

The younger woman frowned and pursed her lips. It was true that Shizuru had responded gamely to her jibe over a week ago about that particular topic. So now she felt the onus of producing an equal reaction weighing on her and, as Shizuru knew, would submit to it. That was the beauty of dealing with Natsuki, she thought: if you phrased a request to her as one that she had to satisfy in order to be just or honourable, she would grant it absent hesitation.

"Nina," the girl eventually said, "is young."

Shizuru was glad she was able to suppress her smile just in time.

"You think so?" she prodded the creature whom she often called "child".

"Mmhm. She seems old?"

"Older than her years, yes."

"Hm. May be."

"May I hear the objection?"

"I do not, um, object."

"But I thought you just asserted the opposite of my own assertion earlier." Shizuru lifted an eyebrow. "I said she seemed older than her years, to which you replied by saying she was young. That seems an objection to me, Natsuki."

She watched as the girl scowled again, the pretty features twisting in a way that expressed more thoughtfulness than annoyance. Her gaze fixed on the Otomeian's beautifully slim and dark brows, admiring their slant on the icy contours of skin.

"I do not say an objection," Natsuki said slowly, apparently giving great thought to her words. "I mean 'young' in a different way that—that is to say she has still many things to know."

"Oh, young in that sense," Shizuru answered. "Might I ask what 'things' you were thinking of when you said that, then? Surely there is something in particular?"

An affirmative sound.

"I do not—I know not how you say it," Natsuki replied. "I must think, you will pardon me, Shizuru. I think she is not, hmm..."

She spoke an Otomeian word here, which Shizuru repeated by rote.

"What does that mean?" she asked.

Natsuki frowned before suddenly producing a triumphant smile.

"I remember it now," she replied. "It is 'flexible', in your language."

"Ah, I see." Shizuru mumbled the foreign word yet again to remember it. "So, you are saying that Nina-han is inflexible?"

Natsuki agreed.

"Now, I mean that she is that now, still," she went on conversationally, unwittingly provoking a dumbfounded look from a slave they were passing, his jaw actually falling open as he looked up from his stoop. Shizuru grinned. She knew that many people still found ludicrous the notion of her near-mute attendant holding conversation that actually went beyond a mumble or two-until they saw and heard the girl conversing with her.

"She sees things one way," Natsuki was saying, still talking freely. "She thinks it is easier like that. To see like that."

"Well, it is, actually," Shizuru admitted.

"But it is not really seeing," Natsuki retorted. "No, Shizuru?"

This time, Shizuru showed the girl her brightest smile.

"No. You are right, it is not," she said.

"That is why, sometimes, she does not like to see me," Natsuki said grimly. "I think, sometimes."

"Forgive me, My Dear," Shizuru said carefully, having judged that the younger woman's usage of 'see' as a literal one. "But what do you mean by that? Why would she not like to see you? I thought that you got along?"

The emerald eyes darted to her, giving the answer even before the girl spoke.

"Yes, we do," Natsuki revealed, brow puckering a little. "But I think, Shizuru-this is what I think."

"Yes, go on," Shizuru prompted, indicating she accepted the girl's disclaimer.

"I think because she sees, um, old things," said the Otomeian.

"Old things?"

"I mean what is past. The past." She paused unexpectedly, and there was a depth in that pause that caught Shizuru's attention. "In me."

The older woman's steps slowed a beat, and though the girl noticed, she did not comment. She simply adjusted her own pace to match it.

"Is that so?" Shizuru said very softly.

She shifted the sack she was carrying from one shoulder to the other, and reached out for the girl's hand. They intertwined fingers easily, and she squeezed the smaller digits with her own. Natsuki squeezed back, shaking her head as a way of diffusing the other's concern. Her hair shimmered: it looked like dark water rippling after it had suffered a cast stone.

"Does she remember much of it too or not?" Shizuru asked, not needing to name what 'it' was.

Again Natsuki shook her head.

"She was," she said, "very young."

So were you, Natsuki. She did not actually say that, of course. She simply said something standard and noncommittal. She also remembered hearing that they had found Nina hidden in a different place, relatively far from the worst spots of the massacre.

"She is young now," Natsuki told her. "So she thinks to see so narrow is still good. To see only the present, instead of the past and possibilities. But things change. Could be, one day, she will see more. And learn to change too."

"Then she will learn to remedy that failing, you hope?"

"Yes. She must learn. It is important, flexibility."

Shizuru emitted a small laugh: "That is what I keep telling my opponents back home, myself."

"That is why you always win, Shizuru."

That got Shizuru's attention again.

"Do I?" she said.

"Over such opponents, it is natural," the girl replied. "You break them."

"Because they are inflexible?"

A nod.

"Life," the Otomeian said sagely, provoking a chuckle from her, "is about flexibility."

"Spoken like a true philosopher. And would you say you are flexible, Natsuki?"

The young woman actually considered it seriously.

"I try," she said at length.

Shizuru chuckled again, the sound wafting delicately between the two of them.

"From the mouths of the babes," she murmured, before asking Natsuki if she had ever spoken about her own cousin.

"Your cousin?" Natsuki's curiosity was patent. "What cousin?"

"Or which cousin, I suppose, since I do have several," Shizuru answered reflectively. "Well, the one who has been writing me regularly ever since I came here, asking for my reconsideration and return. She does it with admirable regularity, actually. Perhaps the only thing worthy of admiration in that one, even. Her name is Tomoe Marguerite."

"To-mo-e."

She said it slowly, as though the syllables taxed her. How odd that she should say it so, Shizuru thought, before another thought suddenly intruded: was it because she had mentioned that Tomoe had been pleading for her to leave this mission and come home? Could it be that which had sown that seed in Natsuki's voice?

A little self-consciously, she hoped it was.

"This is her full name?" the young woman asked her, getting a nod. "I do not recognise it."

"We do not share any names in common. She is not actually related to me by blood, but as a consequence of her father wedding my aunt after he was widowed. My aunt on the maternal side. So our cousinship is not 'natural', you might say."

"Ahh."

"She is my junior by less than a year," she continued. "And, I think, sees me more as a sister than a cousin. Or should it be 'idol'? I daresay she is very fond of me."

A vague sound from the Otomeian, who saw the slight sourness in Shizuru's expression as she said this.

"I mention her now because I was comparing you and your cousin's demeanours with each other to ours," she continued nonchalantly. "And was noting the differences. I was thinking, you see, that it is obvious that your cousin thinks very highly of you, and yet does not manifest it in the ways that mine does."

"How."

"How does she manifest her affection to me?"

"Yes."

She took a deep breath before answering, and waited until they rounded the corner.

"Different ways, I would say-more outspoken ones," she said. "But I suppose the difference between them now would be a consequence of the differences in character. We may put it this way: your cousin respects you very much, does she not? It seems to be so to me."

Natsuki looked pensive, but nodded anyway.

"Would you say she would hate to disappoint you?" Seeing the protest on the other's face, Shizuru added swiftly: "I am asking about how you think she would feel, Child. This has nothing to do with your actual expectations and demands-or lack thereof-of her. Do you think she would hate the possibility of not being deemed satisfactory by you? Be honest."

A pause, and then another nod.

"Well, I think that is how my cousin feels about the matter too, with respect to me," Shizuru pursued. "But the difference-this is only my opinion, of course, so feel free to counter-the difference is that, whereas I think your cousin would always strive to meet your approval in whatever she does, my cousin would only do so insofar as she thinks that I shall perceive her actions."

The slender black brows arched upwards as Natsuki threw a glance at her.

"Yes," Shizuru said. "My cousin lies to me, Natsuki. She is sweet, kind, a bastion of all the primary virtues when I am present. Yet she is an entirely different person when she thinks I am not looking. She has no scruples about acting in a way that would displease me so long as I am not there to see it."

"Of course, I can hardly take her to task for that," she continued almost tiredly. "Or, at least, I have no reason to do so just yet. I myself am hardly a person of great consistency, and I am aware that I change my attitude to suit the occasion too. Still, it is quite unsettling to know that there is so great a disparity between her various attitudes that they may already be considered malicious deceit, especially when the attitude she turns so often to me seems to be mimicry of one of my own."

"Mimicry. She copies you, Shizuru?"

"Yes, in a way."

"Huhm." Natsuki rumbled the sound softly. "Is she like you?"

" No ."

"Ah."

They exchanged a swift glance, red striking upon green.

"You are wondering about the swiftness of my answer, I suppose?" Shizuru surmised. "Did you know her, you would have no cause to wonder. She and I are still different enough from each other to warrant a discernible variation on the same theme."

She stopped here and frowned, gilded brows drawing together. Natsuki waited, stroking her hand with a thumb.

"Then again, that my only be my conceit," Shizuru finally admitted. "Since I actually wish to think us different from each other, and wishes tend to soil one's assessments. Is she like me, really? It is hard to tell. I do not know, and perhaps exactly because I am the supposed pattern, may never know. Self-perception is always reflective, and there has yet to be found a mirror that is not aberrational."

She took a look at Natsuki's amused face and smiled in apology.

"Forgive me, here I am going in circles again when all you needed was a simple 'yes' or 'no'. You know how I fall into these games of mine," she said to the young woman. "If I had to answer simply, Natsuki, I would say tha-"

"Do not," Natsuki interrupted. "Do not answer simply."

Shizuru threw her a bemused look, and the young woman's eyes came alight.

Oh, it always starts from her eyes, Shizuru thought, feeling an airy flutter in her midsection. I love that her smile always starts from her eyes.

"I like it," Natsuki confessed with some humour. "When you-you are very vague and complicated in your answer. I like that you are complicated."

The older woman had to laugh: "I am complicated, eh?"

Natsuki's eyes were laughing too.

"Yes," she said. "It is true."

"And here I thought the truth was simple . "

"Oh, no," Natsuki disagreed. "Truth, it is complicated."

"Do you think so?" the other answered, intrigued by their conversation. "So lies are not complicated?"

"No, lies are simple," the girl said. "They are many but simple."

"Many but simple." She lifted a golden eyebrow at the girl, who looked unshakeably certain. "If so, how is it that so many deceptions end up becoming so complex that they take years, even centuries to unravel? What say you to that, Little Philosopher?"

They were at the door to their room now. Natsuki passed through first and held it open for her. The girl was shutting it when she gave her answer.

"Not little," the Otomeian said mock-proudly, provoking a giggle. "And because many lies are mixed with some truth, I think. And sometimes, the lies, they become truth. It is all simple and also complicated."

Having slid the bolts on the door, she turned around to be surprised by the Himean kissing her forehead very tenderly. She looked up at the older woman with a question.

"Because you pleased me with your paradoxical philosophies," Shizuru explained. "Now, then, I am afraid we must set this aside for now and replace philosophy with fashion for a moment-as so often happens with philosophy these days, it seems." Her eyes were on the cuirass she had set on one of the chairs. "Do assist me in trying it on, would you?"

With Natsuki's help, they were soon able to fit the cuirass properly over her body and tie the straps to hold it there. It was comfortable, Shizuru thought, and yet the maker had managed to stay true to her form, keeping her outline trim without diminishing the piece's functionality. The whole was fashioned out of several smaller plates skilfully attached to each other, arranged in such a way as to permit movement normally hampered by a standard corselet. The joints were tailored very specifically for the wearer, in this case, so it permitted even more flexibility than usual. Shizuru turned this way and that, testing it to see if the comfort would keep even when she bent.

"He made it well," she exhaled in satisfaction as Natsuki watched her. "I doubt even the smiths at Sosia could produce a lorica segmentata of such magnificence! The man does merit his reputation after all."

Natsuki, standing by the bed, agreed.

"Would you like to try it, Natsuki?"

Natsuki's eyes registered surprise.

"No," the young woman said. "No, thank you."

"Ah. A pity. I think this would look very good on you."

"But heavy," Natsuki countered. "And too big for me."

Shizuru considered the girl's form for a second.

Well, that is true, it is too large for her, she decided, imposing the image of the armour on the Otomeian's. Natsuki was extremely slender, even if she was tall as well. She was also unaccustomed to the weight of a metal cuirass. A pity: she would have looked so handsome in it, thought Shizuru.

"Are you certain? I really do think you should try it on first."

Natsuki declined again.

"Too big, too heavy," the girl insisted. "For me."

Up shot Shizuru's eyebrows.

"Are you trying to imply that I am too big and heavy for your taste?" she demanded in false offence. "You should be punished for that."

"No-ooohf!"

Shizuru grinned at the woman she had shoved onto the bed and sat on. Natsuki tried to scowl from beneath her, though with no success.

"You see?" the older woman teased. "I told you this would look very good on you."

"Mmph."

There was muffled laughter as they struggled, ending with the positions reversed and Natsuki on top. She smiled mischievously at Shizuru and whispered in a voice pregnant with humour: "Too big and heavy."

Shizuru laughed.

"Heavy, am I?" she asked, taking revenge by using both arms to push Natsuki's hips upwards easily, lifting the younger woman's midsection in the process. She laughed when the legs atop her bent swiftly with panic, knees touching the bed, and tried to brace Natsuki's body as part of it was held in the air. "Then you are weightless."

The dark brows above her scowled, the Otomeian's lips pouting until Shizuru finally released her hold. They looked at each other as their lower bodies came together again.

"I think you really should eat more, Natsuki," Shizuru said, closing her eyes. "I feel you still weigh too little for your height. You're skinny!"

There was no answer from the young woman above her and she shot a quick glance at the girl's face. Natsuki looked discomfited, she realised, and she decided to change tack. She remembered that she had been mentioning the idea quite often and now worried that the younger woman felt she was nagging. But it was only natural to be concerned, was it not? The girl was so lean, after all, to the point of barely escaping boyishness: while it lent something to her strange and willow-formed appeal, Shizuru knew the girl could stand a little more on her bones. It could not bode well for the girl's future health either that her appetite was so meagre. Natsuki was not a great eater, nor someone who seemed to regard eating as anything other than a necessity for her daily function. Shizuru suspected the girl might even forget to eat on occasion, were she not accompanying her at mealtimes.

"It is not that I find anything displeasing about your body, of course," she said gently. "It is merely that I worry for your vigour in this brutal weather, which comes wretchedly harsh to those of sparing build. I did not mean to be bothersome, Natsuki."

Natsuki shook her head.

"I know," she told Shizuru, getting up on hands and knees so that she put space between their bodies. Shizuru wondered what she was doing, and worried for a second that she intended to get to her feet already. She saw that the Otomeian had other intentions soon enough. A hand went to her chest, fingers tracing the finely-tooled ornamentation of the cuirass. Natsuki was fascinated by it, judging from her countenance.

"Your seal," the young woman said, her fingers on the embossed design at the centre of the breastplate. "This."

"Yes."

"Made for you?"

"Yes."

"You commanded-asked for it? This way?"

"Yes, I ordered it."

"Ohh."

Shizuru smiled at the sigh of wonder, letting the other continue her investigations as she wished. She asked Natsuki if she had ever seen similarly ornate cuirasses before.

"Mm," was the answer. "But different styles. And I have not touched."

"This is your first time to truly inspect one, then?"

"Mm."

"What do you think?"

The travelling fingers paused, deep green eyes coming to her. There was laughter in their depths.

"Heavy," Natsuki said, dropping her head on the metal breast. It shook with the older woman's mirth at the conclusion.

"Oh now, if you keep saying that I shall start to feel like some beached whale," Shizuru said amidst her giggles. "Lumpy and blubber-filled. Ugh. How horrid!"

"Beached whale," Natsuki repeated, before saying suddenly: "I have heard of whales."

That was an odd way to put it.

" Heard of, Natsuki?" she said.

"Sailors talk of them often."

"They do. But you have never seen one?"

The young woman emitted a soft laugh: "Under me, now."

"Be serious," Shizuru said, rapping her with a featherlike tap on the head. Her hand remained on the black locks afterwards. "Although I suppose that I may be called that, in a figurative sense. But about the whales! Do you mean to tell me you have never seen one?"

Natsuki stretched out, crawling upwards to face her.

"No," she said, serious again. "I have."

"Where?"

"Paintings."

"Where else?"

"Only paintings."

"I see." Shizuru thought for a moment. "I suppose it is only natural, since you live away from the open sea. Do you know how to swim?"

"Yes."

"Do you like it?"

The nod was brisk: "Yes."

"Perhaps we should go swimming sometime."

Natsuki was incredulous.

"Not now," she cautioned the older woman. "You will get cold. And sink under the water."

"Only I?" was the teasing answer. "What about you?"

The girl smirked.

"Me?" she said roguishly. "I am not heavy."

"Brat."

The laughed.

"Ah, come," Shizuru said, indicating that she wanted to rise. "Why do we have these sheets of metal between us when we could hold each other better and with fewer obstacles-or better yet, no obstacles at all, save in a few intransigent angles?"

There was a chuckle from the other woman and she continued, "Though I believe that, with a little flexibility, those gaps can be bridged too."

She winked outrageously at the Otomeian, who actually dissolved into red-cheeked and muffled laughter. Her mouth nearly broke from the broadness of a grin, too, at the sight of her often-stoic companion so wracked by hilarity. It was such a delight to see her this way, she thought, acting more like the girl she should have been if not for the contrary machinations of fate.

"Come up and help me take this off, please," she said anyway, laughing too. "You imp, stop it already and help me. Did I look so ridiculous earlier?"

Natsuki paused long enough to affirm it, grinning at her hugely. Shizuru winced in good humour.

"And here I thought I was being irresistible," she muttered, setting them both on a fresh bout of mirth.

Later, they finally paused in their antics long enough to sit up and set about the task. They removed the cuirass carefully, handling it with the reverence of people who appreciated not merely its beauty but its purpose as well. Natsuki set to work draping it over the back of one of the chairs afterwards, and Shizuru watched her from the bed.

"Yes-just so. That should be fine. My thanks, Natsuki," she said, before admiring the object yet again. "I truly am pleased by how well it turned out. I can hardly wait to use that now for one of the parades. Or doff it for a triumph. It is glorious enough to wear at a triumph."

Natsuki was still fussing over the arrangement of the cuirass.

"You will have one," she said, head bent over the chair. "Yes?"

"A triumph Well, yes, but that is still far into the future," Shizuru replied. "I shall not hold the triumph for a while."

It was Natsuki who actually said it for her: "Until you go back home."

Shizuru's head came up.

"Yes, I will have it then," she said in response. "However, that shall not be for a very long time."

Natsuki gave no reply and she continued.

"This campaign shall go on for a good while longer, as you know. So I shall be deferring my triumph for my return. It will be a very long time indeed."

She was not sure if Natsuki's head nodded or it was merely the girl's present task that had conceived the gesture. She was about to call her name when the dusky voice finally spoke.

"It is good."

She stared at her after that, trying to catch the girl's attention but failing as the latter kept her head hanging over the already well-arranged cuirass, to which all her interest seemed to have been directed.

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"It is good," the young woman repeated. "This cuirass is good for your triumph."

"Indeed," Shizuru replied almost impatiently. "As I said, earlier."

"Yes."

"It would suit a triumphing general, I said."

Natsuki's lips, she saw, held a very small smile.

"Very pretty," they told her. "You will be magnificent, Shizuru."

For some reason, the faint sadness in the tone got the Himean to blurt out the words she had been trying to hold back.

"You wish to see it?" she demanded, only slightly horrified by her own temerity. "Natsuki? Would you like to see?"

Natsuki stilled, then raised her head slowly to meet the anxious crimson eyes. Her own eyes seemed to echo their emotion before suddenly glazing over with casual amusement, her lips turning up into a relaxed smile. Shizuru watched the shift with astonishment. It astonished her so much that she quickly forgot that she was astonished by her own question, in fact.

Still, she was not one of Hime's greatest politicians for nothing. Her countenance went bland instead of bothered. A second later, she looked perfectly composed again, having recovered enough to school her face. But Natsuki's expression had set her thoughts in turmoil.

Since when, she was asking, has Natsuki ever needed to put up a mask so earnestly around me?

"I already have seen it," the younger woman was saying in her cool voice and with surprising insensitivity. "Just now, remember? I liked it."

"Yes," Shizuru said.

"I told you it was good," the girl continued. "I already said this. Shizuru, you forget."

They stared at each other. The emerald eyes, still glazed over with that strange, light expression, suddenly twitched, and she knew they would rip away any moment. No, no, do not look away from me. She chanted that in her mind, willing the thoughts to somehow impose on the reality. Despite that, she said nothing until Natsuki had turned around and already started to walk away. It was then that she sprang from her seat and caught the girl's hand, killing off her escape.

Again they stared at each other.

"I do not forget, Natsuki," she said, holding the pale hand firmly, expression saying that she would not let her leave yet. "Is that really what you think?"

A beat, a flicker of fear on Natsuki's face. Shizuru unlocked her hand at the sight.

"Where are you going?" she asked when the girl turned and walked off again. "What is it, Natsuki?"

It was uncharacteristic of her to quiz someone so rapidly, to follow a question so quickly with another. She was aware of that. At the moment, however, she decided she did not care. All her cares had been condensed instead to a single focal point, which was the girl still walking away.

"Natsuki, I asked you a-

She would have gone on had Natsuki not cut her off.

And that, she decided, is out of character too.

"A drink, Shizuru," the younger woman replied, acting strangely calm. "I was to get you a drink."

Shizuru's eyes went to the closet at the other end of the room. That was where the cups and liquor were kept, and that was where Natsuki had been headed.

"You drink always, after we walk," Natsuki was telling her, slipping loose from her slackened hold. Parting from the younger woman's touch felt like tearing off her own skin. "You will not take a drink now?"

"A drink?"

"A drink."

Shizuru looked at her and saw the calmness of her face, the unnatural lack of emotion in those large green eyes. Too much strangeness, and far too quickly. What to do? Shizuru weighed the matter in a series of near-instantaneous calculations, trying to figure out what would be best to do in this situation. Eventually, she sighed to herself and judged it was better to let it pass for now, at least until she understood better what was going on here and what Natsuki was feeling. Or hiding, for that matter.

"Yes," she said. "Of course. I shall drink, if you would be kind enough to get something for me."

"Wine? Water?"

Shizuru's eyes went to the closet nearby, where they kept the wine. There was an excellent Falernian there, and a jug of Chian so fine it would have made an Epicure weep. The decision seemed easy.

"Wine, if you please."

Natsuki mumbled agreement.

"The Chian one, Natsuki."

"I will get."

"Thank you."

Shizuru watched her step away, conscious of a sense of anticlimax. She had finally broached a topic, after all, that had caused her so much conflicted introspection for so long. It was only natural she should expect something more dramatic! The situation had seemed to lead to that, right before Natsuki veered it away and into duller channels.

Could Natsuki be afraid of it too, she asked silently, stepping backwards in order to perch on the bed. It was understandable if that was the case, and perhaps even expected. It was such a frightening topic! Yet she had not really given a thought to Natsuki's uncertainties about it before now, so saddled had she been by her own doubts. Now she saw just how far they had ridden her, for she was surprised by her selfishness. How could she have forgotten that Natsuki too would have her own opinions on the matter?

"Pour yourself a drink as well, Natsuki, if you want one," she said aloud, while pondering. "I know wine is not really your preferred beverage, especially not unwatered wine, so you should feel free to take what you wish."

The girl went on with her task. She was pouring wine from a decanter to the ornate cup she had set on the table. Shizuru watched the stream of blood-like fluid as it rushed out, steadier but also slower than her own racing thoughts.

If she is avoiding the topic, that may mean several things, she decided, unable to get out of her mind the image of the girl slipping on a facade. It had been so unexpected! She had seen Natsuki put on the mask of sombreness before and the mask of indifference, too-but never the mask of ignorance. Not like the girl to dodge a hit without countering, but she had done that this time, and had even run away after it! What could be the reason for that? What did that indicate and what did it possibly mean?

A sigh.

Getting ahead of herself again, was she not? She should actually be thankful that Natsuki had stopped her earlier. Otherwise, a supposed resolution to that problem might have been forced without having been given sufficient thought-and this needed a good deal of thought indeed. This was something that required great insight, much planning. It was a decision that would require a person's full conviction, and when the time came for her to make it, she would give it all of hers. But not now, when she knew so little about what Natsuki felt still.

Now is not yet the time, she judged, accepting the cup being offered to her. Now was far too early, when there was still so much to be done and so much left to run its course. Better to take the reprieve Natsuki had granted so kindly and deal with the things that had to take place first. It was necessary to do so before she could rule on how to handle that other, later problem. And she would. Gods bear witness, she would handle it.

"I am sorry."

The word pushed her gently out of her considerations, and she looked up to find Natsuki's head before her, the long curtain of dark hair hiding most of her face.

"Natsuki?"

"I am sorry I was slow," Natsuki repeated. "With your wine."

"Oh, not at all," Shizuru said, reaching up with her other hand and brushing the fall of black hair. It was comforting that Natsuki did not flinch at the touch. "Forgive me, Natsuki, I was thinking about some tasks and my mind wandered. You were not slow at all, so please look up. I need no such obeisance from you, you know. Never from you."

The next second showed her the rosiness of the girl's skin. She made Natsuki sit next to her.

"Excuse my lapse," she said. "You shall not drink?"

The other shook her head.

"I see. If you would like a sip of my wine, however, simply tell me."

A nod this time. Unexpectedly, a few raps on the door intruded on the silence, and she looked that way with a little irritation. Natsuki was already on her feet, however, indicating she would see who it was.

"Thank you, Natsuki," she said. Suddenly she smiled. "Oh, I think it may be the map I ordered made. I asked the legates to have it sent to me today."

She was right. Natsuki returned with the map, the two of them alone again, and they spread it out on the table to peruse. Shizuru stared at it intently, inscribing a faithful rendition of the relative distances and locations in her memory for future reference.

Lucent green eyes fringed by charcoal lashes studied her as she did this. As far as those green eyes were concerned, the change in the woman was patent. Gone was the uncertain, subtly disquieted Shizuru of before, replaced by the woman of unshakeable assurance. She was back to being The General, which still sat more comfortably with her experience than being The Lover.

"Have you been to these areas or near them, Natsuki?" asked the Himean. Her forefinger traced the map where a river delineated the beginning of Mentulaean territory. When Natsuki answered affirmatively, she went on. "How wide is the river? Would it require only a simple bridge or a grand one?"

Natsuki opted for the latter.

"But," she added, "there is a near bridge. Further up, Shizuru."

"Yes, I see that," Shizuru answered. "This is merely a provision, in the event that I should need to cross here."

The girl blinked at the spot the finger was tapping.

"Near the mountain?" she said. "It is bad land for marches. Rugged and ridged."

"Yes, I know. Even so."

"But why?"

"Because no one shall be expecting it."

There was an instant during which it was apparent that Natsuki was thinking on it, debating the merit of the notion. Another instant and she was smiling at Shizuru, who actually had to grip one hand above a knee to dispel the intense urge it produced in her. The Otomeian was not a person who smiled often, at least not in the sense of smiling with her teeth shown. She smiled close-lipped smiles, secretive and enigmatic ones, so when she actually did flash her teeth as others would, it often knocked the breath out of whoever was facing her. Shizuru could attest to that, as could several others fortunate enough to have seen it. Little did the smitten Himean general know, but at least one legate and a couple of centurions had been dreaming about her companion for the past few weeks. It was a result of having accidentally witnessed one of these rare smiles-which had actually been directed to the general herself.

"You do things like that," the young woman was telling her. "Really like a snake."

Shizuru inhaled luxuriously: "Striking with surprise, you mean?"

"Yes. And very fast."

"Well, those are indispensable to good generalship," came the response. "Swiftness and surprise. Many a battle have I won with them."

"Good."

"You approve?" Shizuru asked, amused.

"You win." She lifted a brow. "Hard not to approve."

They laughed.

"True enough." Shizuru returned to the map. "Well, I have this down by now. I think I shall call a muster for my personal inspection soon, to check that my centurions have not been idle. Although, from our frequent trips to the barracks, I should think they have been following my orders."

"To drill and to drill," Natsuki recited, remembering Shizuru's directives.

"And after that, to drill even more," Shizuru finished, chuckling. "Oh, they should be tough as nails! Most of them are veterans, but some of them are serving under me for the first time, so I wish them to be accustomed to it as early as now. My soldiers have to wear out the drill field before they even step on the battleground."

She threw the dark-haired woman an inquisitive glance.

"Your troopers seem to be well-drilled too, Natsuki," she said, tipping her head. "Do you drill them yourself? I think I have failed to ask you this before, but I have always been curious about it. You have a second-in-command, yes?"

"Kyo, yes."

"The man you instructed Nina to tell to report today."

"Yes." A lock of hair fell over Natsuki's right eye and she brushed it away. "Kyo is second. But there are more. Like your centurions."

"Ah! I expected as much. How many subordinate officers do you have in your division?"

"Ten."

"Since you have about an ala and a half in your division, would that mean each one is assigned seventy warriors? Are they divided equally among the commanders?"

"Yes. One officer for seventy troopers."

"Very neat. And they all report to you?"

"Yes. Or to Kyo, when I am not present."

"And he reports to you. I see." A curious glint came to the rusty eyes. "Do you ever find insubordination to be a problem? Or failure to carry out orders to satisfaction?"

Natsuki actually laughed.

"No," she said, eyes dancing with mirth.

Interesting reaction, thought the older woman. Now what could be behind it?

"You have penalties for it," she guessed. "Severe ones?"

"Severe, yes," the other confirmed.

"How severe?"

"You die."

Up came her chin.

"Do you mean," she asked, "that it is always death, Natsuki? Regardless of the relative weight of the infraction?"

Natsuki shook her head.

"No, not always death," she said. "But very often death. If the leader-me, for example-if I want to kill the one who is insubordinate or a disappointment, I can. My choice if I want to kill, and the troopers' choices to support me."

Shizuru's eyes narrowed.

"And have you?" she asked. "Killed someone for those things?"

"Yes."

There was a short, though not awkward silence.

"I see," Shizuru said.

And she quickly returned their conversation to other matters.

"Ah, Chikane-chan, there you are!"

Chikane Himemiya whipped her head around to find her wife sprinting at a dangerous clip down the east corridor leading to their atrium-in which room she herself presently was. Her eyes flicked down even as the woman charged forth, her gaze noting the step that Himeko would be sure to miss at the rate she was going. Sparing no time for second thoughts, Chikane strode forwards and held out her arms just as the other woman fulfilled the prediction and made the misstep, her momentum propelling her into the tall woman's arms. Chikane was just able to see the purple eyes widen in surprise before blonde tresses covered her sight, her body absorbing the impact of the other woman's landing.

She herself was laughing.

"Oh, Himeko," she said afterwards, only half-chidingly. "I do wish we would meet in less exciting ways."

Her wife, now quite stable standing on her own, produced a sheepish giggle. They stepped away from each other and exchanged grins, one mischievous and the other embarrassed.

"I'm so sorry," Himeko said, somewhat red in the cheeks for all that this was a common occurrence. "Did I hurt you? I'm just so clumsy, Chikane-chan."

"As long as it causes you to fall into my arms, I have no complaints," the other replied playfully, her mind going to the one time that condition had not been met. It was when she had failed to catch the other woman after another misstep, despite all efforts to the achievement. That had been during their trip to her seaside villa, when Himeko had made another kind of trip while descending a staircase. Chikane had also tried to catch the other woman that time, but Himeko had somehow managed to alter trajectory mid-fall, just enough to propel her to the space by Chikane's side instead of Chikane's arms. It had been a spectacular miss, she had to admit. Who would have thought someone could change direction mid-fall, like that?

A good thing she was only a couple of steps away from the bottom, Chikane reflected. Had it been otherwise, her wife might have gained more than a few nasty bruises from that strange accident. Chikane herself had sustained a small bruise to her ego afterwards, although it was a bruise she laughed at even now. She had looked such a fool with her hands held out that way and so uselessly! Remembrance of it always made her laugh. Although she supposed it would be a little harder to laugh had there actually been someone else there to see them. But then, that was a secondary consideration. What came first was that Himeko was fine.

"What is it you are holding there?" she asked, looking at the very woman in her thoughts. "You did not even let go of it during your fall, so I profess myself immensely curious as to what could be so important."

"Oh!" Himeko lifted the scrolls she had in hand, and Chikane found herself having to hold back a smile again as she thanked the gods that one of them had not poked her in the eye. "It's why I was looking for you, Chikane-chan."

"Letters for me?"

"Yes," and then a little breathlessly: "From Argus."

That was news indeed! The fine, coal-black brows shot up.

"My, my," she said calmly, offering her palm. "Arrived just now?"

"Yes. I ran as soon as they got here."

"Indeed you did, Himeko. Thank you for that, though you need not make such haste next time."

Himeko handed them to her and they turned in unison, heading for one of the well-padded couches nearby.

"One of them is from Suou-chan," the fair-haired woman explained to her while taking a seat. "And the other one has Shi-chan's seal."

Chikane had already noted the seals before, so she had no need for Himeko to tell her that. Still, she thanked her wife for the observations and bade her take a seat on the same couch, drawing her close by placing a hand on the woman's waist.

"Then let us see what they contain," she said, holding both scrolls in one long-fingered hand. Himeko watched her as she set one aside and began opening the other. She stopped abruptly when Himeko emitted a small squeak of surprise.

"What is it?" she asked, pausing from completely breaking the seal. "Are you all right, Himeko?"

Himeko stared at her guiltily.

"I'm sorry, Chikane-chan," she said, lifting her head from where it had been resting against Chikane's shoulder. "I just thought you'd open Shizuru-chan's first."

Blue eyes regarded her.

"Is that what you would like me to do?" Chikane asked, beginning to put away the scroll she had been about to open, to replace it with the other one. Himeko shook her head agitatedly, stopping the dark-haired woman's hand with her own.

"No, no, Chikane-chan," she said, looking her wife in the eye. "No, it's just-I thought that was what you'd do. I was surprised, that's all. I really don't mind which one goes first."

Chikane released a breath.

"How well you know me!" she said, her smile widening. "I would normally have wanted to open Shizuru's first, I admit it. But I decided to open Suou's, this time, since it is shorter. And there is another thing."

"What is it?"

"I expect to find a description of Shizuru herself in Suou's latest letter," she said. "I did ask for one, after all, in my last missive to Suou. So one serves as a prelude to the other."

Himeko laughed: "An opener, Chikane-chan?"

The patrician smiled back.

"Yes, well," she said. "It does enhance the flavour of the following act."

"Is it a tragedy or a comedy?"

The deep blue eyes lit up.

"Oh, that is such an accurate metaphor! Well done, Love!"

Her wife blushed furiously from the compliment. Raised in an unmentionable social class, Himeko had never been trained in rhetoric or been given proper tuition in the usual subjects. Yet, Chikane had noticed, she had a natural feel for verbal imagery, perhaps because she was a painter or creator of images too. As such, the patrician had been encouraging her to apply this talent not only to her paintings but also to her speech, persuading her to employ metaphors freely whenever they came. While reluctant at first, Himeko had eventually warmed to the practice-which was only to be expected. After all, if you lived with one generally acknowledged to be among the best rhetoricians alive, it was impossible not to slide into a love for rhetorical devices too at some point.

The amateur rhetorician now dropped her eyes, fair lashes sweeping over a prism of violet.

"You're worried too, Chikane-chan," she remarked gently. "About that thing with Shi-chan, right?"

The raven-haired woman pinned her wife with a gaze.

"Are you, Himeko?" she asked.

A nod.

"You should not be."

The heliotrope stare asked the question.

"Whatever grains have been insinuating themselves into the mechanisms of our plan will only ever be that," Chikane answered coolly, her words ringing with the constancy of her own confidence. "They may irritate for a second, but they are still only grains. Shizuru and I are perfectly capable of grinding them down in our mill."

She opened her eyes to find her wife's staring at her with fierce admiration and had to smile at it. It was always nice to know that your spouse thought so highly of you.

"Go on, Chikane-chan," her wife urged, smiling too. "Read your letter."

Chikane complied and broke the seal completely, unfurling the scroll that had come from her sister. Her eyes darted over the lines so quickly it seemed she was not actually reading it; yet, the woman resting against her shoulder knew she was taking in all the contents. It would not be long, the fair-haired woman knew, for Chikane Himemiya was another prodigiously swift reader-nearly as swift a reader as Shizuru Fujino, in fact. And indeed, hardly any time seemed to have passed before the scroll was rolled up again.

Himeko looked at her wife.

"How is it, Chikane-chan?" she asked, knowing the expression on her spouse's face very well. "What's going on now?"

Chikane smiled and it was a complex smile.

"What is going on, Himeko," she sighed, "is that the lady Tomoe Marguerite has been riding for a fall."

Chapter 34

Vocabulaire:

1. Auctoritas - Very roughly defined, one's public standing and clout.

2. Calends - The first of the three fixed points of a Roman (Himean) month. The days of the month were not named or given numbers, save for these three points. The Calends is always the first day of each month (e.g. the Calends of January = January 1). Along with the other two fixed points (the Nones and the Ides), it was considered a sacred day. Note that dates were reckoned backwards from the three fixed points.

3. Domina - "Mistress" or "Madam".

Twelve days before the Calends of January, Chikane Himemiya was apprised of her best friend's alleged contestation in the elections. Before the midnight drip of the chronometer fell on that day, Chikane had sent off an urgent letter to that friend. She entrusted it to one of her best men, whom she also entrusted with one of her best steeds. Her directions were short but specific: ride hard, change your mount as soon as necessary, eat on the saddle if you must, but stop for nothing or no one. The man, upon receiving these orders, nodded firmly to show he understood. He knew that were his mistress not too genteel for such language, she might even have told him to simply shoot from the saddle to urinate. As it was, she had no need to tell him such a thing. Those serious blue eyes spoke for themselves.

Impressed with the gravity of his task, the man carried out the orders to the letter. He rode hard, then rode even harder. He changed his mount as soon as he felt it flag in stride, asked only for the best and fastest horses when making the trade. He even ate on the saddle sometimes-although he still did stop to relieve himself properly. Thus, even with the trouble of the snow on the passes, he still managed to reach his destination an exact month after his departure, twelve days before the Calends of February. Very good time indeed. His mistress would be pleased.

He was welcomed very warmly, for he bore letters of importance not merely for the general of the northern army but also for many of her officers. Chikane, in a gesture of thoughtfulness, had sent out couriers to the correspondents or relatives of some of the other officers, thinking that they might wish to send (short and hastily-scribbled) letters as well. Hence her courier bore somewhere around twenty scrolls in his bags, aside from the two meant for Shizuru, to be duly sent to their respective destinations. Most of the scrolls were not overlong given the circumstances in which they had been produced, so they did not trouble the courier with their weight. Of this the courier assured the senior legate of Shizuru Fujino's army, handing over his burden to the woman.

"You have one too, Harada-san," he said, pointing to a thick scroll sealed sloppily with wax.

She smiled, knowing the reason for that sloppiness, and thanked him.

"You're winded, I'd think," she told him, still grinning at the man from across the table. A letter from Aoi! As far as she was concerned, this man deserved all the good treatment they could give. "And your steed too. Have some more wine."

She refilled his cup, and he thanked her before draining it swiftly.

"Thanks very much, Legate, and sorry for the quickness in putting it away," he said, bowing his head with deference. He had impeccable manners for a mere slave, Chie thought, before smiling to herself at the thought. Of course he would have impeccable manners: he was of Himemiya's household. "It's the journey that's taken its toll. I was about parched."

"I understand. Come, have some more then."

He stopped her before she could refill it again: "No, please. I'm thankful for your kindness. But I should be going."

She stared. "Why, you can't be getting back on the saddle already!"

"Oh, no. I meant I should be going to lie down a bit, actually, Legate- I haven't slept more than four hours in two days." He grinned at her shock. "And that poor horse! Got to see if it's not dead yet."

"We'll replace it for you, if it's still too worn out when you have to leave."

"Domina said I should wait for the general's reply, Legate."

"Ah!" A pleased look. "Then that means I can send back too, if I finish in time."

"If you'll not take longer than a day after the general is finished, Legate, I'll wait," he offered, to her delight. She reached into her pouch to slip a couple of denarii into his hand, whereupon he beamed with pleasure.

"I'll try not to make you wait at all, My Good Man," she said, rising from her desk.

He followed suit and they went to the door. She called out to someone.

"Find him a decent place to stay," she directed to the aide who answered her summons, looking over her shoulder and at the bags on her table. "Don't forget to tend to his horse, eh, if he's not ridden it to death yet? Send Akiko to me, too."

"Right away, Legate."

"Do you know where the general is, by any chance?"

"I heard one of the passing soldiers say they saw her near the cavalry camp, I think."

"Right. I think I'll go there myself, then." She nodded to both men.
"Go on, please, and don't let me keep you."

She returned to the table, eager to open her letter. She knew she could not do so, however, until she had delivered that of her general's. She just had to think of the interval as a way of sweetening her pleasure in that letter later, honing her eagerness for it now. She was not always opposed to delayed gratification .

"You sent for me, Harada-san?"

It was Akiko, another of her aides.

"Yes," she said, looking up from the scrolls on the table. "Get someone to help you, Akiko, and deliver these letters to wherever they're headed. I'll take these, though." She picked up the letters for Shizuru, both sealed properly and very neatly. "And I'll bring them to the general myself. Do you know where she is?"

"They said she was headed to the cavalry camp."

"Sure about that?"

"I'm sure I heard the tribunes say it, Harada-san." The brown-haired young woman frowned thoughtfully. "I can send someone to check."

"No, it's fine." She picked up her scroll, resolving to read it the very second she had handed over the ones meant for Shizuru. "Get a horse ready for me, will you? I'll ride out to the cavalry camp."

"Right away. You'll be going unattended?"

"Unattended." Her face lit up further as a piece of flowery imagery found its way to her tongue. "I think I can find the golden girl and her sultry shadow myself."

She did find them herself, and as easily as she had expected. The general was known by all of the auxiliaries, and the same was true of the general's bodyguard. Hard not to spot that golden, smiling individual even from a distance, with the black-haired, ice-white personality prowling next to it. All one had to do was look or ask those who had looked: when the first method failed, Chie took recourse in the latter. Since so many were always looking at the pair in question, she was not short of sources.

It was in the stables set aside for the Otomeian officers that she discovered them. The pair was in discussion about one of the horses there: an enormous white beast with a handsomely roman face and subtly dappled lower legs. The dapples were stipples of palest grey starting from the hooves and fading gradually near the knee, so that the horse's legs actually looked bluish at the bottom before turning a pure white in a gradient rising to the top. Chie sized up the unusually coloured animal with an appreciative mumble.

"Gorgeous, of course," she remarked, peering over the stall: the other two women were inside. "I've never seen that kind of colouring before-or, at least, not with such smoothness. The dapples are so small they're almost invisible. The blending of the coat colours is superb."

"That is exactly what I was telling her," Shizuru said. "Do you not think it makes him seem like something born straight out of a glacier, Chie-han?"

"That's a good way to describe it," the legate answered, still marvelling at the beast's strange colour. "A pure white horse is showy enough, but this one is even more eye-catching. He does look like he's made of ice. Is he yours, Natsuki-san?"

The young woman she had addressed looked up, being in a crouch so as to inspect the horse's enormous hoof. She rose to her feet at Chie's query and shook her head.

Shizuru made a sound of surprise.

"But you said that it was one of your horses," she accused the girl, to Chie's bemusement. "Why are you saying otherwise now, Natsuki? Did I misunderstand you earlier?"

The girl placed a hand gently on the horse's muscled neck and stroked it. It nickered with obvious enjoyment, and then whinnied to her.

"It was mine," she said to Shizuru in her dusky, mellifluous tones. "Now, I give to you."

Chie brought up a hand to cover her smile as their general stared at the Otomeian.

"You give-but why, Natsuki?" Shizuru asked, seeming puzzled by the girl's largesse. Aware of how rude her words might have sounded, she amended them the next second. "I am grateful for the thought, of course. Immensely so. But this is such a handsome steed, and I feel you would surely have more need of it than I, being not only head of a cavalry division but part of a horse people. You cannot truly mean to give away such an animal, Child. He is worth a small fortune, I can see it myself. Would it not be better for you to keep him, especially as you are also in a better position to make good use of him?"

Natsuki's head moved. It was not a great movement. How she managed it, Chie did not know, but all of a sudden her eyes were woeful though the rest of her face was still as stone.

"No?" she said, seeming-but not actually sounding-crestfallen. "Shizuru, you... do not want?"

Again Chie had to cover her mouth, but this time to stop a full-blown cackle: Shizuru- Note the lack of an honorific! -looked stricken.

"I do, of course I want him," the stricken one exclaimed, suddenly all too eager to accept the gift. "I merely hesitated because I was embarrassed to accept something so beautiful, and part of me did want him so much that it rather compounded my embarrassment. Forgive me, Natsuki, for my awkwardness. If you truly wish to make a present of him to me, I promise to treasure him from now on."

The green eyes were no longer mournful, just like that. Chie, suppressing another laugh, had to wonder if the girl understood just what she had done and how she had done it. Did the mysterious Natsuki know how to control Shizuru Fujino now, or had that been executed unconsciously? Oh, yes, one just had to wonder.

"I give you, then," the Otomeian said, to settle the matter. "His name is Albinus . But you can change."

Both Himeans smiled.

"Whitish," Chie said, interpreting the name's meaning. "It suits him, all right. I'd keep the name, wouldn't you, Shizuru-san?"

"Absolutely. Albinus it is."

Natsuki nodded, the very slight curl of her lips showing immediately that she was pleased. She said nothing to further express her pleasure, though. The senior legate thought that was very like her.

"Albinus, eh?"

Chie breathed in deeply, inhaling the odours of horse and hay, the scent of dung like a low whisper beneath them. She did not wince at the smells; her nasal apparatus was familiar with such scents on campaign by now, and she actually liked horses enough to consider the odours pleasantly fragrant in a way. Besides which, she had always believed that if you could put up with that dreadfully malodorous military article called the sagum -the leathery wool cape used by all Himean legionaries during wet weather-then you could put up with any other stink and consider it sweet-smelling by comparison. A good, well-used sagum had all the bouquet of the vilest odours gone wrong, with the added improvement of having been left to rot and ripen a few days in the sun.

Which makes one wonder how this one can put up with it, she thought slyly, looking at the woman she suspected of buying a new sagum for every campaign and coating each one in fragrances when not in use, to keep the odours down. Jupiter knows Shizuru-san has an obsession about smelling sweet and clean all the time.

"I agree, though," she said, after an exhalation that misted her sight for a second. "That's a lovely horse you've just given away there, Natsuki-san. He really is worth a fortune, isn't he?"

The young woman looked proud. This time, she also answered verbally.

"Yes, he is," she said to the senior legate. "Thank you."

"Your horses really are so big. I still can't get over the size of them." Chie's gaze went to the next stall, where Natsuki's familiar black stallion stood, its arrogant dark head over the stall and leaning yearningly towards its owner. "Handsome stock you have, your division's troopers and the cataphracts. I'll bet the Mentulaean horsemen slaver after your animals."

The Otomeian smirked.

"Their horses are small," she told the two. "Nothing but nags."

"Especially compared to ones like this," Shizuru put in, now stroking the mane of her new horse. She held out a palm to let the horse sniff at it, its nostrils flaring. "Compared to Albinus. Here, Albinus."

She offered the beast a carrot, which had been passed to her by her bodyguard. Albinus took it and chomped happily. The black horse in the next stall regarded him with dark-eyed envy and pushed its head further over the stall wall. Natsuki gave the animal a carrot too, to propitiate it.

"I know troopers regularly have two horses, Natsuki-san, but I admit I was beginning to think you had only one," said Chie, frowning as she watched the animals chew on their treats. "I thought it was only that black one."

"I have more," Natsuki replied. "But Niger I ride most."

"Albinus looks like a regular war horse too, though."

"Yes. Sometimes, I use him." She looked at Shizuru. "Now, you can use him. He is right for you."

Shizuru was about to reply when Chie interrupted.

"Right for her?" she said curiously, repeating the young woman's words. "How do you mean, right? Do you mean the colour?"

Natsuki looked at her as though the answer should be obvious.

"Yes, and, too," she replied. "For Shizuru, it must be a great horse."

Both Himeans felt their mouths twitch. Shizuru was the one to speak first.

"One wonders how I manage to merit the majesty of 'a great horse'," she said with a self-deprecating smile.

Natsuki looked pointedly at her.

"Your legs," the Otomeian said. "Very long. Not for you, little horses or nags. Or donkeys. Not good to have long legs and ride little donkeys."

The listening Chie paused to imagine it: Shizuru astride a donkey . Shizuru, with her very long legs dangling down the sides of the animal like paddles . Absurd!

She brought up her cloak quickly to muffle the guffaw. All that did was to dampen its clarity, though, for she continued convulsing in the folds of the material, oblivious to the dry glare Shizuru was giving her. The fair-haired woman turned to Natsuki, whose mouth was trembling from the heroic effort of preserving her gravity.

"I thank you for being so protective of my image, meum mel," she said dryly. "And in front of this one too, no less."

Chie waved a hand in the air as though trying to bat her amusement away. Truth be told, she was brushing away the outrageous image that had come to her mind just moments earlier.

"I'm sorry for that, Shizuru-san," she said to her friend, who did not really look offended. "You'll have to admit you'd look a sight, though. That's what you call a smashing mismatch."

"One might imagine the same of you. You are not short yourself."

"No, actually, it's my torso that's long, so my legs wouldn't look as odd then." She shrugged charmingly, as though that imperfection mattered not a whit to her. "Besides, why would I ride a donkey?"

"For the experience, I suppose?" Shizuru offered. "Might I ask what brings you riding over here, by the way? I assume you wanted something more than to talk about horses and mules."

"Oh, Jupiter! Now I've just about forgotten the reason I came to find you. What a fool..." Chie reached into her pouch as the other two made their way out of Albinus' stall. They shut and locked it behind them. "Here you go, Shizuru-san. Fresh from the saddle."

The crimson eyes grew wide.

"Why, finally!" she cried, taking the two scrolls meant for her. "Dated?"

"Twelve days before the Calends of January. An exact month past."

"Still faster than expected, especially given that it is winter. I gather from your remark, of course, that this travelled overland?"

"Yes. The gales are still blowing stiff, so no ships coming up from the south yet." Chie scuffed her boot on a bit of hay scattered over the ground, and showed Shizuru her own scroll with a wide grin. The younger woman returned the expression. "I have you to thank for this, you know. And Himemiya, of course."

The hint fell into place immediately: "Do you mean to say that this mail is not from the usual couriers?"

"Yes. It was carried by Himemiya's man. He was blown, just like his horse," Chie replied. "A good fellow. He got here in less time than even Himemiya would have expected, I think. A good thing, since he said she did give him instructions to be quick about getting those letters to you here."

The lean, more-handsome-than-beautiful face took on a pensive expression and Chie nodded at the scrolls in Shizuru's hand: "Something important there, Shizuru-san. I think you'd best read it now and think on your answer."

"Ahh," Shizuru said comprehendingly. "It requires an answer."

"The courier's been tasked to wait for you." Chie looked at her with humour. "Try not to be too quick about it, would you, or at least let it stand a day? I think that man could use some rest, and there's my own return letter to consider."

She half-turned, ready to go. Shizuru's lilting voice stopped her.

"Forgive me, but I meant to trouble you for a few more moments, Chie-han," the fair woman said. "So in this sense, I actually consider it fortuitous that you should have sought me out."

Chie stiffened. Anyone could guess that the coming conversation had to be something serious to be given priority over a matter as urgent as that letter in Shizuru's hands-and Chie already knew exactly how serious the coming topic was.

Which still did not make her ready for it.

Shizuru, sensing the other woman's apprehension, cut to the quick.

"Yes," she said gently, in answer to the unspoken question. "I have heard of it."

Chie raked a hand through her short and waving hair.

"I think it's best discussed with prudence," the legate finally said.

Shizuru angled her head slightly. Chie responded with a helpless gesture-though she did not go so far as to flick her eyes towards the young woman behind her friend; that would have been too obvious. Then again, perhaps it was her very avoidance of such an act that made the hint obvious too.

"Shall it be long?" Shizuru asked.

"Maybe and maybe not."

"Depending on?"

The soft brown eyes gleamed.

"I suppose on how you take it," came the reply.

"Natsuki."

The girl looked their way; she had been engrossed in playing with the two horses, both of whom still nudged their huge heads at her and tried to get the upper hand in her attentions. She had a hand in either beast's mane, being the sort of master who often strove to be fair. She released both of them in answering Shizuru's call, and the two animals blew through their nostrils, fussing at being abandoned.

"Would you be amenable to letting me take Albinus for a canter round the pen?" She was referring to the fenced-in area some of the other troopers used to practise or sometimes break in young horses. She offered the girl a smile. "I would like to try him out now, if you would allow it."

A short while later, Chie found herself back on her horse and clopping along to Albinus' long-legged gait as they moved easily around the pen. Privately, she thought it a wonder that there was no one else there. It was a fine winter morning, clear of sky and fresh of air. The sea-scented breeze stirred their hair into ribbons, just as it did their horse's manes .

"I don't mind this at all," she said, looking up at the other woman's profile. Albinus was so large that he had a huge advantage over Chie's own mount, and so it showed in the heads of the riders, all the more as Shizuru was already the much taller woman. "But I have to say I expected you to simply take me aside or send her a way off, while we talked in the stables."

She pointed her chin at the open ground before them, which was interrupted by the far-off fence. That was where the general's bodyguard was perched, watching them.

"This is a pretty interesting ruse," she said.

"Not entirely a ruse," the other replied, body swaying effortlessly to the rhythm of the horse's movements. "I did want to try out Albinus, Chie-han."

"And how is he?"

"As expected, splendid. The Otomeians breed and train their horses with great care, and the same may be said of Natsuki."

"She is one of 'the Otomeians', after all," Chie reminded smoothly.

"Yes. Of course." The rusty eyes, lids half-lowered because of the angle, slanted downwards to look at Chie. "Might I learn now for what you deemed it necessary to remove Natsuki's presence?"

"Because it has something to do with her."

"Ah!" The softly uttered exclamation was accompanied by two uplifted brows. "Natsuki?"

"Yes."

"We are talking about the same matter, are we not?"

Chie permitted a small smile.

"I'd like to think so, General," she said, using the title to indicate her deference to the younger woman in this matter. "But we can't be too sure unless one of us says it."

There was an acquiescent nod.

"Then, permit me to be the one to do so," the fairer woman said, still guiding her horse quietly around the track in a canter. "What is this I hear about one of the rankers being flogged?"

Chie sighed, conscious of both a sense of reprieve and a sinking feeling, like someone who had just made it to the shore from a shipwreck only to contend with the possibility of pools of quicksand littering the beach. She had known from the moment Shizuru had detained her earlier that this was the matter on both their minds. Nonetheless, she could not help having wished that she was wrong, that Shizuru had other things about which to talk. Anything other than this, perhaps, was preferable.

But it would have led back to it eventually, right?

Of course it had been wishful thinking on her part, to hope that the general would not catch wind of it. What was that Nao said to her, once? That the woman could detect even the puff from an ant breaking wind when the wind encroached on her territory? But then this was no mere insect expelling gases from one end of its alimentary canal. This was a serious thing, a Himean being put under the lash. Flogging, while accepted as part of the military's punitive code, was always a grave matter. It was telling of their culture's perspective on flogging that only slaves, among non-military members of Himean society, could be flogged. Regular citizens not presently under military service could not actually be put under the whip.

"Yes, it's true," she finally admitted to her friend, who knew all these things too. "One of them was flogged by order of a centurion."

"Flogged."

"Yes."

An interval of silence. Chie knew her friend was still weighing the idea-and impressing its weight on her, too, through that silent consideration. The younger woman had always been proud of her army's discipline: Shizuru Fujino, everyone knew, ran a very tight army. There had never been a need for her to flog any of her soldiers, never before any infraction so grave that it necessitated such humiliation. For it was humiliation, a flaying not merely of a man's back but also of his dignitas. This was a first for Shizuru's people, and hence something to be considered.

"In my army."

Chie did not cringe, although she knew someone lesser would be doing that by now. She merely said "yes" again in her most collected tone.

"At whose behest?" Shizuru demanded lightly.

"Nao's."

"Nao-han?" The bright eyes bled surprise. "She ordered it?"

"Yes."

"Was it from her century?"

"No, but from her legion." As superior primipilus of the legion, the red-haired woman had the right to claim seniority over the other centurions and their centuries. "She had the man's centurion execute the punishment, though."

"For?"

"Unbecoming conduct."

Shizuru sighed.

"Oh, Chie-han," she said almost resignedly. "Tell me already, do."

Chie sucked in her breath.

"Unbecoming conduct and speech touching on the person of a superior officer," she stated, obeying the order to reveal what she knew. She slid her eyes reluctantly up to Shizuru. "Specifically, the most superior officer."

The younger woman looked stunned. Oh, thought Chie, I see what she's thinking.

"No, no-it was not disaffection to you," she soothed immediately, watching the alarm in the red eyes subside slowly and with great reprieve. Shizuru had always enjoyed the unquestionable loyalty of her soldiers, so disaffection was anathema to her. "I wouldn't credit that ever happening to your army, Shizuru-san! But. It's complicated."

"How so?"

"As I said, it has to do with Natsuki-san."

The tawny-haired woman produced a mirthless smile.

"I am all ears," Shizuru invited. "To hear about this complication."

Chie removed a hand from the reins and brought it up to rub her aching neck. As expected, Shizuru's guard started to rise once it came to Natsuki. Best to do this carefully, as she had planned.

"Let me see," she said. "I think I'd better start from the beginning."

"That is generally a fine place from which to begin," Shizuru replied mildly, though with a less ironic smile than before.

"Nao caught the man declaiming, er, improper things to the others in the barracks," she commenced. "Mind you, she said that if it had only been a small gathering, she might've let him go with a few slaps. As it turned out, there were quite a few people present there, and she found that aggravating the breach. One saboteur or demagogue is all it takes, she said."

Shizuru inclined her head, indicating that she should go on.

"What Nao found objectionable in the soldier's declamations were some remarks," Chie continued cautiously. "Which he made about your relationship with Natsuki-san."

The angle of the head changed; Shizuru was staring keenly at her now. It made one wonder, Chie thought fitfully, whether it had been the mention of her own involvement or the one about her paramour's to provoke such undivided attention. Chie was more than willing to wager that it was the latter.

"What of my relationship with Natsuki?" Shizuru enquired. "He saw it in a negative light, I suppose?"

The senior legate grimaced and answered positively. On the other hand, the other woman's serene expression could have been carved by Praxiteles himself. More and more unnerving!

"What was said?"

Another grimace. Chie had been dreading this part the most-although, to be honest, an intrigue-loving part of her had been looking forward to it too, and for the same reason that the greater part of her felt dread. How would Shizuru react to this? One never knew with such a woman, and perhaps that was what bred curiosity there.

Let us hope that trait does not kill the cat today, Chie told herself before answering the query.

"It was argued that your liaison with her was a disgraceful dalliance," she admitted reluctantly. "That it was not becoming... for a woman of your station and position. To carry on with the likes of her."

Her eyes were forward, her mouth drawn tight after she finished. There was a long silence after her statement that she dared not break, thinking Shizuru would do it. Shizuru did not. After the weight had become too heavy to bear, Chie finally risked a glance at the younger woman. And was surprised.

Shizuru was smiling.

"Well, Chie-han," she said. "That is a point of view, certainly."

Chie stared at her from beneath drawn brows. She was too amazed to say anything just yet.

Shizuru went on.

"Disgraceful dalliance," she murmured. "Not bad rhetoric, for a ranker, and surprisingly good vocabulary."

Chie took a deep breath.

"Hum." A cough. "I rephrased what he said, actually."

"So I thought. It is typical of them to express themselves in more vinegary language, after all."

"Yes." She hoped that Shizuru would not ask her to repeat the more accurate, more vinegary version. She did not think she had the gall for it yet. "Well, that's so. I can't remember what it was, though."

"The ranker's name?"

Another hurdle: "Haruki Shiro."

Shizuru narrowed her eyes, and Chie knew that she had assigned the name to a face in what was, most likely, a correct assignment. Shizuru fraternised so easily and so frequently with her own soldiers that it was inevitable she would remember some of them-or in her case, given that prodigious memory, most of them. She looked at Chie now with faintly troubled eyes, although the uptilt remained at the corners of her lips.

At least, Chie thought with a niggling sense of disappointment, that one produced some sort of reaction.

"One of my veterans," the commander said with wonder.

"Yes."

"He served with me in the campaign prior to this one."

"That's so."

"Unfortunate."

An abrupt blast of wind set the wheat-coloured hair astir. She did not make a move to brush them aside, and the locks that dangled or had worked free from the ponytail streamed across Shizuru's face like ribbons of bronze-brushed flax.

"Was the flogging truly necessary, in your opinion?" she asked Chie, who was caught off-guard by the question.

"I think so," the legate answered.

"Nao-han does, obviously."

"And you?"

"I?"

"Do you think it was necessary?"

The thoughtful face, aloof in the lift of its chin, grew even more thoughtful.

"My senior legate should know the answer to that," was all she said.

Chie accepted the subtle admonition with a winning smile.

"Sorry. I should, that's true," she said.

Shizuru said nothing, still keeping that frightfully serene smile on her face. Was there nothing that could truly upset it?

"I should be more careful about the things I ask," Chie told her. "By the way, Nao made it clear that you knew nothing of the flogging and that, were it only up to her, you would know nothing about it, so as not to trouble you."

"I see." A meaningful look. "Should it trouble me?"

"Aah." There was the question. "I have to admit I don't know. I think it depends."

"It seems many things are conditional this day. I suppose it depends now on whether or not I should let it?"

Chie shrugged and released a breath of patent ruefulness. Shizuru sighed as well.

"How far has it gone, Chie-han?" she asked.

"Just some murmurs. Nothing to really worry about."

"Perhaps not. But murmuring turns into muttering, which may well develop into full-blown rumbling." Her eyes came alive unexpectedly as she whipped her head towards Chie. "Do you think they would approach her?"

Oho! Chie crowed to herself, even while feeling pinned by that glare. When it comes to that, the smile vanishes, eh?

"Not a chance of it, as far as I'm concerned-and Natsuki-san has her own inviolability, besides," she said confidently, calming the burn in Shizuru's stare. How those red eyes could blaze when it came to her lover! Were Chie not a friend and were it not for the wintry air, she might be sweating under that fierce look right now. "They're good, disciplined boys and girls, our soldiers. I think, too, that they're smart enough to know anything that far would directly pain you, and they love you too much for that, even with the resentment considered. But that's where this comes from. We have to remember."

"What do you mean?" Shizuru was bemused. "This comes from resentment? Have I ever given them cause to resent me?"

"It's not you, but their feelings, their admiration of you," Chie answered. "Haruki Shiro is one of those soldiers who've always admired you and, in the sense applicable only to a soldier and his general, is probably one of those legionaries who is in love with you. You have to understand that your relationship with your legions has always been one great love affair, militarily speaking."

The younger woman's brow creased for a moment.

"Is that love affair so jealous, then?" she asked. "Does that imply I should be wary of even my most loyal legionaries, from now on?"

"No, I wouldn't go that far, Shizuru-san. I think that all it implies is that there will be others who feel like Haruki Shiro." The legate squinted while saying it. "It doesn't mean that every one of them will feel this way. Most of them are amused by it, of course, and highly entertained. Love affairs delight most of the rankers, especially a love affair like yours."

She pushed on swiftly before Shizuru could ask her what she meant by that.

"But for some people, it won't be reconcilable to their ideas and ideals," she followed. "For instance, some people put you on a pedestal that's built partly out of your elevated ancestry, your blood. You know how Himeans love the notion of an idol! They'd like to see that idol's pedestal kept pure as it is in their minds."

The reply was soft, but with enough of a drawl to signify the younger woman's displeasure: "Meaning to say Natsuki's blood and ancestry is an impurity?"

"I don't say it," Chie answered, to douse the conflagration threatening to break out in the other's gaze. "Please excuse me if my tongue's too clumsy to make it sound better. Some people will, and that's all I'm trying to say."

She looked intently at the other woman.

"Shizuru-san," she said. "Some people do."

A few taut seconds passed, after which Shizuru's chin lifted again. She exhaled a short, irritated breath of air through her nose.

"It comes back to that," she then remarked. "As ever."

"Pardon me?"

"Natsuki," said Shizuru matter-of-factly. "Is not Himean."

"No," Chie replied, wondering where this was going. "She isn't."

"That is from where most of this comes, yes? If it were only a matter of ancestry, she could near outstrip even me."

"Well, I think you're right that it's chiefly a matter of her not being Himean." She deliberately avoided commenting on the second part of her friend's statement, as she disagreed strongly with it. Then a thought came to mind. "Shades of Himemiya and her wife, though Himeko-san is still a Himean citizen. And there we can see the big difference, I'm afraid."

"A big difference indeed."

They clopped on quietly after that remark, which Shizuru followed with another.

"Well, then."

A puzzled glance from Chie. "Well?"

" Well, I can remedy that."

"What do you mea-" She broke off as she realised what the younger woman was saying, back snapping rigid as she gaped. Her horse felt the action and quivered up its sides, its muscles stiffening for a second. Chie's own tension was not so curt in duration. " Ecastor! What are you planning?"

The barely concealed twinkle in those crimson eyes gave her the answer.

"But-but-but that's insane!" Chie sputtered, not even trying to hide her shock.

"Is it?"

"You couldn't give her the Extended Rights just on a whim, Shizuru-san, it's sheer insanity! The censors would never stand for it, especially if they know it's for you," Chie babbled, forgetting even to be politic in assuming-and, both of them knew, probably assuming rightly-that the current censors would oppose a recommendation not only from but also personally beneficial to the ever-controversial Fujino. The present censors were firmly entrenched in Traditionalist ranks, after all. "Besides, you know how jealous people get about bestowing those privileges! The Extended Rights are touchy!"

"True," Shizuru replied, knowing full well that she could not gainsay that much about her friend's pronouncement. The Extended Rights were a set of privileges packaged as a special citizenship granted by Hime to some of its oldest and closest allies. These allies were generally native Fuukans who had rendered great service to Hime. There were entire colonies of such citizens near the city of Hime proper, called Extended Rights townships. To understand the concept of the Extended Rights as distinguished from the Himean citizenship as well as from the Fuukan citizenship, one had to understand the geography and history of Hime as distinct from that of Fuuka itself.

Fuuka was the larger mass of land, the name for the great sprawl of territory that held Hime near the middle of its leg-like length. Fuuka was divided into several other territories or provinces, and for some time, the many inhabitants of these territories existed as settlements independent of each other, without a united sense of identity. Then, a hilly little city cradled in Fuuka's centre began to expand, grow increasingly sophisticated, and assert itself with greater and greater power. Its people spread out, populating and dominating other territories through various means, its armies conquering more and more tracts of land and wealth. Beginning as a monarchy, it assimilated the aristocracies of annexed regions into its own, and later evolved into a republic. Eventually, it grew so powerful that it became the most important city not only in Fuuka but also-a good many said and believed-in the civilised world. The inhabitants of that hilly little city had grown into the nation of Hime.

Hime, therefore, had the greatest clout in Fuuka. Certainly the other peoples in the region were let remain, but only after centuries of discord and subjugation, ended when a mass of treaties were struck. These treaties forged a bond of alliance between Hime and the various Fuukan tribes and nations, which were thereafter referred to by Himeans as though a single entity: the Fuukan Allies.

Hime, having the better bargaining position of the stronger party, was naturally the superior in the treaties that had been made. Nonetheless, the Fuukan peoples gained something too, not least of which was a prospective benefit dangled before their noses: the informal promise of eventual enfranchisement. No matter that it was only informal, no matter that "eventual" promised little, and no matter that promises could be broken; the esteem of having a Himean citizenship had grown so high by then that all those contentions could be ignored for the possibility of fulfilment. To be a Himean citizen, to be part of a people who could and had sent unarmed and unguarded persons to stop armies at a mere word! Yes, the possible gains far outweighed the losses-or, at least, that was the prevailing opinion.

The geniuses of the concept of peaceful subjugation, Hime's politicians saw the utility of that opinion. To sustain it over the centuries, they came up with something that would keep appetites whetted without granting complete satiation: the Extended Rights. These were presented as an intermediate step to the final goal of attaining Himean citizenship, a kind of secondary-citizen status that granted most of the liberties of full citizens save such ones as the right of suffrage and the right of candidature. Possession of the Extended Rights, therefore, simplified relations with Hime by legitimising most contracts the possessor might possibly enact with Hime or Himeans. A valuable thing indeed, given that almost everything in the world now touched on Hime's interests and was touched by it in return.

Thus Hime's allies clamoured for the Extended Rights when they were first introduced. However, the status was bestowed only to certain Fuukan allies that had been "excellent" in the service they had rendered Hime-and, as the more astute commentators put it, occupied areas of great strategic importance. For the Extended Rights had been born as a political tool, and were used in the most practical sense, or very politically.

This cold practicality did not alter the fact that those receiving it were mindful of its privileges and special nature. Which is to say that they made much of it. Why should they not? It separated them from the other Fuukans and from the rest of the barbarian world. It made them only one step away from Hime, and if it did not exactly make them best, it did make them better.

And here was the point of Chie's argument, Shizuru knew. Himeans, Extended Rights citizens, and all other Fuukans who cherished dreams of their promised elevation in status, would likely oppose the notion of some odd foreigner being accorded the Extended Rights simply because of her patrician lover. People loved exclusivity, after all, which meant they would guard whatever little they had very jealously. Yes, she could see the repercussion already. She could even see the capital her opponents would make of it, aggravating an already vexing situation.

Oh, the pettiness of people with position! She believed that only those who were small enough in themselves would object to a worthy person receiving such a signal honour. And Natsuki was worthy! Had she not dashed fearlessly into battle for Hime's sake, an ally actually worth her salt? Had she not led the cavalry crashing into the rear of the Mentulaean army at Argentum, even making the personal decision to use a part of them to cleave the enemy mass in half besides assaulting the sides? That tactical choice had only augmented Shizuru's directions to her for the good. Why, were she only Himean, she should have received one of the highest military decorations for it!

People would have to be told about that, she decided. They would be reminded of it, and that would go some way to stemming opposition on this matter. Besides which, she had her own considerable dignitas and auctoritas too to aid her in this venture. These were no small things either!

"Yes, I do foresee the opposition you are fearing," she said. "But I find it trifling and simple enough to overcome. It should be fine."

"Next to impossible, you mean!"

"You say it yourself," the younger woman retorted easily. "Next to impossible . Not impossible itself."

"Still!"

"Still?"

"Shizuru-san, it's just not that simple." Chie shook her head vigorously in bewilderment. "Even if you get her the Extended Rights citizenship, it wouldn't make much of a difference. Everyone would still know."

"What would they know, pray tell?"

Chie gave out an exasperated breath.

"First, they would still know that she only gained it through your assistance," she said.

Shizuru cast her a humorous glance.

"That seems as though my assistance actually reduces the credibility of any proposition," she jested, at which Chie shook her head.

"No, that's not what I mean. Maybe for some people, though, that's so," she retorted, referring to the younger politician's many opponents. "I meant that the apparent, er, relationship between you two wouldn't really be good for the credibility, as you say. It would persuade many to think that you recommended her because of your personal interests in the matter, and not simply because of her noteworthy service to Hime as an ally in battle."

"I suppose some might think of it that way," was the noncommittal reply.

"They would still see her just as a bar-a foreigner," Chie amended swiftly, going on. "I don't think it would change anything for the better and could even make things worse. It could prove a bad move for your career and a futile one for her sake."

"Oh?"

"She'd be a foreigner with the papers of an Extended Rights citizen, sure, but at heart and by blood a foreigner," Chie persisted. "To everyone, she would always be only that."

"Not only that, and not to everyone . "

"No, no, of course not. But people wouldn't like it! They like the snobbery of the Himean citizenship, and the Extended Rights citizens like theirs too. You know that."

"Yes, I do know that. But surely the backlash shall not be too great, Chie-han. She is only one woman."

"But she'd be your woman!"

"So she would!" Shizuru almost- almost! -snapped back. The fine, fair brows were arched proudly, for she was finally goaded. "Even so, what can that be to them and, more importantly, what can that be to me?"

Chie cast a pleading look towards her young friend, whose eyes were ablaze again. She suddenly regretted having said anything leading to this conversation at all: friendship and respect aside, Shizuru really did intimidate her.

"Shizuru-san," she said beseechingly. "I'm not saying this to displease you, so please excuse me if it seems that way. But please do think about it."

Silence fell after this sincere appeal. They had both stopped their mounts and were now at the very centre of the pen, their horses facing each other. Which one had swung her animal ahead and in front of the other's was unclear; they were too occupied by their conversation to note such things.

"I do."

It was Shizuru who spoke.

"I am thinking about it, Chie-han," she said, voice gentle again but huskier than usual. Chie had to manoeuvre her horse back to the white horse's side to properly hear it. "And it is only for that reason that I am even considering that concession, mind you. At the very least, she would be better-treated by Himean law then, and it is the acknowledgement of the law that matters in certain ways for her convenience, I should think-not the inane slurs of gossips and rabble. I beg to differ from your opinion by thinking that it does matter too, to some extent."

She stopped here. Chie felt her heart go out to the younger woman at the flash of uncertainty that passed over the latter's face. That face had never been anything but unassailably confident, proudly certain in all enterprises. But now uncertainty flashed over it, and though it was for no more than an instant, Chie felt herself grieved by the sight.

It seems, she thought, wrong.

"Yes," she finally acquiesced, tempering her oppositions for now and for her friend's sake. "Yes, maybe you're right. It would add a little more acceptability to it, at least officially."

She trailed off as yet another thing struck her about this conversation. Again she stared at Shizuru, who was only the slightest touch puzzled by the abrupt and intense study.

"Shizuru-san, given the way you're talking about this," the legate began slowly, as though measuring each word on her tongue, "does it mean you're keeping her?"

Now what does she mean, Chie wondered after her question, by looking the way I feel?

Again a short silence passed between them, pregnant with all the implications of the question. Neither woman seemed willing to birth them, as though afraid of producing a monstrosity. When the silence was finally breached, the break actually seemed more of a prolongation than a conclusion of the labour pains.

"Oh, right," was what the younger woman sighed. "That."

"That?"

"Indeed. That."

Chie eyed her friend curiously. The patrician's face had gone entirely blank, and the effect of such vacuity on those beautiful, elegantly-sculptured features was disturbing. It seemed to objectify her, render her almost inanimate, such that Shizuru looked no more alive than a marble statue.

Let's breathe some life into it!

"Indeed?" Chie said, repeating the vague utterance. "You mean, 'Indeed, I'm keeping her'?"

A quiver seemed to pass over the blank countenance, but it vanished quickly, seeping into the stone.

"I suppose," Shizuru began. "I confess I have yet to ask, and yet..."

She spoke slowly, though with halting stops. Chie watched and said nothing, fascinated by the spectacle of a Shizuru not just speaking haltingly but also trailing away as though lost for words. Thus she was all the more surprised by the metamorphosis that took place the next second, as Shizuru's face set abruptly into an expression best described as resolute. It was not an expression that settled onto her face like a sheet being thrown on as a cover, but one that rose up from within and leaked out of her, moulding the cover to its inner surge. Chie knew the surge for what it was, knew that riding it was an unbreakable and unexpectedly iron-crushing will. Frightening thing, always! She had seen it sufficient times by now to recognise that it meant her friend was out to crush the odds until they evened or swung to her favour. And she knew-now she knew-that she truly had to be careful.

She did not doubt, looking into that face, that if she was found to be one of the odds, she would be crushed as well.

"Yes," Shizuru pronounced, looking Chie steadily in the eye. " Of course I shall keep her . "

She just had to make sure she had heard it: "You shall bring her to Hime in the future, you mean? After the campaign?"

"Yes. I shall take her with me."

Both of them drew sharp breaths. Finally! There it was, out in the open. Chie had to admit she felt no small measure of satisfaction from the positivity of the statement. So many months of having wondered, so many days of conjecture! There was a certain relief to finally uncovering a decision. But that same relief came attached to a sour and heady whiff of trepidation, and with good reason.

I would tell her that, she told herself, no longer looking at Shizuru now. Her eyes had gone to the cause of this conversation, as had the other woman's. I would tell her that, if it not for the fact that I know she knows it already. I would tell her that it's nearly impossible to carry out her decision, if not for the fact that I've already done so in a way and if not for the fact that she surely feels the impossibility herself.

A sudden flash of doubt insinuated itself into her thoughts.

Or does she?

She slid her eyes sideways, looking at red eyes fixed on far-off green ones and gazing at them with a fierceness and solidifying resolve that made her wonder how much those eyes could see, how far they could look. What was the breadth of Shizuru's perceptions? What were the limitations of that outlook? Why, in god's name, did it seem so all-consuming?

Did Shizuru even feel impossibility?

Chie shivered. Perhaps that was what her friend's essence was, she reflected. Shizuru was not governed by normal humours but by blood that held a drop of divinity in it, a drop distilled throughout the ages from her forbears and spilled, originally, from the veins of Venus. And another drop added to that, from Mars. It was well-known and acknowledged: her divine ancestry, her god-spawned heritage. Great-granddaughter to the gods thirty-eight-or-something generations later.
